

blood-bound camellias

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at <http://archiveofourown.org/works/54403738>.

|                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rating:          | Mature                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Archive Warning: | Graphic Depictions Of Violence                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Category:        | M/M                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Fandom:          | 文豪ストレイドッグス   Bungou Stray Dogs                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Relationships:   | Dazai Osamu/Nakahara Chuuya (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Dazai Osamu &amp; Nakahara Chuuya (Bungou Stray Dogs)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Characters:      | Mori Ougai (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Ozaki Kouyou (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Hirotu Ryuuro (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Oda Sakunosuke (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Akutagawa Ryuunosuke (Bungou Stray Dogs)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Additional Tags: | Hurt/Comfort , Slow Burn , Mafia Soukoku   Double Black (Bungou Stray Dogs) , Torture , you into easter eggs? don't even joke lad , kouyou ozaki's big sister energy (derogative) (?) , Blood and Violence , yk that tumblr quote , i hope you're so happy and i never see anything of it , skk: and i WILL fry him like dry tempura , also skk: i dont love you but i always will , gracious arahabaki god metaphors singularity or not , Angst with a Happy Ending , technically , hirotu gonna be founding a babysitting union , Suicide Attempt , Canon Compliant |
| Language:        | English                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Stats:           | Published: 2023-09-11 Completed: 2024-08-03 Words: 817,373Chapters: 41/41                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

blood-bound camellias

by sapphirestormout

Summary

I could do so much more with you, he'd sworn, studying Sheep-stained bracelets — longing for a claustrophobic place in his skeptical ribcage. To wound from the inside.

See?, he would have said, from that carcass. You bleed too.

Or: Soukoku, in three acts.

Notes

Welcome to this attempt — Please read, before we start. Thanks ;)

1) English is not my first language; I beg you to forgive any particular mistake you will find in this story — and please feel free to let me know in the comments if it's something too atrocious!

2) When I first started writing this story, Stormbringer wasn't a thing at all — the first fanmade, very confused translations began coming out with the entire first arc already written. But having since then become my favorite novel, I absolutely wanted to include everything that it brought forward about Chuuya, Asagiri's beloved spring (and mine). The only detail I couldn't get rid of, and that I ask you to remember, is that in this universe, the events of Stormbringer happened 6 MONTHS after Chuuya joined the Port Mafia — not a year. That's all!

3) While this story is an attempt at narrating what might have happened in Dazai and Chuuya's three years of partnership, apart from events referred to (but never extended on) in the Bsd Wikia, everything is made up by me, and it's certainly not meant to be taken as obligatorily true or realistic. Just my interpretation of facts!

4) This story is divided in six parts; all of them will be posted in this singular fanfiction. Five of the six parts are already written. Updates will, hopefully, not be too sporadic. No beta we die like Odasaku.

5) Do not copy past this work into any other website. Do not print. Bad past experiences.

6) Feeling like I should preface that this story does end with Dazai leaving the PM, which makes the Happy Ending tag more of a... “omg this is a prequel and they're on a weird ass honey moon in a french prison rn thank god” feeling. Let's say Canon Compliant lol.

7) Kudos and comments are always appreciated!

Enjoy!! :)

ONE

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

---

異能特務課

Special Division For Unusual Powers.

Archive 124. Yokohama, JP.

-

On The Righteous And Binding Command of Santōka Taneda.

Second In Command: Sakaguchi Ango.

File Number: 510003

*Reports Dated: From Year ** To ***

Topic: Double Black [双黒].

Ability Users Involved:

Dazai O. [T.S.] [Identification Number: A0000];

Nakahara C. [K.C.] [Identification Number: A5158 // Error. Please refer to file: Prototype A2-5-8].

Compressive Estimated Damage Worth: 550.523.249.200 yen.

Comprehensive Estimated Kill Count: 98.078.002 people.

[Please refer to file: The Formation of Suribachi City; the Nine Rings Conflict; the Dragon Head Conflict; the Annihilation of the Bishop's Staff; the Frostbite Season; The Yokohama Cleanse...]

-

On the matter of the Port Mafia's most feared and powerful asset, the Yokohama harbingers of devastation [...]

---

---

ACT ONE

---

[...]

and they say the rain

each time it comes

brings autumn that much

closer [...]

[autumn poem, nakahara chuuya,

first stanza]

Three days after the body of the late Boss was buried in the Bay, as per tradition, a package was left on the doorstep of the new Head of the Port Mafia.

“You should allow me to take a look at that,” his young companion pointed out. Narrowly hungry eyes brushed by the fireflies-sagged jar on the makeshift nightstand, only barely interested in the midnight-rain soaked box. “If I’m lucky, it might be a bomb.”

Mori Ougai huffed.

Not a far-fetched theory — weirder, deadlier things had been abandoned where mafiosi hoped his feet would walk, ever since the old Boss had been set aside. Some were sensible; other ones got an easy laugh from his disinterested accomplice.

“I refuse to disarm another bomb from under your seat,” he tutted. “You truly have no care for my possessions, do you? I had to order new editions of more than half of my biology archive, last time.”

Privately, the boy couldn’t have cared less. The medicine books lining the glass cases of the clinic had only been somewhat interesting for a blink — Mori had taken them off his hands the moment he had seen him trace skinless drawings and broken bones, and then set his eyes on his own limbs.

Boring.

The doctor abandoned the package on the desk; grabbed the firefly-jar instead, shaking it, amused by the intent way the boy's eyes followed the motion.

Offhandedly, he asked: "Whose grave did you steal it from, anyway?"

He blinked, slowly. His eyes were a tad too wide for his face, and his front teeth curiously crooked; something about his appearance was unsettling.

He had turned fourteen only so very recently; he'd been tied up to the Hospital bed in the corner of the two-stories building only a few hours before — belts wrapped around his spasming limbs; a piece of fabric — once a bridge between his jaws — now bitten and loosened at the edge of his chin, covered in blood and drool.

Safety measures, Mori had explained, over his whines. Then he had studied the gash he had given himself against the rusty bars of the bed, and picked up his stitching set.

That's ugly. Why did you leave a scar?, the boy had whined some more.

He had smiled. Because it's you.

"Steal what?" the boy asked.

"Your name."

Dazai Osamu blinked some more. "Unfair."

"Unfair?"

"You stole yours off the Boss' corpse. I only did the same."

Port Mafia black, he'd told him — handing him the suit he'd worn as blood stained the walls. Clothes and eyes and blood. A one-way ticket to the one place no hitchhiking had ever brought him to. Only the doorstep of a doctor with no frontiers.

"Who said I was going to blame you?"

"Oh," He perched up. Attempted to, before the restrains shoved him back in place. His eye — only one of them, unbandaged — was still on the fireflies. "You're going to kill me, then. Yes?"

He had been waiting for a reward for his quiet obedience. At the root, failure was him — as much as the water the man had sweated to drag him to the bed and keep him alive. The doctor never did expect him to stutter. Of course — he had mostly forced that habit off his tongue. He wondered what face the man would make if he fell back into it.

"I can't recall," the doctor wondered, "Did you want something written on your tombstone?"

"I thought the Port Mafia refused graves."

A small smile. The doctor loomed with the ease of someone much taller; the moonlight framing his silhouette had a crimson edge to it — someone must have killed someone under the Yokohama moon. “You’re not Port Mafia, are you?”

The boy shrugged. It didn’t really matter; the porch had smelled of death, so he had let himself fall. Shadows looked the same everywhere.

“If I end up not having a grave, you can carve it on my corpse.”

“I’m sure you will. A corpse isn’t much to leave behind.”

“It is, if it’s no one’s to inherit.”

A hum.

It wasn’t much, truly. On his first day in that unlikely inferno, he had received a coat. An end and a new beginning, the man had told him.

Beginnings don’t interest me.

Ah — the end has to start somewhere, though. Does it not?

Collaboration, perhaps. Butterfly and a pin, unwilling accomplices — except that Mori had planned for it, and Dazai had stood next to the blood graffiti on the wall, and let them stain his own bandages, and lied. No luckier thief than that of a man who doesn’t want a thing. Someone had to have started the process; someone had to be undergoing it. The only logical conclusion, he thought, was: both of them, neither.

Mori opened the package with little fanfare, messily cutting the edges — the work of an overexcited child under the New Year’s lights. The boy wondered where, exactly, Elise went off when there was no need for pretense.

All they got out of it was a red scarf.

“Oh,” Dazai laid his cheek on the sweat-damp pillow, allowing the sick warmth to seep through his bones. Inside the abandoned jar, one firefly flickered weakly — buckling to the bottom. “Guess hanging myself will have to do.”

Mori Ougai put it on, and that was it.

scene i.

[quietly blew right through]

---

The dog Dazai had dragged home had been acting up spectacularly.

“Was starting a fight all that necessary?” Mori asked, leaning against the doorframe. He studied the dried trails of blood under his nose with a critical eye; only politely amused.

“If you don’t teach them young, they will pee on the carpet until their last day,” Dazai replied, still skimming through the sea of papers he had abandoned on the hardwood floor. “I bought a training manual. If Kouyou’s punishment wand doesn’t have him straight, I shall take care of it.”

Of all the rooms of the Headquarters, the old Boss’ bedroom was the darkest — mocking the still persevering New Years’ lights outside the Chapel-like windows. Reading had hardly ever been easy, what with the only-partly working eye and the echo of failures from childhood — Dazai often felt the urge to tease his shortcomings, though.

Can’t talk and can’t read, she had used to scoff. One wonders how you’re meant to get by.

That’s where you’re wrong.

“I told you, six months ago — that aggravating Slug should have been placed under my orders from the beginning,” Dazai insisted. The marker he was using had been stolen from Madame Tanaki’s secretary desk; she would want it back, empty or not. Always so materialistic. “He didn’t even hit you. Be glad.”

“You boys’ car privileges are still revoked.”

“That’s just unfair. He can fly.”

Mori stepped inside.

Because he was a coward, he knew not to show it — he ranked his eyes over the long-since vanished stains of blood on the walls, slow and urgent; a good intentioned sinner.

He had been damned more than a year before; his eyes were still on the boy by the window.

“The fight against Verlaine left a complicated toll on the city,” Mori reminded him, one hand on the bed’s column. Something about that place never let him stand on his own feet.

“Chuuya, in particular — He can barely talk from screaming his throat raw, wears more bandages than even you, and has just lost his past, his brother, and his friends.”

“Two of those are easily recoverable, though.”

In his hands, the documents went — on the matter of Paul Verlaine and Black n. 12. Then, scratched and rewritten — on the matter of Arthur Rimbaud and Paul Verlaine. Then — Transcendents.

Dazai looked up, blankly. “Aren’t they?”

The Boss tilted his head. “You know.”

It wasn’t a question, so he didn’t answer. It wasn’t all that important. Mori was there, so, of course — Dazai wouldn’t stop thinking.

“Why Slug, anyway?”

“All those wounds he gave himself slowed him down unnervingly,” he replied, obnoxious. The world had looked particularly bright from the roof; Chuuya had barely been a dot in the sky, bleeding profusely — a blessed rain. Cursed, maybe. “Still do. Didn’t you see? He almost missed me when he threw himself over the table to beat me to a pulp.”

“Perhaps if you hadn’t suggested giving him up to the authorities as a terrorist?”

“And, I fed him a slug I found in the rubble, when he passed out on me,” he continued, “I don’t think he’s aware, though. He’s been so boring these last few days. Is mourning truly that vexatious?”

Gloved fingers ruffled his hair. He leaned into it — back, into, away. “Did you have fun partnering up?”

“Not at all,” he chirped. “Who’s Fukuzawa Yukichi?”

Mori paused.

Mori didn’t pause — he corrected himself. He let people think he had been taken by surprise. Dazai had been attempting to steal that little trick for a long time, now.

“An enemy,” he said, eventually. Masterful — Dazai would be a muse until the day he died, and an entertainer even as a corpse. “Unless it was needed for him not to be.”

There weren’t many things Mori needed. He used to make lists of it, spinning on a stool, mixing chemical components in a child cup he had stolen from Elise’s grasp — an Ability Business Permit; a child who held himself disgracefully; for the Government to stop stalking them, for Dazai to talk more, less, slower.

He considered.

“Enemies grant more advantages than allies are able to, often,” Mori added, unnecessarily. “Sincerity regarding intentions is a given. You can hardly not trust someone who has attempted at your life with that same life, can you not?”

He hummed. There was no desk in that room — or he would have sat underneath it, as he did around every table at the HQ, like the cockroach no one could quite step on hard enough.

There was nothing to gain, or he would have insisted.

“Dazai,” Mori called, “There’s nothing you can do.”

His shadow seemed to grow on the wooden floor, stretched bizarrely by the absence of sunlight. Its edges were a border; on the other side, he thought, was his pointless disappointment.

Dazai had dragged gold at a greedy man’s feet, and there was nothing to do but count banknotes until paper cuts bled him out.

“I don’t need him,” he let the man know. Just as unnecessary. “I can get you where you wish to be on my own, and you know it too.”

“I do,” Mori confirmed. “I know better, too.”

“It’s not worth it.”

His skeleton was as light as moon tears — the throat-clenching trust a fool in a choker had placed upon it wouldn’t make it gain a pound.

It had made him magnetic, that was all. Had made a dog the most human thing around.

All he is, Dazai considered, is another chain on my feet.

“No reason to settle for second best, when I can have what you two did in that valley. You know it. No need to be childish about it, is there?”

Verlaine’s picture stared back at him.

I don’t know how to not be, about him, he did not say. Dazai wasn’t stupid. It had been men who wanted him dead and men who bowed to him and fools who did neither; and then Arcade lights and someone whose orders-voice cracked in between vowels too.

Strategically fundamental and fundamentally annoying. I don’t want him here and I don’t want him to fall from the sky and I don’t want him to break my nose again and I don’t want you to look at him.

“You won’t let me die, as long as he’s around.”

Mori nodded. “No, I won’t.”

“I’m not waiting for your permission, though.”

“Kill him, then,” He shrugged. Dazai thought, lips trembling only so — that they were each other’s closest thing to a line in a testament. “Slash your throat over his corpse. We don’t dig graves in the Mafia, but I will ask them to disperse your ashes by the same shore.”

Not even that freak of a doctor would have survived cutting Dazai’s brain open to take a peek. He knew; he had tried.

Mori Ougai was, quite simply, a fool.

“Alright, then,” He gathered his papers; gathered the former Boss’ ghost from a grave bed — because he had killed him once, and he had killed him twice, and he would kill him again. “I wanted to ask — Why did you put Verlaine in the Ivy Dungeons?”

The man did not speak.

Then, inevitably, “They’re my favorite.”

“Oh.” He tilted his head to the side. “That is very stupid.”

“Is it? What’s your favorite spot?”

“In our territory?”

“Yes.”

Dazai drew a smiley face on the paper. It looked distinctively bored. “I don’t have one.”

Mori smiled, too. Nonsensically, he thought — good job.

Later, he made his way to the West Bay, where the waters were the greyest and the smell seemed to linger on clothing with each step.

Few passersby appeared — mostly unlucky workers, whom the holidays refused to quieten; occasionally, a wandering couple or two, huddled under an umbrella and painted red and gold by the festive illuminations. It was a romantic season, he knew; it had hardly helped him find a suicide companion. Most wouldn’t die at Christmas, if they could pick.

There was a corpse at the edge of the port.

Interested, he leaned on the railing a few feet upon it — pressing his upper body down until the metal sunk painfully against his waist. With his heartbeat pulsing in his wrists, he hummed.

A woman was crouched next to the body, pale hands fumbling with the filthy red crater on his chest, and his exposed ribcage. The man’s jaw was moving — whatever he was saying, Dazai was too far to hear his last words. Whatever it was that reflected the dim moonlight in the woman’s palm, it was too deeply soaked in blood for him to see.

She brought a phone to her ear, and simply said: “Now, V.”

Lifetimes and seconds raced across beautiful features, framed by dirty blond braids — she could have been even younger than Dazai, or she could have existed longer than that Western Bay had. All he knew was that she was smiling.

Gentle fingers rested on the corpse's eyes, lowering the eyelids. She mouthed something, holding her dug up treasure close to her chest — religiously. With ease, she pushed the body over the edge of the stone floor, watching it dangle between the waves — and disappear, quietly, through the bruise-painted sea.

Holding his feet up, Dazai wondered about the point of saying hello, sweetly and promisingly, to a dead man walking.

---

ONE MONTH LATER

---

---

chapter i.

---

Case number: 18009567

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. were summoned to the HQs, Building One. Under the orders of [...]*

---

Dazai was good at cutting loose.

Despite numerous proofs of said fact — ranging from Mori's exasperated sighs at the empty space next to him, to the infamous Spain Accident — his ribs, pressed so viciously against the rain-wet wall of the alley he could read the graffiti on the stone even with his eye set on the road, didn't seem to agree.

"Hasn't this gone on long enough?"

Beads of sweat gathered at the edge of ever present bandages, mixing with the raindrops — he held his breath, sinking his nails in the wall until his heartbeat slowed down. He was still perfecting the trick, to be fair; still, the sudden lightness of his body was addicting. The sound of distant steps joined the voice battling the storm; it sounded as out of breath as he was. They had been running for centuries — only his pursuer's age could challenge the obsessive attention Dazai had dedicated to memorizing every inch of Yokohama.

The steps got closer. His fingers spasmed uselessly against a nonexistent trigger. Nowhere to go.

Unless.

"Hey!" the voice snapped, right as the too-long edges of his coat brushed the tips of their reaching hands. Almost — but too late.

Dazai paid it no mind, climbing up the rusty ladder of some abandoned emergency stairs. His feet landed brusquely enough to rattle his teeth, scraping across the roof of the nearest unstable building — and then he was running again, stalked by the clouds turning the sky into a silver rainfall.

Despite the mudless ground the roofs allowed him, the jumps got dangerously close to Mori-will-whine-and-bring-a-cast territory soon enough — he slid down the nearest pipe, landing right in front of a running taxi.

"Watch where you're going!" the driver snarled, over the symphony of horns of the road.

Dazai slid down his hood; he dove into the midday traffic, squinting with only one eye at the blurred world. He refused to venture to the sidewalk — it had been crowded before, under the threatening sky; and it had stubbornly remained so, even when umbrellas had begun not to fit. Too many people were never as good of a disappearing prop as mafiosi insisted they were.

He only missed it for one reason — the icky, uncomfortable feeling of rain sticking against the sheep-patterned socks he had bought as a joke and kept out of boredom, justified by old Port Mafia sayings. Never wander around with blood sticking to your shoes.

A flash of familiar purple lit up the storm.

Unmerciful, a closed umbrella — powered by an Ability that died the moment it hit him right on the back, leaving him whining and half-bruised to the kitten-like grab of his pursuer's annoyed hands — shattered the rain.

He whined, disappointed.

“Honestly, Dazai,” Hirotsu Ryuro heaved, gloved hands strangling the steering wheel of some car he would bet he had hotwired. Perhaps he was imagining Dazai's throat, instead; in any case, no one in the Port Mafia ever really touched him. “Was the swim in the pond necessary?”

“Shh,” he tutted, pointing at the half-soaked book on his lap. “I'm trying to read.”

“Now you want to read.”

“Maybe it was my aim all along. Red light!”

It wasn't — but the startled halt he performed still bruised the man's knees.

Capture had come in the shape of the creak of whatever pre-War engine had once brought that vehicle to life successfully; Dazai wouldn't have called any part of that show a torture for information — but the swaying hips of the dancer-toy hanging from the rear view mirror were slowly devouring his sanity.

He scribbled it on the corner of his book. A consideration for the torture methods dissertations Mori loved having him write.

“Not to mention the ruckus you caused to Squad 104,” the man insisted, swerving through the traffic. There was always a fragrance of sorts around the Commander of the Black Lizards — cologne and viscera, and second hand-smoke. “The disrupted funeral, the attention from the police — what were you even doing in that fish market storehouse? Have you been locked up there for the last three days? No one could find you.”

“I know Mori gave you a disgraceful job, but you don't really have to find me,” Dazai let him know, helpfully. “In fact — I bet everyone would have so much more fun if you didn't.”

“Respectfully,” the man insisted, “Sending the entire organization in a frenzy every time the Boss summons you is — unprofessional, to say the least.”

“And inconvenient for you?” Dazai guessed, more gleeful than the storm outside should have allowed.

Unfair, he considered. The last time he'd truly caused a frenzy, he'd pointed a gun to his temple in the middle of a boring meeting with the third-to-lowest rank of Intelligence. But Mori had stuck him on the table, after — it had been weeks since the last true frenzy.

Munching the line between respect and annoyance was mildly exhilarating — waiting for it to snap violently enough to bring the Boss' loyal Commander to —

"Very much so," Hirotsu muttered. Hope died like a flame — he was too stubborn to ever lay a finger on the Boss' precious —

Butterfly, he considered. The man's clothes were covered in mud — even his monocle hadn't been left unscathed by the flower shop he had catapulted the two of them into. Little butterfly on the wall.

"These days, I have two of you to locate — in case you've forgotten."

Imperceptibly, his fingers tightened around the red edges of his guide.

"Ah, yes," he said, plainly. "Makes Run from the handler much more exciting, don't you think?"

"That is certainly a way of putting it." The Commander's eyes darted to him.

Strikingly cautious, always — long gone were the days of curiosity, sneaking looks to the boy who kept knocking on every door, hoping Mori would let him take part to boring meetings. Fourteen and fifteen were only so different.

"What does Boss even want?" he huffed. "There are no uncompleted tasks, no meetings I've purposefully missed, and no breaches in my new security measures. I've checked. I haven't even played any new pranks," Little white lie of its own right, but he doubted the old man would care about the surprise he'd left for Executive Ace. "I refuse to play dress-up with Elise again. I don't care if she's mad at him."

"I believe it's something a bit more serious than that."

"Oh," Red shone bright in the corner of his uncovered eye. "Do tell me more."

Dazai was out of his seat a beat later.

His feet slipped down the concrete, pushed by the motion — glowing hands were slammed on the edge of the driver's door, startling Hirotsu to the point of convenient distraction.

"Damn you, Dazai!"

He sprinted down the bottled-up lines of traffic, abandoning Hirotsu's curses and the barks of sneers from the newcomer behind.

[The world handler — he sometimes mused — inevitably brought vaguely pet-like premises and consequences with it.

As such, he had been more than happy to use that title in regards to the other cursed half of that unwanted nannying, and his clear need for a muzzle of sorts. Mori wouldn't have liked the use of such practices against the mouths of his dearest investments, though — so, a dog-sitter would do.

God knew Nakahara Chuuya needed one].

“You need to stop hijacking the syndicate's encrypted line to make me do your chores!” the boy screamed, leaving obvious indents on the roof of every car he was using as a foothold to catch up with him. “Wait until I tell the Archivists you’ve been messing with their shit!”

“Which revenge method is that?” he called, instead of saying, I didn't know if you'd come.

“Two hundred and go fuck yourself!”

Where have you been for the last month, was another candidate — but he wouldn't have dared. Lest obsession got mistaken for care; lest boredom got mistaken for obsession; lest he got mistaken for a match to the neurotic way Chuuya's eyes tended to follow him.

[You misunderstand, Mori had told him, patting his head. He's your handler too, Dazai.

An ungrateful job.

That had to be Hirotsu's view on the matter; not that he would have ever dared to describe it as such. He was a smart man, who recognized threats as instinctively as thunder. Smart men — he knew — were to be trusted as far as you could throw them.

Sturdy as he was, the old man wouldn't even reach the other end of the street].

The sky thundered. They ran.

The Alley — as their collective, partially sarcastic efforts had decided to refer to it — was located several neighborhoods after the Port Mafia Headquarters. The thirteen stone steps that led to it began abruptly, between an old apartment complex and some bar with an indigo neon sign that washed the stone in its bluish shade. The space was suffocating; the roof-ed dead end was framed by broken pipes, raining a thick curtain of water that mostly hid the alcove from sight.

At the price of getting soaked.

“Piece of shit,” Chuuya muttered, shaking his head like a wet dog, slamming a fighting boot on the pipes, nonetheless.

They squeezed in. He wouldn't have been able to sit on the ground with his legs straight — his shoes would have bumped against the metal fence door taking the place of a dead-end wall. There was nothing behind it, unlike what they had thought — but they'd found other uses for it.

“Move your ass,” the redhead hissed, “Gramps’ gonna find us soon, with the trail of destruction you left behind those fat feet of yours.”

Then, right as Dazai sorted through his pins, he proceeded to punch a hole through the rusty doorknob of the metal wall-safe.

“I was about to pick the lock from that,” he informed him, helpfully, as he did each time.

“You can do it next time,” Chuuya replied, just as habitually. His glance lingered a second too long. “You have a peach flower in your shitty hair. Where is it?”

“What?”

“The painting. Where is it?”

“Did they stuff your ears in whatever kernel you were locked up in for a month? I meant —“

A huff. Gloved fingers puckered something from his fringe; instead of crumbling it, Chuuya let the broken flower float to the ground. “Well?”

Dazai extracted the thin package from the back of his pants, tearing the princess-themed paper he had wrapped it with apart.

It was a small thing — wet from the run, but rusted in ways that only spoke of time. Still life was portrayed through dark strokes; fruits and plants and wilted flowers Chuuya only analyzed for a bit, before shoving the painting into the case.

His sleeve rose. A scar blinked.

He thought of red lighting in the sky.

Rain tapped gently onto the pipes; Dazai, whose body seemed not to know how to react to the notion of something it was being subjected to, blurted out: “Hirotsu is going to have to pay tickets for half the city.”

“Suits him.”

He gasped. “An aspiring Executive refusing to pay respect to his superiors? How scandalous.”

A vein in Chuuya’s temple pulsed.

The trio’s forced coexistence, under Mori’s smiling orders, had not been an easy feat — all three of them were too mistrusting for it. Dazai and Chuuya’s alliance had never been vocalized; only signed on the concrete they would practice rounds of Run from the Handler on.

“You slashed three of his wheels before we left,” Chuuya snarled. His hands struggled to keep the bundle of stuff inside the case — silverware, collection stamps, knives, padded cuffs, deck of cards. “Maybe the first reasonable thing you’ve done in your life.”

“Is that how you talk to the man doing you a favor?”

*“A favor my ass. You lost three consecutive rounds at Zombie Apocalypse III. You landed yourself in this treasure hunt bullshit business.”*

Trickling strands of hair were plastered to his freckled face. He had been trying to keep an ugly ponytail alive ever since joining; now, cut off at its root, its remains laid on his nape, soaked and muddy, like a wound. There were only so many ways one could look at Nakahara Chuuya — evaluating a threat, or dodging a flying kick. Or searching for him over the edge of the national average height.

“You’re not getting out of your debts so easily,” the boy muttered, like a second thought, as he punched the case-lock in again.

Which ones?, he didn’t ask.

They both knew the Flags weren’t on him. They both knew Dazai had been willing to pause the end of the world. They both knew he had played Hopscotch as Chuuya’s veins tasted electricity.

They knew Dazai had looked at him, one day, and had yet to look away. In the good and in the bad of it, he imagined Mori sighing.

He didn’t know if people were supposed to look different after a month of absence. No one who had left for that long had ever returned — corpse or curse. Kouyou’s still not-quite trusted fingers had begun to snap the street-kid-hunch out of him. His gaze was distant — settled on people Dazai had seldom met, and never cared to mourn. Settled on a boy who’d stolen his face but given Chuuya thief-guilt anyway.

“Sure,” Bandages always got scratchy under that weather — he got rougher. Chuuya had started wearing a leather jacket again; the scars he was hiding underneath had haunted Dazai’s mind for a whole month. “Because if it’s my atonement, Chuuya’s not to blame.”

His jaw was clenched. A bead of water fell from his eyelashes; it landed on that hard line.

“How much is left?” he asked. Silence was an unlikely result in any car crash occurring between the Mafia’s youngests. It sounded slightly less mean than: how come you aren’t done mourning yet?

“A shit ton,” Chuuya replied. Dazai didn’t know how to feel about the hideous hat — even less so, about the familiar chain hanging from it. “Might be done by Spring, though.”

“Maybe, if you hadn’t vanished to some tacky French hat store for a month —“

“Kouyou sent me to the border,” Not even the sapphire tinge of that place was enough to placate his firework palette; he was as headache-inducing to look at as always. “And fuck you, the hat is cool.”

“The hat is so not cool. There are no words to describe just how not cool the hat is.”

“It’s not — Like you have been around! What’s this I hear about you becoming a stalker?”

Dazai whined, long and bored, sliding down the nearest wall until his legs were bent and his tie half choking him. “Mori’s decided his spies aren’t enough eyes and ears around the city.”

“If you’re not careful, the Demon Prodigy will find out,” Chuuya mocked. “The Demon Prodigy is listening. The Demon Prodigy is in the crack of all our asses. Have you been going around with a chainsaw and a fucking mask?”

There was solace in being despised before being feared — it was not rewarding. Ghosts were often feared, but rarely were they cursed.

He hoped his soul wouldn’t linger, anyway.

“They talk about you too.”

“They aren’t even sure it was me, ” The boy brushed the matter aside. It was true — maybe because Mori wasn’t sure he could bet on a second round, he had been hesitant to claim the mess that had gone down in December. “Last thing I need. I’ve been back for two hours, and everybody’s been asking about the famous King of Assassins. ”

Dazai wondered if he noticed the way the name lingered on his tongue; unwilling to leave. Then, inconsequential, he said — because it was true, and obvious, and there were things Dazai knew not to touch: “Some of the Flags’ people blame you for it.”

Chuuya stood so still his outlines trembled.

Dim, he concluded. The local dog looked strangely dimmed out. Either a mourning attire — or Arahabaki’s tightened grip, after tasting air not enclosed by human lungs.

That could be an issue.

He spat out: “Stay out of my —“

Purple broke through from the top of the stairs, along to the roar of the thunder, framing hellbent eyes.

They weren’t quick enough.

---

...

---

“Honestly, Dazai.”

Double strike, he thought.

Mori's face peeked under the edge of his office desk — where Dazai had stuck his offended body, the moment the guards had slammed the doors shut behind them. Only the latest of the dead things to crunch under there. “Do you guys truly need to exhaust poor Hirotsu like that?”

A huff came from the other side of the desk. “It wasn't even my fault.”

He snapped up. “That's such a lie — “

His head hit the makeshift roof.

Mori shook his head, sighing. “I suppose the Commander knew the risks. At the very least, you two aren't quick to find reliance,” A wink; a little hidden interaction, because he liked those. “Trust a man only as far as you can throw him, correct?”

That's what I said, he didn't let him know.

“You should tidy up,” Dazai offered, instead, unprompted. “You have so much room these days. Invest less on those gloomy curtains you like so much, and get someone to clean dust off these shelves,” He forced himself to sneeze. “Suicide by cold doesn't sound appealing.”

“Your recent interest in tidiness will never cease to amaze me,” Mori's eyes flickered to his mud soaked socks. He didn't blink at the childish design; only offered him a pair of shoes from one of the drawers.

A single size too big, of course. At their root, they shared pettiness.

Would you mind standing up?, he didn't ask. Renunciation wasn't his kind of death. You will ruin your back. You will scare poor Madame Tanaki. Indecorous. Mean. Is it the headaches again, Dazai?

With a bored sigh, he extracted himself from the desk.

Only an offensive number of two of the Black Lizards assigned to constant-Mori-watch stood at the doors, unconcerned with the halfway traitors they were meant to keep from running out. He waved cheerfully at Sama, Mori's well known favorite — she didn't even blink, but her dirt-blond eyebrows twitched.

Before allowing him to go stand a good distance from Chuuya's quietly seething frame, the doctor made sure to offer him one of the thickest dossiers on the desk — resting all his weight on its edge. His skin itched. Tiredness, he considered. Watching things of the world get touched by him was bound to grow exasperating, at some point.

Not one to keep the dog waiting on the porch, Dazai leaned down, pointedly, whispering: “I almost forgot you were there. Ever thought about putting a bell on that collar of yours?”

His eyes stayed forward. “Go fuck yourself, Bandages.”

He roamed through the pages in his hands — loudly. The leather of the boy's gloves creaked.

Boredom was a thorn in his side; so tightly intertwined with his ribcage it sometimes felt like an embrace. On the verge of puncturing his lungs — on the verge of being extracted. Stuck. Unfortunately, Dazai was made for obsession.

“Say,” he added, “Are your torture ouchies all healed up?”

Chuuya's head snapped in his direction as if electrocuted. “You—“

“Ah-ah — don't go and feel special! Being tortured is somewhat of an entrance exam for the Port Mafia.”

“Yeah?” He challenged, with the same tone he had used to formally accept the Unofficial Deadly Dazai and Chuuya Prank War, months before — much to the entire syndicate's chagrin. “Wanna retake yours?”

“Then,” Mori interrupted, abrupt enough to straighten them. “What's this I hear about you two hacking the encrypted communication line, now?”

Eerily coordinated, they fell silent.

Lectures had existed even in the Before Hatrack — a vague parenthesis of time, peaceful and weary; a chest that did not know the taste of a boot cutting its breath short and splitting life in two parts — but they had grown irreparably in the after.

No clone, he had once insisted to Mori, half high on painkillers, could ever be that annoying and still lack an off button.

“...for two Executives candidates,” Scolding did to Mori's features what spring did to dead flowers. It couldn't birth anything — it could, still, cruelly highlight the contrast. The smell of rotten usually became tasteless. “You boys need to understand that power alone will not get you where you wish to be. Bringing honor to your organization is a duty you accepted when you joined. Whether you wish to cause them or not, your childish antics do nothing but create obstacles to your aims,” A smile. “I would expect better from some of my best strategists.”

“I'm a strategist,” Dazai muttered. “He's just a dog with convenient rabies.”

Chuuya's gloved palm printed itself on his nape, almost sending him flying forward. “And you're a walking mummy some idiot didn't lock well enough inside a shitty tomb!”

Mori stared at the ceiling.

Some people in the syndicate, he had heard, — because lately he heard everything, as he did before; but with permission — called their coexistence an investment. Most were simpler men — they only called it a bother.

“We didn't even sabotage the line, anyway,” Dazai spoke up. “I simply created another channel, and made sure the main one would occasionally play Elise's favorite cartoon jingle.

To lighten up the men's days!"

Chuuya's teeth creaked. Unenthusiastically, he encouraged: "And it's the twenty four hours long loop too."

"Lovely, right?"

"I'm sure."

"Plus, you've been saying they rely on the line too much — This is the perfect occasion to force some autonomy."

"Someone should fix the in-ears, by the way," Chuuya added. "Why are they shaped like pears? They hurt like a motherfucker."

"Thank you boys, for your fore-thinking," Mori's eyebrow curled, blocking Dazai's lips from delivering a mockery. "Unfortunately, we cannot afford it, as of now. Especially considering..."

He trailed off.

Thunder shook the floor-to-ceiling windows, painting shapeless golden shadows on the endless shelves behind the man's back. Over an exchanged glance, they frowned.

Chuuya dared: "Considering?"

The man cleared his throat. Dazai breathed, very slowly.

"Do better," Mori ordered, at last. "I'm afraid that, otherwise, measures will need to be taken. You don't want to lose more privileges, I'm sure — You've just returned, Chuuya. Given recent endeavors, I'm expecting great things from both of you."

His smile grew distant. Ask him where he was, Dazai thought about whining. Ask him why he left, he won't lie to you. Ask him to tear his skull open for me to get a peek and he will do it.

Great things.

From the corner of his eye — only for a mere blink — he could have sworn he saw black smoke wings, erupting from the silhouette next to him. He wondered if his bones screeched at night. If being caged was different from being vacant.

(With a show of trust, he thought, came something sharply more obstinate. Dazai didn't care about being worthy of something he hadn't asked for — maybe it was the obsessive blinking of a man whose dog had almost been run over.

A need to keep an eye on him, which he would have despised. A need to despise him, which he would be looked at for).

The Boss concluded, smiling like the thin moon: "I'm certainly looking forward to some more collaboration. It would be a shame if you allowed something as childish as dislike to interrupt your current winning streak, yes?”

Eyes low, they exchanged a glance.

Stupid, Dazai thought.

Uncharacteristically blind, even, from a man who lived off understanding. They had been racing against each other since the first granule of debris from Suribachi City had landed on his tie. It was the only way he'd ever managed to convince him to go along to his unimportant desire for a normal enough intake of air and two pairs of joysticks; by betting he wouldn't.

“Well, then,” Mori clasped his hands. “I’m sure you understand. I will see you at the next briefing. Dazai, I want those security plans I asked for on my desk by tomorrow —“

“That’s so soon! I had this poisonous mushroom I wanted to —“

“— Chuuya, you can refer to Kouyou for the next troubles we’re going to need your help with. Until then, you may continue showing us wonderful results in the jewel department,” The former doctor might have as well kicked them out, with the grin he offered. “Please, do try not to make my Commander lose his patience enough to quit.”

“If he hasn’t quit in seventy years, I doubt he will now,” Chuuya rumbled.

“Hirotsu’s not even fifty.”

“He isn't?” they chorused, disbelieving.

“Apart from car privileges, maybe we can find something else to take,” Mori continued, undeterred. “Perhaps talking ones. Maybe that Arcade you two seem to like?”

They kept quiet.

He pressed: “If that’s all?”

A mumble: “Yes, Boss.”

The doors opened.

“Oh,” Executive Ace blinked. “Would you look at that. The Demon Prodigy and the Jewel Prince walk into an emergency meeting.”

Dazai had always thought the man vaguely resembled a guinea pig — perhaps the coat hanger at the entrance of Building Four. The displeased curve of his mouth said everything they would ever need to know about his opinion of them.

“You’re the one who came in, actually,” he informed him.

“Prince?” Chuuya snapped.

A gelid smile. “Yes, isn’t it nice?”

“Certainly clever,” he tutted. “You could have informed us about your blood lineage sooner, though. Did you copulate with a dog?”

Matching disgusted expressions found him. They still didn’t quite manage to distract themselves from each other.

Predictable, of course — Ace made jewels from lives; Chuuya had made himself a life from jewels — smuggling affairs no one had conducted as efficiently as he had, in the entire Port Mafia’s history.

Not even Dazai himself. Allegedly.

A good explanation for jealousy — except it was much easier. As the man knew too well, Boss liked most people in the Port Mafia — no matter how canine — more than he liked Executive Ace.

It took them a moment to catch up.

“Emergency meeting?” Chuuya echoed, with a squinted look to Dazai, first — did I miss something? — and then Mori. The last emergency meeting between the Executives had concerned an assassin from France, and his so-called brother. “Has something happened? Ane-san —“

“Nothing you two need to concern yourselves with,” the former doctor was quick to say, amiably, laying one hand on each of their shoulders. Gently, but firmly, he pushed them towards the door, pretending not to notice Dazai’s curled eyebrow. “Just boring old Executives matters, yes?”

“You said we’re candidates,” Dazai pointed out, as obnoxious as possible. “Should we not practice?”

His grip tightened. “There are many candidates.”

“No, there aren’t.”

“Yes, there are. If we gave everyone on-field training; secrecy would be lost.”

“Besides, this isn’t a matter for children,” Ace intervened, as they brushed past his tacky coat. Gems were hidden in every stroke of his clothing, every unnoticeable detail.

Chuuya’s entire body seemed to jolt forward for a death grip, even with his hands still stuck in his pockets. “Call me a child again, if—”

He cleared his throat.

The boy clenched his teeth. “Sir.”

“When you say corpses,” Dazai insisted. At the very edge of the doorframe, he sunk his nails into the wood, fighting not to be pushed out. “Do you mean our men or enemies?”

“Corpses are corpses,” Mori replied, as if he had ever truly been a doctor. “Nothing you need to concern yourselves with.”

“But I want to see them — “

“I could help,” Chuuya offered.

“Victories truly get to youngsters’ heads,” Ace huffed, flaunting his steps towards the main desk. Dazai began to consider that perhaps, the bomb they had left in his office during a rougher round of the Prank War had gotten to him. “You are good enough assets, boys. But you cannot yet bring thirty three of our men back from death, can you?”

“Thirty men?”

Mori’s smile froze — sharpened. “Perhaps some confidentiality, Ace?” he called, fogging up the windows with his tone alone.

Chuuya hid a snort in his fist. Dazai studied the glimmer of entertainment in the Boss’ eyes — as familiar as the sight of his own bones; of butterflies on a wall — and he didn’t.

Paling, the man bowed.

If he could feel Mori’s gaze on him, he was smart enough not to attempt to meet it. Yokohama’s own Taishan Fujun, and his many reasons to be angry. His little efforts to be so.

“Forgive me, Boss,” he grimaced, too late.

“How did we lose more than thirty men without knowing how?” Dazai asked. “Have you checked their pockets? Is it gruesome? Do their faces show a bliss I can only begin to imagine? Maybe they went to the Pomegranate and found a woman to—“

Chuuya’s furious gaze snapped to him. “How is that your first thought, honestly —“

The doors were opened a bit more. With little care and an exaggerated sigh, Mori shoved them out — his scarf brushing the floor; his eyes hidden behind curtains of ink hair.

An old pose — mastered from nights with his hands still wet from this or that assassin sent to get him, or to irritate him, or to not be useful.

“Nothing you need to concern yourselves with,” he spelled out, one last time. Dazai felt him lie with the ease of the changing seasons. “Someone will let you know if I need your collaboration. Welcome back again, Chuuya. Oh — and do fix the communication line, would you? We might just need it, very soon.”

With that, and with his widest smile, he slammed the doors on their faces.

---

...

---

It was, ultimately, Hirotsu's fault.

"Who the fuck does he think he is, anyway," Chuuya mumbled, bent over the pile of reports they had been tasked with typing into files.

It was an Archivist's job, though Dazai had been the one to introduce the concept of it, tired of dusty dossiers and glasses-wearing men — and Archivists were hardly mafiosi who could demand entertaining work. It was certainly a change from Kouyou's mandated calligraphy lessons — arising whenever they happened to irritate her just a bit too much.

It certainly made it harder to pile his work in Chuuya's hands. Computers were heavy.

"As if he's never eavesdropped on the upper floors. Everyone eavesdrops on the upper floors," His tsk! matched a thunder from outside, only slightly more vicious. "That's why they're there."

It was factually untrue, but Dazai could easily imagine how his time with the Flags might have created that belief. The one time he had seen Albatross from up close, the man had been eagerly pretending to read the texture of a fake plant by Mori's office.

"Yeah," He nodded, energetically, sprawled out in his seat. Mori would hate it. "That's why."

A flash of yellow and red popped up from the shorter side of the desk. "I don't see the point," Elise chirped, with that nails-on-chalk tone of hers, flattening one rosy cheek against the ink-spilled mahogany. "You should just hear everything, all the time, everywhere — Like I do!"

Chuuya opened his mouth. Wisely, he eventually opted out from explaining.

Spying on the meeting had been the natural conclusion to the circumstances, though — Dazai could only blame the other boy's intoxicating presence on his foolish decision to pick the easiest route. Being found crunching down and bruising each other in an attempt to stick an ear through a slot of the doors was all but dignified.

Elise had caught a glimpse of them — screeched their names, obviously, because she was a delight in pastel and Mori's clammiest grip. Hirotsu, still panting for breath, had only been merciful enough not to drag them by the ears.

"Yes, thank you, 'Lise," Dazai patted her head, yawning — because Mori patted his head, and he disliked it. "I've been telling Chuuya his phenomenal canine senses have gone rusty."

Every pen on the table jumped with his slammed hands. “And I’ve been telling her that she should do us all a favor and shove a doll’s foot up down that big mouth of yours —“

“He did tell me that,” Elise nodded. “And this is boring, so maybe I should.”

Dazai’s office was a square of pale walls and endless crimson carpets, optimal for hiding blood. It was, according to the voices, one of the fanciest in the Five Buildings — the most he had ever felt towards it had been mild curiosity, upon noticing an alluring hook on the roof.

It was mostly empty. Recent additions, though, had stained the pristine atmosphere — Chuuya’s A Sore Loser fliers he had yet to hang around the HQs, the lighter he had stolen from Hirotsu, Elise’s favorite doll, a scribbled drawing of blood Q had left there, and a Dogs Not Allowed sign Chuuya kept throwing out of the window.

“Why the hell does it smell like fish in here, anyway?” Chuuya retched, looking around. “Did you adopt a life-sized mackerel and stick it up your ass or something?”

“Crude,” he hummed, clicking absently on the mollified buttons of his game console. “Might be the expired fish I forgot to place in the vents.”

From his guarding spot in front of the doors, Hirotsu almost dropped his cigarette. “You what?”

“How did you forget?” Chuuya grunted. The pile of documents between them seemed to appeal to him even less than it did to Dazai; it probably had something to do with the Grammar For Beginners books he had noticed piling up in Kouyou’s office. “Was the smell that familiar?”

Dazai showed his tongue. Chuuya rolled his eyes.

Eyes.

Corruption had swept through Yokohama mercilessly, not unlike the snow beginning to fall from thunder-plump clouds. It had left changes in the wind — new gloves for Chuuya’s hands, twelve and half new pages in Mori’s files on him, and a burned iris in the boy’s left eye.

His new — somewhat heavier — gaze had no solution and no question; one eye as efficient of a cage for the sky as ever, the other the color wood might take if burned at the edges.

A hand appeared on the other side of the desk. “Dazai smells like guns, though. And crab,” Q informed them.

“That’s because crab is a delicacy.”

“I like salmon!” Elise intervened.

“You don’t even eat.”

“I’ll eat you!”

“Unlikely,” Crab was good, though. All of the empty cans under his bed were good, whenever he remembered to snap them open. Favorites were a more complicated issue. None of it ever stuck.

“No, he smells like dead fish,” Chuuya swore. He sent a furtive look to their sentinel. “Not the only dead thing around here either.”

The GAME OVER text blinked. “Not the usual dead thing,” Dazai hummed.

Q didn’t seem particularly interested in the intricacies of the convo. It was already a miracle they had uttered more than a senselessly eerie word the whole day — visits out of The Room mostly consisted in sulking around, absently scratching their arms, and staring Dazai down with those strangely shaped pupils of theirs.

They liked Chuuya, though — much to the boy’s badly hidden disappointment, whenever he caught the bloodthirsty child hiding under his coat. Dazai was simply tired of filing protests for unpaid nannying at Mori’s desk.

“I know many dead things,” Elise pointed out, blinking at Q with all the superiority of a less-child-than-you attitude. The line of her mouth wasn’t quite human.

Mori insisted she had been different, before.

Before the War, Dazai assumed. Perhaps her penchant for youth had begun when there were no more wounded to suck dry. As far as he had been able to extract from her distracted eyes, her only thoughts on the change were —

Ah, blame him! If he hadn’t been so obsessed with that little doctor girl!

The children were still talking. “You do?”

“Yes! Rintarou was a doctor, you know.”

Q bit their lip, fascinated. “Can I see?”

“Of course! If we dig around a bit, we can find Dazai’s old grasshoppers.”

He winced. “The ones you danced on?”

Chuuya made a face. “Why would you raise grasshoppers of all things?”

“I was hoping to one day find a potion that would turn me into a creature small enough to ride on them,” Dazai sighed, starting a new game. “A bit like you. And then, I would use them to jump to Saturn, and die of asphyxiation.”

“That’s bullshit.”

“I truly hope you’re not referring to the size part.”

“Saturn is less dense than water,” Chuuya insisted. “Theory of flotation, jackass. If you put —“

“I know many oceans,” Elise swore.

Q gasped. “Do you?”

“Ane-san should have never given you those Physics manuals,” Dazai scoffed. “You’re turning into a full nerd —“

“I’m fucking not —“

“You can’t be the ominous gravity user and a nerd,” he whined, undeterred. “It’s gonna be bad for business. People will start fearing you might give them homework instead of threats.”

“How about I show you some —“

“Boys,” Hirotsu called, dryly. “The reports, if you would.”

A little respect would do you good, Kouyou was the only one brave enough to chirp, usually. Proper and beautiful; far away and smacked away from his hands before he could even imagine brushing against her kimono. He’d be more polite, he thought, if he had been left in her care instead. He’d be blinder.

What had Ace told Mori? She has yet to say a word — yet to even scream. Being found next to a corpse shouldn’t cause such a close-off, I believe.

No, Mori had agreed. Not when she might have made the corpse herself.

When he raised his gaze, Chuuya was already staring back.

“Didn’t you say you wanted to live?” he asked.

“I said I wouldn’t die, for now.”

“Boss doesn’t want us to interfere,” the boy insisted, eyes subtly set on their guard dog. “In case you didn’t notice.”

“Are you actually stupid?” Dazai asked. “Did that seem like the behavior of someone who doesn’t want us to know what’s happening?”

Chuuya stared. “Yeah?”

“He would have kicked us out before Ace arrived, if that were the case,” he insisted. “Mori knows when people are coming into his office — and he’s well aware of what Ace’s willing to do to flaunt his power over us.”

“Then why set up that whole show?”

Disgust pulsed against his temples; he laid his chin on his crossed arms, sighing long and deep. “Clearly, he trusts we’re just noisy enough to start collaborating — if it’s for the sake of finding out.”

Horror spread on Chuuya’s face.

Frustration was a close second. Not denial, though — and that was the only answer he needed.

“Elise,” Dazai called, offering his hand. “I will let you ride on my back for the entire week, if you fail to mention this to Mori. Deal?”

She hummed, tapping a finger on her chin — holding Q’s expectant breath hostage. Chuuya curled an eyebrow in her direction; she blushed so hard it matched her dress.

“Alright,” she sniffed, fakely bored. “But you carry Q, too!”

“Q’s reward is not being permanently locked up, like the naughty prankster they are,” he replied, ruffling both of their hair. “Now, if you’ll allow me.”

Chuuya’s sigh was visceral. He climbed to his feet, nonetheless. “Kouyou will murder me.”

Should have been my dog, Dazai considered taunting him with. Before his words could settle, though, his fingers threw the bullets he had extracted from his gun in the air — Chuuya immediately kicked them to the doors, sinking them deep and close enough to the outlines of Hirotsu’s frame to startle him into a half death.

Elise let out a shrill for the sake of it, as Q dragged the too-long sleeves of their shirt to their eyes, unsubtly spying between their fingers.

“Boys —“

A flash of red shook the whole room; old combat boots ran across the roof, shattering one of the floor-to-ceiling windows with ease — and Chuuya flung himself out, into the grey.

“Dazai,” Hirotsu warned, slamming a hand on the nearest seat to send it flying in his direction. He skipped away, under the kids’ laughter, rushing to the makeshift door. “Dazai, don’t you dare go to the dungeons —“

“Oh, she’s in the dungeons?” He blinked. “Why, thank you. I suspected it, seeing how Ace deals with torture — But I really wasn’t sure”

“Dazai —“

“Stay with Q, yes? You know they’re not allowed to be left alone.”

“You aren’t allowed to —“

With little forethought, he jumped out.

Thunder and lighting had abandoned the sky, leaving it smokey and soft. As wind whipped his lips to the point of tearing the skin, he opened his mouth and gulped every snowflake landing on his tongue.

Hopelessly, he exhaled.

Leather enclosed his bandaged wrist; a grip abrupt enough to make his shoulder protest — he dangled from the edge of the emergency stairs, hips knocking against the rusted metal.

Dazai looked up.

A shock of scarlet broke through the plump candor of the ether. He thought of blood, at first, because habit made the young — then, of the flowers some old man sold an alley from there. Some people, he admitted, were just born to be where there was enough space to destroy.

“Don’t you dare make me an accomplice,” Chuuya growled, hauling him up with no fatigue.

The racket of their shoes landing on the stairs seemed to rattle the whole building, startling some suited men behind the glass walls, as they slipped and raced down. Snow fell verbosely; he felt it seep over the edge of his flapping coat.

It took them twenty floors to find an open window. Dazai kicked the unlocked seal off, only half yelping when Chuuya pulled him inside by the belt. Hirotsu was nowhere to be found.

“Think he stayed with Q?”

“He better,” the boy scoffed. “I don’t want to deal with that bloodthirsty fetus.”

Some wide eyed mafiosi spluttered as they rolled onto the carpeted floors; they dashed to the stairs, unwilling to test their tolerance in a confined space — journeys in the elevator usually ended with stepped-on feet and pinched bruises. Eventually, they rolled into the Entrance Hall.

“Good morning, boys,” Madame Tanaki greeted, seemingly unconcerned with the harsh breaths out of their mouths. “Chuuya, you didn’t tell me you’d be back so soon!”

“Morning, Tanaki!” they chorused, quick to run past her to slam their hands on the furthest door of the room — pushing and snarling and scratching, attempting to tear the secret opening to the Dungeons open. “You look as radiant as ever,” he chirped.

Her confusion filtered through the ashtrays and chandeliers, perplexed even under their whines and threats. “Boys, are you allowed to go —“

“Sure we are!”

“Oh. Then should I —“

The door opened, sudden enough to send them flying back. They scurried for the stairs, letting it close behind them with a hiss, shutting the silver sunlight of the afternoon outside.

Dried mud and spiderwebs were the only upholstery down that endless path; the walls were sharp to the touch, wet with humidity — at a second look, and a second touch, the fractured rifts were shaped like desperate fingers. The steps could barely fit a single body; no lights led the way, apart from flickering yellowish LEDs barely dimming the shadows. Their texture was grainy and uneven; uncomfortable even under good soles — the one time Dazai had wondered about it out loud, Hirotsu had been quiet for a very long moment.

It isn't mere cement, he had said.

He had refused to add more.

Dazai wasn't down there often — Mori preferred to offer lessons where the sun would burn the image under his eyelids. When Tainted's glow painted the walls red, he only pettily nullified him twice.

"I can imagine better school trips," he commented, eventually, down that endless path. "Feel free to file a complaint for the ruined kindergarten experience. I won't read it."

A crack was left on the next step the boy's foot touched; not Dazai's bones, at the very least. "The closest thing a freak like you ever had to school trips must have been Old Yamamura's execution back in August."

"That was fun," Dazai confirmed. "No need to get defensive, though. What, didn't the Flags give you the full teenage summer experience? With all the time you spent with —"

His voice was clipped. "Get their fucking name out of your mouth."

A beat.

Alright, Dazai categorized. Lines to be drawn; cartography to be lined. Some things weren't made to bleed only by the hand of cruelty; they bled by the hand of mere sound, too.

You are either promising or you aren't, Mori had told him, once. An interlude to those endless chess games he would distract his overcharged brain with, uncaring of loss. Every man lost is a loss. A bit more, if he's Port Mafia.

How dishonest, he had replied, we don't even bury our dead.

"But the Sheep must have," he replied, instead — because it was safer, and some grievances became quiet sooner. "Did you guys wear matching jackets and visit the Museum of the Suribachi Disaster every second Sunday of the month?"

Chuuya scoffed. "You would be laughing if you knew what the Sheep were like."

He skipped two steps, confident in a quick death by smashed skull — changed his mind, and hung off the boy's wrist, ignoring his curses at the sudden darkness. "My school trips, not that you asked, were terrible. Some kid tried to jump into the shark pool before me, once."

Skepticism painted his snort. "What would you be doing in school? Showing off what mummies looked like to innocent brats?"

“Not quite. What were the Sheep like?”

“It’s been months,” A bleeding sun blinked to life, pooling all the way to the tarnished square frame of the entrance to the dungeons. “Who the hell cares.”

Reddish rays of led lights chased each other across endless stone walls, chained boulders, and a floor so deeply stained in blood it creaked under his soles. Dazai jumped, slapping his hands on the upper frame of the doorless threshold. None of the Mori Corporations efforts were there — no chandeliers or manicured hands from a woman playing secretary. Only the cat-piss-like smell of viscera.

And the wails.

Mostly echos — eerily similar to the winds lulling his home to sleep. Dazai haunted his own house everyday; those people haunted their graves.

“Shit,” Chuuya’s face turned sour. “It smells like death in here.”

“That is kind of the point.”

“Shut up.”

“Better or worse than the slums?”

“The jury is still out,” He paused, eyes settling on the central column. “I’m assuming that’s her.”

Her clothes fell around her kneeling frame like stomped out petals from the long-wilted — hands held over her head by the chains, legs spread as if broken. The dried blood had turned golden locks into reddish strands of dirt and mud.

As close as they stepped, she didn’t move.

[“Not a single word,” Ace spit out. “The bitch’s resisted everything. I would think she was one of Kouyou’s whores, if her standards weren’t higher. She doesn’t even throw up — Which takes half of the entertainment out of it, too.”

“She’s certainly aware of the violence, but she doesn’t seem touched by it. No Gang tattoos, no Ability marks. Perhaps —” He hesitated. “Perhaps, if we could try to use Dazai’s Ability —”

“No,” Mori said, final. He was a man the way knives were blades. It meant — “No, keep him and Chuuya out of it.”]

Two fingers pressed between his eyebrows, but a bit higher — clicking almost the center of his perplexed forehead.

“Stop frowning,” Chuuya ordered, making his unhurried, unhesitant way to the barely-breathing corpse. “You look stupid.”

Speechless, he dared: “Excuse me?”

“You said she’s the suspect for the murder of thirty of our men?”

The woman didn’t react to their impolite investigation — allowed them to study her scalp, force her eyelids apart, prove Executive Ace right when she refused to flinch under the touches. She was ageless; if anything, the blood made her look younger than she probably was — in a strangely decayed way; the painting of a deceased noble child, covered up by dry colors.

“Didn’t Ace say she had no tattoos?”

Chuuya’s fingers hovered over the dark lines on her shoulder — nine concentric circles, thin and deep, not wider than a man’s hand. “He may be a moron, but no way he’s that blind.”

Dazai squinted. “I don’t recognize that.”

“Could it be why she doesn’t feel pain?” he proposed, immediately aware of his memorization of all underground-related affairs. “An Ability?”

“I’m touching her right now. If it is, it’s not one that can be deactivated — if not by the User. Pinch her nose.”

“What?”

“Pinch her nose. I want to see her awake.”

The sheer offense on his features made him look the youngest he had since the Flags’ funeral. “Why don’t you do it, jackass?”

“Because you’re right here,” Dazai reminded him. “And you go around wearing tacky gloves. Maybe a little foresight, next time?”

Chuuya fumed. His hand twitched at his side — he leaned across the woman’s body, pressing two fingers on the sides of her nose.

Nothing happened, for two blinks.

On the third, the woman’s enraged hands were reaching out for his neck, sharp and abrupt.

“Shit — “ Chuuya jumped back, swept up by the frantic body jolting in their direction. More instinctive than thought-out, he kicked Dazai in the chest, sending him flying a few feet further from where he’d been crouched down.

The darkness caught fire — when he leaned on his elbows, Chuuya’s Tainted glowing frame stood between him and the prisoner.

Her body was tilted dangerously close to the ground, wrists tearing each other open a bit more with every push — foam pooled around her mouth, trailing down her chin. A flick of Chuuya's shoe to her knee plastered her to the ground, gaining a hundred pounds more. Cheek squashed on the floor, she growled.

From the space between Chuuya's legs, Dazai studied her frantically-moving eyes.

"I do appreciate an energetic girl," he said, finally, standing up. He kicked Chuuya's in the calf. "Could you throw me a bit more gently, next time? You almost broke my back."

"One would think you'd be ecstatic."

"Dying by your hands sounds like a recipe for disaster," he underlined. "You would probably leave me with only half my head off. Look at how poorly you wake people up."

"You—"

"Alright then," He put his feet on both sides of the girl's legs, the tips of his shoes brushing against her fingers, and asked: "Good morning, beautiful. What were you doing with the corpse of one of our men?"

She growled again.

It was borderline too animalistic for a person, but too close to words to be anything else. She tilted her head back to meet his eyes, fighting the grip of modified gravity — and slammed her skull back against the rock.

"I know you can hear me," Dazai insisted. He snapped two fingers in front of her eyes; she blinked. "That's good. See? You can do it. What were you doing there?"

She crashed her head back so hard a new patch of blood appeared on the boulder. Sighing, Dazai tilted his body back to lean on his heels — and squished her fingers under the sole of his feet. Unexpectedly enough to make even Chuuya straighten, her hissing turned into a cut off scream.

He lifted one leg, abandoning all his weight on one shoe — his foot rubbed until it tasted the ground, snapping the bone on impact.

"Maybe you need a mental image," he considered. "I get that. You're tired. Christmas was right at the doors — Lights everywhere. Imagine my surprise when I saw such a pretty woman spend the holidays with a carcass. I heard you say something to him, by the way — But why greet the dead?"

A tactile pause came from behind him. "You mean you saw her too?"

"Tell you later," He stepped away from the crusted bone curling on the vomit-traced floor. Hopping, he checked the underside of his shoe — cleaned it on the cheek not pressed to the ground.

"It'd be nice to get an answer," He pressed the shoe down, as she retched. "I usually get one."

"Dazai," a voice called. "Focus."

“Yes, yes,” He crouched down, cradling the woman’s head in his hands. He wiped two lines of tears from her cheeks. “Sorry about that. By the way, who was that V I heard you call after you snooped through that man’s chest?”

Silence.

He crushed her head against the ground.

Her nose shattered on impact, framed by a sickening sound. He kept her down, chains rattled in an effort to bend her arms. Sitting cross legged in front of her, chin on his hand, he offered: “Here’s what I think.”

“But don’t tell Ace, yes? We’re not supposed to be here, you know. I think you didn’t get captured. I think someone sent you here,” He tilted his head. “And I think they’re going to be rather mad if you talk — But madder if you don’t, and I offer my best efforts to your fragile bones.”

Imperceptibly, the woman stilled.

“Want to know why I think that?” He grasped her chin, meeting her gaze through the swollen, violet skin. “No one stays silent for that long over money — not Mafia’s money, especially. You don’t have a vendetta. I know you saw me at the Port. You didn’t say anything. And if you knew someone was there, and still let the name V slip, it means you wanted the Mafia to know something — That you let yourself be found next to a victim.”

He settled two fingers on her tongue, forcing her lips apart through wet coughs. “And you also wanted to put this V in a tight spot. Must be someone not really nice. Someone you haven’t spoken a word about to Ace. Someone I’m sure will not be happy about your current state.”

He ripped his hands out, patting her filthy hair as she threw up — right by his shoes. Chuuya scoffed.

“I didn’t even ask for your name.”

Tears streamed down her face. Her lips — while trembling — stayed shut. Sighing, Dazai stood up.

He raised his leg and kicked, slamming his foot into one of the arms the chains were holding — the limb snapped with a crunch!, tilting unnaturally against the boulder. With the next raucous shriek out of her mouth, the walls trembled.

“I doubt they didn’t do worse than this,” Dazai commented. “What’s with the screaming? Do I look more intimidating? Did you have stage fright? Did he tell you —“

“Tenshi.”

The quiet followed.

He broke it with clasped hands. “That’s nice. Finally. As in angel?”

“Tenshi,” the woman repeated, falling to the ground — howling when her arm tilted. “Tenshi, Tenshi, Tenshi —“

“We got it,” Dazai broke through. “You’re the angel, then. What are you doing down here? Not ethereal at all.”

“Scout,” she breathed out. “Souls.”

“How poetic.”

“He — Book.”

His face fell.

“The book,” Angel insisted. “He... scout.”

“I see,” he concluded. “Thank you, then.”

“The book — Book, he —“

Dazai stomped his foot on what was left of her hand. No sound found the strength to escape; all strings cut, the woman tumbled to the ground.

He wiped his hands on his coat.

“Hey,” he noted. “She did make a sound.”

Still standing where he had left him, edges of his pants stained in fresh blood, Chuuya’s nose scrunched up. “A name and something about a book,” He sounded unimpressed. “Is Ace that shit at interrogation?”

“The jury is still out,” he parroted. “But now we know she might just be as much of a tassel as our men. Moreso — Mori doesn’t know.”

““That how you treat victims?””

He shrugged. “When it’s work, yes.”

“Great. Don’t call our men tassels, jerk.”

Who would distract Hirotsu and who would run first, he thought. Who would kill the snipers on the roof and who would be the target. Who would know what kept people together, and who would watch from behind the glass.

“In any case,” he started to say. “We should go, before —“

A bullet pierced through Chuuya’s forehead, bursting into ruby-made fireworks.

That was how his brain registered it — the sight of living-ricochet was a somewhat new one. The quick sequence of projectiles stuck to the boy’s skin, as it glowed brighter and brighter, just enough to show every piece of viscera on the floor. From the stairs, their attacker gasped.

He was a tall man, not older than thirty. Black hair sprinkled in dust framed plain features — and the collar around his neck, metal littered in gemstones, reflecting small squares of colors on the dried blood on the ground. Without a blink, Dazai pointed his gun over Chuuya's floating frame — and his outstretched arm.

“Oh,” he said. The man choked when Dazai fired — ripping the gun from his grasp with a single bullet. “So poor Ace did get deceived.”

[“Here's the thing,” Dazai wrote on the back of one of his reports, in the most elementary kanjis he could think of — keeping an eye on Hirotsu. “Ace will definitely lose face, if we start snooping around after Mori told us not to.”

“The bastard won't be happy. He lives to see approval shine out of the Boss' ass,” the shakiest handwriting he had ever seen insisted.

“More than that — He's already a man with distasteful habits. Strategic clumsiness would only worsen the voices.” Ace was one of the rebounds from the previous Boss — someone who had wanted power more than answers. Mori had no time to waste with incompetent people — he was reliable, to a certain extent.

His Ability made his habits predictable, though.

“The Madness of the Jewel King allowed him to flourish in the Casino business,” he continued. “He had rows of what are basically slaves to rule over the connections he makes for the Mafia — And he's not stupid enough to get addicted to his own game.”

“So what is it? Drugs? Sex?”

He snapped his fingers. “I'm sure you're familiar with the Pomegranate.”

“Ane-san's house?” Chuuya blinked. “I didn't know Ace was a client. Doesn't he hate her?”

“You could confirm his presence there better than me. I hear she trained you there for a while.”

“Stalker. But yeah — Can't say I've ever seen him, though.”

“I have my sources. Apparently, he's around whenever Ane-san's on a mission — I don't think he could stand the humiliation of Kouyou Ozaki knowing he appreciates any of her services.”

“But the girls...” Chuuya frowned. “They're terribly loyal. They tell Kouyou everything.”

“You partake in the gossip? Please be a dear and find out if any of them would be willing to —”

“Keep your dirty hands away.”

“They live in a prostitution house.”

“You’ve never been to the Pomegranate, have you?”

He hadn’t. “Anyway,” he sniffed. “Facts are — Ace has been there more than once. Enough to compare the women to his prisoners.”

Understanding painted his traits. “He said she acted like one of Kouyou’s whores.”

“How’s that saying we have?” he asked. “If you can’t find the Pomegranate, just listen. The women spend all their time singing, don’t they? But if the prisoner refuses to say a word to him — How is she similar to them?”

Chuuya stopped in his tracks. “He lied.”

“Isn’t it weird, how he mentioned her ‘not even throwing up?’” Dazai quoted. “I’ve seen him torture before — He always leaves the room when something like that happens. He says he can’t stand the smell. Maybe he didn’t want Mori to think him incompetent enough to make her spill her guts in the least helpful way.”

“You think she threw something up?”

“Yes,” he agreed. “But I don’t think he was the one who made her.”]

“You shouldn’t be here,” Dazai noted, as the man’s teeth prodded at the bruise from the gun’s rebound. “You weren’t supposed to be here yesterday either, though — when you lied to Ace about finding something in the prisoner you weren’t supposed to touch’s vomit.”

“You—” the henchman snarled. “I don’t know what you brats think you’re doing, but —”

Chuuya turned around.

He weighed the pros and cons of being offended by the startling ease with which the man’s face lost all of his aggressiveness. The shortness is much more recognizable, he let his hurt ego know. “You’re —”

“Are you going to finish a single sentence through this whole conversation?” Chuuya asked, unimpressed. “Let me guess — you’re here to see if whatever you found is back in the chick’s stomach. Don’t want Ace to know you lied about it being only vomit.”

“How do you —” His gaze flickered to the woman’s abandoned body. “Did you kill her?”

“I’m not pathetic enough to fumble with prisoners,” Dazai replied. Mafiosi never recognized him at a single glance — Mori was too greedy for something like that. Recognition spread slowly on his pale face, still. “You know, if you had given Ace what you found, he probably would have praised you.”

“Stolen the credit, too,” Chuuya added, scoffing. “But praised you.”

“You can check on her,” Dazai encouraged. “And then you come with us to solve some of our doubts, how about it?”

The bullets still sticking to Chuuya gathered around his frame — more purposeful. “Not that you have a choice.”

Through stiff motions and curved shoulders, moving slowly under their watchful gaze, he walked around them — over the puddles of blood. He checked the woman’s mouth with trembling precision, lifting her tongue and removing some shattered teeth.

Not an inch of her moved.

Relief dropped his spine. “She ingested it again.”

“It,” he echoed. “Yes, let’s talk about it.”

Chuuya motioned towards the stairs, feet cracking a hole in the ground. The man’s eyes fell on the chasm. “After you.”

On their way up — tailing the man’s steps with Dazai’s gun pressed on his lower back — Chuuya leaned in close enough to whisper: “You have it, don’t you?”

Scoffing, he showed the silver cross in his hand — polished from internal fluids with the corner of his coat. “Do you take me for a fool?”

“Keep it away. Shit’s smells worse than you, seriously,” Hands low, they high-fived. Dazai got the brief, irrelevant thought that it might have been the first time he got touched in weeks. “And you still smell like mackerel.”

---

...

---

The bar was called, very sensibly, The Bar.

The suggestion had come from Madame Tanaki herself, as she nodded approvingly at their effort at friendliness towards their much detested Ace’s men. It was a low cost hole-in-the-wall; every piece of furniture was a rusty green, and the lights flickered with time and effort. If the yawning woman at the counter found something suspicious about the way Dazai and Chuuya dropped the man between them in the furthest empty table, she didn’t get paid enough to ask.

“I hope you don’t mind,” Dazai said, still smiling as charmingly as he could, as the waitress walked away with their three non-alcoholic orders. “The two of us are still minors, you know.”

“And most alcohol tastes like shit,” Chuuya added, seemingly serious.

“You two think you can just sit here and do your shit with Ace’s most trusted?” the man spat out, through the sweat drops on his temples.

“Yeah, kind of,” The boy nodded. “Are we to assume Ace sent you to follow us? How lucky. You must have been scrambling for an excuse to go back to the Dungeons.”

“Don’t be naive,” Dazai replied. “Ace knows I don’t let people follow me.”

“You only found me because I let you, kid,” the man growled. As soon as he leaned forward, Chuuya moved the knife he had grabbed from the table an inch higher on his leg.

“Sure,” he conceded. “Let’s go with that. You let us find you — so we could capture you. Thank you for the collaboration!”

“Who even are you, anyway?”

Pushing his chin out, the man declared: “George Kingstain.”

“George. So exotic.”

“Never heard of you,” Chuuya said.

“Me neither. But you must be a talented man, George. Say — How did this situation play out?”

Kingstain worked his jaw.

“I’m not a fucking idiot,” he said, finally. His Japanese was unpleasantly accented. “You two are going to get me killed.”

“Will we?” Dazai blinked. “I haven’t even threatened you yet.”

“You look like big mouthed infants,” He squinted at the other boy, seemingly blind to his stiffened spine. “You’re Nakahara, aren’t you?” He snorted. “The Port Mafia’s social climber. From an enemy, to a subordinate — To an Executive candidate? One wonders how you do it.”

Chuuya fiddled with his glass, bored. “Counting jewels until your balls fall? Killing loud mouthed bastards? Wearing pricey suits?”

“Making powerful friends,” Kingstain let out a chuckle. “You’re very good at that. Executive Kouyou helping you out?”

“You’ll keep my Boss’ name out of your mouth, or you’ll lose your dick,” Chuuya offered, very efficiently. The man paled. “By the way, you seriously don’t know the bastard?”

“Please, please, don’t assume,” Dazai said. “My fans are few and spread out —“

“You’re the Demon Prodigy.”

Not a new appellation — if somewhat recent. Mori had probably not been the one to start the rumor, but he surely hadn’t put an end to it, either. Good enough of a permission slip; good enough of an order.

“How nice,” He wished he had his console with him. “You do know me.”

“Of you.”

“Same thing.”

“You know, the organization is overflowing with theories about the leader’s obsession with you. I have my own.”

“You’re full of ideas involving children and sexual favors, aren’t you? How peculiar.”

““You going to murder Boss?”

Chuuya stiffened.

A bit distractedly, he wondered which one stung more — the old sheep instinct to defend those who had taken him in, or the idea of Dazai actually doing it. All options of what he might do if put in that situation were delightful.

“Mori’s probably the one who spread that one particular rumor,” Dazai answered. “Not on my bullet list, though. You, on the other hand —“

“Can’t say I see it happening. People say you’re the shit, but they won’t tell me why,” Kingstain scoffed. “Weak sons of a bitch. What can a brat even do?”

“I’m great at handstands!”

“That’s such bullshit,” Chuuya intervened, sounding offended. “You have no balance.”

“Are you challenging me? Because I will do a cartwheel in your face right now. You’ve been gone a long time.”

“I’d like to see you try —“

Foolishly, Kingstain attempted to bolt.

Not bothering to shift his gaze, Dazai let his ankle hook itself around the man’s stool. He stumbled back on his seat, held down so heavily it could only be the work of Tainted.

“Are you an actual idiot?” Chuuya asked, almost genuine. “If you refuse to speak, all we have to do is go to Boss and let him know. And Ace will find out.”

“How will he feel about you disobeying his orders to mess with such an important prisoner?”

“The bitch killed thirty three of our men,” he bristled. “And he was only wasting time — Beasts like that deserve to have their throats slit.”

“That’s inefficient.”

“That’s fair.”

“Oh, spare me,” Chuuya twisted his wrist.

The next cut off groan to come out of the man’s mouth had even the waitress turn around.

He kicked Chuuya in the shins. “Can you stop making us look suspicious?”

“Even children get the basic concept of gaining information,” he hissed.

“This is taking too long,” Dazai downed the last of his drink. “George, what do you think about talking? I’m sure you’re not stupid — You must understand the situation you’re in. Or what my companion’s Ability can do.”

The man stared, teeth clenched.

“We want to know what the issue was with what you found,” He set the cross on the table. “And what you think this is.”

George’s eyes widened in recognition. Dazai hoped, in the name of the praises he had offered to Ace’s intelligence, for the right hand man thing to have been a lie. “You — You told me to check the —“

“You attempted to kill the girl,” Chuuya summarized. “She threw this thing up. You knew it was important, but you couldn’t report to Ace without him asking why you were there. Did she say anything about it?”

“And did she have a tattoo on her shoulder, while you were there?” Dazai asked.

The man tightened his lips. By the time the ice in his glass had melted, he said: “She didn’t. I’m not even sure she noticed anything was going on — She’s been acting fucking weird since the first day. Crying in silence. Until —“

“Until?”

“Until yesterday, when I went there,” A hint of awkwardness frowned his features. “I heard a voice. From the thing. ”

Their eyes fell on the cross.

“This thing,” Chuuya checked, skeptical.

Dazai hummed. “So it is some sort of communication device.”

“You knew? ” the boy hissed, ready to smash his fist upon it.

He raised a hand, blocking his motions. “I had my suspicions. Describe it to me.”

Kingstain tried to shrug, under Tainted’s grip. “All distorted and shit. Maybe it got — I don’t know, damaged in her stomach. I don’t get the point of putting it there. Not like she could hear it.”

“Technology is getting complex. Maybe it’s more sophisticated than it looks.”

“I don’t even know if it was a man or a woman,” George said. “Altered. It was saying something about — shit, about an angel, I think?”

The shield of gravity faltered a bit. He could feel Chuuya’s leg run up and down against his, under the table.

“And then just — statics. Maybe something about a book? I don’t remember. Something about her needing to wait a little more,” Kingstain gulped. “I put it in her mouth and left. I didn’t pay attention.”

“And the tattoo?”

“She didn’t have tattoos. Listen, I really told you everything,” the man insisted. “There’s no need to warn Ace or anything, is there? I can help you come up with an explanation for that cross, or —“ Dazai’s phone picked that moment to ring.

He didn’t bother checking; he brought it to his ear and said: “Yes, Boss?”

Kingstain’s reaction was visceral. He struggled against the hold of modified gravity, kicking the legs of the table until the drinks were spilled — Chuuya pushed his knife all the way down, pressing a gloved hand to the man’s mouth.

“Shut the fuck up,” he warned, not a hint of playfulness. “I’m slitting your throat. Shut up.”

“I haven’t been completely honest with you,” Mori announced, without an inch of remorse.

Dazai showed a surprise he wouldn’t see. “That breaks my heart. To what do I owe —“

“My catch escaped.”

He snapped his tongue. “Did she?”

“She was broken out,” the man corrected himself. Not exactly concerned. “I know you’re with Chuuya.”

“And I know it’s your fault if I am. Your little nonchalance act has gotten so old.”

“Under the assumption of you having actually solved some of my doubts — there’s going to be an official Executive meeting, tomorrow. You and Chuuya could tell us all about it.”

“Doesn’t it seem like a bit too many corpses?” he commented, “For two youngsters.”

Mori’s amusement filtered through, like a hand ruffling his hair. “This whole situation might just become a bother, if we don’t make sure to gain the whole picture.”

“What makes you think I have this solved?” he questioned. Chuuya was doing his best to reassure the waiter. The border had given him more freckles. “Maybe I’m stumbling in the dark here.”

“Are you?”

The edge of his seat dug into his nape. “You revoked our access to the meetings too.”

“How lucky, then, that I am currently erasing that order.”

“What do I get out of it?”

“I will tell you what I haven’t been honest about,” was Mori’s answer.

“I don’t know.”

“I will also,” he sighed, “Allow you to stop hanging out with Chuuya.”

Dazai paused.

A beat too late: “Don’t you have better detectives than two teenagers?”

“Do you have something better to do?”

“I suppose I might show up.”

“You and Chuuya. He already knows too much. He’s going to find out more,” Mori underlined. As if he had somehow heard his name being called, the redhead frowned at him. “I doubt you need me to be outright about this, Dazai.”

“About Fukuzawa, you mean?”

Another beat passed.

The silence between chess moves — a good strategy and a better one, and everything Dazai had done to give Mori’s eyes a glint. Everything he would regret, if he ever grew the habit to.

The man chuckled. “The choice is yours.”

“Don’t be naive.”

“I’m not. You know too well how tense the situation has been since I took over. Chuuya is a fundamental asset, and he will always be one. This is my offer.”

“My counteroffer is that you let me kill him,” Dazai replied. A god dying was as unrealistic of a fate as few other things; he wanted to see it so badly it almost made him ache. “And then you let me kill myself.”

“Still on the double suicide? I thought you’d said Chuuya wasn’t a suitable companion for such a mission.”

“Yes,” he sighed. “That is exactly what I feared you would say.”

Ending the call, he stood, sweeping the cross off the table.

“Well?” Chuuya asked. The smile Dazai offered Kingstain got him to flinch in his seat.

He announced: “Great news, George. We don’t need you anymore, and your existence is a disgrace. But since you were very helpful, I have decided I shall be merciful.”

Dragging the man out of The Bar proved itself to be infinitely harder than getting him inside of it. When they finally managed to throw him near the dumpster at the end of the alley, the sun had fallen behind every skyscraper, turning the roads of snow into a soft, bleeding valley.

“I’d say it was nice,” the redhead concluded, hands on his hips. “But you’re breathing scum, and I still want to shoot you in the dick.”

“You bastards,” George growled, doing his best to fight the sheet of gravity still holding him to the ground. “You fucking — I’ll kill you, do you fucking hear —”

“Yes, yes,” Dazai cocked his gun and shot.

It echoed. Distracted by the trail of holes the bullets had painted between his legs, on the dirty concrete — it took Kingstain a moment to realize his arm had been hit. Before he could scream, Chuuya slammed his foot right on the wound.

The air around them trembled, like a mirage of sorts, shining a vicious red. In exactly seven seconds, George Kingstain had stopped struggling, abandoned in a pool of blood.

“Did you know both high and low gravity can make you pass out?” Chuuya said, satisfied.

“That explains why being around you makes me feel stupid,” Dazai commented, without really meaning to. He winced; hurried to add: “How long until he wakes up?”

“Between the wounds and the stress? A few hours. He’s not going to bleed out, is he?”

“Who do you take me for?” He frowned. “I didn’t even shoot him in the dick.”

Along with the sunset, quieter than the stars ever dared to be as they returned, they made their way back to the Headquarters.

Their feet sunk in the snow, neighborhood after neighborhood, a mimetic pair under the light from the shops’ windows. Blood dripped through the candor; no one would notice, as they stepped on each other’s feet, mistaken for scholars — for less bloodied beings.

No one asks questions about one kid, Dazai had always said. Two people took up more space. He loathed the idea of someone engarling his section of universe — the one so tightly wrapped around his shoulders, like a less heavy coat.

But Mori Ougai was, he reminded himself — extracting a bottle of head ache pills from his pocket and gulping down two — quite simply, a fool.

“No one ever taught you to share, asshole?” Chuuya spat out, at some point, pushing him out of the snowless space under the line of balconies, and almost slipping.

Not so hard to imagine; the most unrealistic words possible. Dazai had dragged him there himself. He mostly wanted him gone — wanted him in his line of sight, too. He wanted nothing, and the dog he had not been quick enough to collar was there to stay. Dazai could have stared right at the winter sun and it would have burned his eyes less.

“It wasn’t worth it,” Chuuya huffed, “Kingstain. We already knew the angel thing.”

“We didn’t know it was a device,” Dazai reminded him. “Or that whoever is on the other side planned to break the woman out — Which he did. The Executives will be glad to know.”

The boy nodded, distracted with the steps it took him to jump over a garbage can. Landing in cleaner snow, Dazai counted fourteen seconds — before he stopped, dead in his tracks.

Then: “The fuck did you just say to me?”

---

...

---

The closest pharmacy to Dazai’s residence was a small glass box at the edge of a lonely sidewalk — the first building in miles.

The railing dividing the street from the sea was rusted and covered in old fliers, guiding an imaginary queue. He had only ever met one being who had had to wait to enter that forgotten drugstore — a quiet cat, fond of the sea.

It’s either poisons that will keep me alive a few breaths more, he had told him, or the sea. Isn’t it better to lie to yourself?

I suppose, he had lied.

That night, a box of bandages in his hands, a man was waiting by the railing.

“Are you all done?” he asked, polite.

If someone in the world had a right to be called common, that man was one of those people. Pale skin and vaguely caucasian features curled under dark hair; he couldn’t be older than twenty, and yet his wrinkles were from all but cheerfulness.

“All done,” Dazai confirmed.

The man held up his own bag. “What did you buy?”

“Bandages. And these muscle relaxants — they’re supposed to make death as painless as possible. Hopefully. You?”

He shrugged. “Social anxiety pills. Or something like that. I don’t know. They probably have a name. I mostly trust my doctor on this.”

“Terrible choice,” he sighed, dramatically. “I trusted a doctor, once. And I’m still alive.”

The man had a terrible laugh — squeaky and broken. “I can only pray the same will happen to me.”

Dazai leaned on the railing. He had often considered death by drowning — it sometimes seemed all but painless.

Still, he would probably try, one day. There were too many days — too much time.

“I’ll pray for you, then.”

The man mirrored him — a bit awkwardly. “So, why the bandages?”

“My little sister wants to become a nurse. I let her practice on me. Why the pills?”

“What do I know,” He scratched his scalp. “Some people are just born weird, I suppose.”

Don’t I know. “Nothing to do with Tenshi, then?”

The man stilled.

“Not to assume, of course!” he clarified, lightly. “There is something social, after all, in the art of standing and watching someone suffer for our aims,” His smile stretched until his jaw hurt. “But what do I know, right, V?”

He cleared his throat.

In a voice just as small as before, he said: “He is not very happy.”

A three way game, then. “Was he happy when you let the Mafia get their hands on his angel?”

The man refused to answer.

“Alright, alright. How mean. You will just leave me with the doubt.”

“Doubt?”

“Whether you decided to free her on your own or you were obeying orders,” Dazai explained. “I would ask Tenshi but, well. She’s not in my immediate reach anymore.”

“That’s nice, then,” V said. “You people are the worst kind of monsters.”

“She hasn’t been treated well,” he agreed. “Is calling us monsters easier on your conscience?”

“You’re assuming I have one.”

He shrugged. “You wouldn’t be here to warn me if you didn’t. Punishing yourself?”

Blistered fingers played with the handles of the pharmacy bag — systematic and anxious. “He is not happy.”

“Well, tell him I’m absolutely desolated.”

“I say this with the uttermost honesty,” V repeated, “It’s better not to make him mad. Just let him do what he wants.”

“Alright,” Dazai promised. “I will.”

V nodded.

It took him a few more minutes to gather the strength to tear his eyes from the sea; he hugged the bag to his chest. For the first time, he noticed the bright yellow shirt he was wearing — the cartoonish rendition of two soldiers depicted on the front.

“Well, then,” V concluded. “Goodnight.”

Dazai waved. “Bye!”

He didn’t watch him walk away. He stared at the white reflection of the moon, instead — and he started counting, fidgeting with the stolen cross in his pocket.

When he got to seven minutes and fifty one seconds, his phone rang. Nodding, he whined: “Mori, I was —“

“Kingstain is gone.”

He stilled. “How did you get this number?”

“Are you kidding me?” Chuuya replied. “I’m being serious! Kingstain is nowhere to be found.”

“I’m being just as serious!” Dazai insisted, horrified. “You need to tell me who gave it to you.”

“I’ve had your number since forever, you fucking — I’ve called you before!”

“And I didn’t answer.”

“For fuck’s — Kouyou gave it to me.”

“Liar,” he accused. “Liar. Ane-san doesn’t have my number.”

“Have you ever considered that maybe you’re the one who doesn’t save other people’s numbers?”

“Why would I?”

“Can you use whatever’s left of your fish brain to listen? I’m telling you Kingstain is gone.”

“Oh, I know,” Dazai leaned back on the railing. “They probably took him a little after we left him there.”

“What?”

“Long story. Don’t worry about it.”

Chuuya’s pitch rose, making him wince. “Don’t worry about it? What are we supposed to tell Ace? And Mori? They’ll want to know about what we did.”

“Ah, don’t think too much about it. You will end up all wrinkled. And delete this number, alright? I’m not kidding. I’m willing to electrocute it out of you.”

“Would you fucking —“

“My choices are for the syndicate’s wellbeing. Try not to act like a spoiled child.”

“As if you give a damn?”

“Accusing me of not caring about my own organization? Far-fetched.”

“I’m not wrong,” Chuuya replied. A terrible conclusion — he would need to rectify it. Insisting cycle they were: the last of Chuuya was never the last of Chuuya, because the bet was constantly too good not to take. “You’d burn this place to ashes yourself if you could. Be there tomorrow, or I’ll hunt you down myself.”

Of course, he told himself. They had always been this — before month-long vacations and supposed lines of codes, too. Two Event Horizon looking for the nearest body to crash against — willing to wait for the perfect moment to strike. Patience was born out of necessity.

Patience, he considered, fidgeting with the silver cross, was born out of doom.

Chapter End Notes

so!! that was the start of it. see you next chapter :)

scene title from:

I put a twig of sweet osmanthus in my apartment room for two, three days. Its aroma comforted me in my loneliness. I feared the fading of this smell, so I kept my curtains closed. Yet a cold wind sneaked in through the crevices. And it quietly blew right through my lonely heart. It made me sad.

Oda Sakunosuke, “Autumn Halo” (Aki no Kasa)

DAY

Chapter Summary

The moment one of the volunteers — still fumbling with the taxi drivers' corpse and the chaos of onlookers — attempted to put a blanket around his shoulders, Chuuya was out of there.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter ii.

---

Case number: 03839387

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, under the orders of Executive A. (nominative state: confidential) and M. O., Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [...]*

---

It took him three weeks with the doctor to attempt to kill himself.

Or so he recalled. According to Mori, he had, of course, done the exact same thing two weeks and six days after they had met — two weeks and four days; two weeks; one; everyday since he had turned fourteen and almost every day before that.

Nothing made that day better or different from the others. Mori had caught up sooner, though.

The doctor was a strange man, Dazai would think, almost every morning. He had no real reason to care about his breathing lungs and beating heart, apart from his old job. He had no reason to care, but he still appeared viciously against any form of death entering his little sanctuary.

He had pushed his biology books in his direction, the first days — and taken them back when he had started tracing the skeletons too passionately.

“You teach me, then,” he had said.

“Teach you what?”

He had traced the wound on his arm. “Where it hurts.”

“This is a place to heal,” Mori told him. One of his hands caressed the air; it was a gesture he did too often, too distractedly, for it to not mean something.

“You’re a doctor,” Dazai replied. He caressed the air, as well; a belated reflection. He wasn’t looking for approval, wasn’t looking for anything at all — but Mori still nodded. “More death has been in this room than in any other corner of the world.”

It dripped down the walls — slithered in front under the doors. Tickled Dazai’s cheeks when he slept. Mori wouldn’t let him die.

“Let go,” he said, softly. Every string of his vocal cords was wrapped tightly around each one of Dazai’s bones; guiding him where he didn’t want to go. Getting saved wasn’t tempting, wasn’t what he wanted; and Mori Ougai was no benefactor. “Dazai, let go.”

“Only if you put that needle down,” he heard himself whine — a tad too emptily.

“You have no intention of stopping,” the man replied. Always one to explain before he answered. “I cannot.”

He’d destroyed that place a few times before — had crashed against chairs and glass bottles, trying to grab the last scalpel and slit his wrists open, to find the right dosage of pills that would get stuck in his throat, to cut his air off with a piece of gauze curled around his neck. It was true, but —

“It won’t hurt,” Mori swore.

“Oh,” Dazai said.

He pressed the finger on the trigger.

The gun was a weight on his mouth — sticky and annoying. He hoped to get a clean, round hole in the back of his head; hoped the bullet passed right through that opening and tore Mori’s forehead apart, right in that brain of his; hoped it bounced back and destroyed the mirror, because who knew if Dazai’s reflection was stubborn enough to linger — live on and haunt and be haunted — he hoped it worked, even just once —

No hole formed, but the syringe was stabbed into the side of his neck.

“Rule number one,” Mori told him, very politely. “If an addict is in the house, you don’t keep the drug there too.”

“That’s a lie,” he giggled, as the world spun and he fell, hands grasping at his sides. The way death wasn’t supposed to, it hurt — Mori Ougai was no benefactor. “Or you wouldn’t keep a child in your own home.”

Mori kneeled next to him. He put a towel under Dazai’s head, something comfortable to lay his thoughts on as his every limb lost feeling. “Can I take the gun?”

“Can I die?” Dazai asked. “Can you let me die?”

Mori pried his fingers open. Took the gun. “Do you want to die?”

That’s not the point, he could have screamed. “Yes.”

He stood up. “That’s a shame, then.”

“You said you would help. You said you would help, you promised you would help —“

“Listen to me,” Mori interrupted him. “Do you want me to tell you something that will help you?”

“You said you’d help,” he repeated, incoherently. He’d die for a glass of water, he thought. He’d die to choke on it.

“Here’s rule number two,” Mori stabbed another syringe in his throat, pressing down. Dazai caught fire. Dazai fell asleep. “No one is listening.”

---

...

---

“What do you lads think you’re doing?”

About Kouyou Ozaki —

Diction was among the first tassels Dazai’s naked eye had been intuitive enough to notice, when Mori had shoved him under her nauseatingly sweet gaze. It came with other lighting quick ideas — such as stench of blood and pricey kimonos and hates you and always will. Dazai had been molded to know when vowels would never turn into screams.

Unfortunately for them all, the Lady of the Port’s mosaic was, at the end of the day, just a piece of floor splattered in colors.

“Sorry to disappoint, Ane-san,” he chirped. Behind the doors she was trying to close on their faces, the Hall of Light and Darkness glistened dimly under moonlight, caged by the tongue-colored sleeves of her kimono. “But Boss said we’re allowed to come in.”

“It’s true,” Chuuya intervened, as if it pained him to. “Why else would I be around the bandaged freak?”

Her eyes fell on him — softened significantly. “Chuuya,” she sighed, “This, again?”

“Calm down,” the boy grunted. Respect was there, somewhere — certainly a begrudging upgrade from the skepticism he had bore for her during his first weeks. But Chuuya was always rather courteous with women, in a way that reeked of forgotten teachings; asking for Elise’s permission before holding her hand, and offering his coat to shivering subordinates. “I haven’t tried to sneak into a meeting in weeks.”

“Maybe because you weren’t here?” Kouyou pointed out. “Moreso, you didn’t even come to offer your greetings when you returned.”

“Maybe because I went looking for you all over the Pomegranate, but you weren’t —“

“Chuuya, you know you’re not allowed into the Pomegranate without me —“

“That’s a shit rule and you know it —“

She didn’t even blink. “Language, thank you.”

“People opened up brothels in Suribachi City too,” Chuuya snapped, “I keep telling you.”

“Executive meetings strictly involve Executives,” Kouyou insisted, the picture of pleasing politeness. The hard steel in the gaze she settled on Dazai managed to feel elegantly mocking, too. “Unofficial left hands excluded.”

“Mori told us to come,” Dazai insisted, bored. “I mean — Perhaps he should have left his official right hand woman know?”

Suspicion dripped from her squinted eyes in vagons; it gained her nothing but a surprised — “Hey! Boys, do not — “ when they pushed past her sentinel stance and tumbled inside the room, hurrying across the reflected squares of stained glass windows.

Conflict was forbidden in the Hall of Light and Darkness — among the reasons why Mori tended to go on a tangent regarding Dazai and Chuuya related matters in that place specifically, and a fact that Dazai mourned daily. He had always wished to witness his own blood through those colors.

“You almost begged me to send you off to some peace and quiet for a few weeks,” the Lady of the Port quoted, stalking towards them between the rows of suited seconds-in-command parting. “A strange way to define a war zone, but I wouldn’t want to cage you. And the first thing you do upon your return is dilly-dally with the devil?”

Chuuya spluttered. “I didn’t choose to do that!”

“That’s a bit rude,” Dazai whined. “I’m much more evocative than terrorists.”

“Boss sent us off to investigate —“

“Oh, did he, now?”

“Indirectly, yes,” With a hum, she pinched his nose. “Ane-san, that’s —“

“Tat-tat,” she tutted. “Both of you. What did we say about that disdainful title? Do I look like some nasty gangster’s living ornament that he calls wife whenever the brothel is full?”

Dazai considered agreeing, just to see her get mad. Then again, he wasn’t quite in the mood for her disciplinary calligraphy lessons.

“Ane-san, don’t be mad,” he said, in the most innocent act she would never believe. “How’s poor Chuuya to blame if he cannot accomplish anything without me?”

The boy flared. “And how’s poor Dazai even meant to walk with those shitty flapping fish fins of his without some merciful fucking aid —“

“Humility,” Kouyou broke through, gentle — staring Dazai down with eyes of steel, “Is but a dot on a canva.”

“Wasted ink all the same,” Dazai replied.

“It would do you good to remember your unfortunate allies, demon child.”

[“Let us make this clear,” she had told him, and in her eyes was certainty of a deal already made. As if French assassins could ruin her sowing. She had harvested her field with midnight rain; perhaps unaware — except she did not know the word — no flower would ever be anything but wilted. “He is not taking him.”].

Conflicting, he knew. The heart-wrenching need to drag her latest flower away from him, lest he turned him into something too dark even for her tastes — to push him into him, and make sure he would be just corrupted enough to stay right where he was.

How unfair, he thought, repressing a smile. Her eyes thinned. You’ve known me longer.

“Fear not, Ane-san,” Dazai shrugged. “I remember enough to keep us all afloat.”

“We must thank your unmeasurable wit, as always,” Kouyou smiled. “But I would rather people under my command didn’t have to walk around with death cheaters. Some deceptions are quick to stick to blood.”

Clearing his voice, a bit lost in that senseless match of theirs, Chuuya offered: “Talking about blood is prohibited in the Hall.”

A new voice appeared, a hint of tobacco following it. “In that case, I fear today’s conversation is going to be rather difficult to carry on.”

“Gramps,” Chuuya exclaimed. The glance he sent his way was unmistakable — do we run? “What are you doing here?”

“As surprising as the notion might result,” Hirotsu said, winged by a quartet of blank-faced Black Lizards, “I do have jobs that don’t include the two of you. My men were the ones who found the bodies,” He curled an eyebrow. “Assuming you found out all about that.”

The stared back, innocently.

The man was quick to give up on that lost fight; instead, he offered a vertiginously deep bow to Kouyou, steady like a grandfather clock. “Executive.”

“Ojisan,” she greeted — a bit more genuine in her amusement. “I shall hope your Lizards will fix this boring matter with the same swiftness they uncovered it with for us, correct?”

“I will be more than happy to help however I can,” he assured. “If Boss wishes so.”

“He will be more than fine with it,” she assured him, motioning to the corpse abandoned in the dead center for the Hall. “He has bigger problems than his Lizards having a bit of fun.”

The living exception to the no violence in the Hall of Light and Dark rule laid on the kaleidoscopic ground, no blood under his evidently battered body. Dazai could see signs of the time all over: frail skin, stiffened muscles, lips grey. The squares of colors painted the gash in the middle of his chest — showing off ribs and decaying viscera — in beautiful shades; the two lines of green and blue upon his wide open eyes made him look almost alive.

“To answer your question,” he heard Hirotsu say behind him, turning towards Chuuya. “Boss asked me to come here and —“

Dazai walked up to the body; crouched down next to it, prodding at its flesh.

He felt Ace’s gaze graze his back, insistent in its pretense of non-existence. The Mafia’s suited shadows tended to stare wherever he went — until they didn’t. He had heard every scoff in this world.

He brushed his fingers on one of the protruding ribs, feeling the scratchy surface under his skin. The tear stopped right under his breastbone — but Dazai thought that he might manage to grab his heart, if he tried hard enough.

Silly, he told himself. What would you even do with it? Take it for yourself?

A too-precise stain of black on the man’s arm caught his attention.

“No way,” Chuuya breathed.

He had felt him step closer; he didn’t move when he leaned over him, one gloved finger tracing the first circle of ink — startling bright against the dead skin. It was, undeniably, a tattoo.

Chuuya’s sleeve had risen, just a bit. Dazai’s eyes settled on the naked portion of his wrist — on the edge of a spiral-shaped scar, pink at the edges and white where it would hurt. He wondered if it was empathy, that tugged at his conscience — empathetic, him, in the way skin stuck to ribs.

No, he thought, no, it’s sharper.

“Boys?” Kouyou called, tentatively, still a few steps away with Hirotsu. “What are you doing?”

“Nine,” Dazai counted, along to the motions of the boy’s hand. When he looked up, Chuuya was pressing a finger to the creases in his forehead, blankly. “You — Alright. Nine circles.”

“The stomach?” he asked.

“There’s a tear near the viscera. Empty.”

A pause. “The mouth?”

He nodded. “The mouth.”

Before either of them could force the corpse’s tongue aside, the sound of steps echoed through the hallway. Like a well oiled machine — a new, still uncertain at times machine; but one Mori had sacrificed all to start up — every person in the room fell to their knees.

His visual reduced to Mori’s polished shoes, and Sama’s protective stand behind them, he couldn’t resist casting a glance to the other boy.

“Is that why you wear the hat?” he whispered. Stubbornly, Chuuya kept his gaze on the floor. “Trying to hide that bald spot?”

His head snapped up — the quietest murderous look in existence. “I don’t have bald spots, you fucking jerk. I’m not even sixteen!”

“Maybe you’re precocious!”

Mori finally stopped, sufficiently close to everyone, sufficiently far away. Establishing a difference is the key, he had once told him. Though, I’m not very fond of locked things.

He waited.

“Then,” he said, eventually — only when the bruises on every man's knees began to pulse. “Let us talk business.”

Fingers brushed against Dazai’s hair as he passed by — never touching his skin; never stupid enough to. A half pat wasn’t new, but Mori never did anything in front of the eyes of a crowd without a reason.

When he got to his feet and met Chuuya’s gaze, the boy’s eyebrows had flown up to his hairline.

Mori stood upon the corpse; a spiral of suits built itself around him — mannequins with a good aim, Tanaki had called them. Kouyou and Ace situated themselves a good number of steps closer to the center of that system, as far from each other as possible.

All very sorted; very organized. Dazai thought it sort of devastating.

“The Colonel isn’t back yet,” he murmured, dryly. “How long can a vendetta honeymoon be?”

They crowded at the edges of Mori’s butterfly wall, leaning on a column — not important enough to stand closer; too stained in blood spilled for his sake to stay further. He could feel Chuuya’s shoulder against his, tense and ready.

“Last I heard, he won’t return until the summer,” Chuuya replied. Ready for what, he couldn’t place. That utter energy stored inside him, bursting through the makeshift waterfall of The Alley and electrocuting his fingers — reaching for a naked part of him and stopping themselves halfway through. It had only been a month; it had only been five corpses. “He’s too busy following the last of The Dragons around the Kanto region. Won’t stop until they’re all liquified under his stupid soles.”

“Why hasn’t he picked any new Executives yet?” Chuuya added, squinting. “After —“ A pause; a complicated expression. “It’s been months. Doesn’t he want the good old five balance back?”

“He has,” Dazai corrected him. “Picked a new one, I mean.”

“Then why aren’t they here?”

“The third Executive is — an asset of sorts. Mori has decided to keep him a secret. Traitors could be anywhere,” He will know, he thought, nonsensically — because that was how it went, when one stumbled upon a too-curious god through the slums, and someone almost as good at Shooting Guard II as him. He knows how you lie. “I assume Ane-san knows. Right hand woman and all.”

Chuuya’s breath tickled his ear, leaving shivers-like footsteps in its wake. “Do you know who it is?”

“No.”

Hirotsu had taken a silent step forward, leaving the formation. “Yes, Boss,” he was saying, answering some question Dazai hadn’t caught. “They found them together. Having finally identified the gang of our — fugitive prisoner — ”

“Yes,” Mori agreed. “The assassin. Regarding our men’s corpses — Our current guest in particular. You said the forensic team believe he was dragged down into the sea by whoever attacked him.”

“It’s the only explanation, Boss. Blood prints didn’t show any stumbling towards the edge.”

“I see. Kouyou, the numbers?”

“Thirty three murders,” the woman answered. Dazai raised an eyebrow. Mori didn’t meet his gaze, but he knew he must have felt it. I haven’t been honest with you. “All of them had the same kind of gashes in their chest as this one here. Other desecrations, as well — but the wounds tend to rest around that area.”

“Thirty three,” the Boss echoed. “In?”

“Three weeks,” Ace intervened. “The longest pause was four days, but then we found four of them in one day. All the bodies were brought to the shore.”

Kouyou stuck up her chin, rolling her umbrella through manicured, blistered fingers. “Old tactic.”

“If I may,” Hirotsu intervened. “I do not think any of this was meant to be hidden. It’s all too similar in too little time, and almost all around the same area. It must be a message of some sorts.”

“Absolutely,” Mori agreed, unconcerned. He looked down at the corpse with a pity Dazai knew the men would whisper about. “And I’m sure that in a moment it will be clear to everyone who sent it. Hirotsu, you already know, of course. Kouyou?”

Blinking, but only once, the woman followed the raised gloved hand motioning her closer. He did not know what to prepare for — but he did it all the same, because he knew Mori’s face.

Deadly punctual, all the blood drained from Kouyou’s face. Pain flashed across her face like the mark of lightning-quick claws — Dazai had never seen such heartwrenching ache before.

The anger that immediately froze her traits was much more familiar. When she looked up from the ground she was kneeling on, the gaze she offered Mori almost made the man smile.

“You said they were eradicated,” Kouyou said, so calm her outlines were shaking.

“Last I heard, they had been.”

Ace frowned. “Who?”

The words climbed up her throat, leaving burning tears behind in their wake. He couldn’t see the blood dripping from her lips, but it hit the ground louder than a bomb. “The Nine Rings.”

Chuuya’s breath caught.

“What?” he asked. “Did you meet them?”

“With the Sheep,” His eyes were searching his mentor’s face, unanswered. “A bunch of weaklings. I think — Ane-san’s lover came from them.”

Dazai almost smiled. “Oh.”

Decadent tragedies were well known around the Port Mafia — especially when they could teach a lesson. Mori could have suffocated any and all murmurs when he had stepped on the throne — but despite refusing the prior Boss’ methods, he wouldn’t act against what was useful.

Why renew the working floors?, he had winked.

Kouyou could have blamed him for it — openly, perhaps; or whispering along to the voices who imagined a crown on her head. She never had.

“He wasn’t a mafioso?”

“No. He left the Nine Rings to join,” Chuuya shook his head. “To get Ane-san out.”

“...eradicated,” Kouyou was saying, facing one wing of the men surrounding the eye of the storm. Rage was a rather cold emotion on her; her men shook with it. “I received reports. I took care of it myself. Why, pray tell, is there still anyone in this city with the foolish gal to call themselves one of the Nine Rings?”

Silence.

Kouyou didn’t snap. She didn’t kill, and she didn’t shout, and she didn’t attempt to erase the curve of her mouth. The single step she took forward startled every shoulder she wasn’t screaming in the face of. “Answer me.”

“Apologizes, my lady,” one braver soul spoke up, with a thread of voice. “We — We were under the assumption that —“

“I don’t need assumptions.”

“We believed —“

“Your beliefs might need some observance,” she insisted, crystal clear. “Unwavering faith might lead to blindness. Scorching hot curbs too, if this damn season allows it.”

The wall of men paled.

“Let them go, Kouyou.”

Her fury took a less pleasant shade. “I swore to reduce those cowards to ash,” she told Mori, the tilt of her head only somewhat unstable. “I thought I had done it. You said — How long have you known?”

“Three weeks,” The man raised a placating hand. “Kouyou, be rational.”

Her smile turned into stone. “Be rational?”

“You know the Nine Rings, ” he continued, undeterred. “You have always known there were possibilities that no eradication would be final.”

“Are they that powerful?” Chuuya frowned. “The Sheep took care of them in a few days.”

The Sheep had you. “They’re uninteresting,” Dazai replied. “They have a thing for bloodbaths, but nothing more. Their system is their strength. They have this old seal — Anyone who gets ahold of it becomes the new Boss, automatically. So, even if you killed every last member of the current syndicate...”

“If a new man found the seal, they could step up and regroup,” the boy sighed.

Dazai kept his eyes on Kouyou — watched that conclusion reach her mind, pushing her shoulders down, imperceptibly. “So now they’re killing our men and tattooing their symbol on them? Why?”

“I believe they might have an issue with me.”

Glances were exchanged. “You, Boss?” Hirotsu dared to speak up.

“Certainly,” Mori echoed, easily. “As many are unfortunately stubborn about in the underground, the Five Moons alliance included — They don’t recognize me as the rightful Boss of the Port Mafia,” He smiled in Kouyou’s direction. “They have also taken bad to your eradicating mission, which I allowed. This bundle of information has apparently made them rise against us.”

Awkwardness seemed like too common of an emotion to find a free seat inside that room, but Dazai watched it drip down the ceiling and onto everyone’s clothes. Mori smiled like a kid.

A shared belief around most hands that had held a gun at least once, certainly — after Dazai had been named head of the Secret Force Squad, he had been tasked with extermination of every subgroup who had dared to whisper that belief a bit too loudly.

He had spent long nights in that boring loop — organizing missions, torturing fools, reforming the frankly antique methods of the Mafia, making sure not a rat would step under Mori's door unwanted.

Hearing all of that, though, Chuuya's only skeptical response was: "Why the fuck would Boss sicc a mental fifteen years old on his enemies?"

A headache knocked on his forehead. "You could at least be grateful," Dazai muttered. "I just told you very private information. Almost nobody knows I'm head of —"

He stepped on his foot. "If you keep shouting it, they will."

Ace was still scoffing. "The Nine Rings have never been a paragon of success. How come they managed to inflict this much damage?"

"Maybe you should ask that to your men," Hirotsu replied, blankly. "Most of the men were found in your territory, weren't they?"

Chuuya snorted so loud it was undignified; the Executive gritted his teeth. His voice was tense over a faceless mask, when he said: "I say this the uttermost politeness, Commander, but you should learn to pay more respect to your superiors."

"Respect is to be earned," Kouyou hissed. "Twenty men in three weeks, Ace? Maybe those collars of yours are making your men lose their minds. Every man we lost was an asset. Our deal with Le Directeur is already in shambles —"

Ace laughed, unamused. "Which your pathetic squad was in charge of!"

"It took them three hours to be notified of the disappearance of the captain," she reminded him, eyes flaring up. "And now —"

"That is enough," Mori interrupted them.

They shut their lips. Still seething, Kouyou snapped her head to one of her men instead, throwing an order under her breath. He bowed, shoulders trembling, and ran out of the meeting room.

With a thoughtful hum, Mori continued: "All facts on the table, then. Thirty three deaths, all of them somewhat strategically and commercially relevant. Any higher in our hierarchy would have been an outright war declaration — It would have alerted the Five Moons."

A rumble passed through the room. The union of the most relevant syndicates in Yokohama was very rarely spoken out loud. Meetings between the Moons were rare; attacks against them even more so.

That the Nine Rings would tip-toe around their borders, Dazai knew, meant they were sure of what they were doing.

"As of now, a wide scale reaction on our side would be judged —" Mori clasped his hands; nudged the corpse, pensively. "Exaggerated, I suppose."

“Exaggerated?” Chuuya whispered. “We’re the literal Mafia.”

“What was it that your Sheep said?” he replied. “Don’t attack unless provoked?”

A strange taste of confusion frowned the boy’s features. He insisted: “What, Boss is now forgiving?”

“Yokohama is built on balance,” He shrugged. “Syndicates have to keep the hostilities to a reasonable level, if they don’t want the city destroyed.”

Something was still stuck on the Hatrack’s face. It surprised him. Chuuya’s bones were made with the soil of the city he so loved; it had been clear and vivid from the tallest roof, watching him become a void for the sake of a valley. The womb of his lonely childhood.

“But we’re the literal Mafia,” He blinked.

“What I’m curious about, though,” Mori was saying, “Is their purpose.”

Ace cleared his throat. “I thought you had said you were their target, Boss.”

“I said they don’t approve of me. If they wanted me dead, they would attack me and my men. I might still be the final prize — but first they want to gain something else.”

“Control of the Port?” Kouyou suggested. “As of now, all their targets have caused malfunctions in our oversea affairs.”

“Destruction of an organization through its gains,” Mori echoed. “The previous Boss left our finances in a — deplorable state, I’m afraid. Attacking that wound is certainly clever — I do wonder how they knew, though.”

Some bird passed by the stained glass windows — a startling ruffle of wings, bumping against the steel of the structure. In the utter silence, some flinched.

The word spy hadn’t even been muttered, but Dazai felt it ring in his ears.

Chuuya — more-or-less head of the foreign jewelry affairs — sent him a sideways look. “I can’t believe your over-controlling ass would let information go where you don’t want it to, and I know I didn’t do it.”

“Classified,” he confirmed. “Only Mori knows what I came up with to solve the finance issues.”

The boy sniffed. “Made me bring information to him in the middle of the damn night, with fourteen guards following me everywhere.”

He studied the murmuring crowd, squinting.

A pair of eyes met his own.

“Well,” Ace commented, rather pointedly — staring right into their half-darkened corner. “Perhaps we should ask our youngest accountants, shouldn’t we?”

Flowers following the last drop of sunlight — every head in the room turned to them.

Chuuya stepped forward, stubborn.

He felt himself sigh — deep. “Suspicious of the capable? How typical.”

“Perhaps we should ask the man who let our men get murdered in his territory,” the other boy spat. “Worry about what else you might have let out.”

“I’m an Executive,” Ace scoffed. “What, you brats sincerely believe Boss would have given this seat to the first untrustworthy person around?”

“Keep your enemies close and whatnot. At the very least, I would,” Dazai offered, helpfully blank. “Truly no other sensible reason for me to hang out with my darling Chuuya.”

The boy choked on enough poison to fill his old crater home to the brim. “I’m not your darling anything, you repulsive —“

Mori clapped his hands — only once. His smile was sharper than the protruding ribs on the floor. “I was just about to interpellate them as well. These two, are, after all, the last and only people to hear a word out of our disappeared prisoner’s mouth.”

The gazes studying them got sharper.

Respect was much to ask; he would settle for fear, or general discomfort. He had been skirting all around the borders of the Port Mafia longer than Mori had been on his throne — some creepy, scarred cat that liked to hang around blood a bit too much not to cause a few shivers here and there.

They all knew he was dangerous. They just couldn’t pinpoint why.

“She didn’t say anything about the Nine Rings,” Chuuya clarified, once he was done recounting the events of the dungeons — some details unspokenly agreed not to mention. Dazai could feel the details of him being carved in those men’s skulls, ready to be discussed as soon as they left that room.

Did you know he has one eye that’s just —

“She did have the tattoo, though, according to Dazai,” Mori said. “These talks of recruitment are more than reasonable — the Nine Rings are regrouping. This V Dazai heard her talk to must be a collaborator.”

“But the tattoo wasn’t there before yesterday,” Chuuya insisted. “And she wouldn’t respond to the torture. I doubt the bastard is just more talented.”

“I don’t,” Dazai intervened.

“How do you know the tattoo wasn’t there?”

Ace watched them hesitate with growing glee.

“I’ll get to that,” Dazai said, eventually. “What matters is — Why would she let herself be captured?”

“Is she a mole?” Chuuya added. He could imagine him on top of a discarded box, somewhere in Suribachi City — talking with such seriousness that all those wannabe gangster kids’s eyes would shine. “But if we assume they already knew where to hit —“

“The woman willingly offering herself to capture is just a theory,” Ace replied. “We cannot take it for a fact, only because she managed to escape — As intuitive as our Dazai Osamu might be. ”

“You should,” Dazai intervened. “It is a fact.”

“You’re smart. We’re all aware. Still —“

“We know more than you do, as of now. You couldn’t even torture it out of her,” Chuuya scoffed.

“Chuuya,” Kouyou called. She tapped two fingers under her chin, eyebrow curled. Whatever that signal meant, it worked: the boy grunted a bit more, but straightened.

“This is a deeply formal setting, boys. Some respect is to be given,” Mori agreed, smiling stupidly, after a few moments of assuring silence. “If you could tell us what’s missing?”

The mention of George Kingstain got Ace’s shoulders to stiffen; the summary of his suspicions over the way the Executive had framed his experience with the prisoner got him a few nasty glances. “This was in the prisoner’s mouth,” Dazai still concluded, staring forward, throwing the silver cross onto Mori’s spotless gloves. “George Kingstain seemed in a certain hurry to verify she had ingested it again.”

Hirotsu’s eyebrows brushed his hairline. Judging by Chuuya’s disbelieving scoff, he wasn’t the only one.

“This is a theory,” Dazai assured, innocently. “Perhaps Executive Ace might have not wanted to tell Boss his prisoner had finally started reacting — and that, regardless, he still hadn’t managed to make her talk.”

“But Kingstain heard a voice speak through the scale. Something about an angel, which the woman confirmed to be her name,” he added. “And something about her having to wait a bit more. And now — she’s gone.”

“This,” Ace stuttered, after silence reigned for a few seconds. “This is presumptuous!”

“And correct, I bet?” Chuuya intervened, crossing his arms. His gloating was almost visible. “It all adds up, and your right hand man confirmed it.”

“Don’t be mad. He took advantage of you as well, you know,” he said. “I suggest a thorough exam of your current men. Maybe the collars really do slow the circulation down.”

Kouyou coughed, hiding her mouth behind the handle of her umbrella.

“You have no right to — “

“It’s not unheard of,” Mori interrupted him. His eyes had not left Dazai yet, contemplative and the tiniest bit amused. “Many members of high-stake organizations are microchipped in some way. It was never my taste, but,” His smile cut his words off. “One could argue Ace’s collars act the same way — He can communicate to his subordinates through them.” A pause. “So this Tenshi of yours had a peculiarly shaped device in her stomach. I’m curious about what makes you think this diverges from our Nine Rings theory.”

Dazai paused. Next to him, Chuuya opened his lips — and closed them again.

“Hirotsu,” Mori called. “Did any of the men you found have something akin to that cross?”

“No,” he answered. “Some of my Lizards work with the forensic team. They had nothing.”

“But he did have the tattoo.”

“Correct.”

“Which would make Tenshi the exception in her own organization,” Dazai said.

“Why would only her tattoo disappear and reappear?” Chuuya insisted. “It might be a fake.”

“No,” Kouyou corrected him. The bad taste in her mouth was tactile; still, she spoke with certainty as she explained: “The Nine Rings were known for an infamous, secret Ability User in their ranks. Many have died to protect their identity. Their Ability works through tattoos — They can vanish and reappear at will; be used to communicate. They only freeze on the members’ skin when they die.”

“Perhaps only the most dangerous members are given a microchip,” Mori added. “See, boys? We could run in circles.”

Chuuya stared down at the corpse. “But —“

“There’s something more.”

The former doctor’s gaze on him was only so exasperated. Only so hiding something behind it. “Do tell, then.”

“I heard Kingstain follow us as we made our way down the stairs of the dungeons,” Dazai offered, hands behind his back. Chuuya’s head snapped up. “I couldn’t understand how he had managed to find out about our suspicions even before I’d voiced them — before I had seen Tenshi at all. He was the only one around when she threw up the cross. We don’t know anything but what he told us. He couldn’t even recall if a man or a woman had spoken through the microchip.”

Chuuya stiffened. “He was lying.”

“Was he?” Ace humored.

“He said something about a him, at one point. I’m sure of it.”

“Maybe it was instinctive,” Dazai agreed. “Or maybe he was lying. But I think whoever is on the other side of this cross might have established contact with Kingstain — Maybe even got Tenshi to have him ingest another cross. Perhaps it’s an Ability — control over a person’s reactions.”

“It would at least explain why Tenshi seemed so unbothered by the pain,” the other boy pondered.

“He might not even be aware of it,” Dazai added. “And now that he’s gone — maybe he was taken by whoever came and freed Tenshi.”

“Impossible,” Ace intervened, a venomous note painting his words red. “Kingstain deserted.”

Dazai’s hands twitched. “I beg your pardon?”

“He deserted,” the man repeated. “He left a letter at the base; took a good chunk of jewelry with him. The security system was damaged.”

“When was this?” Chuuya insisted.

“Yesterday night, I assume.”

“People don’t just leave the Port Mafia,” Dazai felt like reminding him. “I have come up with endless, boring plans to assure that.”

Ace’s smile was as patronizing as they went. “Perhaps you aren’t infallible, Dazai.”

“We left him in a dumpster, passed out and with a bullet in one leg,” the redhead replied, speechless. “How the fuck did he get up and do all that in so little time?”

“He was probably helped. I knew he had been thinking about ammutinating — I have had men ready to follow him for months. Fear you two would report him must have motivated him.”

“As for Dazai’s theory,” Kouyou intervened. “I’m afraid there’s a much easier solution.”

“Is there?”

The woman sent him the dirtiest look she dared to wear under Mori’s watchful gaze. Then — she moved it to Ace. “I can just think of one particular man, who’s not particularly fond of you two — who could, just coincidentally, communicate with George Kingstain through a very convenient collar.”

Ace scoffed. “You have no proof or whatsoever —“

“He probably ordered Kingstain to follow you two to give you a scare,” Kouyou said, contemptuous. “He did the same with me, once. Of course, it didn’t take. As if I would let myself be scared off by some collared mutts —“

“Whether this theory of yours is correct or not,” Mori concluded, throwing the cross in the air — catching it as it fell. “It still doesn’t change the facts — the Nine Rings are challenging us. We, of course, are not to let them.”

All eyes fell on the corpse.

Dazai saw one or two ants crawl their way up the naked bones; mused over how long it would take them to devour the body entirely. Most probably, he thought, he had lived less than he would be eaten for. Frustrated, Chuuya insisted: “Boss, I really don’t think this is just —

“Chuuya,” Kouyou called, as delicate as ice — as sharp. “As of now, you are indefinitely suspended from your current duties. The jewelry deals will pass on to someone else.”

Astonished, the boy blinked. “Ane-san?”

“You are to deal with this situation. I want you to reserve it your utmost attention,” she continued, undeterred. “Ruthlessly, too. Make sure they don’t get any idea of returning from ashes again.”

“But —“

“This is an order, Chuuya.”

He quietened, irritation bubbling underneath. He bowed his head, only once.

Mori observed the exchange with a too obvious hint of mirth. “I’m delighted we have reached an agreement. You have all heard and are allowed to spread the voice: the Nine Rings are to be annihilated.”

“I thought a response would be considered an exaggerated reaction,” Dazai commented.

He smiled at him. He knew that was the right way to describe it: smiled at him. “It will. Sometimes, though, the balance is to be disturbed,” A wink. “Only for a while.”

“Are we to simply forget all they just attempted to pin upon me?” Ace exclaimed, laughing a humorless scream. “Accept that two kids came here and spread God knows what insane theory about my —“

“I suppose we will, yes,” Mori responded. “We have no other choice, after all.”

“No other choice? We —“

“Of course, the situation would be different,” the Boss was quick to add, offering Ace an apologetic smile, “If the woman had not been broken out right under your nose.”

Ace froze.

“You wish for me to ignore the boys’ words?” he observed, through the held breaths of the room. A pause in murmurs; the knowledge of when it was better not to be noticed. “I can. Hiding a failure is not the greatest crime a man can commit. Three mistakes still lay on your table, though: the woman was under your surveillance. Dazai and Chuuya weren’t supposed to investigate. The territory was under your guard. None of these ended up particularly well, did it?”

“Boss,” Ace started.

“It truly is not that terrible.”

You lack redeeming qualities, Dazai had once explained to the man, patiently, as he stitched him up. You landed yourself in a lair of dangerous men. You will have to learn how to be one.

Genuine surprise had over taken him. Am I not one, Dazai?

No, he had laughed. He couldn’t feel a single part of his body; he wasn’t quite sure of how to turn the side to throw up. You’re a coward with sadistic tendencies.

“I apologize,” Dangerous words for a man to say this many times in so little days, he knew. “I will not let it happen again, Boss.”

“You will punish whoever is to blame?”

“Of course. Of course, I —“

“Perfect,” Mori sighed, relieved. “So will I. Hirotsu, if you might escort our crowd out? The meeting is over. Kouyou, you’re welcome to stay. I want to know all you remember about the Nine Rings. We will depart for Tokyo as soon as we’re done here. You know how I love midnight travels,” He tilted his head to the side. “Should Executive Ace still wish to come along after; obviously, he will be welcome.”

Ace choked on his next breath.

Dazai heard muffled comments rise through the crowd. They disappeared as fast as they’d come. The hilarity in Mori’s eyes had nothing welcoming inside itself; at his root, he was a man who wouldn’t hesitate to pick a second victim.

“Certainly,” Kouyou bowed. The man she had sent out had returned; he met her eyes with an alarmed expression, still attempting to spit words out when Hirotsu began directing the crowd out.

“And if you may allow me to enter your jurisdiction for a moment,” the man added, turning towards Chuuya again. His eyes traveled from him to Dazai, distracted, hands still reaching out to the nearest piece of meat. “I didn’t forget, boys. As promised, my — ah, contrary orders to stick together have been lifted.”

Dazai met Chuuya’s gaze from the infinite, imperceptible distance between them.

“Chuuya, you may keep reporting to Kouyou,” he concluded, intertwining his hands again. “She will inform you of any and all jobs I need you to take care of. Congratulations. You’ve been officially promoted to the action field.”

The boy bowed, removing his hat. “Boss.”

“As for you, Dazai,” he added, eyes still set on more material concerns, “I’m going to need your precious opinion on how to solve the losses the freighters’ delay brought. I’m interested in those infiltration channels you’ve been working on.”

He hung his head low — they would mistake it as a bow; he knew, because they always did. Mori never misunderstood a thing — he made meanings all on his own. “You can repay me with some of your stocks of cyanide,” he said, at last.

“You are all free to go,” The man’s eyes fell on his Executive again, digging the room deeper into the earth with each breath. “Sama, do bring the Archivists along. We need to deal with this little matter here.”

---

...

---

About ten steps from the sidewalk, somewhere around the blood stain that refused to be rubbed off the stone stairs of Building One, Chuuya took a leap.

His body lit up red as he floated in the ink-dark air — a child’s lost balloon and a careless bird; a sight so familiar it did not warrant the burn of his nape as he tilted it and stared. The marble of the stone railing cracked under his feet, as he landed on top of the light pole at its end, disrupting every moth clinging to the flickering light.

It wasn’t an invite — but Dazai would never receive anything quite as similar from someone quite as unwanted. With a sigh, he hopped the distance between them and dropped on the second to last step.

The snow had somehow not been drained by the scorching sun of the previous day; silver-tinted white stubbornly clung to the leafless trees lining up and down the road, and to the mostly black vehicles parked in front of the building. A blindingly yellow taxi broke the formation; the miraculously allowed one , waiting to bring Chuuya back to his apartment — per Mori's orders.

“So,” the boy started. “They didn't believe a word we said.”

Entire seasons and decades passed in front of them, riding the back of the sprinting cars. It was not early enough for Yokohama to sleep; it wasn't quite early enough to call the few shadows around alive.

Dazai hummed. “No.”

A beat. “They don't think the cross is suspicious.”

“The term Mori used is common, ” he noted, extracting the prize from his pocket. He had swept it off Mori's hands when he was too busy, along with one of Hirotsu's lucky lighters; not that the man would have allowed him to, if he had not wanted it.

Chuuya dangled his legs, untied shoelaces dancing along with the hissing wind. “And George Kingstain deserted?”

“It would appear.”

Skin deep city noises filtered through the winter wind, scratching his ears and lips alike — distant honks mixing with the faraway rumble of the Bay, waves and petrol, the kids playing with chalk friends and their men slipping banknotes in policemen' pockets to step away from chalk ghosts.

It all smelled of smoke and insides; it all tasted of those sweets Madame Tanaki brought on weekends. Yokohama was grey the way the sea was colorless. On a day he would be left alone, he wanted to die right there.

“Whatever,” Chuuya concluded, eventually. His eyes were already counting trajectories for each man he would stomp into the ground. Dazai would have never brought someone unready for war in his lair of razor-line lifetimes.

“I'm going to ask you a question,” Dazai spoke up, eventually.

His glance was derogative. “It goes, can I ask you a question, moron.”

“I can,” Dazai waved the matter away. There were better, more unreachable things to fight for — none of them quite as supported by the curiosity in Chuuya's unmatched eyes. “When we met, and Mori temporarily recruited you — why did you go along with the search?”

Chuuya blinked. “Why?”

“You knew Arahabaki couldn't be found,” he insisted. “You knew the legends were lies.”

“They aren't lies,” he specified, scrubbing his sole against the stone. His blue eye was strangely sharp — lines too gentle to be fragments, but too clever to be ripples. “They aren't malicious. What did you want them to assume about the big bad explosion?”

“Don’t focus on the irrelevant.”

“Don’t ask stupid questions.”

“Is it divine ego?” he wondered. “Is it sabotage? Did you want to watch all your dubious believers lose their faith, when we didn’t find anything?”

“I wanted Boss to let go of my fucking friends,” Chuuya snapped. “And I wanted to see if my shit luck would prove itself once again, by having some dude affected by shivers-in-my-timbers syndrome know more about my past than I did.”

A car passed by; a child plastered her fingers on her window, crying loudly at something Dazai could not hear.

“It’s not even a stupid god, anyway,” Chuuya muttered — half a scoff. “It’s just numbers. Assholes’ stole his name, too.”

What else did they steal?, Dazai didn’t ask.

Eventually, the boy cleared his throat, lips tight. “Well, whatever,” he echoed, hands deep in his pockets. Either disapproval or frustration had made the gloves insufficient — and he could not believe something so pointless could appear so layered. “See you, freak.”

He laid his chin in his hands; sat up straighter, the way the Boss’ weird something was supposed to when he was kicked out of the adults table. That was how it went: goodbye until hello, and some Arcade games in between, and some liquified brains on their fingers, then goodbye again.

Dazai saluted. “Hope it’s my funeral.”

Muttering suited men conversed on top of the stairs, throwing offhanded glances in his direction whenever a cloud hid the moon.

He would have reminded them the sky was not his to control yet — he would have boringly stuck his own gun down his throat and watched them panic over the safest way to not be blamed for it. Most of all, he would have left that city, walked until the concrete wasn’t as familiar, and drunk snow until he dropped on some misremembered grave, splintered at the seams like he was.

[Conflict, she had sworn, conflict — you can bite it from the air].

He did none of these things. He threw the one eye he had to the line of skin between Chuuya’s glove and sleeve — scarred and familiar and unbleeding — and kept his eyes there when he pulled the taxi door open — when he pushed, first, because he always messed up the things children learned first.

With a hiss and a winter-cold puff of blurred air, the ground caught fire.

---

...

---

The moment one of the volunteers — still fumbling with the taxi driver's corpse and the chaos of onlookers — attempted to put a blanket around his shoulders, Chuuya was out of there.

It did not take long to find his short silhouette through the columns of smoke, the red-and-blue shadows, and the unnecessarily grievous crowd that had gathered at the feet of the HQs — though Dazai had to make his way underneath armpits and over puddles of petrol turning the snow rotted.

By the time he was out of that bubble of panic and sirens, Chuuya had clung to the roof of some columned portico, making his upside-down way towards nowhere at all.

“Bullshit,” he was muttering, a tad too loud and a tad too accented, in that way none of them knew how to place and he never talked about. “Bullshit! I’ve fought the Nine Rings. They had no talking crosses and vendettas against taxi drivers!”

“No point in yelling to the sky,” Dazai informed him, cleaning the underside of his shoes against the concrete. “It’s empty.”

His next step shook the whole portico; he felt the sudden need to grasp the nearest part of him and drop him to the ground — so he did.

Muttered curses and an only half failed attempt to kick him in the shins later, Chuuya climbed to his feet, watching fire-fighter vehicles sweep past them, painting the night scarlet.

“They know too much if they're trying to get rid of you specifically,” he commented, as they pressed close to one of the columns, when two police cars roared by. No one paid any mind to them — there were pros in age; and pimples, too. “But Mori will tell the men someone was trying to play a prank on you.”

Chuuya scoffed. “Someone.”

He conceded: “Me.”

“That’s not like Ane-san,” He squinted, patting dust and debris off his hat. “She smells threats like a hound. There’s no way she doesn’t understand something is wrong.”

“Did she look reasonable to you, just now?”

“She grieved for too long not to be affected.”

“Of course you’re defending her.” Grant others the mercy you will not give yourself, Randou had said, long before his house burned — Rimbaud had too, he assumed.

His jaw settled. “Of course you wouldn’t get it. They took everything from her. She just wants me to help her get her revenge, once and for —“

He sighed, long and exaggerated. “And that’s the problem, isn’t it?” He hooked two fingers on his choker, and began pulling him over the traffic — far, far away from the serpent’s lair. “Even after all this time, you still think it’s Kouyou’s orders you were brought here to obey!” Dazai chanted, uncaring of the choking sounds coming behind him. “Or Mori’s even — or Hirotsu’s, though neither one of us has ever been particularly on board with that, have we? As I do, however, recall us establishing through a terrible game of Smash Smash!, you are my dog.”

“It’s been months, ” Chuuya spat out, prying his hand off, vicious. “Let the damn dog jokes go.”

“Do you prefer the personal maid ones?”

“You cheated at that shit anyway.”

“You wouldn’t be here if it weren’t from me,” he cut him off. “I think it’s pretty reasonable that you should obey my orders, first and foremost.”

“Fuck you. I joined of my own volition.”

“I was a fundamental step to that will!”

“I don’t see your point,” he insisted. “It’s not like you said anything to try to convince Boss —“

“Of course I didn’t,” Dazai interrupted him. “I’m not an idiot. Use whatever is left of your brain and tell me: doesn’t Mori have too much on his hands to worry about theories? He needs to establish his power, and mafiosi want proof of strength,” He directed an exasperated look to the clouds. “And just now, he found the perfect occasion to give them what they want: a respected organization to annihilate. Not to worry you, but you’re gonna have to develop even the smallest form of intellect — if we do this.”

“Do what, asshole?” Chuuya asked, just as irked. “We don’t have to do anything! The order was lifted — if it was ever given. I don’t have to watch your stupid face for a second longer.”

The open window of the next police car to pass them filled the air in statics and radio-voices. “— required to circle the perimeter, the guards of the Mori Corporations insists it should not be more than a simple —“

Leaning against a street light, eyes settled on the car, was a man in a tailored grey suit, murmuring into a familiar earpiece system. In his attempts to look casual to the passersby, his eyes almost landed on them.

They fell quiet.

Moved automatically, too; to the more crowded, interior part of the sidewalk, where the winter coats and unstained faces would hide the mess of dust and scratches Chuuya was sporting. His knuckles knocked against a naked wrist, and something seemed unsure of whether to appear or vanish from Chuuya's shoulders.

The Demon Prodigy has eyes everywhere, the voices were apparently saying, this time. He thought it pointless. He was eyes; they all were, when a red scarf demanded it.

"I don't appreciate being left with no choice on my collaborators," Dazai whispered, eventually, eyes forward and head low. "My preferences have hardly ever changed the circumstances, though."

Chuuya made a face. "We don't collaborate. We get stuck in situations."

"I'm aware. Is this not a situation?"

His silence was contemplative; he dirtied his shoes with his soles every few seconds, as if incapable of staring at something so polished.

"Whatever," he said, at last, straightening. His fingers closed around his wrist; he pulled him in the opposite direction, almost running an old man over. "I was starting to get bored, anyway."

Chuuya's apartment complex was some ten stores building in the inner ring of the Port Mafia's territory, with conspicuous looking inhabitants and a blood red X on the gate — signaling whose protection was to be faced.

Through familiar black cars and suited, Dazai couldn't help but be surprised by the general coziness of the neighborhood. A whiff of long-since eaten homemade food reached his nostrils; the balcony of the last floor was still decorated in Christmas lights, and its forgetful owner was studying the sky with a rusty, cheap telescope.

He thought back to his own living quarters, and his grin ripped some skin.

They sneaked by, managing to reach the endless sequence of automatic doors of the garages undisturbed — there, the boy clicked on a small, half broken remote and waited for the second to last door to open.

"No," Dazai concluded.

Before he could calmly make his way out, Chuuya grabbed him by the tie, turning him around. "The hell you mean, no?"

"I mean no," he repeated, staring at the vehicle occupying the center of the room. "As in — no. Never. Not even if you pay me your weight in gold. Though that would be little more than an ant's, I assume."

He expected the slap on the nape, so he didn't flinch as it came down. "Stop being ridiculous."

“Am I speaking Cantonese?” Dazai wondered. “I know how to speak Cantonese. I beg you to let me know if I’ve accidentally started talking in Cantonese.”

“What?”

“Chuuya,” He snapped his fingers right in front of his face. “Hatrack. Slug. Foolish dog you are. Look at me. I am not getting on a pink motorcycle with you.”

“It’s not pink! It’s clearly red!”

That metallic beast was bigger than what any fifteen year old should be able to climb on, let alone drive — Chuuya himself being anything but a paragon of growth precocity. The wheels and the handlebar were a deep, sleek black, but the rest of the bike was painted in a very peculiar shade of scarlet — if one wanted to be gentle about it.

“Have you ever seen something hot pink?” Dazai asked. He pointed at the bike. “That’s hot pink.”

“Lay off, it’s the light!”

“No need to be so offended. Don’t tell me you have personal beef with colors as well.”

“You’re the one who complained about getting on a pink bike, not me —“

“No, no,” he bit, “You misunderstand. I’m not getting on any bike with you.”

“I’ve seen you throw yourself under moving cars for fun,” the boy replied, disbelieving. “You tried to choke yourself on the sweets on Hirotsu’s desk just a few years ago. Yesterday you begged Madame Tanaki to stab you with her pen. But riding a motorcycle is where you draw the line?”

“Precisely,” he confirmed. “Are your legs even long enough to reach the pedals, anyway? Because I truly don’t think they — hey, hey. No. Stop!”

Uncaring of untold rules of the syndicate — Dazai’s skin being amongst the untouchable territories, particularly to Ability Users — Chuuya did not hesitate to bodily drag him inside the garage. What followed was a blur. Nails scratched and bones rearranged themselves, as each sharp corner of their bodies bloomed blue and purple by the vicious kiss of old furniture and motorcycle parts.

“Stop —“ Chuuya insisted, breathlessly, “ — being —“ Dazai kicked back until he hit what had to be a facial bone, “ — so fucking difficult —“ With one last yank around the knees, he managed to haul Dazai in his direction, tearing his hands away from an half destroyed night table, as he screeched, “ — all the time!”

“I hate you!”

“This was your idea!” the boy growled. “Deal with the goddamn consequences!”

They bumped against the bike. It did not manage to move the beast aside, but it did activate its emergency alarm — roaring insistently against the walls of their skulls. “Don’t make me tie you to the seat!” Chuuya snapped, dragging him towards the vehicle. “Don’t make me — !”

“I’ll take a damn taxi!” Dazai whined, pulling his hair. “I don’t even care if it blows up! I’ll welcome it!”

“Taxis aren’t allowed in the Under Port!”

“Neither are pets! Neither are —“

He paused.

In an uncomfortable embrace of limbs, he sat up, blinking at Chuuya’s ruffled form. “I didn’t tell you about the Under Port.”

“As if it’s not fucking obvious?” the boy scoffed, blowing hair off his scratched forehead. “You want to check if the other thirty two men are as undead as the one in the Hall.”

Dazai stayed quiet. Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “No way your genius ass didn’t notice. The guy was still breathing. A little, yes, but —“

“Of course I noticed,” Dazai relied. “It must have been my Ability, or someone at forensics would have noticed it. But you?”

“Ain’t you hilarious.”

“Why didn’t you tell Kouyou, then? Or Mori?”

Uneasiness draped over his features; he cleared his throat. “I don’t — It felt like they wouldn’t do anything about it. I don’t know. They refused to listen to anything we were saying, so —“

“And Mori would never approve of us involving Q in official assignments,” he concluded.

Chuuya blinked. “What does the brat have to do with it?”

He dropped his forehead against the side of the bike. With little more than resignation, he sighed: “You’ll see when we get there.”

“Where did you even get this thing?” he asked, as soon as Chuuya’s foot sank on the pedal. The bike roared to life, rattling his bones all the way to his teeth. “Did you seriously spend — I don’t know how much of your blood money on a pink bike?”

“Not pink,” he insisted. “And no. Albatross gave it to me.”

A name built to hurt. Said quietly — yet, not quite; said loudly, certainly, with some spite for the world. Look at me talking of the unspeakable.

Dazai had never seen his eyes even brush the ground. He did not know who he was so eagerly expecting to see; what mirage he wasn't ready to miss. Not a ghost; perhaps someone to blame, or a cloud just clear enough.

"The one who talked all the time," he said.

Chuuya turned his head, blinking.

"I had spies on you," he answered, with no input. "For weeks."

"You had spies. On me."

"I just said that," He pinched his side. "Don't make that face. You get all psychoanalyzing on me whenever we're in the same room; I just have better methods."

"How nice," His driver from hell leaned forward, hands tightening around the clutches. "Hey. Wouldn't it be super fun if this was actually my first time riding the bike?"

He froze. "What?"

"Hold on tight."

"You're lying," he insisted, voice cracking between the syllables. "What? Chuuya. Chuuya, you're lying —"

He did try his best to rationalize it, as the motorcycle ate and ate and devoured the night traffic, painting the city on both sides in the most blurred, nauseating colors — all his brain registered, though, was an unusual feat of demise.

By the third pedestrian they had almost ran over, he could feel his last meal climb its way up his throat at a rhythm that challenged Chuuya's evil laughter. The moment they got stuck in a small congestion of cars they weren't able to slalom through, he came to regret his decision to hold onto the underside of the seat.

"Don't you dare!" he snapped — because the boy's shoulders had stiffened, and Dazai knew. He jumped forward, wrapping his arms around his waist. "Don't you dare!"

"Come on," Chuuya lamented, trying to tear his arms off. He braked so heavily the bike squeaked, but somehow managed to turn the next corner without hitting anyone. "It's fine, it's just quicker!"

"You're not making this bike fly!"

"The traffic is so bad —"

"You're not!"

"I've done it so many times!"

"You said it's your first time driving it —"

“I was lying, assface!” Chuuya accelerated. “Let go of me!”

“You don’t even know if it would work with me here!”

“It might! You’re cutting my air off!”

“Good!” he shrieked. Sneaking his hands deeper underneath his shirt, he tightened his grip until the boy choked. He sunk his face in the boy’s jacket and screamed into it: “I’m not dying with you!”

The Under Port — the most infamous portion of the two thirds of Port the Mafia owned — rested underneath the enormous platforms dividing the sea in greyish units. Getting there was a strenuous path: past numerous metal gates and more automatic barriers, past the busy men and the carts of goods, and then — under.

Deserted as the area was past midnight, the couple of guards at the entrance offered them skeptical looks as Dazai emptied his stomach over the railings, under Chuuya’s tapping foot. They were quick to straighten up, though, the moment he handed them Mori’s Silver Oracle — slightly torn at the edges, and stained of chocolate.

“Please,” they stuttered, “Let us know if you need any help.”

“Improbable,” he replied, as Chuuya dragged him over the gate, “But do tell, do you perhaps know the rate of successful suicides committed in the area?”

Empty carriers had been abandoned down the dozen feet long platform, along to irrelevant pieces of paper and dropped goods. The chained boats were as enormous as always; as quiet and lazily threatening as they gently danced to the moon-reflecting waves. They were still some of his oldest memories: a hand tight around his smaller own, the golden ring on the fourth wrinkled finger, and a boat wider than the sky leaving the port. Are you ready to watch it blow up, my boy?

It took the lookout several minutes to answer their knocking on the carefully hidden door. The vertical tunnel of darkness that welcomed them was framed by LED lights — behind the man in a bright orange one-piece equipment suit, studying them.

When he spoke, fog blurred his mask, and his voice was little more than a robotic creak: “Show me.”

Unnecessarily — considering just how often he came down there to check on Q — Dazai raised Mori’s seal.

Where proofs get erased and men and enemies alike are gifted a last greeting, he had been told, the first time. To be fair, the Under Port is much more than a crematorium.

They descended the metal ladder to the very heart of the earth. The air grew humid and sticky with each step down; just to make sure Chuuya would not pass out upon him, he slapped his ankles every few seconds, granting himself one curse or two. The lower they went — the closer the screams grew.

A bit further down the hallway they landed on, the guard was waiting for them. Metallic walls and rusted floors welcomed them, interrupted by security doors and lines of LEDs. At the end of the corridor, a bright warning sign read: DO NOT ENTER ANY OF THE ROOMS WITHOUT EQUIPMENT.

Persistently, the one unchanging, guaranteed melody of that funerary house traveled through the walls, screeching unpleasantly inside his ears. A cacophony of untalented singers with dreams too expensive to abandon. It would fade to the background soon enough, he knew. All that was death did.

“You people should really invest in earmuffs,” Chuuya concluded, rattling his knuckles on the nearest porthole. Pitch darkness greeted him from the outside; polluted waters and night poisoned waves.

He spied into the windows, welcoming the familiar landscapes — men and women in orange equipment, their gloved hands prodding and pulling at malnourished bodies on Hospital beds, trapped inside rooms with the firework-like glows of Abilities.

Somewhere in Mori’s office was a list of every Ability User they had come into contact with; when it was enemies, their paths were few: joining, or being convinced to join. The ones who did neither left the Under Port in other ways. Usually, as organs to the Black Market.

“Oh, look,” he called, obnoxiously. “Let’s make a bet. Is he getting her hair out of the way while she throws up, or is he going to shave it off? Ah — Too late. He shaved it. Let’s find someone else.”

Repulsion settled Chuuya’s jaw. Does it make you mad, he did not ask, does it make you nostalgic?

“You sure look at home in this shithole,” he spat out, eventually. “Anything to do with those school trips you were muttering about?”

“If you count that time I locked myself here for three weeks.”

Bewilderment made him blink. “Why?”

Dazai recalled — sitting on that old floor, cold and surgically clean. No waves and no heartbeat and no breathing pattern; the screams were too loud to let anything filter through. There was blood on the walls and there was saliva on the windows. There was the sea, outside. “I thought being so close to Hell might let me find it.”

“It?”

“Longing for life,” He twirled around, just to hear his shoes squeak. “Fear of death. I suppose that might just be the same thing.”

“No,” Chuuya, stupid as he was, retorted, “It’s not.”

“Want to ask the corpses?”

“Those aren't corpses.”

“No,” he agreed. The guard in orange was making his way back to them; holding onto the edge of their suit — and turning the man's hands into fists because of it — was Q. “The morgue is that way.”

“What did I do?” the child demanded, oozing off sleepiness, the moment they were close enough to cling to Chuuya's pants instead. “I did the homework Mori wanted. I did all my rosaries! No punishment.”

Q, the Boss had once said, tries too hard to look like a child.

“Light up a bit, Kyū, would you?” he huffed. “I'm not the devil incarnate.”

“Ain't that a scoop,” Chuuya mumbled.

The child blinked, uneven pupils passing right past him to land on his favorite not-quite-adult. “Nii-san. Did you bring me a hat?”

He made a face. “Now you want to look like him, too? And with something as tacky as those head warmers of his?”

“Couldn't find one small enough,” the boy replied, easily, angling a kick to the back of his knees. “You'll get it. Be a little patient.”

Contentment looked all but comforting on their round, red-cheeked face. But they were seven, and they had been laughing inside a bloodied box in an alley when the Mafia had been alerted about a mess at a local school, and Dazai had read somewhere that most children tended to grin in the face of it all.

Their arms brushed the sky. “Up, up.”

They never did have a problem with touching him. Nullification had more to do with their doll than their skin; and they were too young to understand most of the syndicate feared Dazai's flesh for a bit more than its thievery manners.

With a sigh, Dazai leaned down to pick them up.

Vicinity with the Mafia's blood-thirsty card created uneasiness in most; Chuuya, forever a paladin of his own just don't kill the kids crusade, would go as far as to meet the creature's eyes, — and relax the curve of his shoulders the moment they were no longer around.

(When they had added bandages to the doll they never went anywhere without, Dazai had not questioned the inspiration. When Mori had offered him whiskey to numb an old scar and said, “They remind me of you,” he hadn't questioned whether it explained his reluctance to kneel in front of them and call them a victim).

“Well, then,” he concluded, dragging his palm across the nearest windows, just to leave a stain. “How do you feel about helping your nii-sans out?”

They made their way through the maze of the Under Port, cocooned by the raw symphonies and the cold metal of the stairs railings, as he explained his plan to Q in little terms. The child didn't appear much interested, as they rarely did when it concerned a part of work that didn't want them to get hurt and hurt in the process — instead, they amused themselves with squishing their cheek on Dazai's shoulder and reaching out to play with the chain of Chuuya's hat.

"That's where the bones go," they would say, sometimes, pointing lazily at some darkened corridor. Whenever they recognized one of the faces passing them by, they would whisper, "That's the woman who threw my lunch on the floor," or, "I saw him kill a man even smaller than Chuuya nii-san."

Near the end of their journey, they propped themselves up and announced: "That's where they bring the family."

It was the only term Q would accept to bestow to the Port Mafia. "Body in acid, remnants in the sea," he recited.

"They never come out," the kid shrugged. "Like the men who touch me."

He elbowed Chuuya in the side. "Say, did the Sheep have any funerary customs?"

A huff. The boy activated his Ability with a jump, bathing the darkness in a reddish light that dragged a giggle out of Q's throat; not one to be outdone, Dazai sat on the railing and slipped down. "What's with you and questions about the Sheep?"

"I'm forever astonished at the universe's ability to gather such a conspicuous group of the stupidest children on earth and leave them all in one place. Only to put the dumbest one of them in charge," Dazai answered, without skipping a beat. In a surge of improvisation, he grasped one of Q's hands, leading the two of them in a valzer down the floor. "Present kids excluded!"

"I'm not stupid!" they protested, stubbornly holding onto their doll. Their eyes studied their motions, trying to read a meaning in them.

Isn't that atrocious?, Chuuya had asked, on their first introduction, hearing about their Ability. After being asked what that word meant, he had corrected himself — doesn't that hurt?

Like all unnecessary things, he could not remember what their answer had been.

"Your gang was a lost Kindergarten classroom, though, wasn't it?" he mused. "Funerals must have been fun."

"The kids were safe," Chuuya insisted. But what was a kid to him, Dazai wondered? He doubted that walking storm had ever referred to himself as such; who had he considered young enough to deserve protection without the need to earn it? "I wouldn't let them die."

Dazai hummed. "A shame they didn't do the same for you."

The metal of the next railing creaked, bending in a half under Chuuya's next step. Q dangled their head in his casqué. Laughter, still; shrieks, still.

A moment later, he said: "Someone would lit up a fire in the deepest part of the crater. People would sit on the roofs and watch the body burn until dawn. We threw shit into the flames — our favorite catch from the month. Symbolism, or whatever they passed it for."

He hummed. "Kids do adore it when other kids lose their toys."

"The youngest I can remember was five."

"Achieved freedom so early? I'm envious."

"I was eight."

"When you witnessed it? Legends start young!"

Chuuya pulled Q's fingers off his face, where they were trying to fit into his mouth. "When they tried to hold my funeral."

Asking would be easy, he told himself. Asking would have been too easy. Dogs had no stories to tell; curiosity was a personality defect in the corpse of a butterfly, and Dazai had long since fought enemies who did nothing more than arise something akin to humanity in his lungs.

"If getting buried in the kingdom of the Sheep is that easy," he said, instead, "I almost regret not accepting to join."

The eagerness burning his lungs waved. Dazai could feel it preen when it received greetings back, behind the stubborn need to pretend questions weren't a thing of this world.

Seesaws were home to cowards, so neither one of them said a word.

"I've never seen a sheep," Q intervened.

Chuuya snorted. "Me neither, Cruella."

"Cruella?"

"You know," He searched Dazai's gaze to ask for help; when he found nothing but matching doubt, his face fell. "You know. Evil dog killer. That ugly face you two are making is not because she's genuinely horrible?" More silence welcomed him. "Like, One Hundred and One Dalmatians? The movie?"

Inadequacy scratched some unliked part of his brain; something too young to stick around. "Of course you'd know all about canine cinematography."

Q was still blinking. "What's a dalmatian?"

"I can't believe my eyes!" a deep voice rumbled, the moment they reached the furthest corridor from the entrance. "If that ain't the old man's little bitch. Looking for dead assholes to practice on?”

“Guard 32!” he exclaimed, cheerfully, opening his arms for a hug he wouldn’t receive. Q yelped as they jolted around, deciding to abandon the circle of his hold and land on the ground, offended. “How nice to see you again. Still getting off rats’ screeches?”

People either came and went in the Under Port, chased out by the never ending atmosphere and glacial temperatures — or they refused to leave, stubborn in their belief that whatever could survive the mud should stay where it was dirty. Guard 32 was neither; he simply had too much fun to ever consider changing stations.

He laughed, just once — a dying cough from a beer-shiny mouth. “Might be funnier if the rats were some of Executive Kouyou’s nicest ones, once in a while.”

“Don’t be so picky.”

“Bet one of ya’ kind would know about it.”

Dazai bowed. “I, my dear friend, am a lover of all women.”

“And yet, look at you,” Guard 32 let his eyes roam down and up Chuuya’s figure. A dirty fringe covered an abnormally wide forehead; the edge of a burned off strand seemed to press against the glass of his mask. The Port Mafia and its many vows — a line of blood for a child killed in battle; a burned piece of hair for a lost loved one.

How strangely delicate, he had once mused, head in Elise’s lap — because Mori was out, and he was never quite receptive to Dazai’s commentary on the Hell they had picked. She had been braiding hair pins through the strands; she hadn’t seemed particularly concerned with his skepticism at the gentlest notes in their syndicate’s death march. How selfish.

No one steals more than a thief with a window, she would have said. It seemed mean — the Port Mafia took and took and took, and then it dared to demand to miss it. No one longs more than those who know what they are lacking.

“I mean, he don’t even look like a girl.”

Chuuya’s flinch lit him up in threatening crimson all at once, tearing him out of his thoughts. “Excuse me?”

“Don’t mind him,” Dazai sighed, pinching his ear to get rid of the dramatics. “He has a thing against boys with long hair.”

“It got ya to shave that damn mane, didn’t it?” Guard 32 howled. “Get a few more scars and then you might actually start looking less like a pussy.”

Q opened their mouth, as if very eager to ask what a few more things were — Dazai had the presence of mind to put a hand in front of their mouth, shaking their head. “I appreciate the input. If you’ll excuse us, we need to check on those bodies you’re guarding,” He leaned forward. “Boss’ orders, you know.”

The man hummed. He was chewing on something, possibly just a nervous reflex; food wasn't allowed down there, either out of fear the prisoners would manage to steal some or because the rancid air might just ruin it. "The sons of a bitch are getting the acid treatment soon. What could ever be that important, suddenly?"

"Boss is meticulous, you know that," Dazai waved the question away. "All three of us are well used to the smell of expiring comrades."

Skipping Q's silhouette completely — as most people who worked in the Under Port knew how to do — the man observed Chuuya, again. "'You a newbie?'" he asked.

"No."

"You don't look familiar."

"Because we've never met," Chuuya replied. "It was a damn good life. You smell like shit."

"Ha! I like this one. Who knew they made your kind fun these days?" Guard 32 turned to open the door, handling the heavy levers with quick, mnemonic motions. "You got ten minutes. Any longer, and I'm gonna let you join in with the corpses."

Dazai gasped, clasping his hands. "You'd really do that for me, 32? You really would? Have I spent so many years underestimating your kindness?"

As he got pulled inside, he made sure to smile to the man until he could not anymore, feet almost bumping against the doll Q was dragging along. The guard positioned himself on the threshold of the door, blocking their way out of the morgue.

The room was smaller than Dazai remembered. All was in shades of rusted silver and dying men's teeth, from the ceilings to the iron tables lined up in long rows. The bodies upon it were covered by white sheets; the hems reached towards the grey floor like low cost ghosts costumes.

Funerals were standard procedure in the Port Mafia; it was all their dead were conceded, though. No body and no ashes and no graves; only the waves. Giving yourself to the syndicate, as the shadows retorted, was a permanent affair. Things crueler than death would not breach the contract.

The heavy cage around them muffled the screeches and the cries; the new found quiet pounded against his skull. Valleys and lakes were sculpted by sheets upon corpses; if he looked at them too long, he knew, his hands would begin to itch.

So close, so far.

Chuuya squinted. He was shaking, his usually cold body doing its best to adapt to the temperature of the room. Seemingly of the same opinion, Q whined, pressing themselves under his coat. "Which one?"

"Does it matter?" Dazai hid his freezing hands in his pockets. "Just find the shortest one. We'll go by empathy, what do you say?"

No matter the punch, they did end up making their way to the shortest man in the room. Only thirteen of the lined up beds were occupied; Dazai supposed the rest of the victims had been taken care of. No plates and no documents; when Chuuya tore the sheet off the body, Q perched their chin on the edge of the cold metal, offering just enough wonder to satiate the unmourned.

The same wounds they'd seen on the corpse in the Hall of Light and Darkness greeted them: a torn chest, naked ribs, and deteriorating organs left to the sight. The details changed with a deeper look — the man's jaw had been smashed and dislocated; two sides of his throat laid apart on the table, pages of a book.

"Pretty," Q sighed, enamoured. Dazai could see the man's vocal chords in a bed of blood and bones; if Chuuya hadn't slapped their hand away, they would have sunk it in. "That's what a good job looks like."

The strangely worded conclusion made Chuuya and Dazai's eyes meet; good diction denounced an echo of some ordering words — perhaps Mori's. To find beauty in the successful seemed a boring concept for a child; then again, few things must be prettier than not being punished.

"Is that what you say in your rosaries?" he couldn't help but ask. There were stranger things than a mafioso with faith; stranger, he assumed, than a kid with it.

But Q was both and was neither; he couldn't imagine them praying to anything but that doll of theirs, and to whatever bullet might one day kill Dazai and let them wander as boundless as they dreamed of.

"No," Q shook their head, pinching his nose when he got close enough to make them giggle. "I say sorry. Like Mama said. No other way to make them pretty, not for me."

In a room of carcasses, he wondered what Mori might say — were he to ever fall to his knees and beg for forgiveness. He would have laughed, perhaps; sent him to a corner or strapped him to the table; not said a single thing, but scribbled on one of his notebooks as he wailed on the floor. Do not stain it, he would have added, unnecessary damages are indecorous.

"What are you waiting for?" Chuuya said, eventually, nodding towards the body. "Touch it."

No Longer Human, blessedly, felt like nothing at all. The doctor had asked him to describe it only once. Loud, he had thought, and hadn't said, because of it. Or draining. Sticky; lonely.

Under his palm, the corpse's chest rose and fell.

Q tilted their head to the side; Chuuya wasted no time in dragging him to the next table and tearing the sheet off. Then the next, then the other — then all thirteen of them, the results the same under Guard 32's curious gaze.

"Alright," he concluded, at the thirteenth body. "This isn't normal."

“No shit,” The boy ran a hand through his hair. “So, what’s this? You’re nullifying whatever makes them act dead. But how are they still alive in these conditions?”

“Perhaps whatever Ability I’m nullifying also acts as a method of conservation?” he offered. “A, on the brink of death kind of power. Mori once had an apprentice who could only heal people when they were about to die. It could be something similar.”

“Isn’t that too much for just one Ability? Keeping the body intact and alive, in this state?” Chuuya frowned. “Could your Ability nullify more than one Ability in one go?”

“Hey!” Q stage-whispered, sneaking between the redhead’s legs, almost making him lose his balance. “What do I have to do? When’s my turn?”

He glanced over to Guard 23, pausing.

Before he could even turn that gaze in his direction, Chuuya’s mouth stretched in the widest grin his skin would allow. “Oh, yes,” he whispered, eyes already settled on the prey. That amber eye of his twinkled, burned to the root by Arahabaki’s caged desire to exist. “I’ll distract our friend. You do your shit.”

He picked Q up, placing them upon the latest table; in the corner of his gaze, he saw Guard 32 raise his rifle higher with each ground-breaking step Chuuya took towards him, hands in his pockets and spine curved. When new screams joined the cacophony, he left them where they belonged — in the back of his skull.

“Work your magic on him, yes?” Dazai told Q, taking his hands off them and their doll. “Let me see if there’s any brain left inside this weird box.”

“That’s not a box,” the child noted. The grip of their chubby fingers around the doll was predatory. “Mori says we need to be resp — repect —“

“Respectful,” he completed. “Mori says a lot of things. You might have noticed.”

“They’re always ugly when they look at me,” Q added. Her hands pulled the man’s face, stretching his features into sharp, scared ones. “I make them not ugly. They never look at me when they’re dead.”

“Dead people don’t care about us,” Dazai explained. “We can philosophize later. Get on with it, or I’ll tell that nice lady you pestered earlier not to give you dinner.”

Q insisted: “Am I evil? Like Chuuya nii-san said. Make ugly faces because she’s horrible.”

That Chuuya was to blame was all but a surprise. “Evil kids are kids who don’t obey orders,” he offered, too busy to lie. “Unlike me, Chuuya won’t want to be your friend, if you’re evil.”

They squinted. “Liar,” they said, quietly.

“What?”

“You’re not my friend.”

He nodded. “But you still don’t want to be evil.”

With wide eyes and a whine, the child pressed an arm to the corpse’s chest, right until blood bloomed through the dirtied bandages they refused to change.

Dogra Magra took no time to come alive; it bled down the walls, crawling in through cracks the absent look in Q’s eyes had caused all on its own. The doll had been ripped apart; its button eyes settled on their victim with borderline alive attention — the corpse sat up and screamed.

No sound came out; his vocal chords had long since been slashed, and the fingers he had wrapped around his own neck would have blocked any effort. He watched him slam his own head back on the table, forehead crushing the metal — the crack that echoed in the room was almost louder than his guttural, unnatural gasps.

There was no one to attack, not after Dazai had swept Q off the table and backed off; as such, incapable to stand on destroyed limbs, whatever his mind was showing him poured all his viciousness on himself.

Cerebral functions, he concluded. A man tearing himself apart and still not screaming out in pain, but simply in Q’s induced mania; a corpse who couldn’t feel it.

Like Tenshi.

“Oh,” the child breathed, half hiding behind another table leg. They were shaking; their smile was too wide. “Is he mad at me?”

“That’s enough,” he concluded. The man trashed and kicked and fought the leather restraints; he kept his eyes on him as he ordered: “That’s enough, Q. Give me the doll.”

Another whine. A flash of black passed by, vertiginously fast — enough to roll his eyes back into his skull. His body flinched back, bumping painfully against one of the metal tables — only for his eyes to welcome the sight of a familiar leather jacket, spread in front of him like a shield, glowing scarlet as it was pierced by a quick sequence of bullets.

“Mackerel!”

He slipped under the metal table, emerging to the other side just in time to get a glimpse of the chaos — Chuuya stuck to the ceiling; Guard 32’s corpse right by the door, piled with the passed out bodies of some other guards who must have intervened; the orange silhouette of one last man, charging towards him with his rifle still fuming — and grab the knife Chuuya had blindly thrown his way.

A piece of concrete — a tile from the roof, he thought, shining red — sank right upon the man’s rifle, dropping him to his knees with a shocked curse; Dazai tossed the knife in the air, grabbed it as it fell — and slashed his throat.

Droplets of blood squirted to his face, as the guard landed face-first onto the floor with a wet squelch. Still stuck underneath a table, Q’s hands covered their mouth.

“Shit catch,” was the first thing Chuuya said, disgusted, landing on the floor. “The motherfucker had some gravity repellent Ability and an allergy to mummies,” He kicked his body aside, as unconcerned as he would never be if those bodies on the floor were true members of the syndicate. He groaned. “ Great. Now we have to mop the floor.”

The fallen guards were deposited underneath white sheets; the equipment they had stripped off of them was hidden in the hole in the ceiling Chuuya had caused. Murders were already a too-bright announcement to Mori’s never ending eyes; Dazai knew they would be found out.

Still they mopped the floor, and they attempted to push Q’s latest victim’s organs back where they belonged before his makeshift funeral.

“Not like that,” he lamented. He reached a hand out, pushing Chuuya’s own away from the portion of skin he’d been about to tear. “That will damage the aorta, and then not even your Ability will keep the waterfall of blood in.”

“What are you, a doctor?” the boy scoffed, but he allowed him to guide his fingers down the corpse’s chest. His hand felt bizarrely broad under his own, thin and littered in Elise’s colorful band aids — unlikely harmless in his weak grasp. He studied the red maze under their palms.

“I did live with one, for a while,” he said. “We need to drain the blood. They might not come in here for a day, but there’s no way this thing won’t bleed all over the floor by then. We could maybe get away with it — if they burn the corpses without counting them. But they will get suspicious if they find a mess.”

“We can’t,” Chuuya insisted. “We don’t have the right stuff. Most we can do is — I guess I can block the largest ways with — I don’t know. Get me some screws.”

He blinked. “Where , exactly, am I supposed to get screws? You think they won’t notice?”

“I don’t know! I’ll unscrew the carriers, or something.”

It was a messy work at best; Dazai ended up using the boy’s knife to move all the skin to the side and allow Chuuya to use his Ability, pushing the stolen crews up the largest holes of flesh and viscera. By the time they had closed every reachable way, the man’s corpse appeared on the verge of imploding — luckily, it did nothing more than shake a little, once Chuuya tentatively let go of his Ability.

They stood side by side, judging.

“It’s so going to explode,” the redhead sighed.

“I mean...”

“It’s so,” he insisted, “Gonna explode in some jackass’ face.”

“They don’t even look at the bodies before dissolving them,” Dazai insisted. “They won’t find out. They’re so bored by their own work — at most, they’ll think someone is trying to play a prank on them.”

“But —“

“When have my plans ever failed?”

A groan. “Whatever. Let’s just get out of here. The noise is driving me mad.”

They had to steal some sheets from one of the cabinets to quickly clean themselves up. Dazai couldn’t do anything about the stains on his shirt, but he made sure the coat covered most of the mess — Chuuya picked up his jacket from the ground and put it on with a huff, after smacking the dust off of it.

“Be grateful,” he muttered.

“For your cheap tricks?” Dazai lied, right to his face. “Never.”

He turned to face the wall and removed the blood-stained bandages around his eye; put them back in the opposite direction. When he turned to face him again, Chuuya’s eyes moved away from him faster than light, all the curiosity buried underground.

A cold hand landed on his cheek.

A breath passed. Gentleness, he thought, later, would take some time more to be seen for what it was. Time he did not have; he stiffened, burning, tickled from the inside out by liquid snow and fireworks.

Blind to it all, Chuuya violently rubbed the last traces of dried blood from his skin, hard enough he feared an entire layer of his face would come off. “Ouch, ouch, ouch — “ he whined, trying his best to get away from the deadly grip.

“Is cleaning yourself such a hard task?” the other muttered, doing his very best to tear his cheek apart. “No need to constantly look like you just climbed out of a sewer.”

“My soul is dirty,” he replied, mostly to annoy him. “It doesn’t matter.”

“Sure it is,” the other conceded, distractedly. Something deafening, something vacant between his ribs — it peeked, a worm abandoning an emptied out carcass. “We’ll scrub it against some pointy surface, how about that?”

---

...

---

“Done so soon?” the guard at the entrance asked, purely to fill the silence, as soon as they stepped into his visual field.

“It was nothing much,” Dazai offered. “You know how bureaucracy is.”

He shrugged. “I suppose.”

Chuuya’s exhale was a storm on his face, heavy as it was. They made their way to the ladder; he allowed the boy to go first, and turned his most polished expression on the guard. “Thank you for your aid,” he said, cheerful. “No need to tell anyone about this little trip, alright?”

“Boss’ secret business?”

“Something like that,” He leaned forward. “But don’t tell anyone who could tell Boss either, alright? The poor man works too much. No need to worry him with such business.”

“I have to report to the Boss every week,” the guard replied. “Everyone who gets in and out of this place has to be written down. This place wouldn’t work as well as it does, otherwise.”

“Yes, yes, of course,” He nodded, eyes wide. “But see, I really can’t let you write down our little trip. This whole thing,” He gestured from them to the silhouette disappearing in the dark of the tunnel, “Has to stay secret. To everyone, got it?”

The man frowned. “Kid, I’m telling you I can’t.”

Dazai tilted his head. “I’m telling you have to.”

Gloved fingers tightened around the rifle; suspicion took over the guard’s traits. Either he had heard the threat underlining his words, or the whole affair had started looking too crafty to him. Whichever it was, he kept his eyes on Dazai and reached for his communicator, asking: “32, what did the visitors —“

He slammed his foot on the man’s shins.

The blades hidden between two layers of sole sunk inches deep; he went down with a choked out scream. Before he could touch the ground, Dazai grabbed his collar, plastering him against the wall. A grip around his wrist got his weapon to land on the floor. He stuck his gun up against the man’s jugular, listening to it throb.

“Do you know how easy it would be to just say yes when someone asks you to do something?” he asked, with a sigh. “Useless stubbornness grates on my nerves.” He tapped the gun. “It makes me irrationally annoyed.”

“Who do you think you —“

“Who do I think I am?” he concluded. He pushed the gun further, choking a screech out. “Irrelevant. Listen to me, yes? You don’t say a word about this little trip. I don’t care who asks. I don’t care if Mori calls you up in his office and gets on his knees in front of you. You don’t tell him a word.”

“I — I don’t —“

“And I’ll know if you do,” he assured, petulant. He knocked his forehead against the plastic mask, plastering his eyes on the surface. “Don’t think I won’t,” He moved the gun from the man’s throat, laying it on his own temple. Under the man’s quiet, stunned gaze, he said: “You tell someone, and I rip your darling Eri’s womb off and feed her baby to the dogs.”

The body under him stiffened.

“How,” the man whispered. “How do you —“

“People tend to care about things. It’s what keeps them alive, you know?” He tapped the gun on his temple, pensively. “Your darling lives in the same apartment complex as the redhead you just saw. I couldn’t believe the coincidence. I do hope she won’t need to open the door today.”

A raw sound abandoned his throat; animalistic in its irrationality, as if dogs knew how to beg. “Don’t,” he begged. “Don’t, don’t, I won’t tell anyone —“

“I know you won’t,” he assured. “Because you know I’ll ask my companion to get rid of the surprise I left. If you do talk after that, though — I’m sure it won’t be much of a bother for him to go up a few stairs and blow your darling’s head off.”

“I won’t,” the guard promised, white as a sheet. “I really won’t. I promise. I’ll just — I’ll just say everything went as it should, in the report. I promise.”

“That’s good,” he sighed, tilting his head to press the gun even harder on his skin. “You know, this is hard for me, too. If I had just let things go as they should, you might have even killed me. I can see it so clearly. You look like a panic shot. You would have raised your rifle at me the moment 32 refused to answer.”

“You might have been able to do it,” he longed. The fingers brushing the trigger of the gun trembled. “It would have been so —“

“Dazai.”

He looked up.

Chuuya had lowered his body down the ladder again, quiet as a spider. He looked down at him with a carefully devoid expression — well aware that Eri didn’t live in his complex; well knew there was no surprise waiting for her.

Dazai ached. He remembered it so well — the garden behind Rimbaud’s villa. Remembered taking the gun and searching for — and doing all he could to feel, just for a moment, to feel the — see what it would be like, if that might be enough to actually —

“Dazai,” Chuuya repeated, merciless executioner of any and all illusions he might drown himself into. He wouldn’t want the corpse around. He wouldn’t know what to do with the blame. “Dazai, where the fuck is Q?”

Chapter End Notes

list of stuff i typed into google as a research for this chapter:

- “yokohama map”
- “how well can a seven years old talk”
- “is it hard to get blood off concrete”
- “kouyou ozaki fanart”

thank you for reading if you made it this far. see you guys next chapter!

YOU

Chapter Summary

They stole two umbrellas from a pair of suited men screaming into their phones, cursing out whatever was keeping them in the storm after midnight, and after scrubbing blood from their soles, they made their way into the station.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter iii.

---

Case number: 18009567

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. were tasked with looking for [...]*

---

The Corruption thing was, objectively, a bit of an obsession.

It hadn't started as such — it certainly hadn't ended like that, not with Mori's amusement rattling the phone pressed onto his ear; praising his fore-planning for a Chuuya-decorated double suicide that made Dazai long for a pre-death of sorts. And yet there had been a middle: a crimson-soaked sky, a fractured Event Horizon, a never ending scream — the call of sunrise and death and an angry fifteen years old, among the few things capable of rattling him.

It could kill you, his bones had informed him. It did not care for him; it knew no mercy — no philosophy, no social conventions and no doctor's lessons. To at least one being, Dazai's blood was like anyone's else.

And Dazai had stepped closer.

He had been stepping closer for weeks, now. In his few hours of sleep, mostly — because Chuuya was pretending he knew how to grieve, and was climbing the stakes, and was nowhere to be found. Dreams of blood raining from the sky, slipping down fingers his bruises knew well — dreams of standing and breathing and watching the end approach and feeling something.

Corruption had dark eyes. Chuuya's hand was on his cheek. It was warm. Dazai knew it wasn't real.

Ask, it whispered. Ask him to break.

Dazai stepped closer.

---

...

---

Light appeared merciless and square-shaped, pulsing against his eyelids with no gain.

“Ah,” A man blinked down at them, holding the lids of the dustbin open with his chubby hands. Mere inches away from his bald skull was the sun; mere inches from Dazai's squinting eyes was some unfinished coffee cup. “There was no need for you boys to wait for me all night. I could have retrieved this month’s payment on my own, you know?”

The neon of The Alley’s lights blinked at him, mostly turned off and not quite intact. With sudden sobriety, Dazai knew who he was.

A mixture of food-wrapping paper, abandoned drinks, and photocopies turned out wrong was his bed — his nape was tilted strangely against one side of the dustbin. Before he could fully attempt to sit up, his leg got stuck in between another pair.

“Uhh,” was the garble out of Chuuya’s mouth, blurred and miles away. He had trash stuck in his hair; his hat was submerged under an empty box of dog food. The moment his confused gaze settled on Dazai, sheer irritation sharpened his gaze. “The fuck ar’ you doin’ in my bed?”

Unexplainably synchronized, their senses returned.

“You son of a fucking bitch —!” A combat boot hit him right across the cheekbone; Dazai could only throw his leg over the edge of the dustbin, much to their guest’s surprised yelp, groaning. “What the fuck did you put in the goddamned chips — I’m killing you — What the fuck is wrong with your rotten bandaged ass — “

“Nakahara,” the man managed to stutter, some minutes into their attempts at a fight. “Nakahara, is this about this month’s payment? I don’t remember asking for any treasure out of a trash can. I believe my tastes are, ah — more refined.”

Somehow, Chuuya managed to settle his gaze on the man’s hesitating frame. The fingers he had clenched around Dazai’s hair abandoned their prey; he made sure to kick him once more before jumping out of the bin, brushing remnants of those few hours of sleep off his good-quality clothing.

Dazai flopped back against that uncomfortable bed, moaning at the sky.

“...matter of the syndicate,” the boy was explaining, shoulders still stiffened with rage, doing his very best not to direct it to the small man in front of him. He couldn’t be older than sixty, but he sported a curiously candid mustache and some stress-deep wrinkles. “I apologize for the commotion. I didn’t realize you’d come by today.”

“Well, we can’t let that hole in your wall overflow, can we?” the man chuckled, a bit nervously. “The Old World won’t rebuild itself on its own, will it?”

Dazai landed on the ground — just in time to see the flash of something tighten Chuuya’s clenched jaw.

All at once, he felt utterly stupid.

Oh. The moment the new local god had been cleared from the Hospital, he had dragged Dazai out of Hirotsu’s desk and beaten him seventeen-to-sixteen at Final Royal IX. He had refused to explain what the weird quests that made up his prize meant; hadn't answered a single taunt. Of course.

It turned out — he came to understand, studying Chuuya and who he called The Owner's chat, much to the former's displeasure — that while corpses were bound to stay so, buildings and bars could be brought back. So, he had found the owner of the Old World — a scarred, rich man who Verlaine had thoroughly terrified.

Except The Owner was a weird man, and all the money he had offered to him had apparently been worth next to nothing.

"About the reconstruction," Chuuya was attempting, breathing through his nose. His pupils were still blown from the chips-drug accident; Dazai wondered if his curiosity was worth more than a running advantage. "We — I was wondering, just how many more — antiques do you need to —"

"Oh, the list goes on and on!" The man brushed the matter away, enthusiastic. "My collection is only just getting started. Some pieces you found — I had been looking for them forever. And all of them up to my taste! Your work has been admirable —"

"If you're going to sell them all, why is it so important for you to like them?" Dazai questioned, just to watch the man grow red. His foot was almost stepped on; he pulled on his crooked hair in response.

The Owner stared. "Nakahara, who's this partner of yours?"

"Not my partner," the boy snapped — softening his tone at the man's curled eyebrow. "He's irrelevant. Been helping out with some of your — antiques."

"That elephant shaped hairbrush almost got me ran over by a local gang," Dazai said, waving. One of his feet was still asleep; when he started slipping, he posed as coolly as possible against a dog-eaten furniture box. "I must thank you for it."

"I see," The Owner said, clearly lost. He cleared his voice, offering Chuuya all his pleasant attention again. "As for selling — Selling! Preposterous. I wouldn't sell these beauties! These are treasures, young man, I wouldn't think of —"

"But," Chuuya frowned, "Wait, how are you supposed to get the money to rebuild the Old World, then?"

"I already have the money."

He paused. "What?"

"Of course I have the money," The Owner laughed. "It's not a matter of needing payment, son, or I would have simply accepted yours. You think I'm above taking dirty cash? I know what kind of people frequented my bar. I know what kind of people died in it."

A storm of colors passed by Chuuya's eyes — overflowing between already unmatching pupils. The leather of his gloves stretched against clenched knuckles. "Then why in hell —"

“It’s still an investment,” he insisted. “I want to get something out of it. And since you young boy seem so eager to have that old place put back together — Why settle for a free ride? That’s just how the world works, kid,” He winked, patting his very round stomach. “Live a few more years, and you will learn it too.”

There had been a dog, in Dazai’s first house.

It wasn’t theirs, mercifully — it was a neighborhood pet of sorts, some poor soul someone had abandoned and made the mistake not to kill. Domesticated beings are bound to stay where they’re put, they would explain to him, at times — as if he cared; as if he was supposed to understand something out of it.

But the dog liked to trespass and to bark at night and to bite at his ankles when he refused to slip food off his plate onto his own mouth — and Dazai hated it far too much to try to understand.

He hadn’t learned instincts with a gun to his head or a never ending sequence of shouts. He had learned when a hit was about to arrive by sound: the dog would always whine in pure, unfiltered delight when Dazai was about to be struck.

“You,” Chuuya said, endlessly quiet.

A hellish shriek broke through the first morning’s breeze; only the Owner was startled — enough to let out a small squeal, skipping in place to reach for a horribly modern cell phone from his pocket. Chuuya wasn’t taking his eyes off of him.

“Yes?” the Owner spoke, endlessly polite, holding the hand he has bumped against a pipe close to his mouth. “Oh — of course, sir! Yes — No, no, I wouldn’t dream of — Nothing important. No. No. Yes, of course, I’m coming right —“

Chuuya stepped forward. “Where do you think you’re —“

The man pressed the phone against his chest, hissing: “We might have to reschedule, Nakahara. Work calls!”

“You and I aren’t —“

“You’re not the only fool with big dreams locked behind my fingers, you know?” the Owner informed him, smiling. “And the Old Bar is nothing more than a site in a very, very good area — Perfect for all kinds of nice apartment complexes.”

A breath. Dazai offered his best attempt at the art of not being a vulture — traced every inch of his shifting traits, emptying themselves out with the ease of passing clouds. The bundle of scars on his left wrist — a spiral and a black dot; a tense vein. Quiet.

“Fine,” Chuuya spelled out, clipped. “I will be in contact for the next artifacts.”

The Owner grinned, making his way to the sidewalk with noticeable glee. “That’s what I want to hear. And goodbye to you as well, you — weird, bandaged sir.”

Dazai waved, amiably.

The moment the echo of the phone call could not be heard anymore, his spine dug a crater into The Alley's wall — mere inches from the leaking pipe.

“You,” Chuuya growled, close enough that the unclarified-dustbin-stain on the tip of his nose wet his own. “Better start coming up with an excuse to why you would fucking drug us in the middle of an emergency —“

“Drugs are illegal in the Port Mafia,” Dazai informed him. “That was just — A party trick. Very famous in the underground. Voices are the Nine Rings came up with the formula! You know, in small doses it’s actually —“

“Don’t piss me off right now.”

“Why? Your architectural endeavors are already disappointing you enough?”

His eyes thinned. “You weren’t supposed to find out.”

“That kind of hurts my feelings.”

“You still owe me help on the god fucking cursed treasure hunt,” he warned. “I don’t care what you think of my motivations. I don’t care for your jokes, and —“

For the second time since he had abandoned the dustbin bed, a distant shrill ricocheted against the stone walls. Perhaps Chuuya was just stunned enough anyone would call him — he kept his hands clenched around Dazai’s collar, but didn’t protest when he fished his phone out of his pocket.

“Oh,” Dazai exclaimed, blinking. “You may want to tell me all about your sob story later. Mori just declared open fire on the Nine Rings. ”

---

...

---

One day before.

The underside of every noteworthy video game machine at the local Arcade was littered in dried gum — and, every other Friday and Wednesday, in dried blood as well.

“When are you going to tell me who you’ve been collecting knick knacks for in The Alley, anyway?” Dazai asked, rolling his thumb around the rusty joystick.

“When you stop hacking into my damn game system,” Chuuya hissed, just low enough that they might just not get scolded by tired retail workers again, crashing his fists on his own screen. “Do you want me to ram every last coin we have up your bandaged ass?”

“But what if you need the coins? To collect them for The Alley?”

The Smash Smash! machine let out a high noise, screen bright and colorful. GAME OVER, it read, over the head of Chuuya’s character — this time around, an uninteresting ten feet tall pirate, in what he could only assume was pixelated Italian leather.

He slammed his head down.

“I’m going to start guessing, then,” Dazai announced, eventually, spinning on his stool. Winter was a merciless companion to the imbrued roads of Yokohama; whenever a particularly intense thunder lit the roads up, the entire electricity system of the Arcade was rattled, momentarily turning every screen black. “You are clearly very sentimental over it — enough to ask me a favor, but not to tell me about it.”

“Do you want a red-thread board too?”

“Either it’s shame, or it’s guilt.”

“Or maybe I don’t fucking like you.”

“Sheep,” he offered. “Or Flags.”

Chuuya kept quiet.

It still rained, outside. Raindrops landed on the windows of the Arcade, twinkling in neon colors — chasing each other down like the racing machines in the opposite corner of the store. The cold of January had cramped up the half-broken heaters, sagging the room in a strange smell.

Yokohama was a haunted house. Malfunctions he wasn’t even causing were Dazai’s greatest gift. That place was momentarily holy.

“Alright, fuck you,” Chuuya said, at last, seemingly choosing to ignore the issue at hand. “We’re playing something else, fuck you. Fuck you.”

“You already owe me three dinners, two lunches, one of Hirotsu’s lucky lighters, a pet snake, and Ane-san’s hairpiece,” he noted. “What more have you got to bet?”

“I’ll throw you off the nearest bridge myself,” the boy offered, jaw clenched, “I’ll even put rocks in your shoes, how about that? That will get you off, won’t it?”

He widened his eyes. “What, like those videos I found in your laptop back in September?”

Chuuya's left eye ticked. "That was a virus. You caused it —"

"Sure thing."

"You popped one watching two people pretend to make out in Madame Tanaki's shitty soap opera. Their actual lips weren't even touching —"

"You got hard at a Resources Meeting —"

"That was literally a gun —"

" — Or were you just happy to see me?"

"That's not even how the joke goes —"

The base of true defeat was its indisputableness — as such, whenever the boy happened to win, Dazai wasted no time spreading around voices that he hadn't. Leashes were fun to pull. Watching Chuuya kick the coin machine as unsubtly as possible to get them more coins, he considered — that he sometimes forgot his hand was attached to said leashes, too.

"Sorry," he begged, at a blond woman mixing tickets at the counter. "Is that LED dog collar up for sale?"

She was mostly unimpressed, — both at his request and at Chuuya's hands cracking the counter — but she did slip them a pair of free coins.

They moved around. Air hockey tables and basketball stations allowed them to throw things at each other with mostly no complains from the employees; punching machines satisfied Chuuya's ego — claw machines, Dazai's desire to slip fake grenades inside them.

[Truly, there were far too many things to settle. Who would take the blame with Mori regarding property damages, who would have to go look for Kouyou's lost cat, who would put a hole in Hirotsu's wheels, who would let Elise stick ribbons in their hair the next time they were unlucky enough to stumble on her.

Far too many things, and far too wide was their willingness to loudly debate over them where mafiosi had business to complete. Mori had begged for a more peaceful solution. Dazai had let him put his hand on his shoulder, as he did whenever he was just gleefully stupid enough to fall into his schemes.

Bubbles and domes were only different in texture — but one was less worthy of a death sentence; perhaps only of Dazai's causal drop of highly personal information, or Chuuya's well-aimed kick that got the coin machine to give more than they were owed.]

"My favorite customers!"

Eventually, their target appeared — stained yellow t-shirt and eye bags over pimped cheeks — offering a clearly half-stoned glance to the chins they had laid on his counter.

“I was just updating our chart of the week! You know, I keep receiving loads of complains — The store wants Supreme Lord Destroyer 3000 and #1 Dog Owner to stop ruling our top three,” Mr. Arcade wiggled his eyebrows. “Got any mercy left in those prepubescent bodies of yours?”

The College drop-out who worked night shifts probably had a name, but Dazai had never quite had a reason to learn it. The only relevant parts of his tall frame were his endless knowledge of pre- Great War -made video games — and his title of the most taletelling person in the entirety of Yokohama.

Mori had his spies. Dazai had his methods.

“Haven’t you heard, jackass?” Chuuya scoffed. “We’ve rebranded.”

The man’s eyes bulged out of his skull. “What, for real?” He typed away on his keyboard, “Ah, that’s — certainly more minimalistic. Slug and Mackerel? You two really have some low self esteem issues going on, don’t you? Is it bullies at school?”

“Not quite,” Dazai answered, genuinely.

“Three months ago I saved him from drowning and he spat out a whole mackerel,” Chuuya added.

“That’s so cool,” Mr. Arcade whistled. “Do let me know if bullies become a problem, though. I dealt with shit, back in High School. You want a quick solution? Eat lunch in the bathroom. Oh, but that’s not hygienic — That’s exactly what the sons of a bitch want you to believe. See, there’s this chick that comes here on Mondays —“

“Say,” he interrupted him. “Have you heard anything about a young Ability user wreaking havoc near the industrial area?”

The man’s eyes thinned.

He straightened. In a distinctively lower, more interested voice, he asked: “How young are we talking?”

“Couldn’t play that Apocalypse IV shit you refuse to fix the machines for,” Chuuya answered.

His eyebrow curled. “Under ten? Unusual.”

“Precisely why you would have heard about it.”

Strategy settled on his dandruff-covered hair, pulling his head down; feigning disinterest, he shrugged. “It depends.”

They exchanged a glance.

“On?” Dazai pressed.

“Information on Ability Users is not our usual chat,” the man noted, nodding towards the store. “Ain’t trying to risk my damn head here. Giving you tips on petty thieves, telling you which gangs have made protection offers — that’s useless stuff. That’s anonymous stuff. Ability Users rarely fail to keep track of who has their name on their mouth.”

“Rogue Ability Users don’t care about such details,” Dazai said. “They mostly focus on mass destruction — especially in places they know informants crowd around,” He stared at him, nonplussed. “You shouldn’t have made a name for yourself, if you weren’t ready to bear it.”

The man shrugged, again. “It’s the wonders of the job, kids. You get to make the rules.”

“And when you bump against others’ rules?”

His smile took a cat-like tinge; he munched on a chip with pointed loudness, pieces of it sticking to his clammy chin. “Then you don’t tell them what they want — and it gets the whole thing moving real fast.”

Imperceptibly — perceptibly, though, in some way, judging from the fingers Chuuya wrapped around his little finger, clenching until it pulsed — Dazai’s face fell.

“Listen,” Mr. Arcade continued, blind, his trustable grin painted neon pink and green, “I’m saying this to help you, you brats. Don’t stick your nose where it doesn’t belong. The voices I heard — something appeared yesterday night, and it has not been caught yet. There’s gangs interested in their whereabouts. Got it? Not kids. Whole ass gangs.”

“Such as?”

He downed some more chips. “Irrelevant. The Nine Rings will get them, for sure. I got most of my info from some of their drunk goons.”

They stiffened.

“Until then,” the man continued, petulant, making the mistake of adding a patronizing pat to both their heads, “Your valiant interest in rogue Ability Users should probably focus on something else, you feel me?”

Outside, it thundered.

“Man,” Chuuya spoke up, eventually. “You are truly underestimating how much we value your opinion.”

Mr. Arcade made an offended face. “Listen, how about you guys go play another round? My tab. Maybe try some Visual War? You know, the immersive 4D experience? That shit might wear those hormonal attitudes of yours down.”

“Why don’t you eat my entire ass instead —“

“That’s not going to happen,” Dazai said, calmly.

The silence that followed was funerary.

Chuuya attempted his best pointed look — whatever he found in his blank gaze pushed his shoulders back, flashing hunger in his eyes along with the next wave of lighting.

“Alright,” He licked his lips, not gracing Mr. Arcade with a single glance. “Nacho Face, you get one question.”

“Nacho Face?”

“You wouldn’t like the other names I’m thinking of.”

He scoffed. “You two are being particularly annoying today. Hey, just to know,” His smirk sunk in some particularly wet side of his brain. “Did you two brats fail that badly at babysitting?”

Chuuya looked right into his eyes.

The man’s spirited nonchalance wavered; it disappeared, slow and confused, as his body instinctually moved away from whatever he tasted in the air. Gravity was him more than it had ever obeyed to him — only just inhuman enough to survive near Dazai’s worst moods.

“Wrong question.”

Violently rattled trash cans and distant store music were equally muffled underneath the pouring rain; the man’s body crashed against the back of the alley, drowning through the ancient dustbins it broke on impact.

He tried to scream — the bullet Dazai fired into his thigh choked the sound out of him, helped by the gloved hand Chuuya clenched around his mouth.

“Use your words,” Dazai encouraged, not wasting effort into raising his voice above the incessant drums of the storm. A man in danger would hear all that was needed, Mori would say. “Where do we find the brat?”

Nothing but a pained shriek; he stuttered his way through some nonsensical syllables, prayers instead of answers. Chuuya moved his hand away from his mouth, grasping one of his flapping arms — he tightened his glowing-red glove around two of his fingers, and snapped them backwards.

His next howl left Dazai’s ears ringing; still, he laid the mouth of the gun into the wound left behind by the bullet, pressing, and he spelled out: “I asked you a question.”

“The —“ he choked, garbling vomit, tears and rain all at once, heaving, “The — Following the — The people who got them arrested, t-they said — they said — revenge, or —“

Their eyes met upon his convulsing body; Chuuya’s jaw settled, his gaze questioning.

He mouthed, Possible.

“And?” the redhead asked.

“Their — Their Ability —“

“We have no care for that,” Dazai interrupted. “Where were they seen?”

“I don’t know!” he swore, sobbing, “I don’t know, I don’t know, they didn’t tell me —“ His throat burned itself raw in another shout, as Chuuya tightened his grip around the shattered fingers. “I swear!” he shrieked.

“Fine,” he said, “Anything else?”

“No, no, I swear —“

“You sure?”

“Nothing!” he cried, “Nothing, nothing, let me go — No!” His voice rose, blurry eyes settled on the gun Dazai had raised once again, aiming for a quick death, “No, no, you — I can help, I can help you, don’t, don’t —“

“Not many sewer rats Boss doesn’t know about,” Chuuya noted, meeting his gaze again. “If we take him out, we’ll need to threaten someone into starting where he left off,” He paused. “Beg us for it, though.”

“Please,” he choked out, “Please, please, please —“

That request, more than any thunderstorm and month long absence, made him pause.

[“He will grow,” Mori had said — had insisted, the one suggestion he refused to take from his unconventional right hand man, the one king he would not let him decapitate. The man had lessons to teach and a seat to fill, and Dazai was promising and suicidal, and Mori was going around saying things like equal and finally, finally, but not if it was him — “He’s not the sort of weapon that fails twice.”].

“Not many that Boss doesn’t know about,” he agreed, lowering his gun. “Just few enough to need an example.”

He anchored his fingers in the man’s hair, and shattered his skull against the wet concrete.

---

...

---

They stole two umbrellas from a pair of suited men screaming into their phones, cursing out whatever was keeping them in the storm after midnight, and after scrubbing blood from their soles, they made their way into the station.

Eyes-burning wind destroyed Dazai's own not even halfway there — as the Arcade was just close enough to the borders of Suribachi City that Chuuya's shoulders had grown tense. So

—

“Hey!”

— he spent the rest of his time reaching for the other boy's one, having his slightly bloodied hands swatted at. It took the snow mixing with the rain and soaking their shoes, for his fingers to hang off Chuuya's unwilling arm, sharing the umbrella between whines.

“We need to check Q's records,” Dazai said, between one jump in a puddle and another. “If they're looking for the people who sent them to us, their target must be someone from their old Institute.”

“Didn't you and Mori meet them?”

He shook his head. “We were contacted by one of our men playing policeman. Q was denounced by the headmaster; it must be written down somewhere at the HQs.”

Chuuya made a face. The station appeared in front of them, unblurred by the fading rain. “Hasn't Ace been demoted to official keeper of the archives?”

“And the Torture Department was handed off to Ane-san, yes.”

“Don't call it that.”

“It's what it is.”

“Ace won't let us snoop,” Consequences to the troubles the man had caused had spread like a wildfire, even if it had only been a little less than a day; whispers and dirty looks alike in their particular direction. “Not after Boss had his ass for it.”

“Well,” Dazai stated, jumping over the gates, as the boy inserted his ticket. “We'll just have to sneak in, then.”

Only a little less than a dozen people stood around the sidelines. The trains were never late — nonetheless, Chuuya didn't spare him a blink when he lowered himself in the empty tracks, waving off the very few concerned passersby. Dazai was merely surprised that someone had thought to worry.

He wandered, dragging his shoes through the snow, playing Hopscotch through the lines. He laid down, at some point, counting the rays of the upcoming sunset. He chased a moth, loudly praying for the train to come soon. At last, he climbed back to the real world — on the wrong side.

Chuuya had abandoned the soaked umbrella on a bench; wet hair stuck to his cheek. If he looked at him just uncaringly enough, he had black wings on his back. “You’re not being funny,” he let him know.

It screeched against his sternum — an old fear. He was sitting on the ground, tracing kanjis he couldn’t read; he was biting his tongue to make all his letters exist near to each other.

But Mori would have tutted for it, so it passed — like it all did.

Irrelevant, he considered, because spoken by lips that bled in ways he would never. Dazai crouched down, made a ball with the snow near his calf — and thought about asking, where have you been?, and threw it right into the boy’s jacket.

Chuuya’s jaw fell.

“You,” he attempted. Then he made a snowball, and hit Dazai right in the forehead.

They went back and forth until the train arrived, prey to the steadfast glances of the other passersby. One of Chuuya’s snowballs entered an open window of the upcoming train, arising a yelp from a some unfortunate old lady inside it.

Fingers blue and trembling, he had to jump to reach the wagon; he scratched his knees, and Chuuya made sure to kick him right where it would bruise.

They reached an empty carriage, and Dazai dared: “Bet you can’t hang off the straphangers,” because Q was gone, and it had been a month since he had bled in the sky. Hirotsu, unwilling companion he had been in most of Dazai’s solitary afternoons, would have told him to sit quietly, counting clouds. The boy squinted, and grasped the metal bars.

Neither of them laughed through it, hands stuck around cold metal — but it was quieter when they got off the train.

“Alright,” Chuuya concluded. An unmistakable stain from the bomb still remained on the street facing the Headquarters, surrounded by lazy police tape. “What’s the plan?”

---

...

---

“Executive Ace’s office?” Madame Tanaki munched on her lip, wrenching tattooed hands in each other’s grasp. She was the only soul left in the Entrance Hall of Building One; a night shift lover. “If you guys want to steal a gem so bad, I could give you this tacky necklace my dear bought me,” she sighed.

I’ve been married four times, she would giggle, when asked. Do I look like I need sleep?

The premature gray of her hair morphed into silver underneath the lights of the chandeliers, framing the X shaped scar that covered her face from the temples to the edges of her jaw. In her pink cardigan and pink scar tissues, her skin properly littered in tattoos and her glasses hanging from a black lace — she was a stubborn flare from the prior Boss’ reign, too smart not to bow at the change.

According to the voices, she had also given birth to her third daughter during a safari in Kenya, worked in a chocolate factory — and was responsible for the broken chandelier in Building Three, which she had shot in joy, after finding out she was pregnant again.

“Not that kind of emergency, Tanaki,” Chuuya assured her. “We’re not trying to mess around. Promise. We just have to deal with a — thing.”

“You know every corner of this building, don’t you?” Dazai batted his eyelashes at her. “Even better than I do. There must be a way to reach Ace’s office undisturbed. Won’t you do a favor to your child’s godfather?”

The redhead’s elbow sunk in the space between two of his ribs, full on crumpling him. “Go choke. She already said I get to be godfather —“

“Don’t make me laugh,” he choked out. “At best you could be a dog father, and he’ll be too squishy to play catch for years. Ha. That was funny.”

”It really wasn’t.”

”You have no useful skills to offer a newborn.”

“And you do? You? You’ll teach the hangman knot to a fetus?”

“Maybe I will! At least I won’t put a hat on him the moment he’s out of the placenta —“

“Boys,” Tanaki attempted, raising quieting hands, smiling softer than the snow on their coats. “There’s truly no need to fight. Neither one of you will be godfather.”

Their protests drowned each other out, the loudest thing in the night. It was most mafiosi’s work time; ever so often, suited men carrying body begs would pass by. If particularly brave, or particularly high ranked, or particularly stupid, they would throw a despising glance in Dazai’s way.

“Hanging around with people your age, Demon?” a passing man called, fingers clenched around a rifle. “Can’t believe my eyes!”

“Lay it off,” his companion chimed in, hitting his shoulder, eyes carefully pointed to the floor. “Do you want it to end up like last time?”

Tanaki glared daggers at them. They scurried away, blushing.

“How displeasing they can be,” she scoffed, the moment the duo disappeared in the glass elevator. “Truly have no better way to earn their pay than acting like the miscreants they are.”

“Ain’t that what we all do?” Chuuya replied. In a last resort, he laid a hand upon the woman’s own, on the counter-desk. “Tanaki, come on. ”

Hesitancy battled between the scars on her face. Eventually, staring at the ceiling, she sighed.

Old keeper of the Headquarters building as she was, the woman’s knowledge of its halls and shortcuts managed to beat even Dazai’s own. Some things, Dazai was never too happy to find out, could escape even the boring wanderings of a fourteen year old who was not allowed to any meeting, and expected to memorize their affairs in spite of it.

“We’re literally in that stupid game — Monster In The Wall, ” Chuuya pointed out, somewhere after the thirteenth spider web they encountered in their dark way. “How did Tanaki get a secret door behind her desk?”

“Mori says she had dirt on the old Boss,” he replied, blinking against the crimson glow of the boy’s body. His voice echoed off against the wooden tiles, devoured by termites and time — framing creaking stairs they had to climb sideways. “Maybe she built these passages herself.”

“Wouldn’t surprise me.”

“Did you know one of her tattoos is a barcode that immediately saves a debt on the phone scanning it — and calls the police, in the meantime?”

The boy paused, removing a web from the chain of his hat. “She’s fucking insane.”

“Has to be, to work around here,” Dazai shrugged. “And so many years, too? I would have killed myself decades ago.

“That doesn’t mean much coming from you.”

Chuuya should be just small enough to get through the grate, Tanaki had said. But you, Dazai — you’re thinner, so you go first. Just — try not to get stuck? I’m too pregnant to come save you.

“Insane,” Chuuya repeated, after a while.

“Great tardive hearing abilities.”

“Die,” Eyebrows furrowed, he added: “Kouyou — when I chose her tutelage —“

“Chose?” he cut through, skeptical. “Mori didn’t assign you to her?”

“No,” The boy blinked. “He told me to pick between the Executives. The Colonel looks like his ass is constantly on fire, and Ace is a clear piece of shit. She was a bit uptight — but at least no one fucked with her.”

A good enough description of the heads of the Port Mafia. “And did she think you were crazy? I did hear you bit her.”

“That’s not — “

“Very street rat of you.”

“It was an accident, anyway, and she got too — Whatever. She said all I would ever need to survive in this place was some bloodthirst and silent feet.”

Dazai hummed. “Sounds like her.”

“Pianoman, though,” he added — his voice unwavering underneath the weight of another name that did not even have a tombstone, “He said everything is a hierarchy, and the system was corrupted but functional, and I don’t know what other shit. Respect those you have to, and that will do it all. Asshole had a thing for nepotism, too.”

He wondered if he would need to lay in a grave to feel an inch of the heart-wrenching longing wrapped around his tongue like a whip of thorns. Chuuya recalled their words with some sort of reverence on his lips; lowered his voice, each time, undeserving of an honor the dead did not care about. Guilty.

A dog’s loyalty was too stubborn to need presence.

“Your point being?” he asked.

“I had expected people to respect you a bit more,” he sneered, hands in his pockets. “Scary nickname and all. Most of them treat you like a stray leaving his ass where he’s not supposed to.”

“They do.”

“They aren’t wrong.”

“They all signed up for the Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter, so I assume not,” He smiled, sweetly. He wondered just how boring the syndicate must have gotten for him, after the Flags’ death, for him to wonder after Dazai. Then, swatting his kick away: “Very few people have any idea of what I do. Occasionally, something in their puny brains is just developed enough to understand that it’s better to leave me alone. As you saw down there.”

“That. What happened last time?”

“Some men wasting their afternoons and I got in a bit of a misunderstanding.”

He curled an eyebrow. “Misunderstanding.”

“They got a bit offended when I called out their pathetic existence,” he admitted. “All that alcohol had them red like tomatoes! They beat the good day out of me, of course. Broke one wrist!”

“And you let them?”

“I was experimenting with death by excess of physical damage,” he sighed. “It didn’t work. A shame. The day had been going so well.”

Something akin to disgust filled Chuuya’s eyes. “I really do despise you.”

“It’s mutual.”

“What’s a good day for you?”

Dazai thought about it. “Well, I like crab.”

“Crab.”

“I adore it. I had stopped by to eat some — and then I came here, and those men just had to ruin my afternoon. I let them,” He knocked on the wall, dirtying his nails, because Mori and his Laws Of Hygiene papers would hate it. “Then I put a bullet in their leader’s head, and Mori put me on cleaning duty.”

A huff. “Gets the point across.”

“Sure does. You know how Mori is,” He cleared his throat, “This is a deeply formal setting, boys, please.”

Chuuya stopped so suddenly, he almost bumped against him. All his astonishment bathing in his red glow, he questioned: “What was that?”

“You know,” he insisted. “When he gets all whiny. I must thank you for joining this boring meeting.”

“That doesn’t sound like him at all.”

Dazai made a face. “Yes, it does.”

“No, it doesn’t.”

“I have known him longer.”

“And I actually listen when he talks,” he hissed.

“My condolences,” A fraction of sunlight peeled through a slot in the tiles, blinding him before he could respond. He leaned closer; whistled. “Would you look at that.”

“— think I care?” Kouyou was saying, her shoe deep into a man’s torn apart ribcage, bones creaking underneath the pressure of her heel.

He was still breathing, somehow; pushing each other to get a more optimal view to Ace’s office, they watched his face grow paler and paler. “Boss removed you from your position because you failed. Do not take your childish whining up to me. I'm here to obey his orders, as we all are."

From the other side of the room, Ace scoffed. He was clearly as annoyed by the sight of fresh blood on his carpets as he had always been, the few times Dazai had been brought along to his torture sessions. Such delicate cruelty had never quite fit him; whereas Kouyou's smile was untouched.

"As if you hadn't been waiting for an occasion to gain the lead to the torture experts for years," he jeered, dryly. "And in our current circumstances — all you're waiting for is to skin some Nine Rings alive with those hands of yours, am I wrong?"

Kouyou hummed.

Her kimono brushed against the ground, soaking blood and turning it into blooming petals. She wasn't even twenty yet, he knew — nineteen years of bitter poison had turned into something unhesitant, though, when the tip of her sword reached the space between the man's thighs.

"I have nothing to deny, nor to be ashamed of," she declared, softer than manicured nails down rotten flesh. "Miserable simpletons are bound to make mistakes. It is in their nature. The only difference — is that we are bound to retaliate. That, is what is in our nature. Is that not the nature of consequences? Aren't crimes supposed to be punished?"

"No one needs your philosophy," Ace spat out. "And no one needs you to justify your power. There is no fairness in crawling at a man's feet and obtaining the precious mud under his shoes."

"You believe Mori holds a grudge against you?" Her smile widened.

She sunk her sword. The man shrieked.

"You're wrong," Kouyou assured him, cleaning her blade with one of her sleeves, meeting his gaze. One of her eyes was always hidden under her hair; when he was younger, Dazai used to reproach her after every comment on his bandages. They didn't need mirrors to spit on. "Punishments are for those he wishes to keep around. If he held you in no value, you would be the precious mud under his shoe. And trust me — I am too busy to bring flowers to a traitor's grave."

Shoulder against shoulder as they were, Chuuya had no way to hide his flinch. He thought of a shaking silhouette at the Executives' table, red scarf and silky hands — how he would let Elise braid his hair, a distant veil on his eyes.

Reminds me of someone I can't recall, he had told him, with that accented voice of his they had never questioned. Someone golden.

"The Nine Rings," Kouyou said, "Are nothing, Ace."

The Executive did not say a word.

“Not anymore,” she continued, dragging the tip of her umbrella down the tears of the fallen man’s carcass, reading each cave and organ like a blind man would. “They think they can rise like an impudent phoenix, and kill my men — target the ones under my protection?” The umbrella dug. “No. Never again.”

“I slaughtered them once,” Was the sentence, “And I will slaughter them again. And she —“

Her voice died in her throat. Knuckles white around the handle, a spasm went through her whole body; she tilted her head to the side, as if listening. She laughed — a glacial, lined in jade, melody.

“Never again,” A wet squelch filled the air. “Never.”

Chastised, though not to blame, Ace hung his head low. “Everything for the organization,” he recited.

“Until our blood runs black,” Kouyou smiled.

How boring, Dazai thought, how foolish.

Behind the wall, her victim began to sob.

They leaned their backs on the tiles — knees pressed to their chests to muffle their breathing, still shoulder against shoulder — and they waited for him to die.

---

...

---

“Oh,” Chuuya stated. “Oh, Boss is going to kill us.”

The Blossom Institute, a brick building near the center of Yokohama, had been described as a column of high class and shady backgrounds, in the file from Ace’s archives. Its glass linings, caged by a well-cured garden white with snow, were splattered from floor to ceiling in blood — with a grace that made it indisputably tasteful to the circumstances.

Places as marble-born as those — waterfalls from the highest seats in that city’s heart system — always tickled Dazai’s skin, the way an electrical shock might have.

“Kids, you need to stay behind the tape,” an Officer told them, cutting their line of vision from the massacre. The crowd pushing against their backs pounded against his head with the same vividness of the rows of ambulances approaching.

Their blue-and-red lights only showed off the damage they were trying to so hard to hide — the mess of dismembered corpses on the ground, their hands stuck around each other's throats, the everything-at-reach they had used as weapons still abandoned through the snowy grass, bloody and sticky. The headmaster's unrecognizable, severed head was half hidden under a sheet.

A sheet smaller than all the others covered one of the nearest bodies — a pale hand, scarred down the thumb, peeked from the edge.

Caused a freak accident with a classmate, the papers had said.

"God damn it," Chuuya snarled, through clenched teeth, removing his hat. "God fucking damn it."

"Kids," the man insisted, stern. "Step back."

"What happened here?" Dazai asked.

"You can check the news in the next few days —"

"They killed each other," He blinked. Q had been in the Mafia for months, now — they knew the rules. Do not leave traces behind. "They were also rather violent about it. Weren't they?"

The man's eyes hardened. "Where are your parents?"

"On the ground behind you."

He paled.

Before he could stutter something out, gloved fingers found Dazai's wrist, pulling him out of the ocean of whispering people — deaf to the Officer's calls and the horrified hiss of the wind. The crowd was quick to gain the newly emptied first row seats.

"Let's go," Chuuya said, not paying another glance to the funerary scene. "I know someone who might know where they went."

He dragged his feet through the snow, shoulders low — Mori's spies would need more than that not to find them, but the smell of decay might just distract them. "How?"

"His badge number," he replied. "I know someone from the 135th division. If he's not here, he must be where we're going. We could access his data and see if they have any registered sights of the brat."

"And where is this place?"

Chuuya glanced his way. Not quite amused — not with the echoing rage. "You'll like it tons. We need to catch a ride."

The so-called ride turned out to be a seemingly inconspicuous carriage truck, enclosed by rainproof sheets and overflowing in containers, rattling wildly with each sharp turn it took.

The end lacked doors, letting in a whipping wind and road-dust — the few other passengers they gathered through the journey to the outskirts mostly steered away from it.

“Fly away,” one of the men warned them, when they went to sit on the edge.

“Hope so,” Dazai nodded.

The passengers exchanged looks. They wore torn clothing, layer upon layer of colorless, warmth-searching shields — the tiredness in their limbs was only somewhat brighter than the one in their eyes.

Sitting right at the edge of the back truck, dangling their legs over the road, they kept quiet when a child not older than six — who had been hanging from her mother’s filthy skirts until a moment before — settled next to them.

She blinked. When their eyes met, Dazai mustered up the strangest face he could. A giggle escaped her mouth; she pressed against Chuuya’s side, instinctively.

When she turned to meet his gaze, her smile vanished.

“Odd eyes,” she said.

The boy huffed. “I’m not a cat.”

“Oh,” She fell quiet. “Curse?”

“You guessed it,” Dazai warned her, unprompted. “And I’m the one doing the cursing,” When she turned, he offered her his widest smile. “Should be careful, ah?”

A whine left her lips. Alerted by the sound, her mother called her to her side, sending them a mistrusting glance — under the hiss of whatever story the kid was telling her.

Chuuya’s face was unimpressed.

He shrugged. “One day you’ll tell me how someone who grew up surrounded by kids can be so awkward around them.”

“You got it already,” he replied, distractedly, sitting up straighter. “This is our stop.”

His body leaned so far over the edge of the truck, someone with less awareness of their own physicality would have fallen. Gloved fingers brushed the road, uncaring of speed — they glowed a gentle red against the night, sinking in the concrete as if it was little more than butter.

The vehicle jolted. The wheels were forced to a stop, pulled by that unnatural anchor — they jumped down. The little girl’s eyes followed them eagerly, until the truck vanished again.

“Fugitives?” Dazai guessed, as they made their way through the abandoned warehouses. The panorama was all grey and black; half destroyed buildings and blurred graffiti, losing themselves between wildly tall trees. The smell of drugs was a distant echo; mixed to it, the roar of a crowd, and the rattling of metal fences.

“Access to the area is restricted,” Chuuya confirmed. “Only freight carriages can pass through. Lippman and I used to come here after missions.”

His eyebrows flew to his hairline. “You mean to tell me — glory-lined actor Lippman took part in illegal fighting rings?”

Metal fences had been pushed and tied together to create a small battling space; pressing and clapping against those walls was a crowd of clearly drunk people, exchanging beers and money, their leather clothes smeared in blood. Most gang tattoos were well hidden — a neutral spot, certainly. Banknotes were thrown in the air whenever one of the half-naked men inside the fences managed to slam a body to the ground.

“Not much,” Chuuya answered, removing his hat and abandoning it upon Dazai’s own head. “I did.”

“Look who showed up again!”

A shirtless man made his way to them, slicked-back hair losing their texture a bit more with every sweat drop on his forehead. He sported no gang tattoos or empty bottles — but he wore an expression so cheeky it was blinding.

“Been a while since you and that dandy friend of yours came around, Nakahara,” he laughed, clasping a hand around his shoulder. A good look at both of their expressions made him remove it. “Shit, did your kids’ cat die on the way here or something?”

“No,” Dazai said, “But the dandy friend did.”

The man’s face fell. “What?”

A thunderstorm had gathered on Chuuya’s face, and it clearly had no desire to leave Dazai’s own. It tore itself off, somehow; settled somewhere over their guest’s shoulder. “You must have seen the news, Okuda. Bastard got a three day service. Mourning of Japan’s sweetheart, or something.”

The bundle of old laundry underneath those ripping-bandaids quick words didn’t go unnoticed; the man cleared his throat. “My condolences. Thought it might have been a facade.”

“Yeah, cops always do,” he muttered.

Okuda cleared his throat — again. “Ah — And who is this, ah? Thought you were proud of being the youngest on the ring. Trying to prove all fifteen years old have mean punches?”

“Oh, no,” Dazai shook his head. “I’m not here to participate, my friend. Brutish displays of physical supremacy are hardly entertaining. If that was the idea, I’d go to a dog fight,” He tapped the chain of his newly acquired hat. “Then again, if Chuuya’s here, it’s basically the same thing.”

The man blinked. “Yeah, okay. Nakahara, want me to find you someone?”

“Actually, Officer,” Chuuya said, sending a pointed look to the work bag still hanging off his naked shoulder. “I was thinking I could beat your ass tonight. If you’re up for it?”

“Someone hasn’t lost his confidence,” He laughed, wholeheartedly. “What are you betting?”

They exchanged a glance.

“Three hundred,” Okuda concluded, once he decided they wouldn’t speak up. His wink came with the roar of the crowd, and the wet squelch of a bone being snapped. “Nothing less for our champion, right?”

“Fine,” Dazai said, before the boy could open his mouth to counter offer anything. “But if Chibi wins, we want the cash in coins. Deal?”

His stare waited for their own to lower. When it didn’t happen, he shrugged. “Teenagers,” he commented — as good as a yes.

The ring emptied out; new money was thrown on the ground, as Okuda’s sneers were slowly proven right — a shadow of matters and glances followed them eagerly, as Chuuya sat on an empty beer container, taking his shoes off.

His shirt came next. Dazai’s eyes fell on vaguely spiral-like, strangely vivid scars marring his torso — he placed himself where they would not be seen. “When did you have time to become an underground fighter? Between dog academy and Kouyou’s training, I mean.”

“The Flags thought I hadn’t — lived wildly enough in Suribachi, or some shit,” Chuuya said. He gathered his hair in gloved hands, tying them up much higher than usual. “Grew up in that pit of deprivation and never fought in a makeshift ring? I tried to explain that the Sheep kept me busy, but they didn’t care. Lippman loved this stuff.”

“Bet he did his own stunts in movies.”

“Nah,” A shrug. “He was too lazy.”

Lippman was, in his mind, what all the Flags were — an imposing silhouette in tailored clothing, always close enough to Chuuya to seem walls and windows and warmth. Hair tucked behind his ear, in Lippman’s particular case; a slightly too pleasant, slightly too honest laugh.

He and Kouyou had fought long and silent for the title of face of the organization. Dazai had tried to ask the Lady of the Port if his death had satisfied her; she had refused to answer.

“He would show up covered in bruises from the night before, and drag me along to make up pathetic excuses for him,” Chuuya snorted. “And then try to shove me in an audition room.”

Dazai was hit by the hellish vision of a gigantic billboard sporting Chuuya’s face, towering over the Headquarters — much to Ace’s displeasure. His short frame right next to that of his love interest — a film so horribly fascinating it would grant him all praises.

I want to thank Lippman, he would say, awarded, as Dazai prepared the best Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter up to date. For taking me out of the life of crime I almost dedicated myself to.

“Oi,” Chuuya called, squinting. “The fuck are you giggling about?”

Okuda entered the ring, raising screams and cheers from the drunken crowd. The boy’s eyes focused, at once — he rolled his shoulders back, climbing to his feet. All but a chore; all but a game of uncertainty. The best martial artist in the Port Mafia didn’t fight fools he wouldn’t destroy.

Not the best in our ranks yet, Kouyou had let Mori know, mere months ago, while Dazai slept his way under the man’s desk. But he will be. There is no other option.

Well aware, Dazai leaned his chin on his hand, batting his eyelashes up at him. “Say, you won’t put us both in a very mortifying spot, will you?”

Chuuya’s grin was animalistic.

He wasn’t even sixteen — calling him muscular would have been too kind. He was scrawny and bony and pimpled, the way Dazai was, and one of Elise’s non-permanent tattoos — a cartoon-eyed bee — had yet to fade from his hip. He could benefit from braces, Mori had once said.

But he grinned, still.

Unhelpfully, his mind supplied: ah.

The fight was lost from the very first moment their bodies crashed against each other — nevermind the height difference or the cocky expression upon Okuda’s face. As most sunrises and dawns, Dazai got bored of it pretty soon. He wasted time, instead, humming against the screeches of the audience. He stole banknotes from Chuuya’s wallet, blinking at the half ripped picture inside it — Adam Frankenstein himself, pressing his cheek against Chuuya’s protesting own.

Sometime around the third spit of blood on the ground, he stood up.

He sneaked past the bulky wall of the drunken crowd, making his way to the appropriately distracted Officer’s work bag — stole a bottle of whiskey, while he was there, and ran his eyes down leftovers from lunch, reports, a pack of cigarettes stick to a badge, and, eventually — a two way radio, adorned with the Yokohama PD logo.

A chorus of groans lit up the night. Dazai turned just enough to watch Chuuya pull Okuda’s shoulder out of its socket, blowing hair off his forehead — and then made his way to the nearest warehouse, holding his newfound treasures.

“I can’t even begin to imagine,” he sang, as he skipped his way down the empty space — steps echoing off broken windows and rusty walls with haunted efficiency. Hirose Fumiko was Mori's greatest plague, and the reason why his record player had been destroyed . "And you won't hear me lie —"

He found an abandoned desk near the end of the storage, right under an old neon cross as tall as he was, still covered in old permits and a #1 Mom cup; he sat under that fragile roof, and began browsing through channels on the radio.

It was hardly — much to Hirotsu's chagrin — the first time he played around with stolen police equipment; it took less than a minute for the confluence of voices to creak its way into life.

"...near the Theater, the thief has not yet been —"

"Agent, any new info on the assault near the —"

"...Ability User — that's what the school said, but we can't be sure if it's actually —"

He settled on that channel, pressing the button. "We got any info on the brat?" he asked, dropping his accent to an acceptable rendition of Okuda's town cadence.

The radio creaked some more. Eventually, a female voice intervened: "Agent Okuda, hasn't your shift ended?"

"You expect me to go home and relax while a psycho goes around forcing innocents to murder each other?" Dazai replied, as enraged as Tanaki got against the second male leads of her dramas. "Haven't even undressed yet. I'm near the highway — We got any updates? Witnesses saw them? I could get there real fast."

"Not quite," she sighed. "There's been sightings near Yamashita Park, then by the bridge — The little shit moves fast. No other victims apart from the ones at the Institute; clearly, they had a target. Agent Ino theorized they might be trying to get back home, at this point. But they know we're tailing them. They keep evading us, fuck knows how."

No mafiosi worthy of their name would have failed at a task as elementary as outrunning the police. "You tried checking the cameras near Mori Corporations?"

The creaking lasted definitely longer.

"We don't have clearance," she replied, clearly tickled. "An order was sent out yesterday evening. We can't turn them on yet. The Commander won't risk angering them."

Dazai nodded. Contacting their PD insider on his own had been a risky move, considering the woman was constantly in contact with Mori; but they couldn't risk Q being associated with the Corporations as of now — not with the bloodshed they were leaving in their wake.

"So?" he asked. "What's next?"

"They're thinking of contacting the Special Division."

He paused.

“That’s not a good idea.”

“You think I want to involve the weirdos?” Her shrug was borderline audible. “We don’t have the tools to deal with Ability freaks. The Institute is already on our ass — we sent them our best guards for their honorable guests and whatnot, and the psycho still got in. We need to get them by the night, or we’re fucked.”

If the Special Division got involved — the same people Mori had been trying to extort an Ability Business Permit from for the last year — he would never hear the end of it.

At best, he corrected himself. Mori didn’t much like punishments, though — only lessons.

“Fine,” he said. “Do let me know if we get any —“

A meow thundered across the warehouse.

One of the cats who had been diligently observing the fights had sneaked in — it sat, now, somewhat polite, right in front of his desk, paws brushing his shoes. It blinked at him, very slowly. Meowed.

Dazai turned the radio off.

Unhurried steps crossed the entrance to the warehouse.

“...think we’ll find someone?” a woman was saying. Her voice was softer than a caress; the skip in her step was clear through the pauses of her words — as if no message could be more important than her need to jump over rat feces. “Here, of all dumpsters? Recruitment a delicate deal.”

“Desperate people find desperate places,” A man replied. One he knew. “And this place reeks of desperation.”

“Eh. I only smell sweat and cheap weed.”

“Same thing, almost.”

“Better than what those Mafiosi smelled like, for sure.”

“Tenshi, ” the man insisted. “The money?”

“Do I have the money?” Her laughter was loud enough to startle even the cat, paws showing off their claws. “You’re damn lucky I don’t. I would have ran off by now.”

“What?” The steps paused. “But then —“

“In the car.”

“Why would you leave them in the — Fine, whatever. I can’t believe he still makes me work with an absolute — Just. Stay here. Do not go anywhere, or he’ll have my head, and then he’ll take yours.”

“It’s not like I can go anywhere,” A metallic rattle filled the air; handcuffs, as cheap as they went. “V, come on. Just go. Maybe I can finally take a piss somewhere, if you leave.”

“Not my fault if you’re a prude.”

“Not my fault men are shit. Go.”

The man ran off. The woman kicked some pebbles aside; with a tone that spoke of screaming to the ceiling. The broken neon cross seemed to flicker. Dazai set his chin on his hand — blinked up at it, feeling the pulse under his nails slow down.

Eventually, he pressed his body to the ground, spying through the thin space under the wooden desk front — just in time to watch a curly haired man with a rifle on his shoulder come back into the warehouse, dragging his companion out by the wrist.

The hems of the woman’s black skirt brushed the ground as she twirled and twirled, a cascade of blond hair bouncing with every step. Hanging from her neck was a silver crucifix — rusty with something too red to be rain.

Dazai looked back at the cat. Undeterred, the small beast jumped on the desk, meowing offensively loudly.

When the woman gasped, he stilled.

Before she could step forward and escape her companion, though, the cat made his way to her, each step a wide skip — fast enough to give the clear idea of a chase. Her delight was evident; she leaned down to pat its head when it brushed against her skirt, her glistening cross reflecting the light from around her pale neck.

When the cat made its way outside, she only hesitated for a breath before dragging the man outside with her, ignoring his curses.

The radio still clenched in his first creaked.

“Agent Okuda?” the woman called. “Good news. I might just have a lead.”

---

...

---

Three hundred yen in coins were, as it turned out, a good enough reason for Agent Okuda to forgo all ring rules, and punch Chuuya square in the nose while he wasn’t looking.

“I can’t believe you let him hit you,” Dazai commented, slapping the nasal bandaid on his nose with little grace.

The thump! of the boy’s head against the medicine vending machine was only so louder than his muttered curses. Its bluish light was an eyesore for Dazai’s sleepless eyes — not as much tired as they were whiny about it.

“No Ability Users are allowed in the ring,” Chuuya repeated, hilariously nasal, for the tenth time in an hour, holding onto the handle of their latest stolen umbrella. When Dazai deemed his job done, he sat on the wet ground — just to spite his overgrown coat and the anti-homeless bench on the other end of the street — leaning his back against the glass until its vibrating hum warmed his muscles. “As I’ve fucking told you —“

“I don’t listen to little slugs.”

“My Ability activated instinctively, and I had to focus on turning it off — and anyway, the fucker went against the rules —“

“You beat Ane-san’s demon on the daily,” he insisted, amazed, “And you let a cop break your nose.”

“It’s not broken, fuck off.”

“It’s shattered.”

“It’s fine. ”

Dazai prayed to the pollution-stained constellations. “Like you need any help to look more like a garden gnome.”

Chuuya kicked his side. His shirt had been freed by his shirt; a slot of his ankle brushed his skin. Dazai breathed from his nose only. At the very least, he considered, they had gotten half of the three hundred coins. The Arcade would appreciate the effort.

A car passed by, wheeling at unnecessary speed — Chuuya tilted their umbrella, scherring them from the splash. A pack of Crispy Chips landed on his lap, thrown with all the petty violence of a grenade; the boy’s pack popped along to his own. Quietly, eyes on the empty road facing The Alley, they ate.

It would begin to grow brighter soon; they had less than two hours left before sunrise. Kouyou and Ace would be gone by the early morning; Mori would call by the afternoon to check on him, and he would ignore his calls until he wouldn’t — and in the evening, Hirotsu would bring him to the Under Port for Q’s weekly visits outside of their room.

He gulped down a chip, settled his eyes on the buckle of Chuuya’s choker, and asked: “Why do you want to be an Executive so badly, anyway?”

The boy frowned.

(The Corruption thing, Dazai reminded himself — only concerned what destruction could do for him. Not the opposite. Not even Mori would have appreciated that shade of transactionality.

And it was only a little bit of an obsession).

Tainted was holding his umbrella for him, freeing his hands to lock the pack he had not even half consumed tightly. The knot tickled some old memory — sleeping underneath a rusty bench in a park, holding his meal of the week where no shadow could see it.

“Says the guy who wants to die?” Chuuya replied.

Pulling answers out of his canine teeth was a walk in the mud. “You won’t gain anything from it,” he insisted. “It was all to get info on your past before I could, right? But now you know.”

“Not all of it.”

“No,” he agreed. “But you don’t give a damn about the rest, do you?”

He made a face. It was a very familiar face — he tended to wear it often, around him. Dazai knew he had seldom met mud-diggers as stubborn as himself.

“Maybe it’s none of your business.”

“Maybe I’m asking anyway. Keep up.”

His jaw set. “Knowing won’t change a thing,” Chuuya concluded, eventually. “Knowing what I know now hasn’t either. It’s a matter of principle, at this point.”

He clicked his tongue. “That’s a lie.”

“Fuck you.”

“The Flags wouldn’t have spent all that time looking for traces of your past if you didn’t care.”

“Then maybe people change, shitty Dazai,” he snapped, exasperated. “I have a right to snoop around my dirty laundry as much — or as little — as I want. It’s for sure better than whatever motivation you have.”

It was peculiar. Dazai sort of wanted to rattle his skull until it broke. To tear his chest open and fit himself next to his spine, maybe — cause him an itch he wouldn’t be able to pretend didn’t matter at all.

If not you, he didn’t ask. Death and such things; the view from the tallest building, and bloodied shooting stars racing for a ground Dazai knew better than most. Humanity seemed secondary in the face of such devastating realness. If not you, who —

“How are you so sure?”

A shrug. “‘S not hard. You don’t give a shit about power.”

Dazai grasped his tie; he made a knot out of it, studying raindrops land on his once polished shoes. “Do you?”

Chuuya fixed his choker. He moved his eyes away. “I don’t mind it.”

“I thought you did. I’m not their king, or whatever you went on saying.”

“That was different.”

“How?”

“I didn’t,” He frowned; searched for a word, and landed on the most convenient one, “Deserve it.”

“Deserve,” Dazai echoed, gulping the last of the chips. He crumpled up the pack; stuck it in the little space between Chuuya’s fighting boot and his leg. He wondered if Shirase’s knife wound had scarred — knew it had, because that was how poison and children worked. Devotion and religion and all the stigmas of betrayal. “Searching for fairness in the best of the underground’s vipers?”

“Organizations ain’t shit,” he agreed. His voice was still squeaky at the edges — he was still bony and crooked, as young as he had been a month and less scars before. Dazai wasn’t sure of why he couldn’t stop noticing. “Mori is, though.”

His lips quivered.

“Hey,” Chuuya insisted, an eternity later, as the blue-and-red lights of a passing ambulance shattered his face in second-hand colors. ““You think the cursed brat’s okay?”

At that, even he had to blink. “Do you care?”

“Murder tendencies aside, they are a child,” Chuuya replied, clearly not willing to deal with the weight of saying — not really. “I paid them a visit before leaving, you know? The Under Port is not the most cheerful kid crib around.”

“I’m sure they’re delighted by all the corpses and the smell,” Dazai commented. “Can’t say if more or less than they must be after that massacre.”

“What’s their deal, anyway?”

He leaned his chin on his knees. “I could get philosophical or ethical with it, but I have no wish to give them that much credit. Their mother thought they were a freak. They believed it. Mommy dearest was also a religious freak herself, and she clearly passed some of it onto the worst person possible to believe themselves a sinner. As for the bloodthirst,” He shrugged. “Who knows how much of it is genuine.”

“And what’s the rest? Boredom?”

“Maybe,” he conceded. “Childhood, perhaps.”

Their file had been an entertaining enough read. No amount of paperwork could put into words what was wrong with them — not in a way that wasn’t stampable and bracketed. No one had taught them to control an Ability their mother was so sure only prayers might rub away.

They brought me here to make me better, they had told Dazai — the first words out of their mouth, behind bars they could have passed through, thin and malnourished as they were. He had never understood why they hadn’t. I can’t. They don’t get it. I can’t.

Mori had taken one look at them and said, tutting like a doctor — No, you can’t.

Chuuya kicked the running water under his feet. “That doll should be locked up.”

“Do you want them to go insane, then?”

“They’re too dangerous to keep around.”

He snorted.

“What?”

“Nothing,” Dazai shook his head. “That’s what the Colonel said about you, back when you joined.”

His expression was unimpressed — the one common factor amongst any Executive that lacked flower-lined kimonos and a lipstick-red smile. “Isn’t that funny.”

“What is?”

“It’s what Ane-san told me about you, too.”

As most winds did, it laid in the space between one breath and the other, and it did not ask much more than to exist. He untied the laces of Chuuya’s shoes; the boy stamped the mud underneath his sole on his tailored pants.

“We need to tell them,” Chuuya huffed, once a nearby owl decided to quieten his song down. “Boss is already going to have our heads for the Institute. If he only sics the Lizards on them, they will —“

Dazai registered it in blurred shots.

Wheels screeching hellishly, somewhere where the underside of road began — the lights of the old neon sign upon The Alley flickering. The sight of a silhouette stumbling in that silent corner, shirt off and bruises Chuuya had left up his dislocated shoulder shining indigo under the neons.

Chuuya, letting his umbrella fall, startled — stomping towards him. “Officer?” he called, hesitant steps accelerating when the man blinked at him — and fell to his knees. “What the hell are you —“

“Repent,” the man informed him, in a strangely deep voice. His eyes had never met the humorous glint he had sported near the ring. Over his left shoulder, lines of ink Dazai could have sworn hadn’t been there mixed with dried blood. “It will come back ten times stronger.”

“What?” the boy snapped. He rattled the man’s shoulders, eyes widening at the blood that stuck to the velvet of his gloves. “I didn’t do that much — Okuda, did they slip shit in your beer?”

Light flashed in the corner of his gaze, bright and blinding like a miracle. Dazai was on his feet — he didn’t remember standing up. Officer Okuda was as still as a puppet — he didn’t respond to Chuuya’s hand around his skull, or the scowl of questions on his lips. A silver chain dangled from his neck.

Dazai only had time to count the four limbs of a cross, tightening with a precision that could not be born out of motion — his head exploded.

It was so unnatural it seemed to glitch in front of his own eyes. Chuuya jumped back with a, “Shit!”, unable to protect his front from the mixture of blood and viscera landing on it at vertiginous velocity. “What the fuck —“

Okuda’s decapitated corpse fell. His necklace landed somewhere amongst brains and spilled beer; Dazai stared at the two dots of light approaching the tunnel, and he called, helpfully: “Chuuya.”

Later, in the report Mori would force him to write down, he would explain — the truck had clearly been running with targets in mind. Its horn flared; the wheels skirted and screeched in almost donuts under the bridge, speeding towards Chuuya’s sole silhouette in the middle of the street with purpose.

It hit him with drunkenly efficient precision.

And crumbled like a tin can on impact.

It was an even less understandable sight than Officer Okuda’s implosion; Dazai’s brain registered the shrieks of metal bending and sparkling and breaking under the never ending — Ability-modified — weight of Chuuya’s still frame, one foot pressed onto the hood.

It came to a stop with a hiss. Slumped against what was left of the steering wheel, the driver sported pieces of the shattered windshield over his skull.

Okuda’s cross rolled down the concrete with a crystalline sound. It was quiet.

“Ah,” Dazai spoke up, eventually, watching one of the truck wheels roll away. “Did you seriously piss off some post service while you weren’t around? Barked and bit at them like a good dog?”

Chuuya lowered his leg. His chest rose and fell too quickly. His eyes were still stuck on Okuda’s corpse; his hands in his pockets. Seemingly unconcerned, he asked: “You’re saying you didn't hire someone to take me out?"

Dazai tsk-ed at his own lack of foresight. "You mean you don't recognize it? We were up there only hours ago."

He didn't answer.

They watched the truck fall onto its side with imperscrutable eyes; even as the ground shook, and a small waterfall of gasoline rained from the vehicle's destroyed underside, they didn't move.

He was on his way to the abandoned necklace when the back doors of the truck fell open, creaking louder than the ticking rain. Chuuya's stiffening shoulders came first — the familiar, small arm dropping into a puddle, rolling down the truck, second.

More followed — dozens of bodies covered in dried blood, each smaller than the one before, quiet and lifeless and staring right back at them. He couldn't have counted — nonetheless, a number flashed in front of his eyes, framed by Ace's snickers.

— bring thirty three of our men back from death?

"Kids," Chuuya breathed out, right as Dazai's fingers closed around the chain. Outside that bubble of silence, the rain came to a slow end. "They're all kids."

---

...

---

Present Day.

The way home was, most of all, putrid.

A cobblestoned road led to mountains and valleys of trash, the only real entrance to that abandoned island no one had thought to claim. Mechanical remnants and pieces of every material known to man climbed their way up to the sky, unmoving and fixed like modern art statues — the kind Dazai had never pretended to understand, but Mori liked so much.

Walking to the center of the maze was harder at night, but he had learned his way around by trial and error — had learned when the road would disappear and he would need to scramble his way up and down an abandoned car or two; what bundle of trash wasn't stable enough to lay his weight on; what pieces were so rusty they'd tear his clothes apart if he brushed them by mistake.

Most of all, he had learned to ignore the smell and the eerie silence, wrapped up in the cold embrace of solitude.

Not loneliness, he mused. But empty all the same.

Illegal dumping site was a set of words that called that description like a moth to a flame. Last Dazai had checked, the area didn't appear on any maps. It explained, at the very least, why it smelled so badly all the time.

If someone were to ask — do you have a favorite piece of the abandoned? — because someone might ask — the answer would be quick on his tongue and unrecognizable to his spine, like all he had long planned: the abandoned traffic lights.

They towered on the edge of the crater leading to the center of the site, and sometimes they turned on, powered by something Dazai had never investigated. He liked — he would tell them — to make a game out of it; liked the imperceptible jump his heart did right before the answer came; liked the unwilling reaction of a body that was undoubtedly human.

Flesh and mind were different things. Dazai felt colors and riddles and bets in his ribcage, not in his clockwork brain.

( He liked the thrill of not knowing, because he always did. The crowds of ants he called his peers stared in wonder and confusion at every piece of this world, asking and asking and waiting for answers they knew he would give.

He liked the thrill of not knowing, as if a man could turn evolution back to the start and stare quietly at the starry sky, without knowing what fire even was).

“Hey there!” He greeted a passing raccoon. Laughed, delighted, when it seemed to greet back.

Making his way down the crater was the hardest part. It was half slipping down, half grabbing the nearest piece of trash; he had broken his foot, once, during a first attempt. These days he was an expert, he had informed Mori, with all the pride of the child he wasn't. He skipped his way down, grabbing the pills in the pocket of his coat and throwing two of them in his mouth.

The abandoned shipping container was hollowed out in the cold earth. Old graffitis and even older shipment instructions were painted on the smudged blue of the metal, signs of a time Dazai had not been there to witness.

Following familiar motions, he settled his phone between his cheek and shoulder, raising the metal bar keeping the container shut; he pushed the door to the side. With a creak, his feet landed on the floor.

That metal box would fall apart, sooner than later. It was exactly why Dazai had chosen it.

“I'm here,” he announced to the phone. He leaned down and untied his shoes, skipping around in the darkness to get them off his feet. His shoulders hit one of the walls; his hands reached up, looking for the row to turn the light on.

Mori's voice spoke right in his ear, sinking all the way to his rotten guts: "Two steps to the left."

He huffed, but followed the instructions. His fingers finally closed around the plastic end of the thread; he pulled. With a buzz, the container was bathed in the dim light of the cracked, naked lightbulb hanging from the ceiling.

As it usually went, Dazai hit his forehead against it.

Massaging the area, he muttered: "Damn thing. I should just live in the dark."

"Three steps forward."

"Not even a little concern?" Dazai asked, making big eyes at one specific corner of the container. It wasn't exactly a camera, or else he would have seen it; but he knew there was something. "I might get a concussion, one of these days. Get electrocuted, maybe. Oh, wouldn't that be an interesting way to go?"

"Three steps forward."

Sighing, he did as told. Then he bowed, mockingly. "Do you believe me, now?"

Mori hummed. "Do a twirl for me, would you?"

He barked out a laugh. "I'll kill you."

"Most probably," the man agreed, like he was proud. Mori, Dazai sometimes mused, when the taste of blood was stuck in the gums of his mouth, only ever spoke to him like the mirror had a crack right in the middle. Like the crack would send him to the asylum, once he grew haunted enough to look at it. "Not yet, though. We will talk when I'm back from Tokyo. I have heard some interesting things about your recent pastimes."

"Have you?" he offered. "No concern offered to the thirty three children of mafiosi we found in the Happy Truck?"

"You believe it might lower my rating?" he asked, like he truly cared.

"This place is tasteless lair of plastic snakes," he agreed. "But you know how much I like kids."

"You detest them."

"Yeah," Dazai fell down on the bed. It squeaked under his weight, a warning as old as the days he'd spent sleeping there. He studied the circle of light on the opposite end of the container; idly, he raised a hand and painted shadows inside the white screen. A little bunny, a dove. A middle finger, settling his eyes on the invisible camera again. "That's the point."

Mori's smile was right there, through the waves of the distorted sounds of his phone. The signal was tremendous in that area. His smiles were a terrible omen, when genuine.

"When you find them," the man said, all words that always meant, and said, and, what's the point of an empty wound? "Q's doll will be given to your custody."

He had expected it. "Yes, Mori."

"You know," the man added, "If you and Chuuya had told me about the Old World, perhaps I could have intervened."

"I'm sure you cannot wait to seize the occasion."

A huff of laughter. "The men might need a new bar under our protection, anyway."

"And you might need just one more thing to make the local dog grateful," Dazai yawned. "Bet he won't even whine about whatever punishment you will give him."

"Both of you," Mori specified. "Thirty three children's deaths will not inspire any loyalty in — How curious."

"What is?"

"There is no parental equivalent to an orphan," His breath creaked though the intercom, very distantly curious — the way it got when Dazai had to take tools off his sleeping fingers and settle a pillow under his cheeks. Useful, Mori would say. "The Institute will demand an explanation, also. I can't just send you two to the corner and call it a day."

"Of course, Mori."

"I believe Kouyou might put Chuuya on corpse duty. I hear he might have received some of the old style whipping — you know, that ancient punishment baston the syndicate has owned for generations? The one she uses during training? Yes, that. That is, if the prospect of cleaning duties didn't tire him out already."

"Of course, Mori."

"Shall we find something you might despise just as much?"

Impossible, he didn't say.

Chuuya's hatred for the cleaning duties was born out of something too pure to survive near his fingers; something as human as the desire not to let his eyes linger on the dead faces of men he had known. He would make corpses with a grin and sit next to them with a knot in his throat; it made for a repulsive show, moreso because he refused to admit it.

Dazai had never quite felt anything so —

So.

“I trust you’ll find something,” he concluded. It was what he had been doing since he was fourteen. It may not come for months; years even. But he would find it. Mori tended to keep his promises.

His hum was all the confirmation he would ever need. “Goodnight, Dazai.”

“I hope I’ll die in my sleep,” he replied.

“Did you take your pills?”

“Unfortunately.”

“Then,” the man assured, with all the cruelty the world had to offer — like he had nightmares about being wrong; like he had nightmares about being right. “It won’t happen.”

Beep beep beep, he thought. Bye-bye.

There wasn’t much in his makeshift home that could steal his attention. There were only so many times he could study the rusty stool in the corner — the metal desk filled with work papers and bullets boxes. He had no pillow and no sheets in his bed, either; Mori had taken them away after watching him do his best to choke and hang himself with them. It got boring pretty soon.

Throwing his discarded shoes to the other side of the container, he stood up, welcoming the goosebumps arisen by the contact of naked feet against the ground. His coat slipped down his shoulders; he abandoned it on the stool, watching it spin quietly.

The desk creaked when he laid his hands on it, but Dazai didn’t flinch: he was too used all the spectral noises that house was capable of conjuring. It hadn’t taken long to learn that specific melody, and fourteen years old Dazai was nothing but obsessive. Almost two years later, he hadn’t changed.

Almost two years later, still alive. Still in the shipping container.

The papers on the desk mostly consisted of reports — stuff Mori wouldn’t accept if not written down. He didn’t need them — thought the whole ordeal unnecessary, even — but he supposed not everyone could have his memory. And not everyone was the subject of Mori’s ivy taunts.

“Let’s see,” he mused.

The red file he extracted from under his dress shirt was startlingly bright against that old paperwork. Dazai had no qualms about pushing every useless document off the table; he opened the dossier and studied the thick stack of black and white photographs, eyes skirting along the squares of papers filled with personal information stapled in their corners.

Sneaking into the Boss’ office would have been impossible, hadn’t the man wanted it.

He raised one of the pictures, hiding the lightbulb behind its square. The glow highlighted the outlines of the woman staring back at him, her expression eerily vacant. In a corner, in one of Mori's archivists' red handwriting, was scribbled: Not Found.

Desperate souls, he recalled, find desperate places.

The dossier was filled to the brim. Much more than thirty three, relevant people.

That file was stuffed with busybodies. Men whose only purpose was proving how much more of a shock value crowds of armed men were, compared to a single one. They didn't even have to be that good with a gun; most people just assumed a nicely dressed man holding a weapon would know how to use it. Most people wanted to live.

The theories scribbled in the stapled papers were lazy, at best. Most assumed those boring men and women had caused their own demise; drank themselves to death or picked a fight with the wrong person. No one wanted to know how the lower rats spent their time.

Useless people. And yet, no one grouped useless people together without a reason.

His phone buzzed, loud enough to shake the bed it had been discarded onto.

Fucking chips aside, I know you saw it too, it read. The lack of any insults was the one proof he needed of the genuine ire he still felt. The tattoo on Okuda's shoulder.

Dazai hummed. You're too slow, he could have sent back. I thought I told you to delete this number. He could have texted, Stop making yourself a reasonable part of my plans.

Instead, he snapped the phone shut and threw it on the bed again, watching it miss the mark and land on the floor. The photographs stared right back at him — strangers who were dead set on stretching his life out.

His phone buzzed, again. Fate was a thing, he reminded himself. But the invisible thread choking him was nothing but sea wind — sea wind and Mori's chessboard.

He sighed.

"Whatever," he conceded, staring right into the invisible camera. Knowing Mori, he had already stopped watching. Knowing Mori, it wouldn't matter. "But I won't be happy about it."

There was honor in walking to your scaffold with your head tall. Dazai had no time to waste with such things; he dragged his feet along the metal ground, and grabbed his abandoned phone.

things i googled while writing this chapter:

- do arcades look different in different countries
- are fighting rings age restricted
- bandages
- acceptable fight moves
- what does the police sound like realistically

WILL

Chapter Summary

The first rumble of thunder came with the third nail they ripped off.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

---

chapter iv.

---

Case number: 11190067

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, under the orders of M. O., came the last of a sequence of missions at the hands of Dazai O. and Nakahara C., as per [...]*

---

Miyoshi Takayuki's office smelled of blood.

Not the concrete kind — not the dried sand under his soles, under too long nails Mori would reprimand. It dripped down the walls with the cadence of a proud, retired soprano — never landing in puddles just dull enough to stick to the sidewalk.

No one who sat high enough in Yokohama to see the moon face to face could ever be called bloodless. Dazai simply wished it didn't convince CEOs they had any right to ruin his mornings.

"Mr. Miyoshi, for the last time," He rolled on his guest chair, distracted. "The deal was: if you helped any other shipment but our own, we would kill your hostages. I truly don't understand your outrage."

The entourage of suited men behind the CEO's shoulders caged the skyline through the glass walls of his office. Everything was pristine; it still felt a bit cheap. Blood refusing to show itself as the riches it was. Miyoshi was all thin eyes and thinner lips, with his hands tight around the hostages' corpses' pictures Dazai had personally taken.

There were cameras everywhere — it mattered little, though; the Port Mafia had enough anonymous tips to waste on that Corporation to drag them sixty feet underground.

It made getting caught somewhat boring.

"You don't understand," the man hissed, in the name of professional repetitiveness. Important things are to be said once, Mori would have sighed. "The Nine Rings, they — threatened us, they stood right where you are —"

"We threatened you, too," he pointed out, blinking. "Were they scarier?" His head dangled back. "That won't do. I pride myself in my methods. Don't I?"

Behind him, the line of Secret Force Unit men gave a monotonous, coordinated nod. A brain or two behind their sunglasses might have saved them on the edge of a cliff — puppets wouldn't see the point in it, though. The bitten curb Mori had encouraged once opposition to the local fifteen years old leading them had arisen had turned them quiet.

If not allies, then examples.

The Boss' suggestions were usually bloodier than they were wrong.

"They," Miyoshi gulped. "They — They threatened my family. Found my daughter's school, and —"

His nape flopped against the top of his seat. "Of course they did."

"She's barely nine, she —"

"Obviously."

"My, my employees — Their lives matter much, enough to keep our deal afloat. But my own blood, my flesh, my child — Sir, you, if you'll forgive me the — Sir, you are young. You cannot understand the love of a parent —"

“The love of a parent who abandoned his pregnant wife for his much younger intern, and who his daughter has seen six times since she was born?” he completed, tossing his phone in the air and catching it as it fell. It lit up, awakened.

“Mr. Miyoshi, what is it that your company does, again?” he questioned.

It took him an endless time to answer. Wrecked by hesitance, eventually, he said: “We — We deal with electronics. Trades with Europe, sir.”

“Economic procedure, then.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Which means, ” he concluded, “That you know the value of competition. Different brands and a multifarious offer are what make our society so interesting, right? Let a man pick, and you will know what you need to do better. Most importantly — You know how annoying it is to have any competition, when you have no care for the betterment of society.”

Dazai settled his eyes on him, just for a blink. “As — I’m sure you understand — my Boss has no interest in,” He lowered his gaze to the pictures, “His leasures lay... elsewhere. ”

As one, Miyoshi and his men flinched.

Voices and sayings had spread like wildfires during the prior Boss’ reign. Then, they had become ghost stories — Mori mostly saw no use in dead men with no price tags. But he liked stories. He especially liked Dazai’s demonization of the Mafia’s methods — as he called it — keeping the stories alive.

He should have been less prodigious, Dazai knew — had had it confirmed throughout that whole week of war against the Nine Rings. It was always to blame.

“Alright,” Dazai stretched, extracting a bundle of papers from underneath his chocolate-stained dress shirt. This is a confession. The Yokohama PD will mysteriously get their hands on it mere hours after finding your men’s corpses, and you will be brought to jail — where the Nine Rings will not be able to threaten you any longer.”

“Someone from our ranks will be placed in your stead, as to recover the shipments we have lost after you offered their access to the Nine Rings,” he added. “And everything will be where it is meant to. I should hope you appreciate my solution. I spent a lot of time thinking about it. Just sign it, would you?”

Miyoshi’s pale skin bloomed scarlet.

Through his hysterical stutters, Dazai typed a message.

Mori, he knew, had declared open fire on the Nine Rings out of bored offense. Retaliation is such a boring concept, he had once mused, munching on a chess piece. People should simply quit trying to move against us.

The still reasonable number of citizens involved in the various massacres would send an unmistakable warning to the underground. The world existed for it: soiled ground to sink the spear of conflict into.

Under Miyoshi's rage, Dazai pressed send on a failed picture he had taken of the fallen hostages. Stop texting me, he wrote, underneath. I'm busy.

The answer came pathetically fast — as distinctively too-carefully typed as ever. I have not texted you once all day.

Send another picture and see where that phone of yours ends up, came a second after, blindingly aggravating underneath the Slug contact-info.

Suribachi, he texted.

Silence stretched out, cautiously unanswered.

Damn you.

Also, he added. A picture appeared, as brutal as he had expected it to be: bloody, sharp remnants of a shop window, and the barely recognizable body of a suited man plastered on the shattered glass. Kouyou had truly put him on cleaning duty, then.

If he had been interested in the answer, he might have asked him if he had grown desensitized to his colleagues' carcasses.

An unmistakable, gloved middle finger broke the picture in two. Go choke, bastard.

Hey, he texted, again. Window or desk?

Bubbles appeared. Then, Fuck do I know?

Then: Window.

Thx.

"Alright," Dazai climbed to his feet, much to the man's endless speech's startlement. "You don't need to write. Luckily, there are many recognizable signatures."

Many things could be said about the Secret Force Unit. One thing, though, Dazai couldn't fault them: aim.

A flutter of fingers got them to raise their guns, and open fire. The rain of yellow and black awakened dust and screams; Miyoshi's guards went down with wet gasps and muffled shouts — as a hellish shriek left the CEO's mouth, his eyes set on the blood wakes his men's corpse left on the glass.

Dazai appeared next to him, one hand tight around his nape. As emergency alarms began to flare through the whole floor, he slammed his head forward, waiting for the sick crunch! of his nose cracking the glass of his desk.

“See,” he said. He pressed his head down, until the webs spread — until his whole face creaked. “When competition arises, one has to become resourceful.”

The office doors were slammed open. When a tranquilizer gun appeared in the corner of his gaze, he allowed it to shoot — politely succumbing to the bitter sting on his neck.

---

...

---

The first rumble of thunder came with the third nail they ripped off.

A basement of sorts occupied the depth underground of Miyoshi’s skyscraper-kingdom; Dazai had awoken sometimes around the first knot of his wrists around a metal seat. The distinguished men in suits with distinctively unfriendly faces dealing with him were rather standard; Hirose Fumiko’s oldest single playing from an old stereo, somewhat less.

“Moonlit Lover is certainly a classic,” he had admitted, as they buttoned their sleeves up their elbows. “But my favorite of hers is A Night To Die. What do you misters think of her rock years?”

After that, it was mostly a crimson, vaguely wet blur.

Torture was an old friend, in the way of trash lined up on his house garden. Some days, it was the only occasion he had to touch flesh. Dazai had never enjoyed pain; at least, he would have preferred it at the hands of a capable man. Think Mori, he offered, either silently or not, because torturers always seemed to enjoy conversation. Think Mori. Doctor until the very end of his days. Doctors wear gloves, at least.

It was unprofessionalism at its finest — their knuckles crashed against his cheekbones again and again, looking for nothing but the entertainment of flesh; when his head lolled back, all the blood drooled into his mouth.

“Our deal on the rhinestones traficant,” one of the torturers asked, at some point. “Tell us how to gain his help without the Port Mafia’s intermission.”

“Uwaa,” Dazai whined, wiggling his fingers — missing nails and cracked bones and all. “That’s not any of my business. Not anymore. I got promoted, you see,” He choked; spit out blood — it landed on the scarlet mess of his shirt. Mori did always say to wear a jacket. “These days, it’s the pipsqueak who deals with it,” A blink. “Oh. No. Wait. He doesn’t anymore. Nine Rings’ business.”

“Pipsqueak?” the man grasped his hair, raising his chin up from his chest. “No code names. Tell us where to find him.”

“Gladly. Will you kill him?”

“That depends on you.”

“Please do,” Dazai groaned. “If he finds out I glued his back-up gloves to the ceiling he’s gonna lose it.”

Deaf and distant, the reinforced heel of the man’s shoe landed on his toes, smashing at least one of them right on impact. He bit his tongue.

“Tell us,” he spelled out, slowly, mere inches from his face, “Who he is.”

He opened his mouth. “A bother, is what he is.”

A clenched jaw. “Is he a wild card?”

“You could say. Stupidly short body. I have to squint to even attempt to find him. Elise keeps saying he looks bad in skirts, so she has to put me in them,” He sniffed the blood from his nose up, “Hey, do you guys know if your back door still has an alarm?”

“What?”

The earth shook.

Far enough a less adjusted ear wouldn’t have caught it, combat boots landed on metal tiles.

The storm appeared strangely unfocused — the destructive cracks of the ground, like the bells of a collapsing Church, webs spreading up and down the endlessly tall walls. His taunters attempted to ask — the next sound was a cacophony of horrified screams.

Red flared, vibrant like lighting, running up and down the room in the shape of solidified wind. Wet squelches; shrieks and a revolting crunch!. Blood reached his dirty shows — ribcages spread apart; raining viscera on the floor.

Then, silence.

From the old stereo, Hirose belted out an ah.

“Pathetic,” was Chuuya’s final judgement. He slammed a bored heel on his metal restraints, pinching his under-chin. “All this shit to learn Miyoshi’s secret treasure room’s hideout?”

“What, you think I go around granting myself pain for fun?” Dazai whined, ripping a piece of brain off his tie. A tooth came out when he spat blood. “You need to learn punctuality. Elise is going to wrap me up in sparkly band aids.”

A fate as deranged as that demanded no comment; they jumped over the corpses and left, as Chuuya cracked every security camera on their path. Dazai made sure to wave at every horrified face he met.

Outside, it rained viciously enough to wash the blood off his face. The half-broken bones of his toe made his limping look even more suspicious than the bruises; Chuuya offered a stolen ice pack from an ice cream vendor and a kick to the back of his knees.

“To forget the aches,” he clarified.

The moment the rain subdued, Dazai pointedly stomped into the first lake-wide puddle they encountered, soaking him all the way to his chin.

From there, it was a chase — all the way to the Yokohama General Cemetery.

Chuuya seemed to know exactly how to move around that valley of blooming green hidden by snow and candid stones carved by time, under the lingering smell of incense from the New Year visits. He stopped by a simple tombstone, hardly different from all the others in those maniacally precise rows — and plopped down onto the snowy ground.

“If you smelled just a bit more,” he muttered, without sparing him a glance, “You would have to dump me in one of these.”

“How very hopeful of you to think you will leave a body to bury,” Dazai replied.

“Seriously, when’s the last time you showered?”

“Mafiosi under direct orders of the Boss are busy people,” He brushed the matter away, unwilling to vocalize the unexplainable. Chuuya was many things; someone whose unmatching eyes he wanted to meet, as he attempted to put waking up is an order and falling asleep is a duty and brushing my hair an excuse not to have Mori’s hands in it into words — not quite. “Say, why the sudden anguish for a stranger?”

Seemingly unwilling to talk again, the boy pulled at the frayed edges of his leather jacket, huffing.

“Last I checked, your mourning was reserved for Rimbaud’s traitorous grave,” Dazai insisted. The ice made his face numb; it felt like a smile. “Say, the Flags don’t have graves — so why, exactly, do you have the Cemetery’s planimetry memorized?”

Chuuya was suspiciously silent.

“You have any other traitors to mourn? Those get graves,” he asked. “Any pseudo-relatives I don’t know about? Murderous older brothers excluded.”

“You have the personality of a haunted doll crawling up Ace’s ass.”

“And you have the undefeatable intellect of Kouyou’s hairpins,” He sat down in the snow, sinking into that cold embrace all the way to his waist. His knee brushed Chuuya’s. “Who’s Nishimura?”

“The old fuck who got blown up last week,” Chuuya answered, uninterested. “The taxi driver.”

Surprise, he thought, was to be reserved for moments that might deserve a stutter from a prodigy — from a butterfly on a wall. For the uncharacteristic.

“I’m assuming you paid for his funeral.”

Kouyou’s pride and joy, as far as she could try. “Anonymous donations aren’t gifts.”

You will be the death of you, Dazai recalled thinking, the first time he had stumbled into an alley and saw Corruption break through his ribs.

“You’re using strangers’ graves,” It wasn’t a question. “Aren’t you?”

Chuuya’s fingers curled into the snow. He left holes, staining his gloves; filled them up, diligent like only a focused child could be. Every line of him was antagonistic; every scar peeking from his clothes seemed fresh.

He poked a bit deeper: “Isn’t a whole treasure hunt for a bar enough?”

“Any news on Q?” Chuuya asked, like a coward.

Dazai shrugged. “The Mafia is now officially looking for them. I’m assuming they will call me if they hear a whisper.”

“Boss won’t just let an asset go like that.”

“No,” he confirmed. Q was a cheeky ghost in the hallways of a building not made for kids — nonetheless, they were too good of an investment. You’ll find them, won’t you? “He’ll find them, of course. Hey, which one was the worse one?”

“Of what?”

“The ones you killed,” He snapped his tongue against the roof of his mouth. “Let’s say this week.”

Clouded blue and that burned shade of amber studied every inch of his swelled up face — strangely deep for the most unenigmatic creature in existence. “The hell you care?”

He shrugged.

The searching gaze he offered him was more than familiar — Chuuya wasn’t smart at all, but he was certainly clever. He knew Dazai didn’t waste air — not when he despised it so.

“Kouyou’s number one suspect for the first wave of homicides,” he said, finally. His tone dripped in carelessness; it wasn’t the blood itself to disturb him. He got a kick out of weaving corpses into existence — if it saved his people. “A big shot of sorts. We entered his apartment and slashed his throat. His pregnant wife woke up, so we killed her too.”

Because that lifetime was shared and known, he guessed: “Tore her belly open?”

He ripped a thread off his jacket and wrapped it around his little finger. “Yep.”

“You really have a thing for children.”

“It’s not about the kid.”

“Then?”

“What’s with the interrogation?” he sneered. “Your best shot at grasping human emotion? I’m no lab rat.”

Dazai conceded: “Not anymore.”

He didn’t flinch; it was a near thing.

Fascinated, he stared at the slow regeneration of his fractured gaze — his poisonous grimace, always tense, like every part of him. Whenever his hands had managed to brush against a square of him, every muscle in his body had always been ready.

He spat out: “You’ll have no luck, asshole. It was just gross. Fluids and smell and screams. Weapons are messy.”

“Easy for you to say.”

“Yeah,” He kicked the tombstone. “What the fuck was your punishment, anyway?”

“I’m still here, aren’t I?”

“Your punishment is not dying?”

“Maybe my punishment is a painful demise,” he replied, obnoxiously. Punishment was a shred of chemtrails in the soft sky; like most tragedies, it did not exist as long as he did not care. Here’s a wound, Mori would say. Make something out of it. “Maybe, right now, I have poison in my veins — slow and efficient, but terribly burdensome. Have you considered it?”

Chuuya kept quiet, seething. Spoilt, he could read on his face, unfair. Boss’ little bitch, he had heard many dead men walking mutter. Dazai fed on their ignorance like a last meal; ate up all they vomited, too.

“Hey,” he added. “Tell me one more thing.”

“Your voice is pissing me off.”

“You know in Time Apocalypse III, when the player has the chance to choose whether he wants to kill a man or watch somebody else do it? And if you happen to choose neither, you lose enough points you go back at the start?”

The chain of his hat dangled, gentle and unassuming, crowning his silence with understanding.

“Why am I being included in your misplaced guilt?” Dazai nodded forward — the white road and the grey sky; the corpses drowning in the earth. “I didn’t do a thing to that man, and neither did you. A bit egocentric of you, to claim this pain for yourself. Don’t you think so?”

“I think,” he said, as if he hadn’t heard a word, “That you are a brat.”

Dazai grinned, and it hurt, pulled every bruise of his face. Pushed their shoulders together, like it was meant to appear friendly, like it was meant not to break bones. “And I think you wouldn’t be allowed on any of the rides of the Summer Festival.”

“You don’t lack morality,” he continued, undeterred. “Just the desire to understand where to direct it. So you don’t stop until someone tells you to,” His scoff warmed the air. “The Mafia’s little prodigy, struggling with basic concepts.”

“Basic,” he repeated.

“Sons of a bitch have souls, somewhere. But you get so damn confused looking for it.”

“And so what,” Dazai wondered, jiggling his legs in the snow and widening his eyes. Look at me and regret it. “You think you can direct me to the light?”

“No,” Chuuya stood up, brushing dust and snow off his pants. “I don’t know where that is.”

“Fascinating. Hey, do you intend to visit every victim of yours? Q’s Institute certainly opened up the gates. And dear Officer Okuda!”

A pimple right at the corner of his mouth tilted with his lips. “Don’t take me for a good person.”

Mafiosi were black and red; it stained their eyes and it changed their souls and it kept their hearts beating. Goodness was a thing of this world — he knew, because the poets insisted. Just not one he had ever witnessed.

None of them were good. The general consensus was — Chuuya was somewhat better.

It made for a pathetic sight. Black wings and fingers spasming for a touch he wouldn’t search; corpses dangling from the hands in his pockets and knees on the floor of Mori’s office — on the snowy ground of a stranger’s grave. Inane and blind. Living, laughable emulsion of blood-thirst and integrity. Better than Dazai would ever be.

[Envy, Mori would have said, is a deplorable defect. Raise your shoulders, would you?]

Dazai sighed, tilting his head back until his nape began to pulse, staring into the winter sun. “How irritating this is bound to be.”

“Tell me about it,” the other muttered. “Well? What’s the plan?”

“I’m going to need —” He dragged out; then he smiled, toothy: “A big wall.”

---

...

---

Chuuya’s apartment was empty.

Better, more intricate words would have failed at an accurate portrait; meticulously-kept, perhaps — though it made one wonder how the person whose phone was cracked on all sides and barely alive enough to turn on could manage it.

Haunted, perhaps — if a certain, tentative sort of warmth hadn’t appeared the moment the front door closed behind them. Welcoming them to the void.

“Hey,” the boy snapped, as Dazai made his unworried way through all the rooms, “Hey, what do you think you’re — Take off your shoes, you —“

Calling the nonexistent tidy felt cheap, so he didn’t bother, as he roamed through what had to be a bedroom — or a futon on the floor and a wardrobe. Messiness was not Dazai’s taste — he folded his clothes like someone would check, and he picked up bullets from the ground like the corpses might breathe.

Mori had had the obsession for the pristine of a true surgeon; he had banned him from his clinic by the third mess. Dazai had wandered. Had slept under a good number of roofs. The smartest one had been his desk, but Mori had found out too soon. Another location he wasn’t allowed — partly because it was a quick way out of punishment, partly because he had been stupid enough to get caught. And Mori wanted his craftiness more than anything.

These days, he was tidy.

“Hey,” Chuuya snarled, stomping in his bedroom. He dragged him out by the tie, before he could check out what the shoebox labeled as Shit under his bed was hiding, “Who the fuck gave you permission —“

“You truly interpreted the meaning of essentialism,” Dazai observed, hypocrite until his very last day, content enough with having verified the absence of bugs around the apartment. Given his container, one couldn’t be too sure. Mori liked his kids all in one place. “Are those French textbooks?”

“Give me that,” The boy stole the book from his hands, settling it next to a bottle of milk near the stove. He snorted, kicking his shoes off towards the only furniture in the counter-divided living room — a beanbag. “Have you got no manners of sorts, you freak?”

“You grew up in the streets,” he replied. Over the edge of the hallway door, a pile of what looked like bare mattresses blinked at him, precariously held by the wall. Perhaps he had misunderstood the futon prices; perhaps the Flags had standards he didn’t mirror. “Why are you learning French?”

“Can’t I learn a language?” Chuuya stole the book from his hands. “You know a shit ton.”

Dazai jumped on the counter. “Maybe you should focus on learning Japanese first?”

A knife brushed his cheek; he grabbed it with lithe fingers, curling it in the air once, twice — before hiding it in his shoe. “Stop being so mad all the time. Ane-san’s reports tell me you’re basically a native!”

“I am one.”

“And Hirotsu is working on your diction, isn’t he?” Dazai would know — unwilling subject to the man’s absolutely non-ability-related talent to understand. “Although, stupid as you are, you probably didn’t even realize he’s doing it. It’s alright, though. It took me three whole seconds, too.”

“Have you ever considered stuffing your mouth with shit? Familiar seeks familiar?”

He stole the nearest bottle, gulping down mouthfuls. “Le français semble un choix étrange pour un punk de la rue.”

“Je ne suis plus un punk de la rue,” came immediately, as he removed his jacket. His accent was good; even slightly too good. “Maquereau.”

“Learning pet names just for me? I’m moved,” Dazai leaned forward. “You do know you won’t get to speak it with Verlaine or Rimbaud, though, don’t you?”

His teeth gritted louder than the traffic. He unbuttoned his shirt; Dazai’s gaze fell on the square of freckled skin between his clavicles — and the black ink of the Port Mafia symbol. Two stems of white heather crossed at the base, thin and delicate, shaded blood-red at the edges. Dazai had been told what it meant, once. He could never recall.

Does it rot you too?, he didn’t ask. Bloom was unmistakable; old roots always knew where to look.

“Thank you for the concern,” Chuuya said, eventually. “Unrequested, as usual. Are you going to tell me why you had me running around collecting documents all week?”

“Sure,” he said, throwing his own hidden dossier on the floor. “But first, I’m going to need — some thread. And the biggest marker at your disposal.”

A beat. “You’re about to absolutely desecrate my walls, aren’t you?”

“Precisely.”

He shrugged. “‘Suppose.’”

“Cool. You do have a computer somewhere in this dog house, don’t you? Bring that too. Oh, and some snacks!”

“Fucker, do I look like someone who has snacks laying around?”

Dazai sighed, petulant. “Fair. We’ll just get take-out. I’m feeling Chinese, what about you? Don’t say anything. We’ll just order Chinese.”

His abandoned bottle flew right over his head, barely avoided, as he strolled to the living room. “I’m not your assistant!”

There was no furniture to set aside, so his plan to get Chuuya to do all the work came to immediate motion. Mug shots and information files were picked up from the floor and smeared onto the roof with glue, connected by neon green thread. Walking his merry way upside down, Chuuya scribbled facts, skipping away from Dazai’s bored fingers on his forehead.

“That’s not how you write that kanji,” he informed, at every opportunity.

“Die,” Chuuya replied, without fail, before writing it again and again — until it stuck.

His hat chain got stuck in the thread. It arose a strange debate on the superior Chips snack. It had turned into a Hold Your Breath competition that had all the blood turn the boy’s face red — when the intercom beeped.

“Good, I need a break,” the redhead muttered, walking his upside-down way to the door, still. “Do not snoop around while I’m gone.”

“Yes, Chuuya.”

His long-suffering grace traced his innocent frame. “Don’t you, Yes, Chuuya me, you liar.”

The moment the door was shut, Dazai was on his feet.

He dragged a marker up every wall he walked next to, abandoning a wobbly line behind — scribbling his height near the kitchen door, and adding an exaggeratedly shorter one at its side.

As foretold by their owner, the cabinets were mostly empty. Leftovers in plastic containers took up most of the space — headache meds, too; some variation of Oxy. Chronic pain medications — enough to make him raise his eyebrows. He shook some pills in his palm, gulping them down dry, before adding the ones in his pockets to the mix.

There was method in it, he knew — there was method in everything Mori had ever done for him.

The gist of the reports abandoned in the sink was mostly the same: bloodied ground and vicious enemies, and then bloodier ground and defeated enemies. Chuuya’s arrival on the scene always, always the breakthrough.

It was hardly new — the first boy his age and all his hyperbolic self; that blue bracelet under Arcade lights. Nothing had ever looked more like a leash — apart from those friends of his; unfaithful believers in ripped jeans and a lacking pillar.

Merciless encouragement for him to sink his hands in the blood for their pointless sake. He had done it once; he had done it twice. If he had done it a million times, Dazai understood —

Herbivores lacked complexity.

As he got busy ripping the French textbooks spines in half, a square of paper — a photograph — fell from the pages. Before he could turn it around and study it, the door opened.

“Got lost on the way?” he taunted, throwing himself on the floor again. He wouldn’t know how to explain why the picture ended up in his deepest pocket. “Pipsqueaks must have it so hard up the stairs. Is the elevator going to be fixed soon?”

“Ikeda wanted you to know they’ve exchanged turns,” Chuuya replied — going out of his way to drag fish-patterned socked feet up every inch of his ribcage, before settling on the ground with the bag of food.

“Ikeda?”

A skeptical look. “One of your men.”

“Oh,” The boy’s outright distaste would have made someone else squirm. “Why do you know my men’s names?”

“Maybe because they introduced themselves?” he scoffed. “Why the hell did you station them here, anyway?”

Dazai grabbed the nearest bowl. Piously, he swore: “I’m somewhat hoping they might reveal themselves to be the Chosen Ones and assassinate you.”

A snort. “Your men can’t take me.”

“My men can take anyone,” he tutted. “They’re boring like that. That’s why Mori gave them to me.”

“Boss found the only men in the syndicate who would resist the urge to shoot you in the head if you begged for it.”

He conceded.

They ate. He dropped every last inch of his sauce on the ground; Chuuya wiped every corner of his hands on his dress shirt. With his container still more than half full, and burping long enough for it to be genuinely impressive, he starfished on the floor and started: “What do all the fuckers in this pictures have in common, then? Same hairdresser?”

He slurped the last of his meal, and made his own star. “A few weeks before Verlaine came around, the Intelligence began to notice an unusual amount of disappearances from our ranks.”

“Pianoman said something about it,” Untouched as the wind itself; he almost believed it. “People vanish all the time though, don’t they? Their corpses always end up turning up. They’ll have Kingstain’s balls in a jar up Ace’s desk by the end of the week.”

“I wouldn’t be so sure,” He connected the pictures on the ceiling with a lazy raised arm. “All these lovely men and women have two things in common: number one, their disappearance wasn’t reported by anyone.”

“Then how do we know?”

“Free tattoo and a lifelong oath of observation!” Dazai parroted. “That’s what I proposed Mori wrote on the recruiting fliers. I was rudely denied, but the point still stands: you can’t just join the Port Mafia. Most importantly, you can’t just leave it.”

“Is that story true?” Chuuya asked, on the verge of a mocking tone — but not quite. “It was everywhere in the underground. The Port Mafia has never had a deserter it didn’t catch.”

“Probably not,” He shrugged. “Exaggeration is the mother of fame. But we came close enough to the idea. Thing is — These people weren’t reported, because they were hardly important enough for the ranks to miss. Grunts, messengers, lowly guards—“

“The scum under Boss’ shoes.”

“Basically. Their second shared feature is — If we’re right, they’re under the influence of a microchip of sorts that keeps them alive in impossible conditions, and that might just regulate their pain tolerance.”

“And what,” The boy frowned, following the vacant eyes of the subjects. A sauce stain on his cheek looked like a mole. “Should we expect these vanished people to reappear?”

He snorted. “Of course not.”

His glance could have stricken lightning itself.

“Uss that dog brain for a moment,” Dazai insisted, knocking the side of his head against his, making him curse out. “Those thirty three people — Ane-san called them fundamental assets, didn’t she? What do they have in common with these faceless laborers? If we believe the Nine Rings want us weakened on our economic incomes — why bother with the capture of people who bring nothing but numbers?”

“Desperate people look for desperate place,” Chuuya said. “That’s what you heard that V guy say, right?”

His finger landed on one of the pictures. “Hokama Shigeo. His late father owed an immeasurable debt to one of Ace’s casinos — his favorite recruiting technique. He couldn’t repay us if he won three lotteries in a day.”

Another picture. “Tamashiro Miki. She offered her body to the organization, but she was kicked out of the Pomegranate after the underage sons of some clients accused her of rape. Before she was abducted, she lived in a stop apartment at the entrance of the city. One of her hands was cut off after an escaping attempt. Ishida Ken —“ “Got it,” Chuuya interrupted him. “I was up there writing this stuff the whole afternoon. Miserable people, possibly heartless. Same for Kingstain. But that’s our only lead? It wasn’t the Nine Rings because the Nine Rings don’t go for miserable people?”

Dazai blinked. “Don’t misunderstand. It was the Nine Rings.”

The boy leaned on his elbow, staring down at him. “Excuse me?”

“What, you think the tattoos are lying?”

“But you said —“

“Mori isn’t wrong about the Nine Rings’ involvement,” he explained, dipping his hands in some Kung Pao Chicken, “They are involved. But the microchips alone prove that they are not the mastermind. Whoever is at the top of the chain probably wants them to take the fall. It was a challenge — One that Mori accepted.”

Understanding spread through mismatched eyes. “And if the head of it all can control people with those crosses —people so low ranked no one noticed their existence —“

“It means he could sneak eyes in,” He nodded towards the roof, again. “Naito Ayame, a cleaner who only disappeared a mere week before Tenshi was freed, worked specifically in the dungeons. I hacked the cameras of the stairs, and —“

“If you get Boss on my doorstep for suspicious activity on my laptop, I will end you —“

“And I saw her right where she was supposed to be, when our prisoner escaped,” he continued, pointedly not mentioning the state of alert their Intelligence must be in for those kinds of research. “No one even noticed she had been gone for a week.”

Chuuya’s nod was heavy. “Like the fucking elf in Royal Battle IX.”

He sighed, disconsolate. “Like in Royal Battle IX.”

Silence fell, through the hisses of some nearby apartment’s air conditioning. It was an older building than Dazai had expected either him or mighty Executive candidate Albatross to live in.

Dazai’s dumping site was as quiet as cemeteries came; sometimes, if he tried hard enough, he could hear the distant waves.

Floating lithely to the ground, one of the pictures was ripped off the ceiling, landing right on his face.

Frustration made its way through Chuuya's throat. "It's not enough. Why would distractions have the microchips? Are the crosses Abilities or —"

He filled his cheeks, blowing the piece of paper out of his face. "That's what we're going to find out, obviously."

A distinctively repulsed tremor went through his body. "We."

"They did attempt to blow you up, so I'm hoping you will make for a fine bait," With a final shudder, he jumped to his feet. "Step one of my master plan to catch the bad guys."

"Master plan," he echoed, with a tone that made it clear that wasn't the part of that last sentence that made him the most skeptical. "Like the Secret Executive's spies in training,"

While misunderstood, he hoped his grin conveyed enough. "I think we should call this — Mission Blue Flower."

Gloved hands rubbed at Chuuya's temples. "You need to get over that stupid game loss — Do you know how hard it is to convince someone that gun of yours is fake?"

"Like you have a better name in mind —"

"Maybe I do, yeah —"

"I haven't heard you offer any suggestions since that one ridiculous list of revenge methods of yours — That my poor insides are still recovering from, by the way — So —"

A hint of genuine rage flashed through his eyes. "Don't you fucking dare act like you didn't deserve it." He barely escaped his kick. "What are we doing?"

Dazai gathered the empty food boxes, juggling them precariously. "For starters — You and I are going to infiltrate the Nine Rings. And have a chat with their Boss, while we're at it."

Through his most vicious efforts to tear his makeshift juggling balls out of his grip, Chuuya paused, staring him down.

"Fine," he said, eventually, barely hiding excitement. Little caged dog, hearing the creak of the door leading to the nearest park. "And where do we find this Boss, since mackerels gained omniscience while I wasn't looking?"

"Why, of course," The boxes landed on the floor, spreading remnants of food all over the vacant ground. "Our Tenshi works at the Arcade, doesn't she?"

The lights of the Arcade were turned off.

“Stop ignoring me!” Chuuya hissed, floating up and down flickering street lights and rusty benches. “How long have you known —“

“How is it my fault if you have the observational skills of a dead moth?” Dazai interrupted, plastering his face on the metal shutter. Turned off game machines and his own reflection was all he saw — he kicked the lock on the ground, half-heartedly.

“We were here mere days ago, weren’t we? Didn’t you notice the woman giving out coins near the air-hockey table?”

“No, I didn’t notice,” the boy snapped, “Clearly. You could barely see her face through the bruises your ass gave her, the one time I saw her. And you didn’t think about speaking up about the escaped prisoner standing right in front of us?”

“It’s precisely because she was there that I didn’t,” He offered him a pitying glance. “Living with that much free space up there must be maddening. No doubt, I’d kill myself.”

“You’d kill yourself for shits and giggles.”

“Unrelated. Make yourself useful and get us in, yes?”

Even as he fixed himself in place, heel upon the lock, Chuuya’s mutters filled the moonlight-lined street with vengeance. “Oh, now he needs me to know information —“

The padlock came loose with a well-calculated kick, just silent enough not to startle the familiar symphony of Yokohama — muffled vigilantes and rumbling waves; old engines and police radioes; the never-not-absent chink of crimson drops dripping in a pool of blood.

“Come on,” Chuuya pulled the shutter up without a blink.

“What is it that we’re looking for?” he asked, as they wandered down the square-tiled space. The lack of lights and repetitive jingles gave that familiar room a spectral sort of tinge — with the eerie hums and the occasional mechanical sigh from a recharging game. “You think the Nine Rings would use an old Arcade as a base?”

“No, but one person would,” Dazai replied, sliding across the counter. “As Mr. Arcade never failed to mention, this place is right at the edge of most gangs’ territories — It’s why Mori hasn’t stopped us from frequenting it.”

A snort. He extracted one of the plastic rifles from the War God III stands, cocking it a bit too convincingly. “The same Boss who ordered us to lay off some steam with those electric marbles of yours the last time?”

He jumped on the usually-bright squares of the Dance Dance machine. “I’m banished from all malls in the city, so —“

“That’s because you keep locking yourself in their bathrooms when you’re whining,” Chuuya clarified, stealing a basketball, this time. “Remember that time Elise and Q wanted to play hide and seek and no one found you for a week?”

“You need to stop being so attached to the past.”

“They sent me to look for you in Beijing. Because you left cryptic messages in the local dialect.”

“You’re welcome for the adventure.”

Dazai had barely enough time to lower before the glowing ball could tear his head off his neck.

In a fit of inspiration, he dropped to the ground.

“Dude, what the —“

“She kept tapping her foot,” he murmured. He dragged his nails along the lines of the tiles, tracing the deeper lines of cement. “And Mr. Arcade — He kept glancing here, while we talked.”

A bit more gracefully, Chuuya crunched next to him. “You think she has an underground base?”

“Could be,” Something glinted, right next to the leg of the table. He reached forward. “Either that, or she saw us too, that day.”

Before they could analyze the silver cross — a perfect match to the one still resting inside Dazai’s pocket — any deeper, an unmistakable snarl shattered the silence.

It zapped their bodies like electricity, kicking their legs out in an attempt to drag them to their feet. His knees bumped against the air hockey table, tearing a yelp out of him — the glass divisor between fields was rattled, rolling down — landing right onto his skull.

Chuuya’s flinching head met the edge of the closest gaming machine, and the sudden pain awakened his glowing-red punch.

Vision half-blurred from the impact, Dazai saw the Apocalypse VI metal box set-up fall in unlikely slow motion, creaking a hellish shriek, and tearing its cables off the wall — ready to crash their confused bones. Chuuya’s son of a fucking bitch! was a pointless dot; his shoulder blades dug holes in some space under Dazai’s ribs — as the boy threw himself upon him, blocking the machine with his shins, a mere foot from their faces.

Like a death sentence, the cables snapped.

“Shit, ” Chuuya’s eyes widened, under the game machine hovering upon them; Dazai realized what was going to happen in a blink, eyes stuck on the WARNING: SECURITY sign , “Oh, shit —“

Lighting up the whole Arcade in emergency scarlet, the shop alarm began to blare, loud enough to revive the earth.

---

...

---

Tadeo, as it turned out the devil that had startled them into action was called — the police dog who had been roaming the area along with his more human colleagues — clearly bet its all on its name.

Once they were forcibly settled to huff about their underserved handcuffs, it didn’t move an inch from his guarding position, offering them his unfriendliest, slobbering all over the glass shards on the ground.

“This is a residential area, anyway,” Dazai pointed out, as one of the officers cuffed his wrists. “You guys can’t have your stupid dogs howl all they like. It’s way past any reasonable child’s bedtime.”

“Aren’t they supposed to be used for more relevant shit , anyway?” Chuuya intervened, between curses to his newly bruised shins. He had yet to go on a spiel about how none of this would have happened if Dazai’s stupid slimy skin hadn’t been touching him, but he knew it would come. “Explosives? Drugs? Rescuing people from under a building? Since when are Arcades guarded at night?”

“Since when is anything guarded at night?”

“Arcades aren’t even guarded during the day. ”

The woman was clearly unimpressed. She left to go talk to her colleague — on the ground, unswayed by the half-heart-eyes Chuuya was evidently sending his way, Tadeo growled.

“How come you know so much about police dogs, anyway?” Dazai asked, shaking his bandaged wrists to hear the cuffs click. “Is the legal part of your double life more truthful to your nature?”

The glance the boy directed him could have frozen Hell all over. “This isn’t the time, you —“ Genuine dismay drooled down his cheeks. “Oh, come on —“

“Truly, Chuuya,” A masculine, slightly exasperated voice spoke up. “At your old age, with an actual job — still robbing Arcades?”

Detective Matsuda, as the officer was introduced by Chuuya’s nearly hysterical spit, was a middle-aged man with no hair and thick glasses, who somehow knew better than to put his hands on either of their shoulders as he led them to the police car. He had also, apparently, been Detective Murase’s field partner. At least — before Verlaine had ripped him off his brother’s hands, like a child’s last whim.

“A pair made in heaven, the two of them,” Chuuya scoffed, as the man whistled on the wheel. “Had nothing better to do than roam through Suribachi City every day, like they were looking for living quarters.”

Dazai could imagine it, if he squinted — an even shorter redhead, skipping around the fragile box houses of that hellhole, hiding the younger kids behind his frame when two too-good-willed men in uniforms got too close.

Good men, as per tradition, tended to sink their claws too deep.

“The crater has a certain beauty to it, if you know where to look,” Matsuda intervened, offering them a curled eyebrow from the rear view mirror. Dazai had barely wasted time in grasping his roots; a good-hearted, stubborn man, who had only done one thing for the entirety of his life — who intended to keep that way. One of the absent ones, Mori called them. “Given how many times you would escape to break into that Arcade, though, I believe you might not share that notion.”

The ones who truly want us dead in the name of justice, and not revenge, he would add.

“Let’s get this over with. We have stuff to do.”

“That’s not nice, Chuuya,” Dazai said, dragging the sharper edge of the silver cross up and down his window. His head was still pounding; an irrelevant trickle of blood pooled under the bandaged side of his face — and the other boy kept sending brusque glances to it, as if he somehow knew. “This gentleman is being nice enough to give us a lift home. Learn some manners.”

“Actually, I’m taking you to the station,” Detective Matsuda replied, stupidly. A golden thread with a crucifix dangled from his neck; the irony did not escape him. “You’re currently charged with breaking and entering. Plus, undefined damage to work tools, attempted escape from the police force, and assault on one of my officers.”

“Is your dog charged with assault?” he asked, sticking his head between the front seats. “Because he should be. He tried to eat my shoe. That can’t be legal. Have some sense.”

The man glanced at Chuuya, very pointedly. “Found yourself a partner in crime?”

“Don’t make me throw up on your fine stail leather.”

“Didn’t you use to constantly bitch about your friends’ lack of interest in your video games?”

“He did?” Dazai gaped, delighted.

“Oh, absolutely. Barely ten years old and more bitter than a widow from the Great War. There was this one time, when it took him a whole three hours to escape, that he —“

“Unfortunately, I don’t have criminal acquaintances,” Chuuya interrupted them, eyes stubbornly stuck to his window.

“You are a criminal.”

He laughed. “On what basis?”

“Chuuya.”

“No, show them to me,” he encouraged, pulling Dazai back by his coat, to take his place. The expression he offered the policeman was the pinnacle of gloating innocence — and then something, something distinctively more enraged. “We’re going to the station, right? Show me the papers. Ah? Got nothing? Knew it,” He dropped back onto his seat, pulling at his cuffs, only once. If I wanted — “Give me a few years, and I’ll press charges against you guys for prejudiced tenancy in accusations.”

He wouldn’t. He didn’t know if Matsuda knew, though. Imperscrutable, framed by the echo of the red lights upon their heads, the detective allowed the silence to stretch out.

“I hope,” he said, eventually — somewhat casually, somewhat genuinely, in a way that got Chuuya’s gloved nails to scratch his palms. “That you still have those Mafia lawyers of yours on speed dial.”

“The Mafia has lawyers?” they echoed, just the right tad too vacant.

A sigh. “As expected.”

No matter the late hour, the Police Station was bustling with energy — a tremor slightly different from the HQ’s busiest days, but still similar enough to make his eyes roll.

They were dragged through desks overflowing in papers and snacks, as uniformed men and women made it a duty to bump against their frames as they ran around — answering endlessly ringing phones, tearing the doors open to escape, and pulling cuffed wrists into the tight hallway of cells.

Two tedious, infinite hours followed — as they were immediately separated and stuck in two interrogation rooms. Matsuda followed the redhead like a nostalgic, overexcited relative; the blank-faced woman who had handcuffed him sat in the seat in front of him, and wasted no time to monotonously rattle off questions from a standard-procedure binder.

It was a distinctively unsuccessful conversation.

The final proof of it came after too many I wouldn't know, officer and I'm not answering that, officer, and What's your take on a double suicide, officer? — until, at some point after the first half hour, Dazai laid his chin on his arms and refused to open his mouth again.

The detective — a smart one — simply got up and left.

“...refuses,” he heard the woman snap, from the ajar door, gesturing in front of Detective Matsuda's exasperated eyes. “— lawyer — No, he isn't — Hasn't said a word in almost two hours, what am I supposed — Nakahara's playing the silent game too? Since when is — Port Mafia? We only have the Arcade, we can't —“

With an unmistakable, well-practiced kick, the door of his interrogation room was nearly torn off its hinges. Deaf to the calls coming from the hallway, Chuuya marched in — still handcuffed and still unbothered by the notion — before plopping down on the empty seat next to his own.

“Hey — Hey,” the detective protested, barely holding the door before it could ricochet back into her face, “Kid, for God's sake, you can't be here —“

“You're drilling us for the same shit,” the boy replied, clearly uninterested. “We share a lawyer, anyway.”

“Or we would,” Dazai continued, raising his hand, “You know. If you would let us call him. ”

A vein in her forehead throbbed. She took a single step forward, some frustrating ounce of adult intention running through her veins — pointedly, Dazai hooked one ankle to the leg of Chuuya's chair, pulling him closer.

— Tried to. Nothing came out of it. Gloved fingers grasped his armrest with a sigh, plastering them together under the deafening screech of the old seat against the floor.

The woman's vein nearly bulged out of her skin.

“Just leave it to me, Matsumoto,” Detective Matsuda intervened, rubbing his temples, before she could truly attempt to wring their necks. “I'll take care of this.”

There was an old radio upon the metal table between them, steadily muttering about rising fires around the city through white-noise statics. A camera in the left corner, staring right into their faces; a vague smell of mansweat, left on every surface like a faded footstep.

As he dragged his eyes up and down their files, the golden cross hanging from the man's neck glistened.

“Then,” Matsuda threw the file on the desk. Dazai didn't grant it a gaze. Some summary of their latest mess was of little interest to anyone in the room — he knew the true ammo rested in the evidence board in the main room, where old, blurry photographs of the lowest ranks of the syndicate framed impasse-ended investigations.

“I assume better introductions are in need,” he started, at last, offering his hand. “You're Dazai Osamu.”

“That’s not a question,” he noted, arms in place.

The detective lowered his own. “Mori Ougai’s Dazai, I assume. Hard not to recognize you. Are you surprised?”

A file about him had to be hidden somewhere too, he assumed — and at least one of the suited silhouettes in the red thread-connected pictures had to sport bandages. Dazai had never dabbled in laying low; no one in the Port Mafia had truly had any need to do so.

We could empty out our blessed Bay, the old Boss used to say, and fill it up with dirt.

He shrugged. “Perks of Mori Corporation’s tutelage.”

“And are they quite a few?” Matsuda asked. “These perks, I mean.”

“As many as a weapon manufacturer can give, I assume. Legal defense is amongst them.”

“Listen,” he insisted. The radio creaked; a female voice requested vehicle support. “We all know how this is going to go. You will get your call, and some distinguished gentlemen will bail you out and clear your name ‘till it’s shining, leaving us with nothing but pictures of slightly rebellious teenagers we unjustly stuck in a cell.”

“That certainly sounds entertaining,” Dazai noted.

“Maybe we should get on with that,” Chuuya agreed.

“I’m kinda getting hungry, too.”

“Are you guys aware your toilets are all broken?”

“Apart from the one I broke,” he specified. “Before you get the idea of blaming me for all of them.”

The man cut in: “Doesn’t it frustrate you, that some people in this world can do whatever they want — and face no consequences?”

“Not particularly,” Dazai answered. “But, well — I’m not people. I haven’t done a thing.”

“We all have.”

“I’m sure it frustrates you, then.”

His necklace dangled, back and forth. He had seen eyes like his somewhat rarely; had felt like every adult his once body used to bump against wore similar ones.

The adults were always well-intentioned. That was the rule; that was what they had all agreed on, during some private meeting Dazai was not allowed to whine at the door of. They wore wrinkles at the sides of their skulls like a hard-earned jewel; they let words fall from their lips like the world wouldn’t overflow in pretense, at some point.

“If we all know how it goes,” the latest of the bunch concluded, “Do a few questions really change anything for you, then?”

Dazai blinked. “Would hearing the entire evolutionary history of crickets bother you? Because I could do it.”

“Give it up,” Chuuya replied, the pinnacle of a sharp kind of boredom — far too drenched in diesel not to turn into rage. “You’ve dragged me here one too many times. I know my rights. We don’t have to tell you a single thing.”

Detective Matsuda curled an eyebrow. “What, does Mafia recruitment come with a crash course in law?”

The led lights on the ceiling buzzed intermittently. In the corner of the room, the red dot of the only visible camera blinked.

This time around, the policeman only tolerated the silence for a few minutes. Eventually, he sighed: “You kids said you’re hungry?”

Regardless of the Chinese takeaway boxes still resting on Chuuya’s apartment floor, they perched up.

“Let’s discuss the matter at hand, then,” Matsuda attempted again, a little less than half an hour later, watching them promptly exchange the boxes left in front of them and munch their way through well-spiced noodles. “Why did you break into the Arcade?”

“Chuuya thinks lucky-winning one round of Smash Smash! means he will ever be able to do it again,” Dazai offered, drawing a circle near the boy’s face with his dirty chopsticks. It was good enough food; if it was meant to be a bribe, though, he would have enjoyed some more salt. “I could hardly wait for opening hours to rip him out of his delusion.”

A kick to the leg of his chair rattled his skeleton. “ And Dazai thinks hacking the game machine so that all my players will attempt to commit suicide ten minutes into the game — Somehow translates into him not being shit at every single —“

“Ergo, ” Matsuda said, “It has nothing to do with the rising rate of gang violence — the worst in almost one year; by the way — we’ve experienced in the last week and a half?”

“I’m touched by your faith,” Dazai assured. There were two other boxes on the table; but he was already growing nauseous from the mechanical eating motions, and Chuuya had fallen into his leave half habit again. “But we tend to bet lower stakes on our Arcade nights. Haven’t gambled on the fate of the Yokohama underground yet.”

“Maybe it’s time to,” Chuuya proposed. His grin was a half formed thing, stubborn at the very edges. “Get me a list of crime scenes visited in a week and whoever gets closer to the number wins.”

“That’s grim, Slug.”

“I didn’t say the corpses, I said the crime scene. ”

“That’s basically the same thing,” he insisted, stealing a vegetable from his box.

“How,” His chopsticks pinched his nose, hard enough to bruise. “You can have crime scenes with more than one body. It changes the whole damn point system.”

“Because, you hooligan —“

“Who in hell are you calling hooligan, you wretched whore —“

Matsuda’s sigh came in tandem with a shrill from the radio, — something about a robbery near Yamashita Park.

“I know this is a pointless conversation,” he promised. His eyes kept falling on that mess of a late dinner table; Dazai got the feeling they could have told him they hadn’t been fed in weeks, and he would have cried about it. “Your loyalty will stitch your mouths closed. I understand. You weren’t given anywhere else to direct it to.”

Hidden meanings crawled underneath those words, a tad too cold for the temperature of that rusted room. Pity, he had once told Mori, tasted like antiseptic medicines.

Chuuya’s shoulders curled in, caging his curved rib cage into something even tighter. Strangled by that too large coat of his, Dazai felt the instinct to do the same.

“The disappearances we’re dealing with,” the man continued. “Most of the precinct agrees they are not Mafia style. There’s no usual identification wounds, for starters — no bite to the curb. Plus, your syndicate has never concerned itself with Ability Users. Not to kill them, at least.”

“No point in killing useful cards,” Chuuya shrugged. “If you want to insist we’re two grunts for the Mafia, then you can answer this: why ask us about the disappearances, if you don’t think the Port Mafia is to blame?”

“Because you’ve been around for decades,” Matsuda replied, easily. “And Yokohama is still standing. I’m assuming, consequently, that the city itself is not a target.”

Dazai turned his head; he was unsurprised to find two unmatching eyes already there, answering his well concealed curiosity with a curled eyebrow.

“Oh, yes,” he explained, leaning towards his ear in a stage-whisper, staring right at the detective’s face. “Old man Matsuda is a smart one, you see. Has always been. Was the only fucker around to raise his hand at cops’ meeting and advance the hypothesis that maybe — Mafiosi are not completely broken in the head.”

He whistled. “That’s certainly a feat.”

“Admirable. It gave Detective Murase an aneurysm.”

“And you being Mafia didn’t?” the Detective scoffed. “The Sheep — I understood the Sheep, Chuuya.”

His eyes hardened. “Watch your mouth.”

“They were children,” he insisted. “You all were. Petty crimes, and — and stolen alcohol, and breaking into Arcades — You were doing your best. I could see that. Murase could see that. You didn’t trust adults, and you wouldn’t allow us to help —“

“Help,” Chuuya echoed.

Lighting in the summer, he thought. Something more natural, even — something utterly made for ire, the way that face of his, stolen or copied it was, had always seemed. Dazai wondered if it felt warm, behind that endless frame of his — where the anger wouldn’t reach, but only cradle.

He couldn’t recall if anyone had ever wasted an inch of that kaleidoscopic fire for him.

“— You had reasons not to. But the Mafia, Chuuya, you —“ Matsuda’s gaze fell on Dazai; it scurried down the bruises from that afternoon’s beating, the bandages around his arms. Pity, Chuuya had once told him, always tasted fucking cheap. He had bought them food to be sure they would starve, without it. “You two don’t know what you got yourself into.”

Dazai felt his mouth smile. “Of course.”

“That’s it,” Chuuya dropped his chopsticks. “We want our lawyer. Bring him here or we’ll start screaming our throats raw. Want a child detention case on your hands?”

“It’s not a life just because it’s keeping you alive, for now,” It could have been laughter, the thing out of his throat; he saw the desperation lining it — an old thing, never victorious. “I know that’s what it seems like. We have watched countless people like you get lost in it. Chuuya, do you really think Murase would have died for a lost cause?”

“I thought law-abiding citizens were meant to have some more respect for the dead,” the boy snapped.

“You went to his funeral,” he insisted and, oh, that was news. “Because you felt guilty. Because you knew it was wrong — that a man would die for nothing.”

For me, Chuuya didn’t say, and Dazai heard it so loud his ears rang; saw it carved on five graves that weren’t his to mourn, because he never ran out of grieving space. For me, for nothing.

“We’ve got files on files on people who ended up just like him. Entire archives. The conflict that’s starting — It might not have begun on the Port Mafia’s terms, but we both know the Port Mafia will end it.”

“Great, then,” Dazai clasped his hands. “Glory to the mafiosi. You’ll be able to refuse night shifts soon enough.”

“Civilians disappearing isn’t a Port Mafia matter.”

“Someone has to do shit around here,” Chuuya said.

“Listen to me,” he begged. “You’re betting your lives on something that does not care about your existence.”

Dazai tilted his head. “Isn’t that how faith works?”

An aborted, thoughtless motion raised Detective Matsuda’s fingers to his cross necklace.

It wasn’t like there were no children in the Mafia, he considered. Joining the outskirts of a gang, doing delivery commissions right under the nose of the police, having a tattoo stain young flesh for the sake of numbers — they were the quickest ways to gain some money on the streets.

It wasn’t as if he didn’t believe the sob stories soaking the man’s tone in desperation; as if Chuuya hadn’t muttered about Murase’s death. But the two of them — the infamous Port Mafia’s youngsters; the kids hovering behind the shut doors of meeting rooms, bothering Madame Tanaki for information, breaking furniture in petty fights about bones and viscera —

Don’t take me, he thought, and maybe it had been a prayer of its own, for a good person .

“So,” Even that silence-shattering sound tasted bitter. The noodles should have really been saltier. “Our lawyer?”

Detective Matsuda’s eyes were stuck to the remnants of their food, pooling down the edge of the metal table. They didn’t even exchange a glance.

As one, seamlessly drowning any leftover dejection, they began to scream.

---

...

---

The pair of women in the cell next to their own would be dead by sunrise.

“You’re not holding it right, ” Chuuya reprimanded, fixing the half-empty bottle in his grasp. His feet were planted on the dirt-lined floor of their own cubicle — a square barely wide enough to fit a bench and their abandoned coats, and for his rotating kick not to tear the bars open. “I’m more than fine with ripping your head off with the cap, but Boss will kill me.”

“You’re severely overestimating his gratitude,” Dazai replied — still curious enough about that bet to hold the bottle higher. “Now hurry, or this week’s reports are all-on-you.”

His nostrils flared.

The old TV hanging from the hallway wall framed a bloodied, yellow-tape-covered street, somewhere nearby the train station; gesturing lazily, the journalist vacantly confirmed the latest episode of local gang violence. Cursing-out officers slammed the doors behind them to run into the night.

Momentarily distracted, Chuuya leaned his elbow on the cellbars, studying the filmed crime scene. He scratched at his chest, where Dazai knew the tattoo rested.

Not one of their massacres, then.

From the cell on their right, the first woman said: “I don’t care if it kills us in the process. No pain, can you imagine a life like that?”

“Heaven,” the other one agreed, a bit quieter. She had been sitting since the beginning; if not betrayed the motions of her chest, she could have easily been a corpse. “Heaven — If he’s even real.”

Quicker than a breath, their eyes met.

Chuuya stood a bit straighter. He talked; Dazai only half registered his words, bickering in all the right moments. It remained dubious if the pair had any idea they were being listened to; nonetheless, it was better not to risk it.

“An interesting name doesn’t make a legend true,” the first woman agreed, munching on her lip. Her clothes were frayed. She had the carved face of someone who knew what it meant to starve — and the shaking frame of the homeless sleepers the police could never leave alone. “I know. I understand your fear. But the underground never allowed lies to survive as long as this one has.”

“The Poet,” the other echoed. “And his dreamlike life. And the only price is — Faith?”

“His price is regret,” she replied. “Facing our sins, or whatever powerful men are all about. And faith, I suppose. Takes a whole lot of it to go against the Port Mafia.”

The bored detective climbing up and down their hallway rattled his knuckles on the women’s bars, startling them into silence. Chuuya raised his leg.

Not a word was uttered until the man had reached the other end of the hallway again; instead, the somewhat drowsy staccato of old printers and hushed orders filled their ears — clanging along to the cuffs they had finally pick-locked their way through.

Eventually, the first woman hissed: “I don’t care if their new Boss changed the business. I ain’t forgetting what they did to us. Those fucking Crimson Rains killed my child.”

Bony fists clenching around the base of the bench, the other woman’s eyes kept staring at the floor.

“The Year of the Crimson Rains, ” Chuuya murmured, low. “Haven’t heard that name in a while.”

“Mori tells me you couldn’t take a step around at the city without hearing someone mutter it,” Thirteen and stained by ghosts that did not play doctor yet, Dazai had only heard the echoes of the underground bleeding through the fingers of the prior Boss — a peak of years of slow decay, but a climb that had never been as vicious as it had in that fateful year.

“You couldn’t take a step around without getting killed,” the other boy corrected. “I don’t even remember when they started giving it a name. People were too busy being called traitors to worry about semantics.”

Resentment was a hard fire to put out. Almost two years had passed since Mori had taken over — a succession they had made sure to publicize, lest they lost the occasion to pin all their faults on a dead man in a stained-glass room — but while most agreed that the Mafia was growing irrevocably stronger each day, they hardly believed it to be a positive thing.

“If they are offering themselves as the road to revenge against the PM,” Dazai considered, studying the framed pieces of newspaper in the hallway, “Then they are assured the support of almost every smaller gang. The Nine Rings used to be a chimera of its own right. If someone could be believed wild enough to go against us...”

The woman on the bench let out a sigh. Her fingers intertwined; she began to pray. Deep in his pockets, the matching crosses seemed to burn through the fabric.

“Let them try,” Chuuya concluded, raising his chin in a peerless way that reeked of the Lady of the Port. “We’ll kill them.”

Then he shifted his weight to his other leg, kicking the flying one heart-droppingly close to his face — allowing the tip of his fighting boot to strike the bottle cap away. Like clockwork, it flew between the bars, and bumped a newly arrived Hirotsu right in the forehead.

“These yours?” Detective Matsuda questioned, as he slowly opened their cell. The permanent frown digging his forehead spoke of mistrust: to the unpunished guilty he was letting go, and the old man in cashmere and certain hidden revolver.

Irrelevant. “Unfortunately, yes,” the Commander said, picture perfect gentleman in every move — the Mafia respects hopeful fools, Dazai; they have nothing but — and almost enraged in the eyes he kept on their scurrying out silhouettes. “All paperwork should have already been fixed. I deeply apologize for the disturbance. I assure you,” He curled an eyebrow, “It will not happen again.”

Unimpressed, they stared back at him.

A faraway siren startled most protesting, drunken voices in the hallway into silence — from the television, the panicked journalist squeaked out a warning, as the familiar rhythm of an arising shootout appeared around the car he had taken refuge behind.

It wasn't true quietness; nonetheless, Dazai thought he could have heard a pin drop — slipping through the blaming eyes that were the only thing Matsuda could settle on Hirotsu's devastatingly impassive face.

He offered him a hand. "Thank you for your service."

The Officer clenched his jaw. His gaze slipped down to Chuuya, unanswered.

Surprisingly enough, it fell on Dazai, too.

He shook his hand, resigned. "Keep an eye on them."

Hirotsu's Camaro sported a years-expired parking ticket on the windshield. He ushered them in the backseats, somewhat unnecessarily; neither one of them had ever made the active choice to sit next to him. Silent as the roads were, they roamed through mostly undisturbed, soaked in a silence that was probably meant to signify something.

When he got bored with kicking the back of the driver seat, Dazai leaned forward, switching radio stations.

"Oh, fuck you," Chuuya groaned, as the spoken intro to Hirose Fumiko's Schoolgirl filled the vehicle. "You skipped The Day I Was Born, but you like her pop stuff?"

His head snapped to him. "You know Hirose Fumiko?"

"And you listen to any kind of music?"

"She's the greatest vocalist alive, I'm not going to —" Horror spread all the way to his fingers; any kind of resemblance to the local dog felt like sin he should rub off on him in the most painful of ways. "How do you think I spend my days, honestly?"

Uncomfortably, the boy sunk deeper into his seat. "Torturing fuckers in the dungeons? Planning your own demise? How can you not like her rock singles, that was her peak —"

[If someone were to ask — he had planned, some sleepless night of some sleepless eons ago — he would say: "Her rock years were disappointing and outliving her purpose as an artist," and he would not stutter once, would look them right in the eyes, as people did. "She should have stuck to classical, clearly." And then they'd ask, "Are those your favorite?" And he would nod, as people did, and say, "How could they not?"]

"Then," Hirotsu spoke up, traditionally toneless, "Any reason to cause trouble in the middle of a conflict?"

"Technically, Gramps, we're not in a conflict," he pointed out, dropping back in his own seat, legs crossed. Every window was fogged up; he traced stick-figures with his finger, because it would stain. "It's — How did Boss call it? A time of repercussions."

"It's a time of police cars pretending their daily routes ask them to circle our Headquarters twelve times in a day," the man insisted, sending an unmistakable glance through the rearview mirror. Something about watching his mouth and not mocking the Boss and feet off my leather. “No officer is ever going to arrest us for murder, boys. It’s foolish, seemingly irrelevant mistakes like these that land people like us behind bars.”

“That’s what we have an army of lawyers for,” Chuuya groaned, pulling at his shoelaces. “We know. You make that speech once a week. And anyway — None of this would have happened if this idiot hadn’t gotten scared of a dog and startled me —“

“Excuse me?”

“You jumped ten fucking feet in the air!”

“You almost crashed Apocalypse VI on our skulls,” he whined, “How am I supposed to win the Miso Soup bet, now?”

“The Miso Soup bet was lost from the beginning —“

“Boys,” Hirotsu called, his seat nauseatingly rattled by their vicious motions.

“And, and — You’re the one who has babysitter cops in every corner of this damn city —“

“Babysitter cops?”

“If the guy hadn’t been so desperate to drag your short self into the nearest Good Lad Academy, they wouldn’t have had all that time to match up our files with the little they know —“

“Boys.”

“You kept asking Detective Mastumoto to kill herself with your deranged ass!”

“You ate my chicken, and it was the wing, too —“

The Camaro swerved so suddenly the wheels screeched against the road, drawing a full circle in the empty square; Dazai flew forward, painfully bumping his head against some sharp corner of Chuuya’s cursing out body. “Gramps!”

Hirotsu raised the volume of the radio, undeterred.

Glistening gently on the floor of the car was one of the silver crosses, having slipped free from his pockets. Dazai leaned down to recover it. When he fixed himself back into his seat, the other boy was staring out of his window — meaningfully meeting his eyes on the reflection.

Eerily familiar against his ruined fingertips, the refilled syringe he casually extracted from Chuuya’s pocket went easily unnoticed under Hirotsu’s eyes — too focused on deciding which roads wouldn’t put them in the direct impact of the police cars hurrying towards the center of the city. Quietly, they laid back against the seats, counting breaths.

The car stopped at a turn; the traffic lights blinked, matching the old man’s finger against his steering wheel. Yellow left its place to blue, abrupt and soundless, and Dazai struck the syringe in the side of his neck.

— Tried to.

Thin as it was, the needle shattered on impact, as it came into contact with the revolver Hirotsu had angled between the front seats. He didn't even bother to shift his eyes from the road before firing, — in a crystal thump!, two bullets put a hole in the rear windshield, webbing the glass all the way to its frames.

[Sneaking out of their cell had been all but a hard feat. The need to take turns had been a mere precaution; as intensely warned the guard roaming up and down their hallway had been about the two of them in particular — blood-bound mafiosi in a night cell with children locks — Chuuya had already lowered the gravity around his body, making him light-headed enough to trip on his steps.]

The makeshift Infirmary had been the second stop, purely out of caution — But the archives had been the true target of their swift wandering, on tip-toes and hissed insults.

“No reason to risk catching Mori's attention,” he had shrugged, “When we can steal from the bugs buzzing in his ears.”]

Plastered each against their own car door, Dazai and Chuuya exchanged a speechless glance. A hiss of wind entered from the cracked glass, whipping their faces.

“If you could refrain,” Hirotsu said, eventually, with the nonchalance of a true driver, “My fingers are still spasming from yesterday's anesthesia. I was stuck in the Hospital after a shootout near the port,” He blinked at them in the rear view mirror. “You know how repercussions times are.”

The shocked silence only lasted for a few more alleys. Chuuya ended up exploding in a: “You could have put a hole in our goddamn heads!”

“Your Ability would have stopped it.”

“Shitty Dazai doesn't have an Ability!”

“Were you worried about me?” he cooed.

“Hardly the first time Dazai receives a bullet wound,” Hirotsu brushed the matter off. “You two have caused enough troubles for one night. The Intelligence will have to spend a good day deleting any traces of you from the database. I'm taking you to the HQs, and Kouyou will deal with you.”

The boy scoffed. “Ane-san is in Tokyo.”

“The Executives have already returned, actually. Boss is currently on his way back.”

Dread crept down his neck. “Old man — Old man, be merciful. Where's your heart, truly? She'll make us work on our calligraphy until our fingers fall off —“

Realization struck the redhead's face. "She'll lock us up for the entire whole day —"

"Ah," the Commander nodded, reasonably, "You were certainly ready to lock yourself up — and play until your fingers fell — at the Arcade, during a conflict, so I do not see what kind of —"

Chuuya's fist tore a hole in the headrest of the man's seat, fingers hooking onto his nape — slamming his face onto his steering wheel roughly enough to make the car shake.

"Oh, dear —" Dazai attempted, through the pained curse leaving Hirotsu's mouth and Hirose Fumiko's highest note yet. Gloved fingers cut the circulation of his own. "Plan B," Chuuya announced, before kicking his car door open and dragging the two of them outside.

For good measure, before stumbling down the mostly empty road, swerving through a few horning cars, he stole one of Chuuya's best hidden knives, stabbing a particular square near the filler neck of the car.

By the time the low-range grenade painted a column of fire against the twilight sky, they were already five alleys away.

Not slowing down a moment as he jumped up and down walls, Chuuya called: "When in hell did you put that thing in there?"

"I'm not revealing my tricks," he replied, barely avoiding face-planting against a streetlight, "Putting bombs in cars is my seventh preferred communication technique!"

"The fuck were you trying to communicate?"

"Ah," Dazai spun, running backwards, just to offer his best wink. "Don't follow."

---

...

---

She appeared out of nowhere, the moment the sky turned dust — having quietly followed them from the moment the police had dragged them out of the Arcade.

A Bodeo Model 1889, safety already switched, was loosely hanging from her pale fingers. A strange match with her unusual clothing: a calf-length gown the color of rust, and a white silk shirt, curling on her nape like a hood of sorts, hiding her golden hair under that makeshift veil. Dazai had studied frescoes less delicate than her frame; had yawned in the face of Madonnas with crueler eyes.

She didn't quite resemble the bruise-littered woman on the floor of their dungeons, nor the armed woman who had bickered with V as he hid under a desk — not until she laid the mouth of her gun on the side of Dazai's skull .

"Hello," she said, smiling. "I'm truly sorry to interrupt. May I ask what you were doing in our territory?"

"Tenshi!" he exclaimed, obnoxiously. "All that work to find you, and we just had to wait for you to show up? Arcades are a no man land, by the way. Everybody knows that."

With clear intent, Chuuya took a single step forward, cracking the ground open all the way to the woman's feet. The hems of her skirt shone a pale crimson; stone-hard eyes on, he asked: "Are you going to let him go, or are you going to learn how to crawl with concrete shards in your bones?"

Her smile stuttered.

"Not to butt in," Dazai said. "But I would very much enjoy being shot in the head, if you wanted to join, Tenshi."

Chuuya's eyes darted to him. "Are you fucking stupid?"

"If she wants her revenge, I'm not going to —"

"You've got jam where your brain should be —"

"Revenge ," the woman interjected. She had a wristwatch over her left hand; the crystal was cracked, blindingly reflecting light into his eye. " Tenshi . You boys are speaking strange words."

He paused, daring to sneak a glance her way. The picture of gentleness had been painted on her face, honest to the last bone in her grip around his coat. She was beautiful; still as ageless as she had seemed that day, as he spied from the bridge. "I'm assuming you're here for vindication."

"Vindication?"

"Only fair; my Boss would say. I can still hear your pretty bones cracking at night," Dazai reminded her, softly. "I'm not a good enough person for them to haunt me."

The hesitation stretching out in Chuuya's gaze told him all his position didn't allow him to see in the woman's gaze — her touch was growing cautious.

"Cut the shit out," the redhead grunted, sinking his heel a bit deeper. "You welcomed us with a gun in hand. You know who we are."

"Port Mafia," she confirmed. Her tone lacked the arrogant confidence it had dropped with at the fighting ring; it was nothing like the lulling voice she had used at the Port, though. "You reek of sea salt and blood. You were looking for my hideout."

“We found something of yours, also,” He extracted the silver cross from his pocket, huffing at the viciousness she pushed the gun into his skull with. “Not a gun. I was just trying to be courteous, so you know. I’m assuming you might be missing the extraordinary wonders of mind control.”

Not a word was hissed. Outside the alley she had pushed them in, the first traces of traffic began to appear. In the distance, as it always was — police cars and ambulances.

“The Nine Rings have been waiting for a meeting for more than a week now,” she said, eventually. “An occasion to discuss the... circumstances. I was expecting all but kids. Something more formal. The decapitated head of a friend, and a piece of paper with a location.”

“We haven’t used cut off heads in a decade,” Chuuya replied.

“You’re here to negotiate, aren’t you?”

“I’m here to talk with the woman I tortured,” Dazai corrected. “I know it’s you.”

A shock of sorts went through her body; over the wall of her makeshift veil, in the corner of his gaze, he saw genuine confusion. Something more than approaching the enemy with a gun and receiving no fear; something deeper. You boys speak strange words.

“I know,” he added. “I don’t know if you do, though.”

Carefully, she lowered her revolver.

A back-door rested on the side of the Arcade where they had dumped Mr. Arcade’s body, half hidden behind old fliers and washed-away by the graffiti. It wasn’t a strange sight; the endless mixture of keys and pulls their guide used to open the door, though, denounced either paranoia or secrets a less curious Boss wouldn’t have offered so easily.

Her name, apparently, was Beatrice, and she swore to have never seen them before that day. The led lights of her secret hideout led them down rusty stairs, as she muttered under her breath and switched the safety on and off her gun — all her attention on the silver cross he had offered her.

Walking just far enough in that tight space that their skin wouldn’t come into contact — an ancient, familiar habit they had mastered when the situation required a closeness their Abilities would fall to — Chuuya hissed: “How many personalities does this chick have, anyway?”

“That could be terribly rude, hypothetically.”

“She’s not ill. She’s under the effect of an Ability.”

“Must be hard to understand the whole spectrum of emotions,” Dazai nodded, pitiful, pretending not to get what he meant. Very aware of that fact, the boy seethed. “When you only have one. A very angry one at that.”

Behind another metal door at the end of the stairs, rested a space unlike its upper neighbor. It was a deliberate Western style; deep purple walls, interrupted by heavy curtains that would have fit better on royal windows. Crimson carpets, somewhat sharp under their soaked fits, filled the floor in undetectable order.

Every piece of furniture was the darkest shade of wood, plainly antique and well used. The chandelier dangling from the ceiling painted snowy squares on the walls. Beatrice — studying their observing gazes with something like confusion — led them through a maze of velvet couches, coffee tables covered in tea sets, and tall bookshelves filled to the brim in dusty papers.

A heavy desk, its legs sculpted to resemble growing vines, allowed the woman's body to drop, as she seated on the fairly unfit shop stool behind it. She motioned them to the throne-like seats on the other side.

She studied them some more, silent.

“Did she send you?” Beatrice began, eventually.

They exchanged a glance. “What?” Dazai asked.

“Considering your friend's Ability to snap my neck the moment I allowed you in here, it truly doesn't look like you two came here to threaten me. Or to talk peace,” the woman explained. “So here's my educated guess: you're not here on your Boss' orders. Are you here on hers?”

“Who's her?” Chuuya insisted.

“That's a no, then,” she concluded. She leaned under her desk, stiffening the boy's shoulders — and settled a bottle of wine and three glasses between their faces. “But you haven't talked about the Port Mafia yet, so my theory remains. Wine?”

“We're minors,” the redhead muttered.

Beatrice blinked. “You're —“

“He's a bit broken in the head,” Dazai intervened. “I beg you to forgive him. Hard childhood and all.”

His shoe slammed against the sculpted leg of his seat hard enough to push it back. “Wine tastes like shit, anyway.”

“Oh, not if you learn how it works,” Her smile turned as bright as it had been in the alley, “You see this? This is a Petrus. Calling this darling expensive would be an unforgivable show of impoliteness. If bottles of wine were queens, he would have been beheaded by the revolutionaries.”

“Beautiful metaphor,” he nodded, “As long as you don't drug it like you did with that inhaling dust on your doorframe.”

Eerily slow, her face turned to stone.

Chuuya's head snapped in his direction. "What?"

"I told you about it, keep up," Dazai huffed. "In The Alley? Remember? That drug the Nine Rings are rumored to have come up with? A marvel of black out. Instantaneous reaction and a few hours of guaranteed inactivity from the heaviest goon around. It doesn't need to be regulated on weight, so the costs are much more convenient."

He tilted his head to the side. "Only con, though — You can't use it more than one time in a bunch of days on someone who already took great, great quantities of it. The body grows too used to it."

Understanding colored Chuuya's face the most scarlet of reds — anger, if the smack on his nape meant something; and then begrudging acceptance. "And you couldn't let me know?"

"It was funnier like this. Anyway! I'll forgive your attempt. We don't have time. Say — have you been in Yokohama these last few months?"

Most of her amiability had vanished. She handed them their glasses, more cautious. "I spent the last three weeks in Nagoya, asking an old colleague for help. Becoming head of an organization is not terribly hard; leading it, though, is..."

"Yes," Chuuya muttered.

"It's all been very hectic, since —"

"Since you found the Nine Rings seal?" he guessed. "How does that work, anyway?"

Her eyes flashed. "We have our secrets."

"Isn't it somewhat unfair, though? Having your leader become de facto with a treasure hunt?"

Beatrice shrugged. "There has never been any kind of bloodless power. At the very least, men kill each other with a goal in mind," She lowered her hood, allowing long golden strands to frame her face. "I'm not stupid enough to believe a symbol means divine blessing. That's not what God is about."

"You're religious?" Dazai asked, and the unrelenting desire to jump to his feet and say, you won't guess what my companion here is!, was somehow perceived — Chuuya hit his chair.

"Somewhat," Her eyes fell on the silver cross. She had an accent of sorts; not quite foreign as much as old — the way the prior Boss had talked, in his crimson-stained bed. "Not really. Hard to, in this line of work. Once. But if a powerful syndicate wants to call me their leader because I won this treasure hunt, why should I refuse?"

"I like your attitude," he encouraged, "You sure didn't show it back in our dungeons."

Beatrice squinted, tapping her nails on her glass. "Aren't you two a bit young to threaten a Boss?"

“Old enough to be Port Mafia,” Chuuya replied. He downed a good sip of his own wine, blinking when the taste hit his tongue. “This shit is actually good.”

“We’re not threatening you. Nor do we need any sort of information on your syndicate,” Dazai took over. “We were perfectly able to inflict considerable damage without knowing a thing. What would we even need?”

Her smile tightened. “Arrogance is rarely a wise choice in war.”

“Are we? In war?”

“You brutally murdered my second in command and his wife just two days ago,” she said. In the corner of his gaze, Dazai saw Chuuya stiffen. “Even if I sit here and pretend no one else died — Don’t you kids think it sounds an awful lot like a declaration of war?”

He dangled his legs from the seat. “And you, ripping thirty three of our men’s chests apart — tattooing your own symbol on them? What does that sound like?”

The woman frowned. “We never touched your men.”

“Ah, see,” Dazai smiled. “That’s where you’re wrong. I’m not even counting all the disappearances the entire city has been dealing with. Maybe your supposed visit to Nagoya threw you out of the loop, but the underground is ready to watch us clash.”

“We didn’t touch your men,” Beatrice spelled out. “If you have no reason to trust me, I at least hope you will find a lack of guilt in my words: I am not a fool. Certainly not enough to threaten the widest conglomeration of Ability Users in the city. It would gain me the death of my subordinates.”

“And their respect,” he pointed out.

“And their death,” Chuuya said, a bit too quiet, a bit too pensive. He raised his eyes to her face. “You’re saying you didn’t do it. You just — woke up, one day, and the Port Mafia had declared war on you?”

Helplessly, she nodded.

Dazai’s gaze fell to the silver cross.

Was it as simple as removal? Did taking out the cross release the mental hold? It hardly explained how to nullify the Ability they were sagged with.

“Tenshi — Beatrice,” he asked, “Do you know a man named V?”

A pause.

For a moment, it seemed like the glass slipping from her fingers would not break at all. It did, though — crimson vines spreading through the old wood of her desk, dripping from the edges into their shoes.

Her face was stone. Quicker than a blink, she reached for the abandoned revolver on the floor — but Chuuya was faster, kicking it to the other end of the room.

In a voice thinner than light, she stuttered: “Where did you hear that name?”

“You were with him,” Dazai said, calmly. “The general consensus is that he’s the one who freed you from our dungeons.”

“ Us being the general consensus,” Chuuya added.

“I returned to Yokohama yesterday,” she insisted, lost, “ Where did you hear that name?”

“You —“

“It’s impossible,” Her voice cracked; something just hysterical enough to be laughter. “You don’t get it. It can’t be him, and I wasn’t in your damn dungeons —“

“You were, actually,” he corrected. “And I saw him, so we can rule that lie out as well ,” He tilted his head to the side. “But that doesn’t make sense, does it? Because you killed him yourself.”

Dazai knew what regret looked like.

How easily it stained tailored clothes; how well it hid in the cracks of a building just rebuilt and on the brink of falling apart. Most mafiosi hid it well; just not too well enough.

All of it was a language — the imperceptible spasm that made them pull the trigger too soon; the way their eyes skirted along Dazai’s bandages and then flew away. All of it was a language, and the thing on the woman’s face wasn’t regret. It was something deeper — soul - crushing.

“He’s dead,” Beatrice said, quiet. Was it human, he wondered — was something so filthy truly the key to a beating heart that wouldn’t feel like a job? “I know that.”

“You’re wrong,” He shrugged. “Either that or someone is impersonating him. I don’t know. I don’t really care. But we’re still going to need your help for a matter or two.”

Chuuya nodded to the cross. His shoulders were still stiff, in that careless way of his — prepared to maul, but boldly unworried by the prospective. “You see that little thing? You threw it up in our dungeons.”

“I wasn’t,” she breathed out, stuck between rage and impatience, “In your damn dungeons —“

“You threw it up,” he continued, undeterred, “And then you escaped with the help of someone under the effects of another one of these things. It’s a communication device — powered by an Ability. We assume it can grant some sort of control over its victims’ minds.”

“You told us your name was Tenshi,” Dazai added. “And you went around with this V person, recruiting people to bring to whoever these microchips respond to. Someone you were scared of. You made that very clear.”

Beatrice stared. “You kids think I’m being hypnotized or something?”

He scratched the bandages on his nape. “I suppose that’s one way to see it. Hey, listen — How did you get those bruises?”

Her hands flew to her wrists; a flash of skin peeled behind her sleeves, covering her all the way to her chin. She had been careful about hiding her condition — Dazai, though, knew how someone littered in bruises breathed.

“I got into a fight in Nagoya,” she said, twitching. “I — I can’t remember all the details. I was concussed, so —“

“Dang!” Dazai pointed one finger gun towards her and shot , enhancing a flinch. “I gave you those. All of them. One of our organization’s medical Users took care of the worst of it; we tend to keep prey alive longer. You see, I have this theory — Whoever is on the other side of the crosses views you as his to hurt. Got any ideas? Any past sin to atone?”

“You’re no priest.”

“I’m a sinner,” he replied. “We all are. Isn’t it enough to ask for forgiveness?”

“Call whoever you were supposed to be with,” Chuuya proposed. “In Nagoya. Ask them if you were truly there.” She hesitated. “The name Tenshi confuses you, doesn’t it? The only thing you seem to have in common with this other you is this V.”

“He’s dead,” she insisted, “It can’t be him.”

“We’re dealing with mind control. Who says we’re not be dealing with resurrection, too?”

She kept quiet.

“We have time,” Dazai added. “And wine. And a resistance to poison! It would be the perfect occasion to tell us a story. Or — we can simply leave, if you’re not interested. You can sit here, haunted by your ghostly memories, and wait for the Port Mafia to obliterate your organization.”

He leaned forward . “And make no mistake, Tenshi — You and your people will be destroyed, if our Boss doesn’t get a better explanation for our losses.”

Abandoned on the lake of wine, she clenched her fist.

“But,” Chuuya concluded, slowly, “If the Mafia found out you’re as clueless we are...”

The thought didn’t warrant a culmination. It was there, in the too-complex webs in Beatrice’s eyes — a cunning shade of carefulness.

Ane-san is going to murder us both for this, he considered. Chuuya made a face, as if he had heard.

The woman sat up. “In the name of a truce.”

He smiled. “In the name of a truce,” He dropped back into his seat, clanking his glass with Chuuya’s abandoned — empty — one. “Do make different voices for the various characters! That’s my favorite part.”

Fighting the little hesitation left — the other boy went straight for the bottle, this time, closing his lips around the mouth of it.

“A story it is,” he huffed. “But I want Arcade coins. As soon as this is over, I’m wrecking this asshole at Motor War.”

---

...

---

The one, single unlikelier event than finding the Entrance Hall of the HQs abandoned and empty, was the downfall of a Port Mafia Boss.

“Highly improbable,” Madame Tanaki would say, each time. “But somewhat less rare when you’re around, right?”

Dazai liked few places less than the Five Towers; he knew few places with the same heart-wrenching familiarity. It was all onyx-stained glass and golden-lined couches; the never ending march of brand shoes with blood dried on the soles; the rush of the wall fountains every mafioso would turn their eyes away if they saw him jump inside again.

When it was empty, though — when it was empty it was just a building.

At times, he tasted the idea of being the last to leave. The illusion of that place — just a building, at last — slowly, but inevitably, being abandoned.

He spread his arms on the numbingly-cold floor, blinded by the half hidden chandeliers, and breathed into the secretary desk phone.

“Port Pizza,” he recited, in his highest voice, trying to drown out Tanaki’s soap opera from the closest TV screen. “Where sauce and blood are one and the same. How may I help you?”

“Dazai!”

The clink-clank of her heels on the floor was enough of a telltale — by the time manicured fingers had ripped the phone from his grasp and pulled him from under the desk, Dazai was prepared to the sight of Madame Tanaki's panting — very pregnant — body.

"There's a scumbag on the phone," he informed her, still laying on his back.

"Really, Dazai?" she hissed. Then, speaking into the phone, "No, sir, I — No, yes, certainly — Do say, just let me grab a pen —"

She played a futile game of trying to stick her heels in the meat of his legs, as he changed the TV subtitles' language from the remote. The monotonous lull of her voice turned his eyelids into concrete. If he could have slept, he would have curled under his coat, studied her endless tattoos, and —

Probably not slept, still.

Some eternity later, a warm weight settled next to him, drawing snow angels on tiles. Careful not to touch — as most were smart enough to be. When he studied her face, the silver X of her face was a human, normal thing.

"Honestly, Dazai," she echoed, eyes hungrily following the characters on screen. It was an old episode — she wouldn't have dared continuing Spider Eyes without Dazai and Chuuya both, carefully separated by her frame.

"I'm just trying to widen our horizons," he insisted. "All we have to offer are dusty weapons and old threats. People are bound to get bored, you know?"

Her eyes ran up and down his face. Voices spread too quickly in the Mafia. If he breathed in slowly enough, he could taste the blood from his bitten tongue.

The men were never quite fast enough to drag him away from a gun pointed at his head.

Why today?, she didn't ask. He wouldn't have told her. She was strange; too odd to survive anywhere else, too scarred — and a bit too warm for that place.

"As expected," she said. "Considering our — Policy."

"No wet umbrellas in the Hall?"

"Dazai."

He huffed. "You're no fun."

They watched the soap opera, commenting on old clues they really should have caught on sooner. Tanaki let him put a hand on her belly — though the baby didn't quite kick yet, and it was weird and a bit disgusting, in a somewhat cool way .

She reprimanded his jokes on double suicide, reminding him that no girl would ever fall for his charms with such a sharp blade underneath them. When he proposed she should be that woman, she didn't seem convinced.

“I’m too old for you, anyway,” she tutted.

“You’re as radiant as each of Ace’s jewels,” he replied. “I’ll have to resort to the one thing girls cannot resist to: puppies.”

Tanaki gasped. “You adopted a dog?”

“Haven’t you met him already? Chuuya said he brought you breakfast this morning.”

She reached, as if to slap his arm — with a finery that would have gathered praise, she let her hand fall like it had never happened. “Leave him alone, you — Yes, he did, and maybe you should learn from him —“

It truly didn’t matter — she was warm even from a distance. “He’s just trying to fatten you up.”

“Stop that,” Her lips trembled. “He has done nothing to you.”

“He’s ruined my life. ”

“How?”

He rolled on the floor, miserable. “His existence brings agony upon my fragile, stained mind. If he were a physical consequence to a meteorological phenomenon, I’m prepared to gamble he would be a sun rash. ”

Tanaki curled one eyebrow. “Ever so poetic.”

“This sunrise, ” he insisted, “I even had to drag his minuscule body all the way to his apartment, because the idiot got drunk after his first glass of wine.”

[Few things, he suspected, could have ever been as predictable as Chuuya’s tolerance being that of a child — and yet, for some reason, Dazai hadn’t seen it coming.]

He had watched with genuinely perplexed eyes as the redhead began to spit senseless odes in the middle of Beatrice’s office, floating to the ceiling with mirth and directing pointed insults at his innocent frame.

“First time drinking?” the woman had asked.

“Hopefully the last, too,” he had sighed.

Dragging him out of the Arcade had been a quest — and he would have left him there, if he had been in any hurry to face Kouyou’s rage. He seemed unable to decide whether he wanted to be carried or not; he would spend ten minutes upon Dazai’s shoulders — singing all of Hirose Fumiko’s worst singles right in his ear, and making sure to bite when Dazai would remove his shoes to distract him — and then jump down, rolling in the leftover snow with the glee of a true dog.

At some point — between the third and the seventh street light he smashed, seemingly for no reason at all — Dazai had decided to give up, and drag him by the calves instead.

Chuuya has been fascinated by it all. He had sat in front of an empty Cinema, clawing Dazai's calf to keep him where he was — leaving marks even through his bandages. He had walked up the walls of the building and sat on the neon sign; before Dazai could consider leaving him there, he had begun to loudly announce highly confidential info on every double suicide request Dazai had ever been denied.

He had half expected him to reveal Mafia's plans, along to those whims of his, or some well-kept secret of theirs. The perfect chance to make Mori understand his mistake, and gain a front row seat to his execution. But dogs would be dogs until the very end, and his inebriated mind was as loyal as Dazai had never felt the need to be.

Loyal to the organization, yes. Not to the only other boy his age unlucky enough to be tied to it].

Madame Tanaki was endlessly engrossed in her most beloved soap opera. It was, from the little he had understood in those last seven months, a story of crime, or arranged marriage, or maybe both.

He wasn't particularly interested. If he had been, he would have told her — "Yogi needs to wake up and understand that staying with that living corpse of a man won't do her no good," and then, "How can she afford to follow that self-centered crime lord like a dog, when her mother can barely make ends meet and her father is on the brink of a heart attack?" And also, "Doesn't she understand priorities? Doesn't she?"

"People can have different priorities," Tanaki replied, because he had been mumbling, apparently. "Is love such a low one? Freedom, revenge — They're all feelings. We all die for something. We are all moved by something."

I know, he thought, but what do we live for?

"What are you moved from?"

Her fingers drummed on her belly. "A better future."

"How optimistic."

"It's not optimism, if I bleed for it," She nudged his shoulder. "One day, I will be deemed too rusty to sit at this desk. I will move to Europe, and spend the rest of my life atoning for my efforts to reach that peace."

Dazai curled an eyebrow. "What, you want to join a monastery?"

"I'm too old for religion," Tanaki scoffed. "No — There are more useful ways to apologize to the world."

"Guilt is pointless."

“So is bleeding,” she replied. “Will you come to my funeral, once I’ve lived a fulfilling life?”

“I’ll sit on first row just for you.”

“Maybe I’ll — I’ll buy a house on some coast,” Tanaki mused, sweet and longing, eyes on some blurred spot on the ceiling. “Clean trash off the beaches.”

“Dear god,” he sighed, “An environmentalist!”

She nudged him again. “And you?”

“I’m unmoved.”

She gave him that gaze. “No one is.”

He hummed. Like he didn’t know the answer, he wondered: “Do you think Chuuya is moved by grief, or the absence of it?”

It was mean. Her gaze told him so; but it wasn’t out of place, in those haunted halls and glimmering stained glass — and her distant eyes told him so, too.

“Leave Chuuya alone, Dazai,” Tanaki said.

An old sentence, and an even older judgement. Leave Chuuya alone. Leave Chuuya alone. Have Chuuya help you; help Chuuya in all ways; stand next to him — but do leave him alone.

Mori’s voice or his own. Irrelevant.

Irrelevant and there.

“That would be an unseen predicament,” His smile was tactile. “I trust your ability to convince him, Tanaki, how about that?”

---

...

---

[He returned after lunch, surrounded by black cars and old guards, as entertained with the air itself as he always was.]

There was no flesh in his expression; no wrinkles to give credibility to his affectionate grin, as he studied Dazai's frame. And yet — he knew there was something. It clung to his spine like ivy, drew shadows on the walls of his skull and container. It might have been carefulness. It might have been terror. Sometimes, it was even the absence of loneliness.

"Boss," Dazai said, obviously, unneeded, "You're back."

"Fortunately, yes," Mori confirmed. Same as he had always been. No dirt under his nails; a surgeon until the last day. "I must say, Tokyo was truly starting to bore me."

"The hotels weren't to your tastes?"

He tilted his head. "Elise didn't like the bathroom much. Not enough space for her dolls to bathe with her."

"That won't do."

"No," he agreed. "It won't."

Perhaps, he was just happy to see him.

He dragged him to his office, to check his vitals and throw his pills — throat ache, this time; and muscle relaxants — in the trash. He didn't ask how long it had been since he had last washed, or remembered to eat; he ruffled his hair and dragged him to the thermal baths, whining about complications Dazai would resolve.

Empty and quiet; the marble floors interrupting the pools were the same gray of the snowy sky that refused to leave Yokohama. Behind the floor-to-ceiling windows, the city was nothing but towers of dust, and one spinning wheel.

He yawned, bored. "Baths make me sleepy."

The curve of Mori's lips was gentle, — familiar; tombstone and cradle, clinic and altar. "Nothing makes you sleepy, Dazai."

He stumbled to the furthest pool of the room, waiting — to talk about Q, to talk about the Nine Rings, to talk about police officers and you know you ought to be smarter. Mori's steps weren't late; he had nothing to hide, and Dazai wasn't allowed to hide anything.

Undressing himself was always a lengthy affair. There was the coat, there was the suit, there was the tie, there were the bandages, there was the soul wrenching disgust devouring the hole in his chest, until the edges spread further and further, ingesting the universe itself — the revulsion painting invisible dotted lines all over his skull, cursing his accidental meetings with his reflection, cursing the blue veins he could count, running down his skin and imagining the blood running inside them. Alive, alive, alive.

This is my nose, he thought, staring right into the waveless water, as he removed his underwear. Nose, hand, eye, mouth. She had sung him a song about it, once. Dazai didn't even have the vocal chords to scream.

He removed his bandages last, laying them in careless knots next to the clothes Mori would come and fold tidily soon enough. His hair felt filthy — he pulled the bandages down his face, felt their texture against every inch of his face. The pulsing attacked his skull almost immediately as he blinked, trying to adjust to a world that was as tilted and off balance as usual — just more naked.

It will ruin your depth perception, Kouyou had told him, once. You'll end up with Hirotsu's monocle, demon child.

It had been a surprisingly non antagonistic remark. He remembered asking himself what the need to speak of the obvious was.

I have no need for two eyes, Ane-san, he'd told her, one is enough of a bother.

He dropped into the water with the broadest splash he was able to conjure, and he closed his eyes. He hoped it dirtied the floors. He hoped he could not see his reflection on them anymore.

"You need to take better care of yourself," Mori told him when he remerged, busy folding his tie.

He considered: "Do you habitually clean the house you mean to sell?"

His gaze didn't touch him. Nose, lips, hand. The blue under his eyes matched the Yokohama skyline. Modesty was a see through costume; an umbrella he'd long since left on the sidewalk. Eyes were eyes and flesh was flesh; he was more annoyed by Mori's insistent, leftover doctors instincts, the ones that made him carve X-Ray lines down his chest.

You won't find anything, he promised.

Like he had read it somewhere, but had never wasted sweat on it, the man concluded: "It's a matter of politeness. We offer respect to others, so that we have a right to demand it for ourselves."

"That settles it, then," Blowing off his wet hair didn't work, so he pushed them back with his fingers, making sure their trembling outlines wouldn't be noticed. The end was close and Mori was closer. "I owe nothing to the rats that will devour me."

Mori hummed. He ran pale hands down Dazai's dress shirt. He had old hands, too old for his age, though he loathed to be told: the veins on his palms flexed at the barest movement; the grooves on the fingers that had held a scalpel and the city for too long were deep.

"I wouldn't leave your body to the beasts," the ex-doctor reassured him. "That is a traitor's fate."

"How do you know I'm not a traitor?"

"People like us have no time for it."

Dazai hummed.

“You would have a wonderful funeral,” Mori insisted. “Port Mafia style.”

“Flesh to the ashes and heart to the sea?”

“Maybe,” he said. Smiled. “Or maybe Elise will ask for your body as a doll.”

“Maybe you’ll be long dead, by then.”

“Dazai,” he promised. No blood spilled to seal the pact, but there was no need, with the honesty dripping from his lips like drool. Mori Ougai was no benefactor. “I am not leaving your body to the rats.”

“It’s my body,” Dazai lied. He remembered reading: my debris belongs to the wind. “You can’t have it.”

The next time he went underwater, he sank his nails in his wrists and refused to swim up.

He started thinking. Thinking was necessary, he thought. Especially with Mori. He liked thinking with Mori. He wasn’t a match, but he listened. He wasn’t a match, but he never stopped to ask how much blood his ideas would involve.

He couldn’t see the city, but he could feel it, each dot on the glass like a stain on his bones — his vision blurred, just paint on a canvas, blue and yellow and black, Mafia black — Alright.

Hands grasped the underskin of his arms, pulling him up. He fought against them — fought until he could see red serpents curl in the blue after leaving the cage of that organism that had claimed him; — harder than reality had around Chuuya’s fractured hands and shattered mind, Corruption and —

The liquified roof broke without a sound.

Mori’s arms were tight around him as he swam to the land, his hands grasping at his neck, his side, his chest. His traitorous lungs sang a psalm to the divine air. It was a familiar thing, he thought, and yet so tiring, when his carcass didn’t accept his prayers. Would you listen, he thought, would you listen if I didn’t hate you?

“Not yet,” Mori said. Dazai could hear his heartbeat against his back. It was slower than the waves, and he hated it, hated it, hated it. “Not yet, Dazai,” he insisted, Dazai, and never anything else, never anything at all. Whose grave did you steal it from?

“Oh, I know,” He laughed his heart out, watching it echo against the oil-painted city on the windows. Every fit ripped the flesh inside his throat apart, old, old wallpaper making room to humidity stains. “I know, I know, I know.” ]

---

Their first stop was a local Church.

“How come you didn’t bring Sama along?” Dazai wondered, waiting for Mori to climb up the stone stairs to the doors. “She’s not one to let you wonder at night by yourself.”

“You know, you have a tendency to speak of the head of my guards as if she’s some sort of nanny,” the man replied, easily untouched. “She’s a devoted mafioso. She understands the precarious position I’m in.”

“Doesn’t that make her sort of a nanny?”

“She’s a very capable woman.”

“Remember that time she put me in a headlock because I tried to offer you tea she hadn’t checked?”

Mori’s hum was amused. It hadn’t been, back then — not so outwardly; lest he let his people believe Dazai could be touched. “Now, don’t be mean. She did take you to that rope shop you like afterwards.”

“Hangman’s knots,” Dazai sighed. “Still. It’s so aggravating.”

“What is?”

He pulled the heavy doors open, listening to the screech of metal with glee. “Whenever you happen to like people.”

Senator Masaaki was waiting for them amongst the pews, lips puckered in prayer. In a tone that was meant to sound dismissive, Mori told him to go play — so Dazai did, lighting electric candles with no wishes in mind and falling on the keys of the organ, startling the Senator out of his shoes.

Mori rarely met up with the pusillanimous — he rarely met up with outsiders, in general. Most of the underworld assumed the Boss wouldn’t have been as dauntless as to name their cover up after himself; thus, most outsiders and low-ranked insiders agreed he was the least probable option for head of the syndicate.

Hiding in plain sight, he had explained, pulling Dazai’s ear, the way he did when he could feel he was about to lie to him. How is it my fault if they think me so modest?

He settled on the altar, legs crossed, knocking some silver cup off. They landed on the marble floor with resounding importance, drawing hesitation in the Senator’s tone.

He wondered what he thought of Mori. Of his smile, his gloved hands, the creepy kid he dragged around by the nape — the eerie child cursed to eternal eavesdropping to whispers that kept Yokohama on its feet, who had stolen a doctor's wallet.

Sharp lines cut the stained glass wall in front of him, offering biblical stories to the illiterate — how courteous, she would have said, in that gently mean way of hers, how courteous, they're trying to help you out. The Senator had been elected only a few weeks ago; had boasted about justice to wide-eyed fools carrying their wrinkled hands through the motions.

A snowdrop landed on a Madonna's cheek; it slipped down, slow and unassuming. Blinking curious eyes at him was a cat, its fur littered in the shards of color from the windows behind him.

It meowed, low. Dazai meowed back.

“—low profile,” the Senator was insisting. “A quarter of the opposition is conducting investigations — You must be aware our support — however faithful — is an open secret.”

“And that is an issue,” Mori drawled, likable until his last smile, “For us, or for you?”

“It's — Half a government cannot be swayed so —“

“Your predecessor managed it flawlessly. I trust in your abilities. Leaving my people's fate in a simple man's hands — You surely understand the effort such a show of trust demands, do you not?”

“Sir, I do — My gratefulness is — Being chosen is —“

“It would do your half of a government good,” Mori did not let him finish, “To remember who allowed them to gain any sort of grip over Abilities. That is how your predecessor put it, at the very least. A Permit truly isn't much of a bother. Your Special Division would be just another underground group, had the Maihime Project not —“

The Senator choked.

Sitting in the alcove of a statue, head on the stone leg of Judas, Dazai sorted his way through his stolen wallet. Kouyou was never seen handling money, and her secret funds were a mythical tale — Mori had kept all his money in a jar, near the butterflies.

He pocketed the bills — but only the ones whose faces did not look at him weird ; he downed the sugar packet from one of the pockets, mixing it with leftover Paracetamol.

“That's Kiko-chan, ” Elise explained, out of nowhere. She elbowed and whined, never reprimanded by the hand that had made her — until she settled comfortably on his lap, her marble cheek against his own. “She was the first.”

“First,” he repeated.

“Of his,” she confirmed. The back of her shoes made a sharp sound whenever they hit the base of the alcove. “I think that dumb Rintarou misses her a lot.”

Short hair, challenging gaze. An apron of sorts, dried blood staining it all the way to the collar. “Don’t be silly. Mori doesn’t miss people. If he let her go, he didn’t want her.”

“It was quieter, when she was around,” Fake as the very air they breathed, Elise had not quite mastered the art of being nostalgic. Mori would have seen no need for it. She did not particularly like him, either; because Mori had found the concept hilarious. “I was quieter. He talked to me less.”

“You must have been jealous.”

She knocked her head against his; settled one of her markless hands on his open palm, strangely unreal to the touch — the touch of insides, when they tumbled out of a body.

There was a time, he recalled, when she would settle next to him on his bed, waiting for him to fall asleep. You look weird, she would only say. Mori had found it entertaining. Dazai had shoo -ed her away by the morning.

“Of myself?” she asked. “Only if he disliked it.”

“Dazai?” Mori called.

Wordlessly polite, he skipped his way to the pale face of the senator, offering him a photograph from his coat pocket.

Half an hour later they were in a car, Elise diligently conquering every inch of his tortured hands with colorful bandaids. Her tales never ended: Kouyou refused to buy her a matching umbrella; Chuuya had taken her shopping, carrying her bags with his funny Ability, and, when are you going to take me shopping?

“When I feel like holding your hand,” he told her, and she scoffed. “You only hold it for the pictures,” she lamented.

Mori smiled, ruffling her hair. “We will take another picture soon, then,” he promised her, offering an exasperated wink to Dazai.

You made her like this, he considered saying, but his tongue was too lazy in his mouth. You made her like this. You don’t have the right to look away.

The car driver was silent; they always were. Darkened window and pricey wheels. In the Church, he bet the Senator was still praying, holding the bloodied picture of his family in a fist. Dazai was seldom bored enough to be mean. He settled his temple against the car window; let Elise cover him in bandaids and wished he could snap her throat.

“Come on,” Mori’s hand landed somewhere between his shoulder blades. “Remember to be polite.”

“Military bases are the epitome of corruption,” he replied, as the gates screeched open, just to move his mouth.

“Ah,” His chin nodded to this or that guard, always fitting in all places he haunted. Dazai only knew whispers from his days in the Great War. “The military has been nice enough to promise they will allow Q to stay with them, once we get them back.”

Oh, Dazai thought.

Elise hid under the back of his coat, giggling. He let her play, taking weird turns and speeding up when she least expected it. When their guide abandoned them in front of a metal door, she showed her tongue to his retreating back.

“Now, Elise,” Mori studied the locks put in place. The door was at the end of a corridor; the only one in the entire aisle. Dazai wondered if Q would cry, when they dragged them. “No need to be mean.”

Still chuckling, she hid. Dazai asked: “This is your idea of safe reclusion, then?”

“Do you like it?”

The walls had to be thicker than even his skull. Mori was an expert on military bases. “It is what you proposed from the start.”

The man hummed. From the bars-closed windows on the higher line of the walls, the Church cat blinked. He made sure to nod his greetings. “If I remember correctly, your idea had been to throw them into the nearest basement and blow it up.”

“Certainly,” Dazai shrugged. “Some pawns aren’t worth the hustle. This whole disappearing mess only proved it further.”

“I thought you liked them,” He faked surprise; it made Elise giggle harder. “An adorable little wild beast.”

“That’s why I was so adamant.”

“You will have many occasions to visit them,” With torture tools, Dazai imagined. “But I will limitate contact. It’s clear companionship isn’t what they’re searching for.”

Did you ever want them to search for it? , he thought about saying. Or, would you let them have it? Irrelevancy wasn’t worthy of the former doctor’s attention, though. “I still think you should just let me kill them.”

“They like you a lot, you know?” Mori mused. “I think it might be those bandages they insisted on adorning their doll with.”

“Q doesn’t have much of a style sense,” Elise agreed. “And they aren’t very smart. They could hide some toys under the bandages.”

“First time my fashion choices have landed me such popularity,” Dazai sighed, last in line. “Do you care about the massacre they committed? The ones to come?”

He blinked. “I’m looking for them, am I not?”

“You sure played the distraught part at the Institute’s funeral.”

“And you didn’t show up,” Mori curled an eyebrow. “I expect some more respect from an Executive candidate.”

“And I expect a more stubborn sense of justice from a Boss.”

“If you’re truly trying to push me to punish them, you should know I would stop before killing them.”

Same with you.

His shoulders relaxed into something pettier. “And you wonder why Q likes me better than you.”

It was a complicated thing, he knew — giving rules to a boy who had never broken a single one. No rules, then; just consequences.

Mori just liked the dramatics of it all. Of his invisible crown and his blood red scarf and of a fifteen years old right hand man who he refused to let die. Of Elise being all he most detested in a little girl — and of leaving his wallet in his hands when he didn’t want to reminisce to his face.

“Mori,” Dazai wondered, “Do you even like Yokohama?”

His grin was as honest as it went. “I adore it.”

He thought about the girl in the photograph, the eyes they shared and the blood they had bled on a doctor’s coat — and he hated her, viciously, for a single moment, an uncharacteristic inhale, for not being the fourth in their heartbeat line — the focus of Mori’s gaze and plans and endless lifetimes, and all the things Dazai was too bored to refuse.

“Is that why you forbid this city from falling?”

“You already know the answer.”

“I do,” he confirmed. “Chuuya understands, too — But he’s been acting all weird since he lost those little friends of his.”

A severe glance was thrown his way. Elise had disappeared; only the shadow of her cold skin remained against his pants, like wet patches of new blood. Like he had heard it was good etiquette from warmer bodies — like he knew it got men’s eyes shiny and men’s hands tighter around the rifles he had put there — he reprimanded: “Mourning should be respected, Dazai.”

“Yes, Mori.”

“And?”

He kicked the door. Most things he touched would rot, at some point — maybe the opposite. “If you don’t want that balance to be disrupted, why do you collect monsters?”

Mori twinned his fingers. How did they all look in his mind? A nice little museum, every piece embalmed behind its rightful glass cage, cursed with containment and never ending scrutinization. A rusty hospital morgue, every temporary grave holding their frozen bodies. “The balance can’t last forever.”

“Why not?”

“Because it can’t,” he insisted. “Peace is an interlude, not a play. I’m satisfied with making it last as long as possible, but the inevitable is, per definition — unavoidable. Even the conflict that will come is a form of balance. My teacher knew it as well, when he laid the city in mine and Fukuzawa’s hands.”

“Because he’s good and you’re bad?” he mocked.

“We both know oversimplification is rarely correct.”

“Recently,” Dazai replied, twirling until his back landed on the shut door, “I have been considering simpler thoughts. We could sit here, draw circle after circle and talk philosophy all night, but — what’s the point? Existence is factual. It lies on the mouths of the people. You, Mori Ougai,” he lied, “Are a bad guy.”

The doctor hummed. “Probably.”

“You sent the organization to destroy the Nine Rings, even if you know they aren’t responsible. How is that balance?”

“What’s your theory, then?”

“My theory?”

“What am I doing?” he explained. Familiar: the two of them on two opposite sides of the room, offering problems and solutions. “You believe this whole situation is more complicated than it looks, and that I am purposefully ignoring that fact. Why?”

Lazily, he raised one hand and showed some fingers. “Four reasons. I’m not going to tell them to you, of course.”

“And what do you think about them?”

“Boring,” he sighed. “But I will play your game, if it somehow feeds into your ego. I am but your dutiful servant. Executive position is to be earned, correct? And now I have competition. Plus, I have to pass the time, somehow, until —“

Something in Mori’s tone grew sharper. “Until you find the right way to die?”

[He had been fourteen, he thought, and the doctor always insisted on leaving his bed to him. A matter of hospitality, if their rat cage could he called a home. His old bones could withstand the floor; he had been militarily trained to. Dazai was too delicate. The bed put him face to face with every jar on his desk — every syringe and every corner, every promise and order.

That was why he slept on his back: the restraints wouldn't let him move.]

“Don’t make me out to be picky,” Dazai said. “It’s my fifty second problematic trait. Not by far the most urgent.”

“You’ve never been impulsive.”

“You’d never let me.”

“No,” he admitted. “But I did make you a promise.”

“And I’m holding you accountable for it. I can’t say I’m sure of how much blood is worth my weight in gold, but I will get there, someday,” He knocked his head back against the door.

“And then, I will be just useless enough to be disposed of.”

“This show of faith is interesting.”

“Faith,” He thought of the dirty stained glass of the Church. Q, running around the city. “It’s not faith. Despicable as it is, you are a smart man.”

“You flatter me.”

“It’s either my death or yours,” he replied. The moon filtering through blinded him, when opened his eyes. With heavy limbs, he raised a finger gun to Mori’s face. “And only one of us will bleed for it.”

“You’re not afraid of death,” Mori agreed, like the weather would change soon. “But you’re afraid of pain, aren’t you? No other reason to kneel at the feet of an anesthetist.”

Dazai waited. Waited for a remark that came as a muffled warning. Stand straighter. We’re in public. Youth is intolerable, and growing is a sin.

“Promises are promises,” the man concluded, at last. He turned around; made his way down the corridor expecting to be followed, and he did. “I will give you a prediction.”

He skipped lines, jumping on every fourth square of tile. “Lay it on me.”

“Something will kill you, one day,” Certainty stained the little of him he could see through the darkness. There’s snow outside. There are people in the room. You will not survive the winter, once I find where it’s hiding. “And that day, you will be the one fighting nails and teeth.”

“That sounds good,” Dazai wondered if it was too late to ask any Senators to pray for him, as well — if the girl caged in his wallet, cursed to never be forgotten by the doctor’s fingertips, would do it, too. “That is a show of faith.”

“Faith?”

“Yes,” Mori’s hand landed somewhere between his shoulder blades. In the corner of his gaze, some guard in uniform bowed. “For the frightened.”

Chapter End Notes

dazai: damn bitch you live like this chuuya: bitch you live the same way and here we introduce matsuda! he’s a very interesting character (to me) that we will be seeing more of in the future. actually, that whole scene of dazai and chuuya being caught by him was one of the first scenes i’ve ever come up with for this fic!

i have stuff to say about this chapter, but at the time im posting this, actual hell is going on at my university, which means it will have to wait for next chapter. until then, i hope you stay warm and take care, and take you so much for reading!!

LOOK

Chapter Summary

Chuuya's apartment was empty.

Better, more intricate words would have failed at an accurate portrait; meticulously-kept, perhaps — though it made one wonder how the person whose phone was cracked on all sides and barely alive enough to turn on could manage it.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter v.

---

Case number: 28738389

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. spontaneously committed the following insubordinations: property damage, [...]*

---

(Back then, Beatrice said, he wasn't looking for friends. He was looking for a match).

---

...

---

Attached to the frescoed wall of the training room of Kouyou's villa, were more than a hundred post-its in various shades of pink — each one of them bearing the name of martial arts style.

Most of them had a little tick scribbled next to it, plus some shaky-handwriting commentary — things like, fuk yeh I did, and higher grade doesnt count, and, weird name cool. Kouyou's masterful calligraphy added some ruthless, elegant criticism on the tickless ones — maybe, for example, if he stops stomping around like an elephant.

“Kid, get out of the way!”

Dazai didn't move an inch as a piece of scaffolding came falling, cutting the air through the repair structures embracing an entire side of the villa. It landed on the grass of the artificial-rivers and blooming-trees' framed garden, mere inches from his frame, raising an aggravating amount of dust.

He sighed. “Damn it.”

“I would rather you took your attempts somewhere else, if you may,” the owner's voice spoke up, at his shoulders. “Mori might just make a fuss if he believes I'm aiding his pet demon.”

“Good afternoon, Ane-san. As splendid as a wilted flower,” he greeted, throwing an offhand glance behind his shoulder to her unmistakable cherry blossom silhouette. His eyes fell on the white stain growling at her side; with professional distaste, he added: “Hikari. You look awful as ever.”

The Executive’s dog — a beast in a sparkly pink collar whose race he had never bothered learning, apart from, pointy teeth and pointy ears and stupid face and is definitely taller than me when it stands — bared its teeth at him, drool landing on the cobblestones.

The disgusting thing hated him, of course — it always had; though the question remained of whether that time he had found him trying out its dog food was to blame, or the general hatred all dogs felt for him was.

“I would compliment your renovations, but from what I can see, you’ve simply moved on from Japanese and rich to more Japanese and richer,” he added, dragging hungry eyes back to the building scaffolds. The workers were all very careful — but if he could just manage to get hit clearly enough to the head, it really should have not hurt —

“I appreciate the input,” Kouyou commented, moving to stand next to him. The shade of her umbrella didn’t touch him, pointedly.

“Mori wants you to move to the center of the city, you know?”

“He can try,” She smiled.

“Careful. They already love to drag your name along to that of revolution,” Under the porch, a small group of women in kimonos were discussing the sky — and probably something heavier, too. There was blood on the tips of their nails; one of them held a burned strand of hair. “Did you do it, when he died?”

Kouyou’s eyelashes fluttered, imperceptibly. It was strangely flawless, the way she understood — her eyes didn’t even bother to follow his scrutiny. Perhaps, Dazai mused, peering over a microscope that wasn’t there, those who couldn’t forget simply came to expect the reminder.

“Quite,” One of her hands reached up; pale skin against pale skin, she pulled a burnt strand from the base of her chignon — leaving it to shatter her picture perfect watercolors, disrespectfully unignorable against her knuckles. “I renew it every year.”

“Seems a lot of effort.”

“You think so?”

“Tanaki does it too,” Dazai recalled. “For one of her sisters. But she waits for it to regrow, before she does it.”

“What’s the fair length?” Kouyou questioned — not quite in the tone Mori used to teach a lesson; not quite in her usual own, either. “How do you decide when, exactly, you’re too close to not honoring it? To forgetting?”

Hikari drooled near his shoes. Its eyes followed a flying bird, unbridled in their unsatisfiable hunger; Dazai felt wings he didn't have ache. "Probably when it starts itching, I suppose."

She hummed; fixed the hair back in place.

He showed his tongue to the still-growling mutt on her other side, eye falling on the weight in her unoccupied hand. "Is that a Christian bible? What's with the newfound faith?"

"I'm researching the Nine Rings," the Executive replied. "From what I recall, they loved their lore. It might give me a clue on their Boss' prized artifact. Demon child, you are aware you're no longer welcome across these gates after you tried to hang yourself in front of my maids —"

"Found it in Q's room?" he guessed.

She paused. "How did you know?"

"Smells of Under Port," Hikari settled his muzzle near its shoes, and he mimicked a kick. "And no one else in our inner circle cares about God. Say, where's the dog?"

Her smile was only slightly sweeter than her mutt's. "You better be talking about Hikari."

"No, no," Dazai assured. A piece of drywall landed mere steps in front of him; he frowned at the workers. "I'm talking about my dog, not yours. I have business with him."

"Yes, you rather seem to, lately," He did not meet her searching gaze. "Everybody is raising eyebrows about it. Don't tell me devils get lonely."

"Not at all," He offered her his brightest smile, leaning down to tie his shoes — only to sink his hand in the closest artificial river and spray freezing water into Hikari's unfriendly face. "Just bored. See you in the training Pavillion!"

He managed to reach the already-repaired side of the villa with little complications, which disproved Chuuya's promises that the woman had made it so that her gates would electrify him on impact. He made sure to kiss every maid and subordinate's hand he came across; stole a water bottle from the kitchens and emptied it out on Hikari's doghouse — and when he reached the Pavillion's doors, he barely had time to blink before a red stain flew by.

Chuuya crashed against Golden Demon with ease; their intertwining luminescent limbs painted the frescoed walls covered in post-its he had been spying through the windows in a thousand colors. The Ability could not, technically, ever get tired of the slash and pull of the fight; neither could Chuuya, usually.

"He still hasn't thrown those calligraphy homework in your face?" Dazai commented, eyes on the bundle of papers on a slightly less bloodied corner of the room.

"Not yet," Kouyoy offered, appearing behind him — Hikari, blessedly, nowhere to be found. Perhaps she thought two guard dogs were too much of a hassle. "Though he insists they are unnecessary."

“Because it is, ” came the annoyed remark, from the thunderstorm of kicks and blades in the middle of the room. Chuuya didn’t even spare them a glance, as he insisted: “I know how to write and read. That’s all I wanted.”

The Executive’s sigh could have rattled the entire building. “Decent calligraphy is not good calligraphy. And there is no true point in a mediocre existence, is there? You have no care for beauty?”

“Beauty won’t keep anyone alive,” Chuuya floated himself up to stare the Ability down; his burned eye seemed to glisten. “And I know better ways to handle my time.”

“Here’s an incentive,” the Executive announced, with all her sharp, un-clawed teasing. “The demon child is going to tease you to the ends of the earth if your handwriting does not evolve into something less... cavemanly.”

“It’s true, I will,” Dazai intervened. “Hi, Slug!”

The remark landed Chuuya’s feet on an already wrecked part of the pavement, raising a cloud of dust as he escaped Golden Demon’s mows. He met Dazai’s eyes and cheerful wave like they were to blame for the sound. “What the fuck did you just say?”

His rant began, somewhere in the corner of his attention. Dazai studied the open book in the Executive’s hands, squinting to find a title amongst the thin lines of scriptures. Bless those who persecute you, it read. Bless and do not curse. Do not take revenge, but leave room for God’s wrath — for it is written —

Kouyou’s nails were manicured over scarred skin. She had been sporting a distant gaze ever since the conflict had been declared; her eyes only seemed to sharpen when they settled on the blood staining Chuuya’s gloves.

It is mine to avenge; I will repay.

“— and he asked me what the capital of Paris was, the other day!” Chuuya was spluttering, still, effortlessly capable and relentless in the chase the demon Ability would not allow him to interrupt. “Are you guys sure he hasn’t fooled you into the whole prodigy thing?”

“Beep, ” Dazai said, “Boop. ”

A well-aimed kick stuck Golden Demon into the wall.

Another sigh. Kouyou leaned on the doorframe. “Imagine the wonders he would accomplish if all that hateful effort was put into his homework.”

“Would you mind not calling them —“

She glanced in Dazai’s direction. “How come the two of you stopped training together, anyway?”

“Assface can’t keep up with me — hey!”

“Nothing to do with the destroyed corner of the training grounds they’re still rebuilding, then?” the woman chirped, right as Golden Demon dragged her disciple by a hole in his dress shirt. Karma, Dazai let himself nod. He could very well keep up. A bit too well, if the reparation prices said anything. “What did we say about that little rage of yours?”

“A ridiculous thing —“

“Which is? ”

Chuuya seethed. Eventually, curled up on a corner of the roof, glaring daggers at Dazai, specifically, he muttered: “Contempt is a veil on the eyes. A conflict is won by those whose emotions are of aid, not contrast. Yadda yadda. ”

Kouyou smiled, just shy of patronizing. Clearly, in her quest to get her hand near Chuuya’s muzzle and not have him bite, she had learned some tricks. “See? You learn fast. You shall get the hang of this, too. God knows if it wouldn’t give your Doc’s soul some rest. He spent so long trying to get you to —”

Very pointedly, very apathetically, the boy changed the subject with a: “Why doesn’t the Mackerel have to —”

“I’m not hers,” Dazai intervened, helpfully. “Nor have I ever been dragged to watch ballet on the weekends to work on my elephant steps. Is that fun, by the way?”

The adversaries met in the middle, once again — as Kouyou sighed, long-suffering and delicate, tracing kanjis on the floor with the tip of her umbrella. All she did was endlessly theatrical, only in all ways Dazai’s obnoxiousness wasn’t — where he was exorbitant, she was plastic old money, waiting for an invisible audience to marvel at the standard she was.

And Chuuya was hers, despite his mistrust and the skeptical glances he still threw her way. Not audience and not enemy; a part of the play she never went anywhere without.

“You’re not going to turn him into a mini-me, ” Dazai informed her, to be nice. “He lacks your lack of care. He’s too rough at the edges.”

“He’s not much of a Mafioso,” Kouyou admitted. She raised a hand to quieten her Ability down. “Cursed by the streets. And those Flags’ of his’ clique behavior. But it truly does not matter. He will learn. Everybody does.”

A saying around the Port Mafia went: If the wind kills you, it was Kouyou’s people.

There was no real place for refinement in the Mafia, but her technique did contribute to the secrecy factor. Boss was too amused by her infallible tendency to turn stone into crystal.

The man had called Chuuya a diamond, once; crystal seemed easier; but his roots were rocks and whatever a boy from Suribachi could afford to steal. A star falling as loudly and inconveniencing as something not quite awake could be.

“You’ve been saying that shit for months now,” Chuuya huffed, some minutes later, making his way to them. The glint of Tainted was mild; but Dazai could see he was using it to keep himself upright. “Calligraphy or fighting or demeanor. Whatever it is. Your demon has yet to land a serious hit on me. Can’t we just leave it at that?”

“You’re really a dog in the soul,” Dazai sighed, in the middle of entertaining himself by ripping every page of the Bible he had stolen. He hoped Q wouldn’t be too mad, upon return. “All you care about is playing catch.”

Chuuya’s hand flashed in front of his face, slapping his forehead.

He stepped on his feet.

“You’re already lethal, little god,” Kouyou exclaimed, louder than their ruffle, settling between the two of them. “I’m simply going to make your work easier.”

A huff. “My work is plenty easy.”

“You want to know when you can say you have won?” She wiped a scratch on his chin with the sleeve of her kimono, settling a knuckle under his chin, pushing his head up.

Dazai raised his hand. “When Mori doesn’t make you babysit Elise?”

She didn’t even bother to look down at him. “When there is no blood on your hands.”

Chuuya rolled his eyes, pushing her hand away with excruciating — unaware, clearly — gentleness. “Yes, Ane-san,” he huffed. Much like hers, his edges lacked sharpness; only, Kouyou was gentle for the sake of tightening her hypnotic affections around him, and Chuuya was gentle because. “That seems like it will work just fine in the Port Mafia.”

“Oh, I’m sure you will find a way. And stop calling me that.”

An awkward silence seemed to settle — something shattered between the Executive and the boy’s point of contact, and Dazai’s unimpressed stare. He cleared his throat, eventually, waving the book to make sure they would both be watching as he threw it out of the window — right into a scaffold.

“Oops,” he said, eyes wide. “I slipped. What a shame. Hatrack, we have business to —”

“Come on, then, Chuuya,” Kouyou borderline shouted, spinning the boy around and leading him to where Golden Demon was floating in the middle of the room. “Your string of victories today has been impressive, but I’m sure you can do something more.”

“Ah,” Chuuya cleared his voice, directing him a pointed glance over her shoulder. “Ane-san, we do have to —”

“Those post-its of yours will certainly not fill themselves up on their own. Didn’t you say you wanted to master, ah — Every single kicking ass technique? ” Her smile was untouchable. “I will see you, demon child. Bring my best regards to Mori, yes?”

That something in her eyes, distant and shuddering, peeked again. “The Nine Rings need all of our efforts to be ended, do they not?”

---

...

---

[As he spied his way around the villa, unwilling to be found just yet — climbing over the maple trees to spy into the windows — he had heard a sweat-covered Chuuya mutter, in a tone so awkward Dazai had felt his bones creak along: “How are you holding up?”

Mosaic — that was, according to his bored reviews, how most of Kouyou’s subordinates would describe her. It was easy to forget just how still — how statuary she was, sometimes, until dirty wheels drew lines all over her patchwork.

Composed until the very end — clearly set on giving out exactly what would keep that one flower wilted and good; but so devastatingly, so evidently fond of him Dazai felt like laughing — she vaguely said: “It’s been a long time.”

“Whatever,” he replied, strained. “You still have a right to feel shitty, no matter how long it’s been.”

Kouyou shook the thought away with a lithe motion of her head. “I know better than to let my past get a hold of me. I won’t bless it with my attention.”

“Weird,” Chuuya commented, offhandedly, hands in his pockets. “I do recall someone drilling my head with something about how — ignoring what I have left behind will render the path blurry, or some shit .”

Golden Demon attacked. The boy jumped away.

“Ma’am,” he added, belatedly.

“Aren’t you just cheeky,” she spelled out, on the verge of unamusement. It left her shoulders tired. “It doesn’t matter, Chuuya. I was young and blinded by revenge. Now, I am — Older. I’m smarter. I have the support of the Boss. This time, I will eradicate them for good.”

Her umbrella traced the ground — again and again. Her eyes followed, head tilted to the side.

“This is mine to avenge.”]

---

...

---

(Back then, Beatrice said, I suppose I didn't want to be alone anymore).

---

...

---

Setting fire to the villa was not quite unintentional enough to call it a mistake.

“Dazai Osamu!”

“I’m gonna kill you,” Chuuya let him know, the aggressive roar of the heartbeat in his wrist pressing on Dazai’s fingers. The idea had been to make sure he wouldn’t float away before he could push the two of them out of the Pavillion’s window, taking advantage of Kouyou’s momentary distraction — now, the feeling of scarred skin felt a bit complicated. “I’m gonna murder you,” he insisted, as they slalomed around the garden, “She’s gonna murder you, she’s gonna murder me, she’s gonna murder us —“

“I told you!” Dazai screamed, as they sneaked through the scaffolds slowly casquading to the ground — dancing through the rising flames the electrical system had caused. “There was no time! I forgot to buy our tickets for Rengoku!”

“We could have taken the next train —“

“There’s only one ride everyday, and it leaves in fifteen minutes!”

Chuuya’s halt-in-his-steps managed to slow him down, despite the breathless screams of workers and Kouyou’s girls alike. One of his sleeves had caught fire; he patted it frantically. Dazai had lost his shoe somewhere, and he knew the boy had seen the sheep patterned socks.

“Dazai,” the boy said, very serious, “This house is thirty minutes from the station.”

“Yes.”

“Fuck you.”

“Boys!”

Over the lines of maple trees and flames, Kouyou’s pink silhouette stood on her threshold, rage morphing her into a fairly good imitation of the gargoyle-looking statues at the entrance gates. “You get back here! Now, Chuuya!”

Dazai grinned, cupping his hands around his mouth. “Yo-oh! Ane-san! You should do something about the fire!”

The base of a fighting boot collided with his nape. “You shitty son of a —“

Golden Demon appeared from nowhere at all, roaring behind Kouyou’s shoulders like a too-bright shadow. “If you don’t get back here now, I swear to —“

“We’re going on a friendship trip!” he added, helpfully, clasping one hand around Chuuya’s chin and squishing his cheeks. All the stages of grief adorned her porcelain face, simultaneously. “You don’t mind, do you? You’ve got your Bible Studies!”

“Fuck it all,” Chuuya snapped. Impromptu chasing was amongst the unnegotiable requirements two fifteen year old had, reasonably, declared the very moment Hirotsu had been set on their tails. “Are you gonna move anytime soon, you waste of —“

They landed in the cobblestoned paths intertwining throughout the gardens, and Dazai circumnavigated them up and down the small bridges and stone benches, jumping over the artificial rivers and bumping against the maple trees. The next river they leaped over managed to trick his overly frantic companion; he landed on one knee inside the freezing waves, slamming his side against the bamboo slide carrying the water down.

Dazai was almost pulled back by the impact. With feeling, and right to the sky, Chuuya cried out: “Motherfucker!”

He felt himself sigh.

They made it to the station in ten minutes, by a series of miracles involving hanging off the car of a very distracted businessman and climbing over the station’s walls instead of going through the gates.

“Let’s,” was all Chuuya was able to pant, as they painfully crawled to the Tickets stand. “Let’s never do that again.”

Dazai barely managed to groan his agreement.

Losing their ride in the name of the employee’s lunch time seemed a very real possibility, until Chuuya slapped a disgusting amount of bills under his nose. It changed his expression dishearteningly fast.

“Bribery,” he considered, pickpocketing a snackbar as they made their way through suitcases and busy travellers. “Would easily survive the last man on earth.”

“But there will be no one to bribe, you idiot,” Chuuya replied.

He shrugged. “The last man on earth will be just mad enough to throw bills at a rainstorm.”

The boy opened his mouth to retort — only for his expression to fall, and his fingers to enclose in a death grip around his coat belt, dragging him behind one of the metallic columns.

“Hey —” Dazai protested, shoulders throbbing with the pain of the impact.

“What the fuck is he doing here again?” The words came out as a hiss, as Chuuya squinted at someone near the approaching train’s doors. He did his best to lean forward, studying the crowd, until — “Is that your Officer friend?”

“He doesn’t do train turns,” he muttered. “He must be here for something else. Let’s get the furthest wagon possible from —”

“Matsuda!” Dazai called, extracting himself, skipping in his directions with waving arms. “Officer! Here, old man! Remember me? Hi!”

Hands clawed at his back, uselessly trying to push him into the train tracks road. “I’m gonna tear you from limb to limb,” Chuuya promised, his tone slightly hysterical, “I’m gonna tear your teeth off and make you eat them from the fucking eyes, why are you like this, why are you like —”

“Kid,” Officer Matsuda blinked, surprised, watching them make their stumbling way through the small circle of passengers surrounding him. “Chuuya. What are you two doing here?”

“It’s a train station,” Chuuya muttered. “You want to arrest us for traveling?”

“I might arrest you for that clearly stolen snack bar, but not for the train itself,” the man replied, eyeing the box in Dazai’s hands — and the lipstick stains on it. “But there are bigger crimes, I suppose. As long as you eat something.”

“It could be mine, you know,” Dazai informed. “Progressiveness is at the base of development. Are you trying to limit my self-expression?”

“You’re one annoying kid, aren’t you?”

He saluted. “So they tell me.”

Chuuya nodded towards his notebook. “Bigger crimes, like whatever you’re investigating?”

Matsuda’s gaze turned sour. “Aside from any associations of yours, namely ones which have turned this city into a damn battlefield in the last few days — you two were in my cell until a few weeks ago.”

“That’s the past,” The boy waved the matter away. “This is the future. What happened?”

The Officer studied them. Dazai blinked, slow.

A sigh. “We were called in for a bomb alert.”

Dazai deflated. “That’s all?”

His gaze turned stern. “It could have killed all these innocent people. We were lucky it was bullshit.”

“They wouldn’t have sent you for something like this,” Chuuya insisted, crossing his arms. “This is not your jurisdiction. You’re the kids’ men.”

“You’d know.”

A scoff. “Don’t start that shit right now.”

“You know, I still have tons of stuff my guys sequestered from your Sheep back in the days,” the Officer informed him. “Maybe you could email it to them. Unless the Mafia has special channels?”

“Bet they’re super fast,” Dazai — who knew the trading system of the syndicate had worked terribly before he had intervened — jumped in. “And efficient. A marvel to look at.”

“I’m not here to reminisce,” Chuuya said. “If you want to be helpful —“

“You know I want to —“

“— why are you here?”

A pause. Matsuda glanced over to the crowd, fingers tightening around his notebook. ““You heard of a young, seemingly rogue Ability User? They’re being blamed for the Blossom Institute’s massacre. Witnesses swore they saw them around the area.”

In admirable coordination, they stilled.

Unfortunately, Matsuda took notice of their exchanged glance — the implications of it; of a search Mori might praise them for, but that would certainly make them late. “You...” His eyes widened. “Are you two involved in this —“

“The train’s leaving!” Dazai exclaimed, finger raised towards the opening doors behind them, taking the decision for both of them. “Would you look at the time! It was great seeing you without bars in front of your face, Officer. See you soon!”

“Boys, wait —“

“Stay away from me or I’ll report you. And say hi to your ex-wife,” Chuuya warned — and then, to their lungs’ protest, they were running again.

---

[“Here is the first story every child born in Rengoku learns,” Beatrice started. “There was once a child.”

The child got lost, as clever children do. They wandered out of the Institute — out of the Orphanage; not that we were allowed to call it that — and ended up in the woods surrounding the town. They used to devour a wider part of earth, back then; tickled the walls bursting with ivy, and called curious children like a Siren’s song. There weren’t enough tragic stories about what happened to kids who went down the paths of what would one day become the Forest, to keep them out.

In their terrified search for a way back, the kid met three animals: a leopard, a lion and a she-wolf.

The leopard saw them paddle towards his den and stepped out. He looked the child right in the eyes and asked: “Are you lost?”

The kid answered: “I am.”

“Well, don’t worry about it,” the leopard reassured them. “You’re young, still. You will find your way in time. Until that day comes, why don’t you come with me?”

“Come where?” asked the child.

“In my den. A sorgent runs under it, and beautiful trees loaded with delicious fruits surround it. You can rest and gather strength for your trip back.”

“Maybe one fruit,” the child agreed. “A bit of water.”

“Or maybe a thousand fruits,” the leopard insisted. “And more water than you will ever need.”

But the child wanted to go home, so they grabbed a simple apple and some water, and they left.

A lion saw them wander around, so he left his den. He approached the child and asked: “Are you lost?”

The kid answered: “I am.”

“Did you meet a leopard on your way here?”

“I did,” the child confirmed.

“And you didn’t eat his thousand fruits?” the lion said, surprised. “You didn’t drink all his water, until none was left in the sorgent?”

“No,” the child assured. “I didn’t.”

“That makes you smart,” the lion congratulated himself. “Smarter than anyone else. Almost nobody reaches my den; they get stuck on the first step. You are better than most.”

“I’m not,” the child replied, as the nuns from the Institute had taught them. “No human is better than another human. I just honor my God.”

“Bah!” the lion spat. “Who cares about God? Who cares about other humans? Let me make you an offer. Why don’t you follow me?”

“Follow you where?” the child asked.

“In my den! I live with other animals there, and they all bow to me and do everything I say. They recognize I am better than them. They will surely recognize you are, too. Say — if you follow me inside, I will ask each one of them to give you their mantles, so that you won’t feel cold. It’s a glacial night.”

“It is a glacial night,” the kid agreed. “But one mantle will suffice.”

And since the child wanted to go home, they grabbed a mantle from one of the servant lions and went on their way.

A she-wolf saw him wander through the trees, so she left her den.

“You are lost,” the she-wolf announced.

“I am lost,” the kid replied. “How did you know?”

“Anyone who reaches me might be more found than most, but they’re as lost as everyone who enters this forest.”

“I don’t understand,” the kid apologized. “What are you going to offer me?”

The she-wolf laughed. “Offer you? Why should I offer you something, when I’m so happy having it all?”

“Nonetheless,” she added. “I might give you something. But I want your apple and your mantle.”

The kid frowned. They had been so humble, until now — had taken one fruit only in the face of an infinity; one mantle only even if the night was freezing. And now they were supposed to give them up as well? How would they reach home? How would they survive hunger and cold?

“Aren’t people supposed to help lost travelers?” the kid responded, because the nuns had taught them so. “We shall treat every suffering soul as if it’s God himself.”

“Ah, but you forget,” the she-wolf taunted. “I am no person, and you are no God. I am a wolf and you are a child.”

And like animals do to children, like Gods do to people, the she-wolf ate the child.

The next day, the nuns searched everywhere for them. The people of Rengoku screamed their name — walked the forest up and down. Upon finding a bloody piece of clothing and the headless body of a child, they lowered their heads and wore their grief.

Three days later, a silhouette appeared at the edge of the forest. The child saw a nun kneeled on the ground, praying upon a small grave.

“Hello,” the child told her. “Are you lost?”

And thus the forest became the Forest, and the kid lived].

---

...

---

The train was filled to the brim. It was only a mixture of dumb luck, Chuuya’s mastered guard-dog scowl, and the general unnerviness people’s shoulders tended to assume when Dazai smiled at them — that dropped them on a row of empty seats.

They spread a stolen map in the middle seat, taking up more space than necessary — a move that gained them several dirty glances. Sweet pooling under his bandages, Dazai showed them his tongue.

“This is the Forest,” he explained, as the train swept across rusted tracks. He tapped the map. “Capital F. The locals call it that, at least. It surrounds Rengoku entirely — According to Beatrice’s email, the train should leave us at a ten-minute walk from the town.”

“Why did they give it a name?” Chuuya asked, around a stolen lollipop.

Their foreheads and knees almost bumped against each other. Dazai felt the childish need to start a pushing fight, head to head, just to get revenge for his stolen coat — hanging around the boy’s shoulders to hide the bloodied results of Golden Demon’s gashes. Tight on wider shoulders but exhilaratingly brushing the ground — Dazai couldn’t decide if he wanted to mock or whine. He thought about Mori’s hands on freckled, scarred shoulders.

“Sometime after the Great War, a miracle of sorts blessed the woods. This gigantic wall that had been built as a defense was destroyed — the border just blew up. Some kid was the only survivor. Someone decided it was a sacred place,” He shrugged. “It didn’t help the people much. Rengoku was immensely hard to reach from the main cities, and a nearby factory blew up as well, ten years ago.”

“A miracle,” Chuuya echoed, skeptical. Why is everybody so eager to find Arahabaki?, he had scoffed, in Rimbaud’s face. “What kind of miracle? What religion?”

“Someone was healed, someone sacrificed, someone killed,” Dazai blinked. “Usually one of these. And Christianity, I’d assume. Beatrice is pretty zealous about that cross. Inconsequential, still — Religion is interpretation of faith. Holy always means holy.” A pause. “That’s what Q used to say, at least. In simpler words. Whoever God’s it is, it hates me.”

Chuuya grimaced, pushing the lollipop around. “I hate that stuff.” Sweets were as deadly as cigarettes, as far as Mori was concerned. Fifteen years olds were as deadly as the angriest man around.

He ate it in a very aggravating way; it involved teeth. Dazai was aggravated. He pulled it out. “Not very inclusive of you,” Some nearby passengers rolled their window down; he threw it out.

“Bitch.”

“Wet dog.”

“Beanpole.”

“Dust fairy.” He hooked his hands around the train straps; tilting back, he added, “Personally, I have attempted to follow the path of seven religions in my short life.”

“Yeah, sure, ” he snorted — not quite as if he didn’t believe him, but as if already imagining him bald and dressed in a tunic. “And how did that go?”

“Considering my one goal in existence, not too well,” Dazai answered, unblinking. “The monotheistic ones don’t like suicide in the least. Buddhism was pretty cool. Unfortunately, while they don’t condemn suicide, they’re much too big on life and how it links to the universe and its inhabitants, yadda yadda.”

“Isn’t that exactly your kind of thing?” Chuuya replied, curling an eyebrow. “Life and death are not opposite but equals or whatever your jigs are about.”

“Guinness Records will be amazed at the horrible imitations a common slug is capable of attempting,” At the end of the train, a child began to wail, painting a scowl on most passenger’s faces. “What do you presume God’s corpse might look like?”

The question tasted as absurd on his lips as it did deep into the other boy’s unmatching eyes, framed by overwhelmingly normal sunlight. His shrug might have delivered the final blow to the agonizing deity. “Like any other, I assume.”

“That’s fair,” he replied. He felt two gloved fingers press the middle of his forehead even before he spoke — it didn’t stop him from asking: “Say, what does a dog have against faith?”

The panorama running beside them was as gray as concrete, framed by wolf roads and hills of melting snow. Ever so chameleonic — enough to wear a suit mere days after he had joined the Mafia, and a leather jacket mere days after Professor N had called him a clone — Chuuya matched it to the very last uncomfortable dot.

“What does someone like you even care about religion?” he muttered, at last, taking back his fingers to drag lines across the window, transferring creases to glass, for the sake of leaving it dirty. “Aren’t you a fucking all knowing prodigy, supposedly? What do you care about God and his damn corpse?”

“Faith is an emotion,” Dazai pointed out. “I’m interested in those. As for religions — Humans have come up with smarter things, during the centuries, but hardly quirkier. It’s what you do with Physics, right? You enjoy it because it explains your Ability.”

“You need to get over this spying habit of yours.”

“I also hear you like poetry! Don’t you find it a bit useless to spend all that time studying stuff that fundamentally doesn’t matter?”

“It does matter,” he huffed, and Dazai tried to imagine telling the street punk who had tattooed his sole on his cheekbone that he would enjoy rhyming schemes, sooner than a sheep’s loyalty could last. Chameleonic to the point of sincerity. “History would be shit without someone to tell what people thought of it. And Physics explains the whole damn universe, not just my Ability —”

“Nothing more relevant than the discovery of what some drunken fool would think of love and the world, right?” He sighed. “The best thing about this burdensome world are its people. It’s what keeps them alive that matters.”

Perplexion waited for him in his facing seat; with the heaviness of every metal panel in his container, Dazai thought: might as well. If he could never understand, he might as well get as close to it as possible. “Don’t change the subject,” he chirped. “Everybody is calling what you did last month a miracle too, you know?”

“Codes,” Chuuya recited. “French, Japanese — I don’t even know. Gravity. All the stitches they gave me. Nothing divine about it.”

His fingers were intertwined on his lap. Dazai had been trying to prove his theory right for weeks, now — waiting to see them spasm, imperceptibly; the way his shoulders sometimes did; the way his eyes blinked a bit too erratically, at times. Side effects, Mori would have called them, in a more decent world.

In this, he had taken a look at those electrified bones of his, and told Dazai, more cheerfully than he supposed fanatic Professor N would have — the price of scientific lighting is somewhat fascinating, isn’t it?

Does it hurt, sometimes?, he wanted to ask. Do you even feel it? Instead, he offered: “Perhaps another attempt at self black-holization would make you more pious.”

His pause lasted an inch too long.

“If it’s what Boss wants,” he said, eventually.

Me, Dazai thought. What about —

“Still. What, did Professor N take you and your pseudo-fake twin to Church every Sunday? One Holy Mary for each minute in the tank?”

Chuuya showed him his teeth, dog until the end, fists tight in his lap. “You’re not funny, jackass.”

“Nothing about your life is remotely funny,” he replied, honest. “What else am I supposed to say?”

“We don’t even know who the pseudo fake twin is, anyway.”

His fingers twitched around the strap, again. Leaning until his side was plastered against the cold glass, he searched, then searched again. He wanted to put his fingers under the boy’s choker and pull. He wanted to cut him open.

Ah, he realized, after traveling inside his bones. Jealousy.

“Some of it was was interesting, though,” he offered. “Adam was — certainly something.”

Chuuya scoffed, but not maliciously.

“Hey,” He nudged him with one knee, overheated fabric against overheated fabric. He was always at reach. He was always letting himself be reached. Dazai thought him rather stupid; enough to be forgiven for it. “Dog. Tell me.”

“You’re annoying,” he muttered. Detached curiosity dragged his eyes through every passenger; uncaring, and yet desperate to be let in, after ruining his knuckles knocking. “It gets unsettled in sacred places. Louder.”

There were more useful words to waste. “Arahabaki.”

It wasn’t a question, but he nodded anyway. “It’s like — I don’t know. It vibrates. Hums. As if the ground recognised it — Fucking stupid. He’s all codes, not a god. Maybe I’m influencing myself. Kouyou dragged me to the temple on New Year’s Day. My bones almost imploded.”

“Louder,” he repeated. “Not just loud. So you do hear it.”

“Most of the time, yeah,” He shrugged. Dazai wondered if he knew his pupils grew wider whenever the god’s name fell from his lips. “Buzzes in the back of my fucking skull. I was scared of dogs when I was a kid. Kept telling the others I heard them growling wherever I went.”

Fear of dogs. Dazai wanted to laugh; the season had passed, though. “Can it communicate?”

“Not exactly,” Chuuya huffed. “It doesn’t have a mind. It’s there — A useless limb. I can ignore it, most of the time. But it’s always there. Like — like bathing with a battery, or drinking a shit ton of coffee. It always feels so tight.”

“What does?”

Blue and amber flickered to him again. “Me.”

It doesn’t fit, he had explained to Mori once, patiently, spread open on his clinic bed, bleeding from every inch of him. God’s corpse might just be the body that had fallen from the sky. Maybe, he had thought, he would be reborn if Dazai bled on his grave, on his last day. It doesn’t fit, so I cut it out.

“Does it like you?” he asked.

The boy snorted. “Like me?”

“It’s aware of you. Does it like you?”

His lips quivered. Chuuya wore his heart on his sleeve; a mask of its own right, when every emotion he cuffed around it was slightly enraged — just a hint out of control. As angry as a man could be for feeling it.

No, he corrected himself. For not feeling it enough.

“No,” the boy concluded, dryly. “It doesn’t.”

As good of a curtain call as any.

“You see that?” he said, knocking his knuckles on the glass. Chuuya’s eyes landed on the greenish river under the bridge they were crossing, embracing some abandoned houses. “That’s the Kitanai Kawa.”

A blink. “The Dirty River? Seriously?”

“Are you seeing that thing?”

Chuuya grimaced. “It does look like it would melt a man’s skin off his bones.”

“Because it would,” he offered, helpfully. “Or — Almost. Our brochure says that most of the toxic materials from the explosion of the factory ended up there. It — Sanitized itself a bit, with time, but the water might still cause several fascinating skin diseases and everlasting effects if not immediately removed,” He caressed the skull painted next to the line. “How —”

“No committing suicide on the job,” Chuuya shot down, immediately.

“You’re no fun.”

“Trust me when I say nothing would make me happier than your final demise.”

“You’re a true friend!”

“I am not, ” he said, pointedly, with all the might of a kindergartener ready to shrill the teacher’s name, “Your friend. You suicidal maniac.”

Someone cleared their throat. The woman gripping the straps next to their seats snapped her eyes away from them, holding her kid tighter.

They moved their heads closer.

Murmuring, Chuuya continued: “Speaking of friends — Did you hear about where they want to lock Q up when they find them?”

“I’m surprised you did. Is someone finally taking advantage of having chatty pseudo subordinates and a pendant for camaraderie?”

His stare was unamused. Chuuya had never quite known how to leave other kids with bloodied nails alone.

“What’s with the sudden care?” Dazai asked. “The Owner asked you to bring him the corpse of the weirdest kid around next?”

“I’d bring your bandaged ass, if that was the case,” he muttered. He hadn’t demanded his help for any new treasure hunt; from visits to The Alley, Dazai knew it didn’t mean he had put an end to them. “You talk as if their creepy ass doll isn’t your little-me.”

“If anyone here looks creepy is you, with those rusty tufts you’ve got for hair —“

“Rusty tufts?”

“— defying the Japanese medium type —“

“You look like a dead mackerel!”

“Slug!”

“Attention, to all passengers,” the speakers called. “We are approaching Rengoku.”

“Why would I be mad about inspiring brands, anyway?” Dazai made sure to reply, climbing to his feet in all the wrong ways. “Maybe I want to be buried as a successful man.”

“Buried,” the redhead echoed. “That’s why you want Q dead, isn’t it?”

Dazai folded the map. “Ah, accusing me of harboring such violent feelings for a sweetheart like Q —“

“You’re the only one who can control them,” Chuuya continued, undeterred. “Which makes you necessary. Which means that you can’t die, or Boss is fucked.”

“How long have you been munching on that? Ever since meeting the kid?”

“I’m right, aren’t I?” he insisted. “You don’t want to leave possible bombs behind.”

“You know what your problem is, Chuuya?” he replied. The train came to a stop; the backward motion almost sent him flying. “As most people, you tend to believe others just as you are — fundamentally good-intentioned.”

“I’m not —“

He leaned down, flicking him on the forehead. “Think of it like this: you protect people because you want to. Your beloved Yokohama, whom you turned into a black hole for,” The automatic doors opened, allowing the flood to escape into the cold wind. “Me? I owe people things. And I owe them to people who I need, if I want to end my life as I wish to. ”

“You could kill Q whenever you wanted,” Chuuya scoffed. “You could kill yourself whenever you wanted. You haven’t. You want me to believe it’s just because Mori doesn’t want you to?”

“You know how it is,” He bounced, longing for open space; longing for a place away from talks of death with the most alive thing around. “Not making the Boss mad is an essential step to becoming an Executive, is it not?”

The train station of Rengoku was a wood and metal box in the middle of nowhere, surrounded by tall trees and wild glass covered in melting snow. Strays offered untrusting eyes to the people disappearing into impatient cars and loving arms; and then it was empty. With loads of boredom to spare, Dazai skipped down the hill, dead to the other boy’s calls.

To punish the senseless cruelty of the wind whipping his uncoated frame, the third time they accidentally turned the wrong direction, he tripped Chuuya. In the time it took him to scream a hey! , he did a cartwheel, and he landed on his knees. He said: “Let’s play 99 Hangman Knots. ”

“What? ”

They stumbled and tumbled down the hill, his voice filling every corner of the valley, uncaring for the pushes and the kicks and the rolling down with half intertwined bony limbs.

They turned, and Rengoku appeared.

The town was a ghost made of bricks. It seemed to sprout from nowhere at all, the grass and the trees and the dusty street abruptly interrupted by village houses and wood fences whose skeletons alone had been left. “Damn,” was the boy’s conclusion, surveying the far away cage of the Forest. Dazai considered making fun of him. He turned around, listening to the unnaturally loud crunch! of his shoes — the only sound for miles. “Nice place they’ve got here.”

The closer they got, the clearer the few outlines of the town became: modest buildings in decay, wild nature digging its way through the rock, and a solitary silhouette standing next to a surprisingly steady sign: Welcome To Rengoku.

Beatrice was waiting for them.

Her usual pastel figure was nowhere to be found; the long dress wrapping her figure was as black as the crows perched on the fence, and her hair had been tied up and covered with a veil of the same color. She didn't seem to notice them approaching, busy as she was fiddling with the cracked lines of her wristwatch. The haze acting as a secondary veil on her eyes dissipated, slowly — but it took her a few instants to turn to face them.

“Oh,” she said. “Here you are.”

“Here we are,” Chuuya confirmed, doing his best to hide his heavy breathing. “Brought any poison?”

“Must have forgotten it in the car.”

“Good for us. What personality are we getting today? Just to get on with the program.”

This time around, she flinched. “Can't say I'm sure.”

“Don't worry,” Dazai reassured her, widening his arms. “We'll figure it out. Have you regained any more memories? Flashbacks of sorts?”

“I...” She set her jaw, fingers stuck around her necklace. “My bruises. When I touch them, I get — I'm not sure what to call them. They don't hurt, but it feels like they should. You —” She hesitated, studying him. “You broke my arm.”

“I did more than that,” he corrected her.

She tightened her veil around her head, playing with the hems under her chin. “It was in your email.”

Dazai shrugged. “You had a right to know,” he said. “I wish for free reign on my death. If I can know how my corpse will end up on the floor, you can know what was done to yours.”

The woman studied him. “Corpses are never going to be anything but corpses.”

“They weren't, once,” he replied. “And memories can be forgiven too, can they not?”

“How human.”

“To forgive?”

“Not quite,” she said. Didn't add a thing.

On the fence, two crows cawed in unison.

“So,” Chuuya cleared his throat, as allergic to meaningfulness as ever. “Happy to be back home?”

A complicated expression morphed Beatrice's face. "If you think being here might get me the answers I want on — on V, I'm willing to try."

"Great news," he said. "Lead the way."

The air didn't quiver when their feet landed on the destroyed cobblestoned streets of the village — but with the way Beatrice's face fell, Dazai wondered if he had simply missed it. The dismantled buildings were barely recognizable — whatever she was seeing, it wasn't ruins and bundles of snow.

She led them unhesitantly, her black seams brushing the ground. Her fingers fiddled with her cross; at a second look, he noticed her lips brush — a silent prayer.

"You haven't been back since —" Chuuya started. "You know. Since V's death?"

"No," she confirmed. Her frown could have been either grief or guilt. "I was already living in the underground when I heard about the explosion. I wanted to come back, see if my parents..." She cleared her throat. "The man who took me in convinced me not to. Everyone had died. No reason to waste time."

"How old were you?"

"Old enough to stop caring, after a while," she replied. They circled an old recint, the metal of its entrance arch rusty and covered in ivy; behind was an abandoned kids' park, littered in fallen leaves and remnants of swings. "The Nine Rings wanted to punish the village. He told me they hadn't offered the protection payment, attempted a — A rebellion of sorts."

Dazai hummed. He jumped over the fence, leaves shattering under his merry steps, and settled upon a corroded roundabout. Attempting to turn it, he made a face at the hellish noise. "And you didn't quite believe him, did you?"

She brushed the sides of her dress, marble once again. "Everyone was always so arrogant, but — I don't think they would have rebelled."

"The Nine Rings seriously blew up a factory just to destroy a village?" Chuuya echoed, scoffing. He was eying his careful analysis of the roundabout with a pathetically interested face; only when Dazai took pity on him — and loudly sighed about clearly needing a hand to turn it, Slug — did he scoff and make his way to him. "Such a small place, too?"

"Didn't even have the face to kill them personally?" Dazai sighed, sitting down on the handle. "How pathetic. For God's sake, Chuuya, you have to push to the left —"

"I am, you dipshit —"

"The previous Boss had no objective but that to cause chaos," Beatrice replied — either uninterested or too distracted to pay attention to their spinning frames, nauseatingly going along to the accelerating roundabout. "Not unlike the Port Mafia's previous leader, he might have just begun to lose it, near the end. Perhaps it's inevitable, with our line of work."

She tilted her head to one side, then to the other — as if listening. Crows cawed upon the abandoned slide; something vaguely hostile bled down her blinking eyes. “He thought big messages to small threats would keep the big threats away. The whole area became dangerous for a while, and now there’s no village to pay protection money.”

“That’s why you don’t slaughter everyone!” Dazai let her know, voice rising to battle the vertiginous turns. The winter wind whipped him with viciousness; he laid his head back until the world was upside down. “There is no point in teaching lessons to a corpse! They are not there to learn it!”

“The Port Mafia has done worse,” she replied. Her eyes settled on a piece of rubble at her feet; she kicked it away, watching whatever memory had trapped her mind roll away with it. “Especially your Executives.”

“We have, and they have,” he agreed, easily. Chuuya yelped as he almost lost grip around the handles, unintentionally speeding them up even further. Grinning wildly, he let out a barely-there, wooh! “But none of us destroyed your village, did we? We are not your villain.”

Her lips painted a line on her porcelain face; white knuckles fit a marble statue just fine — but he couldn’t shake off the feeling of having said something wrong.

As she resumed her path — all but an order to end the games — Beatrice concluded: “You are villains all the same.”

He hummed. “And?”

It took them a few tries to stop the roundabout; Dazai face-planted onto the sea of leaves the moment he stumbled out. By the time they had managed to catch up with their guide, heads spinning, the centre of the village appeared in front of them.

Wild grass, rubble and rocks creaked under their heavy steps, caressed by Beatrice’s wind-like gaze. A building on the other side of what must have been a market square shone under the sun, its shattered stained-glass windows framing a rusted bell, swinging with the wind. On top of the heavy wooden doors: The Sacred Institute.

“Well,” Chuuya commented. “One hell of a reputation for an Institute.”

“One hopes they performed as satisfyingly as preannounced,” Dazai agreed. “Did you have to pray before every lesson?”

“Two times,” Beatrice confirmed, distantly. A gentle kind of teasing; a bad memory tossed and turned until its edges softened. “We would get struck on the nails if we yawned. Everybody came out of the Institute knowing it all, though.”

“That sounds like torture,” Chuuya grimaced, shifting his weight from one foot to the other. He wondered if the ground was already holy enough to donate Arahaki its wake up call.

“People in Rengoku had a reputation to uphold,” she replied, like a recorder. “We’re enclosed by the Forest, a land of miracles. Thus, we are blessed. Blessed people have duties.”

“And curses,” Dazai pointed out.

“Yes.” Her frown deepened. “And curses.”

Chuuya cleared his throat. “So, this is where you three met?”

Raising one arm, she pointed to one of the broken windows on the highest floor. “In a little room. They used to bunk together. Always had, since they’d been abandoned on same day.”

“How do you even abandon a kid in such a small place?” Dazai mused. “You all knew each other. No ideas or whatsoever of who the parents might be?”

“It was something of a silent agreement,” she responded, after a few moments of thinking. “We all knew that it was someone here. They knew, we knew, everyone did. Nobody cared much. They’d been left to the church, so they weren’t wanted. What was the point of pointing fingers?”

Chuuya’s nose scrunched up. “Living here sounds like fun.”

“It wasn’t,” Beatrice scoffed, face fractured by her veil. “It really wasn’t. And yet —“

She breathed in. The ivy on the walls seemed to sing along.

“They would climb on the roof and throw rocks to my house,” she recalled. “We would talk on the phone. We tried to find each other — I had to climb on my roof too, but it was too far to see much. They would tell me about what fruit they’d managed to steal from the market, about their latest plan for when we would finally leave the village.”

“You’re coming with us, of course, he always said. And V looked so annoyed about it. Bea doesn’t even want to leave. We don’t even know if Bea will live long enough. V wanted to be mean so badly, but he always just sounded worried. He would answer every call the same way. Won’t you say hello, Bea?” she gulped. “I couldn’t. I couldn’t, and he...”

Silence embraced them, full of expectations. Chuuya threw him a glance; Dazai shrugged.

“Well,” the woman said, shaking the memories away from her eyes. “It doesn’t matter. We can go in, if you want. I’m still not quite sure of what you’re hoping to find, but —“

She stiffened.

Her lips stayed parted — her eyes settled on something. Dazai had barely time to watch her hands convulse, black gloves moving like scorpion tails in the cold air — and abruptly, she wasn’t there anymore.

“Hey!” Chuuya called, watching her run towards one of the buildings. “What are you — wait!”

They ran, enclosed by an upcoming storm that was nowhere to be seen at the horizon. It rose the hair of his arms, still — electricity and rust on his tongue. Crows took leaps into the sky, singing songs that were more screams than melody. Her veil whipped by the wind, they found her hands plastered on the half destroyed glass of a window, eyes searching the dismantled skeleton of the house.

“How,” she breathed out. The glass moved along to her shaking fingers. “How are —“ “Dazai,” Chuuya called.

His gaze had settled on a crack in the wall of another house. His outline was shining red; he met his eyes. “There are people here.”

“Oh,” He blinked. “Are there?”

A sneaky detail in a two-way painting; once they noticed the first line shape something else, it was impossible to see past it. Behind the window Beatrice was studying were two boys, twirling around a kitchen; in another house a wrinkled woman, sewing; in a shop, a man bent over a working table.

Not one building was empty — the people seemed to merge with the greyish skeletons of their homes, as if their skin had grown along. Mouths open, no words coming out — their steps were too quiet.

It was their eyes, though, that made him pause.

“Corpses,” Dazai concluded. Warmth pressed against his back; Chuuya’s weight and fight-stance unmistakable. Their irises held the abyssal blankness of the end of a tunnel. In a lower voice, he added: “Like the ones at the Under Port, I bet.”

“But they don’t look wounded,” the boy replied.

“They could have been killed in any way. And if these are —“

“Akio,” Beatrice whispered, eyes stuck on the mechanical chase of the two boys. “But — Mamoru and — and Akio, they’re —“

Dazai felt a new idea spawn inside her skull. “Tenshi, wait —“

She stumbled upon the weight of those vowels — but it took her no time to disappear through the smaller streets, digging the earth as Chuuya cursed her out, chasing after her with one, two, three jumps on the roofs. He knew, Beatrice had said, that I called this place my home — in spite of. I think he hated it for that. He hated everyone who had made it such for me.

There was no need for introduction for the small house Beatrice fell to her knees in front of.

Even with its fallen roof and torn doors, it looked like her — the delicate curtains on what had once been windows; the handmade fence over a small garden. Floral, childish drawings covered the front door — a gift parents hadn’t had the heart to erase.

He knew who would be inside; Beatrice knew, too — and yet, the sound that escaped her mouth upon forcing the door down was more of a scream.

“Dad,” she breathed, stumbling towards the old silhouettes decorating the blown up counter of the kitchen, the broken TV with cables that didn’t need the fixing that was being ordered upon them. “Mom, mom —“

Their shoulders were dusted by rubble, remnants raining occasionally from the hole in the roof; it covered the woman’s hands too, as she gently mixed it with the flour on the counter.

Dazai felt Chuuya’s eyes pierce his side. He accepted their call — met them from the other side of the threshold. They traveled down his figure, landing on the other side of where his gun rested — no time to wonder if he had been looking for confirmation or permission. Dazai had never particularly cared about either of them. Mutual understanding, then, he supposed. Necessary collaboration.

He nodded.

“Mom,” their guide was calling, hands tight around the old woman’s shoulders. “Mom, Mom, it’s me, Mom, listen to me —“

He stepped through the open door and shot Beatrice’s mother in the head.

Both their reactions were visceral: the woman’s body was blown back by the impact, crashing against her kitchen with a hellish clank. Not a sound came out of her mouth, though; or perhaps the shout leaving Beatrice’s lips covered it.

She threw herself in the older woman’s direction; then, as if a switch was flipped, she turned to Dazai. “You —“

Chuuya appeared from seemingly nowhere, slamming against her shaking frame and dragging her away from the kitchen area. One touch of his gloved hands sent her flying to the opposite side of the room, landing next to the TV her father was still fixing, unbothered. When she tried to reach out to the man, Chuuya stomped one boot to the ground

Invisible cement crushed her body; when she screamed, it was half curses and half desperation.

“You,” she screeched, terrifying eyes behind a black veil. “You sons of a bitch!”

“Nothing personal, Tenshi,” Dazai replied, calmly, making his way to the mess of pans and rubble on the ground. He knelt down, cleaning the old woman’s face — the red trailing from the hole in her forehead kept drawing lines down her wrinkled features. “I apologize, Grandma. Nothing personal against you either.”

“Mom!”

“She’s fine,” Chuuya shushed her. Dazai didn’t move his gaze away from the woman’s open eyes, still stuck in their peaceful bubble. “Like the corpses we told you about. She’s dead, Beatrice. She doesn’t feel a thing.”

That much was clear. The woman was still locked in that mysterious floating state — not an inch of suffering marked the tilt of her mouth. Her hands were seemingly reaching out — as if looking for their missing dough.

“Doesn’t feel pain,” Dazai listed. “Obeys invisible orders. Is allegedly dead, and yet doesn’t appear so in the least. So, we can conclude...”

The hand he offered didn’t wait; Chuuya immediately handed him one of his hidden knives. Under the sound of Beatrice’s questions and shrieks, Dazai turned the blade and sunk it in the woman’s chest.

“Stop!” She could only move her head like a madman. “Stop, stop — what are you doing —“

“She’s dead,” Chuuya echoed, eerily blank. “She’s already dead. It doesn’t matter.”

“You don’t know that —“

“You knew they were dead. They’re alive because of some shitty Ability, nothing more.”

“Fuck you!” she cried, thrashing around. The thump! he heard could only belong to the TV her father was fixing. “Fuck you, fuck you, he was right about you, he was fucking right —“

Dazai cut a square down the length of her bust. He sunk his fingers in the removed flesh, pulling the two sides down like book pages. The pool of blood under them widened, infiltrating his shoes — he searched through bone and viscera, assaulted by a smell so thick his eye watered.

“Anything?” Chuuya asked.

He scrunched his nose. “How distasteful.” He sunk one hand through the woman’s rib cage, moving her heart aside and reaching out to her lungs. “Bingo,” he concluded, when his thumb closed around something too hard to be viscera. He pulled it out, polishing it with an edge of the woman’s ripped shirt — a cross, thick and damaged, oily with remnants of bodily fluids.

Chuuya’s hurried steps echoed behind him, following the hiss of a weight being laid on Beatrice’s body. Dazai felt him crunch down next to him, reddish aura dropping the temperature to goosebumps.

He sniffed the treasure. “Shit, it smells like death.”

“It is death, moron,” Dazai reminded him — reaching out with his free hand, tapping the back of the boy’s one.

Chuuya studied the serene lines of the woman’s face. “So everyone in this village is under the influence of these things? Why?”

He tilted his head. “Oh, for a way easier reason than whatever you’re thinking.”

“Which is?”

Beatrice was still struggling against her invisible restraints. He hummed. “To make her a gift.” Bringing the cross close to his mouth, Dazai called out: “Hi. Am I talking to Dante?”

Unmatching eyes widened. “No, wait —“

“We are here, as you know,” he continued, meeting Beatrice’s gaze from the other side of the room. At some point — some distant plan — she had quietened down. “We’re waiting for you.”

“What the fuck are you doing?” Chuuya snatched the cross from his fingers.

From where he was kneeling on the ground, fixing cables for a TV that had been pushed aside, Beatrice’s father stood up. His bulky frame looked unnatural; he raised his arms with the agility of a mechanical toy, peaceful, as he opened his dress shirt.

Black peeked through, red lines blinking faster and faster.

Chuuya shouted something. Dazai felt him push him out through the nearest breach in the dismantled wall, hands lighting up. To his pounding head’s chagrin — and the hungry impact wave sending them flying’s joy — they weren’t fast enough.

---

...

---

His name was Dante, Beatrice said. As for V’s name, we never found out.

He didn’t particularly like that name. The nuns had given it to him, while V had been left on the threshold of the Institute with a piece of paper so dirty no other letter could be seen. Rengoku is a small place. It was founded decades and decades ago, by western immigrants. We all had unusual names. Dante hated his own the most.

The first time he introduced himself to me, the name barely escaped his lips. I thought it was weird, but I didn’t say a word. I had my motives for doing some things, and they tormented him too.

I told you the first story every child in Rengoku was told was the one of the Forest. I lied. My first story was another kind of warning.

The first of them was as boring as physical illness.

I was born sickly and weak; I barely survived my first months of life. I grew up surrounded by blankets and medicines, waking up in the middle of the night with a weight on my chest and my parents’ tearful certainty that I was going to die. The town doctor had assured them that I wouldn't live past fifteen with the kind of remedies we had in Rengoku. I had to be brought to the city, as fast as possible.

My parents, of course, refused. People of Rengoku didn't leave Rengoku. They stayed and married and made children, lived and waited for the Nine Rings to visit, paid their tribute, prayed and died. No one in town critiqued my parents for their choice. No matter if it would kill me. No matter if they brought me flowers and cried upon my bed whenever the sickness got too bad.

I could resent them for it. I don't. The three of us knew there was a reason for my sickness. The three of us knew it wasn't something I could heal from.

So I waited to die.

In the middle of it, I met a person who refused to bow his head in front of my parents' decision, and wait for my funeral.

"Why won't you say hi to me?" was Dante's question, every time we met. His voice would crack, youthful and childish and too old at the same time, and he would ignore V's pull to his sleeve. I always said no. He always asked again.

We met everyday. He and V would hide behind my classroom door and peek into the window, trying to make me laugh. The nuns would get mad at me. For some reason, that never stopped me from laughing.

For a while, it was just this — them spying on me, lacking the courage to actually say a word. I knew they would find it, someday. Dante was too obsessed with it. V would have done anything for Dante. In the end, I was right.

"Hello," Dante told me, one day.

He was shorter than me. His presence, though, could have filled the town and Forest to the brim. V's silhouette, half hidden behind him, with his quietly enraged eyes, might have destroyed them.

I didn't answer him. I knew better.

That was the start of it, of course. This was always the question running through my mind: why me?

I found out much later that Dante had discovered my secret while searching through the archives. I do believe that's what birthed his obsession: the things I could do for him. But that was long after he started peeking on the window of my classroom, all wide eyes and childish wonder. That was long after the first time he held his hand out and told me: "Let's be friends."

They didn't need a trio. Of that much I was sure. He and V worked seamlessly together, intertwining and crossing each other as easily as breathing. They weren't the only orphans at the Institute, but they had been abandoned the same day. V thought it was fate. Dante thought it was no coincidence. And yet, it took me long to understand it wasn't the same.

They didn't need a trio, but we became one all the same.

V was never particularly happy about the idea, but he idolized Dante too much to say a word about it. Used as he was to the two of them — to a twin bed in a dark room of the Institute, exchanging the few secrets left between two people who told each other everything — I was a question mark.

Most days, V was too scared to say a word to anyone who wasn't Dante. He would stutter his way through adults' questions and hold onto his friend's sleeve. Slowly, he started talking to me. He would hold my hand when we laid on the roof and counted stars, would climb out of his window to talk to the phone with me, would tell me about the things he liked and the things he hated. Loud noises, crowds, strawberries, woods, me.

But he never managed to look me in the eyes.

Was I happy? Was I relieved when the most reluctant of my first friends stopped hating me? Not exactly. Friends were a new thing for me. The other kids pitied me too much to like me. Most importantly — He didn't stop hating me, and I didn't stop wondering what I was doing wrong. We found a balance. We found it for Dante's sake.

Rengoku wasn't the kind of place where people were happy. It was the kind of place where they lived and prayed and died. And yet, Dante was an ecstatic kid.

Why shouldn't he be? He had everything he'd ever wanted. He had V by his side, and he'd somehow roped me into joining their little adventure team. He didn't care about how temporary my existence was; refused to talk about it, unless it was to spit on my parents' lack of action. We would explore every inch of the town, go as far into the Forest as possible, make fun of the way the nuns sang at dawn.

There was only one problem in his life, as far as we were concerned: the Nine Rings.

I was used to them. We all were. Once every two weeks, the lines of suited men would come and demand our money. The town was theirs, they reminded us. The town was theirs and they protected it, and we should be thankful. They would stay the weekend: grab the nearest women and bring them to their cars, to the one motel in town; grab all the liquor from the bar; grab more money than what we owed them.

Whenever someone complained — a parent or a woman, an old man or a kid — they would grab their guns and shoot.

Rengoku's streets were cobblestoned. The blood was always hard to wash away. We stayed quiet through it.

Dante hated them with fierce passion. We would lock ourselves in their room whenever the visiting days came, and he would walk up and down and scream obscenities about them. The Nine Rings were the scum under his shoes. They had killed his and V's parents, he believed; that was why they'd been abandoned. They went around as if they owned it all, unpunished for all their crimes — rewarded for it, even.

Punishment was something of an obsession for him. His faith was severe, more like that of an adult than of a kid. He didn't need to be told to repent for the bad things he did; V and I would find him kneeling down in prayer whenever our games brought us to areas we weren't supposed to go to, whenever we stole something, whenever we did something wrong.

He would hit his own fingers and take away his own privileges. He would make us watch.

"Bad people deserve to be punished," was his second favorite sentence. "But not in secret. What's the point?"

"Bad people will be punished after their death," I would remind him. "That's what the nuns say."

"After death..." he would sigh, contemplative. "That's not fair, is it? Why do good people have to suffer here, but bad people can be happy here and suffer over there? It's not fair."

V would never say a word. I don't know what he thought about the whole thing; a part of me believes that he didn't agree with Dante's obsession. Perhaps it had more to do with the face he would make whenever self-inflicted pain struck his friend's features. Perhaps he didn't care about Dante punishing the rest of the world, as long as he didn't punish himself.

But Dante had a strict code for bad people. And to him, the Nine Rings were the worst people.

When I was thirteen, one of the Nine Rings decided I would be his entertainment. My parents tried to explain my sickness — I could barely run on a good day, and my heart was too frail to survive rawness. The man, of course, didn't care.

This is what I remember from that day: meeting Dante and V's horrified eyes as the man dragged me to his car. They were hiding behind a bush. I couldn't see it, but I knew V had his hand around Dante's sleeve, keeping him down. I remember being grateful for it; being grateful that at least one of my friends was smart enough to not challenge the unchallengeable.

And then I remember this: Dante mouthing me my own, very solution. That was how I found out he'd discovered my secret.

Perhaps I should be ashamed to say that I didn't hesitate. I'd been warned against revealing that part of me since the first accident, when my parents and I had discovered the only true cure to my illness and the reason I had one in the first place. Thirteen years of commands shouldn't have been so hard to forget. Perhaps I should be ashamed to say that I didn't feel a thing when the man dropped dead, one hand on his car door.

I'm not.

The Nine Rings couldn't understand how the man had died, but since the wind could have blown me away and he had no wounds, they stopped thinking about it. "He thought about fucking her too hard," was their laughing conclusion. Then they drove away.

Dante never forgot. And since he knew my secret, he decided it was time to reveal his own.

When I think about it, it's all rather amusing. We were three kids, and he thought our gifts were blessings. I thought they were weapons left in the wrong hands.

I don't know what V thought; I know he had started holding onto my sleeve too, had started looking all the way up to my nose — not my eyes, but it was better than before. I know Dante had decided we would do something about it all, about all the wrongness in the world, and we were stupid enough to believe him. He was so bright. Why shouldn't we?

Of course, it didn't work.

I remember that day better than I remember the death of the Nine Rings' man. We had locked ourselves in their room. I remember there was no blood, because that wasn't how it worked. I remember us three holding hands. I remember the way understanding had dawned upon Dante's face; how quick he'd been to cover it up with a coldness I'd never seen on him before.

Quick, yes, but not enough. And the blink of honesty I saw then is what haunts me at night.

It's the most foolish thing a man can do, I think, and yet they do it all the time. Not understand what something means until they feel its lack for the first time. This much I knew: Dante and V had been left on the doors of the Institute on the same day, and since then, they'd never been apart. This much I knew: Dante would have given V up for my sake. This much I knew: he was a liar, first and foremost to himself.

I remember V's eyes, the reassuring smile he'd offered Dante right before and the complex one he'd given me. He died, and I still don't know what it was supposed to mean.

I killed him, and I still don't know what it was supposed to mean.

Cowardice is an easy way out in the hardest races, and I was a sickly child. There was no blood in my hands, but our experiments had stained countless innocent travelers whose disappearance no one would notice and — most importantly, because I was and still am an egoistic child — I had caused the death of a person I loved. I had eaten and slept with my parents after killing a man from the Nine Rings. For some reason, I couldn't do it anymore.

Cowardice is an easy way out, so I took it. I ran, and I didn't stop until I reached Yokohama. I ran, and I didn't stop until the Nine Rings accepted to take me in.

There, I met one of those miracles Dante liked to talk so much about. There, I understood that Rengoku had never been anything but a prison — a bundle of shadows, each one darker than the one before. It had to be, I thought — it had to, because the man who took me in was light itself.

He was different from anyone I had met before. He grew me into someone who wouldn't fear looking at herself in the mirror. He taught me that there was more to me than illness and guilt from the past.

I lost him too.

In his name, I searched for a seal that would give me enough power to carry out his legacy. And to wash away V's blood from my hands, I started killing. To this day, his is still the first and only corpse I have nightmares about. To this day, I wonder if Dante ever did punish himself for that bad thing we did.

A woman came, a few years later, a demon on her shoulder and heartbreak on her bleeding chest. I dream of her, sometimes. I dream of Dante's hand holding mine under the stars, of V's dead eyes accusing me of ruining his life, of the one man who tried to save me and died for it.

But I dream of her the most, I feel. She tore the Nine Rings apart. She believed it.

A few months ago, another woman came: me.

---

...

---

There was a child, sleeping behind the bushes.

The Forest was bathed in sunlight, golden rays breaking through wild branches climbing to the sky in waves of falling leaves. The grass underneath him was wet with dew, filtering through his clothes. It was the warmest he had ever felt.

“She used to say she would cut your tongue off if you didn't quit it with the stuttering, didn't she?”

V was smiling. It was a distinctively unfriendly expression, no matter the curious eyes he kept on the sleeping child's frame, between his standing legs — a thousand miles from the man conversing on social anxiety pills with a stranger.

“Sometimes,” Dazai confirmed, sitting up. The grass reached his elbows; he ran his fingers through it, and offered: “She never did like metaphors.”

Birds sang from the branches. The woods went on and on from any and all sides he could drag his eyes too, infinite in an unrealistic way. Slumber rattled his bones; a lulling crib — he licked blood off his lip, and hummed along to the awakening of the scratches and bruises covering his body.

Explosion, he recalled. Explosion, and —

“Beatrice told us a story about a kid who got lost in the Forest,” Dazai said. He nodded towards the sleeping frame V was studying. “Was it him?”

“I don’t know,” V replied, shrugging, “Wasn’t it all of us?”

The child shifted. Bandages peeked under the hand he had dragged to his mouth, sticking his thumb in between scratched lips. Dazai had always carried his hair too long.

“Which part of this is real?” he asked. His right wrist ached in a strangely tactile way; when he looked down, he saw nothing but bandages.

V tilted his head to the side. His motions were that of a stranger; he inhabited his body as if unused to it. “Why do you ask?”

“Tenshi stole information on Abilities from our Archives,” Dazai explained, easily. “You already know Abilities don’t work on me. Still, this place is not real, clearly.”

“Clearly.”

He raised his arm; dangled his aching wrist. In the distance — a distance so wide, it might even outrun that Forest — he heard the metallic juggling of cuffs. A flash pulsing on his eyelids — stained glass windows, blood rushing to his feet, red hair and velvet gloves.

“I’m chained up somewhere,” he said. “I’m assuming you worked your cross-magic on Chuuya, but it wouldn’t work on me.”

“The Forest isn’t an Ability. It’s a landscape of miracles,” V blinked, somewhat patronizingly. “You can’t nullify holiness yet, can you?”

Dazai studied the never ending view. It tasted concrete under his fingertips; the rush of wind whipped his bleeding scratches with stubborn existence. “Maybe not. None of this is real. Are you?”

“Depends on who you ask.”

“I’m asking you.”

A new voice appeared, high between the trees — deeper than it had been that morning, dangling and twisting in the same waves it had in an old warehouse, behind an illegal fighting ring. “That might just be more complicated than you think.”

“Tenshi!” Dazai exclaimed, pleased. She was half-laying on a branch, black veil discarded and gown spread; somebody had made the unwise choice of putting a rifle in her hands. “You could have at least brought some wine along, when you betrayed us.”

V hummed. “On a first name basis, I see? That’s nice. My Beatrice here has never been good with friends.”

“You would fucking know,” She cocked her rifle.

“We should get to it,” V leaned down, pushing the sleeping child closer to the brush — hiding him from the kicking sun. “You should be Dazai Osamu, if my information is correct.”

“In the flesh,” He offered a bow.

“And your partner,” he continued, “You’ll forgive his absence. He’s currently dealing with his own sins with some version of us, somewhere in this forest. Not everyone can escape judgement as easily as you. Nakahara Chuuya is his name, correct?”

“Legally,” Dazai confirmed. “Alas, he’s not my partner. I have been attempting to convince my Boss to officially insert him in our database as my emotional support dog, but I fear it might be assumed he’s capable of offering — any sort of pacific support.”

“That’s good to know,” V said, distracted. “My name is Dante.”

The wind howled. Calmly, Dazai watched the child’s fingers twitch; his arms hug himself tighter.

“Forgive my question,” he started. His wrist was still aching; if he moved his hand just so, he thought he could knock his knuckles against another pair. “But have you sinned in dishonesty at a local pharmacy, lately?”

Dante laughed. “I apologize for that. The person you spoke to was V. I wouldn’t have been so merciful as to advise you to leave me be, but he’s always had too big of a heart. It’s all right. I forgive him.”

“How compassionate,” Dazai said. “But does he want your forgiveness? Did he ask for it? Otherwise, it’s somewhat unfair.”

He smiled.

“Unfair,” the man echoed. He tilted his head; set his eyes on Tenshi’s distracted, empty-eyed frame, traits softening and hardening at once. “It is all so very unfair, don’t you think?”

“The confessional is in the town,” he let him know. “I can take you there, if you want.”

Tenshi snorted. “Your partner said something very similar. A bit more prude, though.”

“Not my —“

“He said that, too,” she cut through.

“It is unfair, don’t you think?” Dante said, once again, as if he hadn’t heard a thing. He looked at him with something like pity in his eyes. “Being given a world at our disposal, and being told most of what we do with it is sin.”

Dazai shrugged, raising a hand. “I wasn’t really raised religious.”

“You were raised guilty. We all were. Knowing mistakes will go unpunished as long as they can burn bright enough to leave a sigh,” The man frowned; he kicked the grass in a too-childish move. “What if you can’t? What if flares want heaven as well?”

Watching the man morph his features into any sentiment was disorienting. His face was undoubtedly V’s, crooked nose and young features — even his shirt sported a cartoonish pun, this time involving monks.

“So that’s it,” Dazai concluded. “You’re playing God in the name of flares. Is it fun?”

“Not really,” Dante sighed. “Used to be. Used to be harder, too, though. Goodness and badness are complicated to see through human eyes — the weight of responsibility used to crush me.”

“You could simply not do it,” he proposed.

“Oh, no. I have to,” He tilted his head to the side, again. Blinked. “Your partner doesn’t agree. Sort of marvelous, how he’s able to concentrate on what I’m saying, despite the — Oh.”

Tenshi snorted again, disgraceful. “A child who has been given a powerful Ability, and who’s convinced himself it gives him the right to do whatever he wants — he says. ”

“How hypocritical,” Dante huffed. “Isn’t that basically what he is? Gods tend to lack humbleness, I suppose. Say, Dazai, how come you didn’t tell him you knew Rengoku was a trap? It got him killed, after all.”

A beat of silence passed. Dazai got the feeling it wasn’t either Dante or Beatrice’s pause.

“I did try to communicate it,” he offered, at last, unconcerned. “The wonders of Morse Code. Overestimating the intellect of slugs is a lesson I will certainly not forget.”

“You don’t seem worried.”

“Not particularly,” he confirmed.

“So young, and yet so deeply stained,” Dante murmured. “I would like to believe your dreams are tormented, but I’m not so sure. I felt it, when you were tormenting my Tenshi — The leaking fault. ”

Dazai nodded, interested. “If that’s what you want to call it.”

“You have some gal, calling yourself human.”

His lips twitched upwards. “But there’s nothing to do about the dog, correct? If I understand your Abilities correctly, you’ve managed to reach a Singularity. Not much to do against one of those.”

On the branch, Tenshi tensed up. “What did that bitch tell you about my Ability?”

“That’s not a very nice way to refer to your brainwash-less self,” Dazai tutted. “Your walking dead army — They’re not quite dead, but they’re certainly not alive. I’m assuming they’re stuck in a limbo. Some place not different from this one — the people calling you The Poet swear you can give them an Heaven.”

“Or an Inferno,” Dante confirmed. “They can come forward as they like — Repent, offer their bodies for a chance at forgiveness. It doesn’t mean they will all get the same afterlife. It would be,” A smile. “Unfair.”

“Except it’s not an afterlife. It’s a never ending hallucinations — an excuse to use their corpses.”

“They are certainly not aware of it. Where’s the harm? I need hands, and they need judgement.”

“To be clear,” Dazai asked. “What’s the scale, here? Yokohama? The world? Have you been gathering these —“

“Souls,” Tenshi spoke up, at his pause, bored. “That’s what he calls us.”

“Yes. How poetic!”

“I’m glad you think so,” Dante commented. “To answer your question — Places hardly matter. We shall all be judged. It might take a while, but everyone will return where they rightfully belong.”

“Yokohama is just the beginning, then,” Dazai concluded. “The testing field.”

“Something akin to it. I have to say, this city is certainly a lair of devils of its own right. It was hardly difficult — finding sinners. You just have to look.”

He settled his eyes on Tenshi’s rifle. “And what is the difference between those sinners and her?”

“For one,” Dante said, “She will never die.”

“But everyone else will, if you release the grasp of your Abilities on them.”

“Once everyone has received their judgement, I will see no reason to keep an army alive.”

“But you can never be done with it,” he replied. “Because Tenshi will certainly get sick again if she doesn’t use her Ability, doesn’t she?”

The man’s face seemed to fracture itself — the moving ground of a beginning earthquake, rattling the sunlight only as far as it would wash it. No word came from the woman on the branch — she threw her rifle into the grass, right at Dante's feet, and stared at the sky with a blankness that could not be natural.

"At least, gaining from what Beatrice told us," Dazai continued, undeterred. "She spent her childhood sickly and tormented by what she could do — until she killed that Nine Rings man. Perhaps it has something to do with life forces," He blinked up at her. "People die after you greet them, don't they?"

It took Dante mere seconds to reconstruct himself — an exercise in the name of expertise; the modeling he put his more-alive puppets through. "I'm impressed," he admitted. "Perhaps I shouldn't be. You are missing one single piece."

"Which is?"

He leaned down on the grass — picked up the rifle. His fingers caressed it, as if they could still find trace of Tenshi's skin on it. "My Ability — Divine Comedy — allows my voice to influence only people who are thirty three seconds from death."

He whistled. "How specific."

"Was a pain to discover," he agreed. "Of course, it was all meant to create balance. Powerful Abilities require conditions — It might just make their User less inclined to use them. It's all about containing human nature — Isn't it, Nakahara?"

No answer. Subtly, Dazai moved his fingers in the grass, pressing against the cold metal and the flash that wasn't there — searching.

"Anyway," Dante shook his head. "I was lucky enough to find my other half. The one who completes me. And not in a Singularity, as you seem to believe — Simply in a perfect match."

"My Ability completes you," Tenshi muttered. "Not me. Or else you wouldn't change my personality like a spinning wheel."

Inconsolable, Dante murmured: "Your reluctance sticks with every single one of them, though, does it not?" He sighed. "I wish forcing you to use your Ability on yourself hadn't been necessary. So Gentle And Virtuous She Appears is a gift for the eyes, but your corpse wasn't one I ever wished to hold."

A veil of disgust covered her face. "That's how I know you're not trying to emulate V, at the very least. He would have loved that shit."

"She kills them," Dazai summarized. "Then, with that nice wristwatch she has, I assume you count down seconds — Her Ability doesn't kill instantly. And once the right time arrives —

"I come in," Dante concluded, still gazing adoringly at his companion. "Isn't it just harmonic? Judgement Day, brought by the first man and the first woman. Punishment and reward, gifted by love itself."

"Say, why is the Port Mafia going to be judged among the first ones?"

His smile widened. “You understand — It is rather complicated to create Souls in your beloved Yokohama, when you people work so hard to keep all the sinners to yourself. Your beloved balance has to tip left or right, at some point. It is inevitable. I’m ready to be the tiebreaker.”

“Oh,” he sighed. “I know someone who will be terribly happy about that.”

“Putting an end to you might take some time — But we have waited millennia for Judgement Day,” Dante continued. “My Souls should be launching their first attack right now, I believe — Tenshi did tell me it was best to begin when you two were out of the city.”

His arm was rattled — viciously enough that it pressed against his eyelids — visions of stained glass windows, of the silence — of Chuuya’s rage, dangling next to him from hanging chains. Fucker, he thought he heard. He wondered what Chuuya’s limbo looked like. Fucker —

“Worst of all,” Dazai sighed, “Chuuya’s sticky hand is touching me. This truly is a bad day.”

Dante chuckled. “The Demon Prodigy and his thousands of secrets. It’s a true shame I will never be able to see your limbo. How many plans are you hiding under those bandages of yours?”

“Who knows!” he sing-sang. “Perhaps not even one. You?”

“Me?” The man showed him his naked hands. “I’m not hiding anything. I’ve been sent here to punish those who believe they can stain this world with their dirt and not receive any punishment. God is real — so are his chastisements. Unfortunately, they take too much time to arrive.” A sigh. “It’s not fair, is it? The people they hurt deserve to watch them suffer while they’re alive. What’s the point, otherwise?”

“That’s why you chose the Nine Rings, ” he guessed. “Because they were destroyed before you could get to them. You caught two birds with one stone: got Tenshi back and created them back from dust just to torture them.”

“Precisely,” Dante nodded, enthusiastically. “But do not fear. Most of your mafiosi aren’t like them. The civilians, either! The dreams I sent to them are beautiful. Now, they don’t have to worry about a single thing. They can rest in their hearts’ deepest desires and give me their hands.”

Devotion dropped from his eyes; he started at Tenshi through blinding sunrays. “Life is much more beautiful when you don’t have to worry about living it yourself. Isn’t it, my love?”

She opened her mouth, leg dangling from the branch, abhorrence dropping down her cheeks.

Abruptly, her features went blank.

With hazed eyes, she agreed: “Yes, it is.”

“How romantic,” Dazai observed. “You love her so much, you left her in our dungeons.”

Webs bloomed on the window of his features. “I never asked you to hurt her.”

“You knew it would happen,” he replied. “You know our numbers. The blood on our hands. You want me to believe you don’t know our methods?”

“George Kingstain is paying the price of his crimes,” Dante insisted, eyes still focused on Tenshi.

“Because you made him one of yours.”

“And because one of yours killed him on sight,” the man sighed, contentedly. “The Port Mafia doesn’t forgive traitors easily, do you? It was certainly one bother less. I only regret not being able to feel his demise. My Ability doesn’t go that far.”

“Still, he died a member of the Nine Rings,” he let him know. As subtly as he could, he raised his arm, dragging his wrist up. A scar, he thought, there’s a scar right on Chuuya’s — “And he died attempting to hurt her. You certainly cared less than you did at fourteen —”

Dante’s fingers clenched around the rifle, and without even moving his gaze from Tenshi to aim, he shoot a bullet right through his shoulder.

He felt lighting in quick motion — the rumble of the rifle, echoing across the trees, not even moving the child under the bushes from his sleep; the pulsing wetness in his skin, the muscles of his arm on fire, the grazed skin of a wrist that wasn’t his — of a scar.

A beat late, he felt the pain.

Two beats later, he was hanging from his wrists inside the abandoned Institute, only one of them connected to familiar skin — and then a bone was snapping, and a bullet was being fired, and someone was groaning, and he was falling and falling and falling — and he was landing.

Under the bushes, thumb in his mouth, the child slept.

---

...

---

There was a scar on Chuuya’s wrist.

The sky was red the first time Dazai saw it — a thunderstorm with no lightning, framed by crimson clouds raining divine blood onto a field in the outskirts of Yokohama. He had forgotten to bring a marker, so his hands were free. Chuuya's nose tickled his ribs. He had gathered his gloves and put them in his pocket.

A small, black dot — right at the end of his palm, where two blue veins intertwined between fading freckles. Stained; something was stuck under the skin — not trying to get out, not trying to unravel. There.

He made sure Dante's bullet would graze it.

Chuuya's solution to the signal, he discovered, hanging from the ceiling of the Institute — was to snap his own thumb to free his hand, grab Dazai's gun, and shoot the chains keeping them hanging.

From then, it was white noises — one side of his body dropped, leaving all his weight to be held by his injured arm. Pain travelled like spreading webs on a glass throughout his body, the hole in his shoulder widening with every breath.

Gunshots echoed; Dazai's head landed on the concrete with enough violence to raise vertigo.

The crash of Chuuya's body was distinctively louder. When he felt his body only half drop onto his own, pulled by the point of contact keeping their palms attached — a metal band crashing their hands so close he couldn't feel blood pulsing — he pulled him off the destroyed pew.

"Your hand," he croaked. He settled his free hand on his shoulder, unsurprised by the warm blood he found on his fingers — his other one spasmed in its cage, desperate for space. "Your — Can you —"

"Come on," Chuuya replied. Urgency mixed with ache, making him sound as drunk as he had after Beatrice's wine. "The water will —" He paused; a slip up. "We need to — He's attacking the Headquarters."

His stumbling body almost fell against his own; Dazai blindly grabbed his arm to keep him from collapsing. He heard him hiss, dragging their chained wrists to his injured hand to cradle it.

"You're under their Abilities," Dazai said. His tongue felt like sand. He had the vague idea of standing up, somewhere in his head — the stained glass windows were beautiful to look at, despite the dust. "I can't nullify it without them."

"Tough shit," Chuuya climbed to his feet, the bundle of bone and blood held to his chest shaking. He was dragged up. "They might have left hours ago. The attack might have started hours ago — It's getting dark outside, who knows how long we've —"

A strange sound came from behind the heavy doors. A march; the howling wind. Blood kept oozing off the wound on his shoulder; his eye was blurred. He listened to the heartbeat on the wrist pressing against his, and asked: "What did he show you?"

“None of your fucking business,” Chuuya snapped. He took one trembling step forward; then a more confident one. “I’m killing that motherfucker and getting out of this mind control shit. No thanks to you.”

“You’ll be dead in twenty seven seconds.”

“I know.”

“You can’t just up and kill him or —“

“I know, can you —“ He breathed out from his nostrils, only offering him his shoulders. “You knew it was a trap. Stop acting like you didn’t expect this to happen. Tell me when you’re feeling just magnanimous enough to let me know why it had to, and move .”

Dazai stared.

It’s rude to analyze the unaware, Mori would have tutted — amused in that way that meant he could keep going, but he would be reprimanded; just for the fun of it. The fascinating loses shimmer once it knows itself special, though, doesn’t it?

Trust, he considered. Perhaps it was the blood loss, pooling under their leather shoes. Foolishness?

“I tapped your hand,” he said, curiously.

That got him to finally turn, even as he forced their joint hands to pull the doors open, unmatching eyes on fire. “You tapped my hand.”

“Port Mafia silent escape plan,” Dazai clarified. “Three taps on the knuckle mean bomb nearby. All the lower ranks know.”

“I was taken in by Boss’ right hand man the day I joined,” Chuuya replied, incredulous. “I didn’t know. You tapped my fucking hand?”

A weight slammed against the doors.

He ripped his gun from Chuuya’s limp grasp, leaning his ear onto the wood to listen.

“There’s at least three of them,” he concluded. Better to strategize; better than whatever that convo has meant to be. He studied their joined wrists. “If I get you free, you can use your Ability to —“

“We’ll need to steal a car, if the Souls came with vehicles. The station must be closed by now,” Chuuya interrupted him, gulping down the way he clenched his wounded hand in a fist. “And someone needs to fight against whoever they’ll send. We can’t both have one hand incapacitated, and your shoulder —“

“And you can’t break both your hands,” Dazai added. “Or we won’t be able to help home. So —“

“You need to kill them. I can try and steal a rifle from whoever you put down, but —” He grimaced — handling a trigger with a broken thumb wasn’t the best idea.

He tapped the injury on his shoulder with the tip of the gun, exploiting the electric jolts to wake himself up. “Alright, then.”

He raised his gun and pushed the doors open.

A reconstruction of the scene would only appear much later in his mind — the lifeless glares of raggedly-dressed women and men, their mechanical motion pointing weapons at their faces; the setting sun painting the ruins of Rengoku blood red. Through the haze of pain, Dazai pulled the trigger until his thumb needed no orders, and ran.

Well directioned pushes from Chuuya were the eyes on the back of his head; more and more Souls appeared from every ruined street, the once busy people inside the houses joining the fight with empty eyes.

By the tenth bullet he had put into a man’s forehead, they managed to step close enough to the convulsing body for Chuuya to grab his fallen revolver — and to notice.

“They’re getting up again,” he said, pulling the other boy behind a fallen wall. On the other side was the apocalypse — crawling figures holding onto their weapons, marching and climbing and writhing no matter the bleeding gashes of their bodies.

“They won’t stop until we cut their legs off,” Chuuya spat out. Now that he saw him under the full light, Dazai noticed the lingering signs of the explosion on his body — whatever healing consequences Dante’s power had, they couldn’t do it all.

One particularly nasty cut went across his cheekbones, climbing the bridge of his nose and separating his face in two halves — something that would certainly scar. “They might crawl with their arms, actually. But we can’t waste so much time.”

It was with an unexplainable sizzling shiver down his ribs — that Dazai realized he hadn’t seen his naked hands in an endless while.

Abruptly, he pulled him down. The rain of bullets running on top of their heads bounced uselessly on a mountain of rubble at their backs.

“Some of them aren’t from the town,” he said. “I recognize them from the missing files, so they must have —”

“There,” Chuuya hissed, pointing their joined hands to the further end of the town. “Cars.”

“They might chase us.”

“Better on wheels than on foot.” His destroyed fingers gripped the revolver; a jolt of suffering struck his body. Still, he pulled his chin up. “Run.”

Bullets flew behind them, their rhythmic melody a disturbing contrast to the absolute silence the Souls fought and fell with. Dazai shot them down with ease, his aim trustable as ever — and somewhat useless, given their resilience to stand up again.

With an unfamiliar sort of thrill, he let himself fall into a seamless dance — pulled by a single breath out of Chuuya's mouth; unhesitant about leaving his shoulders naked.

I always end up thinking you'll understand, Dazai thought. He wondered if it could have been an apology, with different people. That was how it worked. He offered a hand and Chuuya knew which finger to grab — he gave an inch and Chuuya shouldered his way inside every plan he came up with, fit where he shouldn't, stole a mile.

Jelly legs managed to do their job, dragging them to the short row of pricey black cars crowding the entrance of the town. They crunched down behind them, running along to the rain of bullets digging into the other side of the vehicles — until Dazai shot the window of a car.

Under the deafening burglar alarm, Chuuya punched the webbed glass, sticking his hands in.

They crawled inside. Dazai settled on the driver seat, their joint wrists falling on the gear shift out of necessity — he slammed the door shut right as a bullet passed through the destroyed window, lighting-quick in brushing Chuuya's nose.

The boy let out an embarrassingly high yelp, voice cracking. "Start the fucking car!"

Dazai's shoulder protested the tight grip of his fingers around the steering wheel. His eyes ran across the dashboard.

He gulped.

"Hello?" Chuuya insisted, violently trying to locate their chasers in the rear view mirror. Bleeding fingers shaking around the revolver, he put a bullet in every car wheel he managed to reach. "Hurry up!"

The rear window exploded — pierced by two more bullets. They lowered, knees bumping against the car, under the storm-like sound of marching on cobblestones.

"What are you waiting for — "

He threw up the truth from whining lips. "I don't know how to drive."

A pause. Chuuya's glare could have destroyed Rengoku a second time. "What?"

"I said I don't know how to —"

"I heard what you said!"

"Why would you ask then —"

"It's colloquial!"

Irritation pulsed between his eyebrows. "That's not what that word means —"

The outside mirror imploded next.

“Can you just — “

“I never learned!” Dazai insisted, throwing his gun in Chuuya’s lap to search for a key. His feet danced on the pedals. “There’s always someone from the organization dragging me around — Hirotsu says I’m not old enough to drive, anyway —“

“Are you fucking kidding me?”

“I’m fifteen!”

“You’re a mafioso!”

“Why don’t you drive since you’re so smart?”

Chuut’s eyes widened a single fraction. His lips parted — then fell closed again.

He pressed his hands on his eyes until he saw stars. “You don’t know how to drive either.”

“Listen —

“You don’t know how to — “

“— Albatross promised to teach me — the Flags had a whole success or failure party in plans, some stupid shit involving two different cakes — “

“How do you not know how to drive? You have a motorcycle!”

“That is not the same — I know how to parallel park, Lippman — Well — He did say to just leave it anywhere hydrants wouldn’t explode —”

“That’s useless!”

“How don’t you know it, asshole? Fucking burgeoise-kid looking —“

“Excuse me?”

“— what, you think there were cars in Suribachi City? It was a crater!”

Unannounced, the neck of a rifle pierced through the glassless window of Chuuya’s door. The mouth brushed Dazai’s temple, pushing the redhead’s back into his seat like a crowbar on his neck. He met a woman’s hazed eyes — her finger tickled the trigger.

“Start the car,” Chuuya croaked out, choked by the weight. “Start the fucking car!”

Dazai’s fingers stuck the key in the ignition. He turned it, then slammed both his feet down.

By some miracle, one of them managed to hit the accelerator, right as Chuuya raised their trapped wrists and pushed the rifle away from his temple. The stray bullet scratched the frame of the windshield, landing between his legs — the Soul was pushed away by the impact.

“Go, go!” Chuuya ordered, coughing. “Push something.”

“That’s useful,” Dazai replied. He smashed his fingers on the buttons surrounding the satnav. “You know, this would be a wonderful suicide scenario if you weren’t —“

A mechanical, vaguely female voice filled the panicked silence: “You will reach your destination in: three hundred and seventy-four hours.”

“Not that!”

“Shut up!”

Dazai grabbed the gear shift with his handcuffed hand and pulled. The car started moving backwards; he heard a promising crunch! and the thump of the armed woman falling from the hit.

“Forward! Forward, not —“

“Can you die?” he snapped.

“It’s like Motor Race III —“

“This is nothing like —“

He moved the gear in the opposite direction and stepped on what he assumed was the accelerator — with a roar that couldn’t be good for the wellbeing of the engine, the car flew forward, clumsily rolling down the hill.

“Can’t you go straight?” Chuuya protested, by the third time he was violently pushed against his car door. “Watch the bush —“

“There’s no way this is so complicated,” Dazai muttered, ignoring him. His feet stumbled on the three pedals, abruptly braking and restarting the journey. His headrest gave a new shape to the back of his skull. “I’ve flown a helicopter, this can’t —“

A bullet divided the air between their seats, breaking out a spider web on the windshield. They turned their heads, searching over the back window.

“Shit, ” Chuuya cursed, fumbling with the two guns in his lap. Black cars were speeding behind them, soaring down the hill to catch up. A man was leaning out of his window, rifle pointed in their direction. “Go faster —“

“I can’t go faster than this,” Dazai insisted. The pulsing of his shoulder had become a background noise, pressing against his eyes with the viciousness of poison. He paused. “I don’t think.”

“The thing says you can go up to 160 —“

“I don’t think that’s possible —“

“That’s what the speedometer says.”

“Why do you know it’s called a speedometer and not how to drive a car?”

“Shut up!” Chuuya’s injured hand grabbed the stolen revolver, bleeding down on the metal in its attempt to close around it. The boy’s curses didn’t help the process. “Just, drive, I’ll —“

He curled his body onto the space between the seats, breaking Dazai’s injury even further apart with the pull. Squinting, he began firing at their chasers.

Peeking into the rear view mirror, Dazai’s heart fell lower than his stomach.

Faster than his mind could follow, he traced their steps back to the first moment they had grabbed the weapon from the fallen Soul. An old conversation resurfaced into his mind — and abruptly, the lack of slowing down from the cars behind them made sense.

“You don’t know how to shoot,” he concluded.

Chuuya elbowed him in the side of the head — maybe involuntarily. “Fuck you, I do.”

“You evidently don’t!” He started laughing, disbelieving, car skirting between trees. “Have you ever even held a gun?”

“Of course I have —“

“For any other reason than stealing the bullets and throwing them with your Ability?”

Chuuya fired another shot; from the mirror, Dazai watched it destroy the left light of the first car stalking them. “I — It’s just a better method!”

The aggravation to overcome his brain seemed to freeze it; he felt every bone in his body curl up, ready to choke the life out of him. “You’re genuinely stupid, aren’t you.”

Another elbow. “If you could stop and throw bullets with your fucking hands, would you use a gun, fucking smartass?”

“Yes!” he pointed out, agitating their joined wrists. “For situations like these!”

“How was I supposed to know?”

Dazai groaned, tightening his fingers around the steering wheel and pushing forward. The side-view window had been long destroyed — at least one of the tires had been hit, if the jumping rhythm of their run meant anything.

The car swerved up and down the rough street, skirting along the tall trees framing the road. A familiar view appeared at the edge of his vision — an alternative path.

“What are you doing?” Chuuya protested, when the sharp turn he took dropped him on his wounded shoulder. Dazai focused the lighting strikes of pain down his leg, pushing on the accelerator as they followed the nonexistent passage through the trees.

The branches they ripped off as they went drew lines down the painting of the car, and one of them managed to get a few leaves stuck in his hair. “Are they still following?”

“Yes! And you’re closing us in!”

With a shot that, miraculously, managed to make the armed woman behind them drop forward, Chuuya pulled himself up again. Dazai felt a bullet hit the back of his seat, the impact throwing him onto the steering wheel mercilessly — dragging the other boy down with him.

He spluttered: “Stop pulling me!”

“You stop pulling me. I’m trying to drive.”

“And you’re being shit at it —“

“And you’re shit at shooting and driving, so who’s worse?”

“I drive a motorcycle just fine!”

“Yeah,” he spat out, shivering. “Sure you do.”

The margin of the shortcut was an intersection, the natural road stabbed by familiar train tracks. Dazai frowned, searching through Chuuya’s curses, the sound of bullets and the fatigued car, and his fogged up mind. Another instrument joined the chaos of sinphony.

He stilled.

He pulled the wheel all the way down again. Chuuya yelped, thrown backwards by the motion, as he landed messily against the dashboard. A trail of blood pooled down his temple and cheek; he snapped: “What are you doing —“

The car swerved, dragging several branches down and repainting its side in the patterns of the ancient trees. The wheels almost gave up under the sudden pressure of the tracks, as he pushed on the accelerator until they accepted to climb up.

“Are you — driving on the train tracks?” Chuuya’s eyes widened. “Dude, even I know you can’t — there’s a bridge!”

Dazai kept his eyes forward. “Yes, Chuuya.”

“You want to drag this thing on a bridge with no railings?”

“Not exactly.”

The car skipped, throwing both of them to the side. Their handcuffed hands grabbed the gear shift, using it to hold onto their seat. He waited to find their chasers in the rear view mirror again, waited until the wheels climbed up the tracks on the bridge, then turned to find Chuuya's eyes. "Hey. You ever seen the Water Demon music video?"

Something in the gaze the boy offered him told him he believed the shoulder wound had permanently gotten to his head. "Shit, Boss will kill me if I made you stupid."

"Just answer the question!"

"The Hirose one?" Chuuya rambled, eyes on the approaching cars. "I mean — Once? Maybe? Her Pop phase was kind of disappointing —"

"You lack taste," Dazai snapped. "Chuuya."

He met his eyes.

Realization lit his face up in several colors. Slowly, he turned to study the sides of the bridge. The Kitanai Kawa stared right back at him, grey waters meeting funerary eyes.

"Oh," he said, lowering his eyes to their joint wrists. A stray bullet passed right by his cheek — it was less deadly than the grin slowly making his way to his face. "Oh, I despise you."

Dazai slammed his foot on the accelerator. Right as the chasing cars crowded close enough to bump against their hood, he turned the wheel all the way to the right — hurling their car off the bridge.

The fall was a series of snapshots — the sudden lack of footing, the rush of wind through the shattered windows, the grunt out of Chuuya's lips as he pressed against his car door, pushing it open. Ungloved, and thus unfamiliar fingers strangled his own; Dazai didn't know how long it took for them to intertwine.

With a pull that seemed to widen his wound until the chasm went all around his shoulder blade, he was dragged out of the car, into a free fall towards the river.

"Now!" Chuuya called.

Dazai gritted his teeth, plastering his caged hand as close as possible to the metal of the cuff — pressing and pulling until it hurt, pulsing along to the blood drooling down his chest. It only worked for a single second — but their hands were separated.

Combat shoes landed on the side of the car; it shone crimson and bright against the falling sun, that unnatural light bleeding from Chuuya's tense frame. His hair floated around his head like a halo — Dazai searched for the sun behind him, and couldn't find it.

"Blow them to pieces!" he sing-sang.

The car bounced back with the swiftness of a feather — when it struck against the cars gathered on the bridge, it weighed more than the entire structure.

Gold bloomed in the sky, the explosion rocking the earth with the might of the apocalypse. It was so white it was blinding; it thumped against his ears until he could hear nothing but screeching white noises and his own blood.

All-encompassed in that deaf darkness, hand bleeding from the released effort of separation, he felt fingers intertwine with his own.

Then, they were falling.

Chapter End Notes

things i looked up while writing this chapter

- trading terms
- english for secretary
- is french an actual language
- scar textures
- yosano akiko, pictures

trivia: the police dog, tadeo, carries the most common japanese dog name i could find (according to my friend); moreso, the name means “courageous”.

introducing officer matsuda, who we won't see for the last time! murase and chuuya's relationship was one of the most interesting parts of stormbringer, in my opinion — so i decided to explore some of it with a similar character. his bond to murase is entirely made up, of course; but i do think it isn't too unbelievable that he might have had some support in his sheep-observing business. hope you'll like him see you next time <3

AT

Chapter Summary

The sun wasn't yellow, he found. The thing dragging him to the border was red and stubborn. With ferocious intensity, he hated him for it.

His contempt had never stopped Nakahara Chuuya from doing a thing, though. Pushing against the invisible force plastering them down, they swam to the white circle on their glass roof.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter vi.

---

Case number: 72937783

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. took part in the attack issued by [...]*

---

He despised ties the most.

They weren't as all-encompassing as other pieces of fabric his carcass twirled inside of — they didn't stick to his skin like teeth in wet concrete when it was summer, like the bandages. They didn't frame his wrists and his calves and his ribs, butterfly-thin and everywhere, just another reminder of a corporeality he had not asked for.

It wasn't that he didn't want a body. It was more of a distant jealousy — the knowledge that he might not have had it, and it might have been better.

The ties, he explained to a cat, once, so perfectly knotted around his neck, lighter than the bandages but less detested by Mori's eyes — pay attention, he had tutted, behind him, arms encircling his shoulders to tie it for him, never mind that he already knew how, if bloodied, you should at least look respectable — the ties have one defect: they aren't nearly long enough to hang himself from.

Sinking, he found another: they stole air.

Dear, she would say, dear, breathe.

Pain exploded in the bridge connecting his neck and shoulder. Electric shocks forcefully separated his eyelids, allowing the dense water to blur his eyes. It was dirty, somewhat sour on his tongue when a storm of bubbles surrounded him. There was nothing to see — nothing to hear but the muffled rush of water and the aching cries of his shoulder.

Oh, Dazai thought, with sudden clarity.

He raised one hand and fought the heavy waters to slam it on his own mouth, relaxing every muscle of his body. Oh, this is perfect.

Every inch of him protested the abdication, kicking and punching and tearing the walls of water down in an effort to swim up. There were rocks in his pockets, he dreamed. There were rocks in his pockets, and he was going to die. There were —

Red thunder flashed in the glass of his eyes, slashing one straight line through the darkness. For a moment, he thought the smeared traces floating in front of him were blood.

Hands cupped his cheeks, shaking him so violently the bones of his nape creaked. The darkness bloomed into a blue-and-gold so bright it felt slightly unnatural — into red serpents curling in the water and caged by a familiar, despised piece of clothing.

A rope clenched around his lungs, squashing them until his head started spinning; he was pulled up.

The sun wasn't yellow, he found. The thing dragging him to the border was red and stubborn. With ferocious intensity, he hated him for it.

His contempt had never stopped Nakahara Chuuya from doing a thing, though. Pushing against the invisible force plastering them down, they swam to the white circle on their glass roof.

As soon as they broke the surface, jaws falling to suck in as much air as possible, they regretted it.

Dazai's bullet wound became a secondary concern — the flames that littered every inch of his skin, eyes, and lungs took precedence. A prickling sensation climbed inside his mouth — a throat ache he initially attributed to his desperate gulps of air.

Keeping his eyes open made his head pulse. Mud was everywhere — under his bandages, under his eyelids, inside his mouth, on the walls of his lungs, in the tender skin of his wound. Breathing was a painful chore, the air itself turning into venom.

Somewhere over the beating of his heart, he could hear Chuuya's wild breathing pattern and sharp motions. Every step got them underwater again, until the world became a rhythmic alternation of blurred and muffled followed by scorching confusion.

"Shore," he heard his voice croak, "Now."

They tossed and turned against the currents, reaching out blindly until their hands grasped the rocks and grass of the shore. Dazai's shoulder broke in two halves with every haul — Chuuya's destroyed hand could barely even keep upright.

He made peace with the possibility of that poisonous monster devouring his eyes — he could feel pustules and burn marks appear on every inch of uncovered skin, seeping under his clothes and drawing flames on his chest.

"The," he heard Chuuya choke out, half a scream and half a cry, knelt on the ground. "The houses — the, we need to — melt my fucking skin —"

His sight had been reduced to clean stains of the world on a dirty window; they stumbled their way up the hill. The house was a small square of bricks covered in ivy. Broken cobblestones lead to a front door that only came down after they slammed both their bodies onto it, heavily enough to make Dazai's head spin.

Ignoring their throbbing skins, they drunkenly made their way up and down blurred rooms, uncoordinated and feverish. Bruises bloomed all over his skin from every piece of furniture he was pushed against, every fall caused by blindly stepping on each other's feet up the stairs. It took three tries to find a bathroom on the wrecked balcony of the first floor — all the other doors locked, too far and too useless — and a string of curses coming out of Chuuya's mouth when he mistakenly used his shattered hand to punch a hole through the first door.

Dazai registered a tiled floor and blue walls, the rising moonlight painting a white cloud of light on ancient looking furniture — a bathtub, towered by a shower-head slowly dripping on the dirty marble.

“Fuck,” Chuuya was still chanting, hysterically, as he dragged him to the shower. Pain seethed through his every word, voice rough as he gulped down those watered flames. Their hands, destroyed and tied and pale, fumbled with the faucet, clicking until the stream of water started raining from the shower head. “Fuck, motherfucker, it burns —“

Everything was black, was red, was blue, was the white of the lighting slashing wounds inside his skull, inside his wound, on his knee when he bumped it against the marble to hurry inside that saving cage. The first droplets of water hitting his skin felt like heaven; the moment his battered skin registered their touch, though, it only burned harder.

His back hit the wall, his feet slipping on the wet ground. The rain cleaned his eyes, sank its nails on the mud on his face and hands and body and tore it apart with no mercy. A stranger — familiar, enemy — body fought him for the cold water spotlight; they pushed and kicked and punched and fell and stood up again.

“The, the clothes —“ Dazai gasped. His bandages merged with his skin a bit more every second, seething and hissing against the burn marks and the pus and the pustules. “It’s — sticking —“

The shoving away turned into dragging closer, as handcuffed hands did their best to tear their owner's clothes apart quicker than the other. The tie, he thought, the tie first, the weight of Mori's elbows on his shoulders, his breath near his ear. Chuuya's hat ended up somewhere in the sink, his pants upon the shower head. His coat, still around the boy's shoulder, fell to the ground with a metal clank. The pills, he thought. The pills —

Nothing had ever felt as good as the tip tap of the water drops on his marred flesh — he could feel every single of them; could feel it slip down his throat.

“Your — the bandages,” Chuuya croaked, rubbing his hands on his eyes. A half curse of pain escaped from his lips — forgetting his incapacitated hand. “The skin, you need to —“

“Don't.” His body was starting to fully register how cold the shower was — that it was still winter outside, that he was wounded, that he wasn't alone, that he was alive. Teeth battering, he threatened, in Mori's voice, in a fool's plea: “Don't touch me —“

“You need to clean the skin —“

“Don't —“

“I’m turning around,” Chuuya snapped. “I’m turning around , just — do something about it.”

Flesh, he thought. His vision was filled with it. Skin, he scratched the previous idea with, because the valleys of his tongue were ugly and dirty, and jealousy wasn’t an excuse to explore them. There were spiral scars on his back too, he noticed, chased by raindrops and lines of red that might be hair and might be blood. He stood there, under the storm, and it was flesh, it was skin, it was a boy his age. He wore red underwear.

Dazai’s lungs felt inhabited, his bones overweight.

“I’m not going to watch,” the only thing alive for miles swore. His hand was a red mess, dropping blood on the marble of the bathtub, a living wound just reopened. He could see it shudder. The thumb was all wrong. “Just — hurry up.”

He stood there, watching that fake rain slip down the too pale, too unfamiliar skin. The bandages hung from the edge of his elbows, from his shoulders, in his useless fingers. You’re gonna ruin your depth perception. He opened his mouth, then shut it again, so heavily he bit his tongue.

Tasting blood, he readjusted his flesh upon his skeleton. He declared: “I’m done.”

Promptly, his knees gave up on their quest. Their joint wrists dragged the other boy down as well; in a mess of limbs and blood and mud, Dazai’s head hit the wall, under Chuuya’s curses.

“Your wound,” he muttered, once he managed to breathe in, so quiet it was barely audible over the rush of water.

Dazai followed the direction of his gaze, finally studying the result of Dante’s rage. The bullet was still there, visible and stubborn, surrounded by pink skin and an astonishing quantity of blood. Dazai didn’t know when it had reopened for the last time — he watched the red trails pool down and hummed.

“You need to,” He gulped, biting down a grin. “You need to pull the bullet out.”

“What?” Chuuya snapped. He was pale under the moonlight. It didn’t fit him. “You should just wait until —“

He glared. “Until someone miraculously realizes where we are? It’s been in there for too long, and that water will only infect it more. I’m sure you’ll be a great nurse.”

“We can’t even stitch it —“

“Sure we can,” He wearily raised his free arm, slamming the faucet shut. He grabbed his pants from where they’d been thrown onto the floor, searching inside the secret sewn pocket of the belt — extracting his prize: a needle.

Chuuya let out a hysterical chuckle. “You’re fucking joking, I hope? I can’t even —“ He dangled his hands, one a mess of skin and bones, the other chained to his own. “I’m gonna put a bigger hole in your chest, and you'll bleed out like a stupid fish on the shore —“

“Ah, that,” Dazai blinked at the metal bracelet around their wrists. The bleeding scratches they'd caused each other by rubbing and trying to escape were bright. Red, white, marble. Water weakens metal. Marble. In his confused state, he nodded. “Yes, right, I'll just —“

The first burst of pain went unnoticed; so did the second. By the third time he had slammed the handcuff on the edge of the bathtub, he started feeling the impact on his knuckles. He could hear Chuuya's muffled protests, could hear the marble screech and the metal fight back.

Flesh, he thought Mori had said, bandages and flesh. Would you rather I cover your eyes?

He pounded the hand down on the marble again and again and again, the thump thump of a drum, of a heart. Red, white, marble. Skin, flesh, crosses. In a last resort, he decided to take a note out of Chuuya's book, pulling his hand out in a sharp motion.

He'd broken many bones. A thumb wouldn't make much difference, he mused, cheerfully. Watching the lifeless finger hang crookedly from his finally free hand, he smiled — only after his throat started aching he realized his mouth was morphing the flames climbing up his bones into a scream.

“...fucking stupid?” Chuuya was screaming back at him, hands grasping at his wrist, fingers red from the forced bracelet and fingers red from their matching injury. “Are you stupid, are you stupid, what the fuck did you do, why did you do that —“

“Now you have free hands! That's great. You're going — You're going to have to tear a thread from the fabric on your own,” Dazai laughed, breathlessly, helplessly, throwing the needle in his lap. “Ha . I'm going to throw up.”

By some miracle, he had the presence of mind to lean his head over the edge of the bathtub and empty his stomach on the floor. The taste was rusty, a bit of blood and a bit of missed lunch. Had Chuuya eaten, he wondered? Probably not. They were supposed to meet after lunch, but he never —

He spat on the ground. Dragged his hand to clean his mouth; used the wrong hand; giggled out a wail. “Ah, this is annoying.”

Eyes wide and angry, Chuuya passed the thread he'd ripped from a piece of clothing between his lips, trying to make it go through the hole of the needle. He paused to pinch the skin between his eyebrows. Dazai hadn't been frowning; it was, he assumed, just an excuse to keep him awake.

By the time Dazai had settled his nape on the marble, the boy managed to work out the thread. He watched him gulp, studying the wound.

“I can't use my Ability,” he concluded. “You would nullify it —“

“That's certainly unfortunate.”

“You can’t pass out.”

He whined. “That’s even more unfortunate.”

“You can’t pass out,” Chuuya insisted. “Don’t you fucking dare pass out. You have to tell me if you feel like you’re going to bleed out.”

“From such a teenie-weenie wound?”

“Since you just smashed your hand into pieces, who the fuck knows,” the other replied. “Don’t even got alcohol to make you stupider than you are.”

“Morphine is a wonderful invention.”

“I hate it.”

Dazai stared. “Why would you —“

“I don’t like being pumped with stuff when I’m unconscious,” he snapped, cutthroat. “Can’t even check what it is, because — Guess what. I’m unconscious,” His eyes fell on his shoulder again. “I’ve never stitched someone else’s wound.”

“Of course you haven’t,” he groaned, then chuckled again. “Why should you have? Doesn’t need to learn how to shoot, doesn’t need to learn how to heal from wounds he doesn’t get, doesn’t —“

With no warning, Chuuya’s fingers — shaking from something too electric, too involuntary, to be fear; as if risk was a call for torture; as if he was hanging from a bloodied spear again — sunk into his raw skin.

There was something deeply intrusive and addictively uncomfortable, his mind had the delicacy to remind him, about actual fingers digging and searching and tearing injured flesh apart. He felt an inch of pity for all the corpses he’d disfigured and men he’d tortured; the viscera he’d snooped through.

Muscles too tired to fight against it, head hurting too much to do anything about it, his body decided shutting down was the only option left.

A slap on the cheek tore his eyes open, startling him. The fingers finally managed to grab ahold of the bullet, extracting it with a curse from their owner.

“Stay awake,” the boy himself growled. “Hey.” Watching his eyelids drop again, he slapped him on the opposite cheek. “I said stay awake!”

A whine escaped from his throat, tired.

The bullet was dropped somewhere on the floor. Red fingers busied themselves with piercing the skin and pulling the thread, and piercing the skin and pulling the thread. Dazai’s head fell back. He could feel his heartbeat in his eyes. He couldn’t feel anything.

The oxygen was igniting material. Water drops bounced on the marble floor, leaking from the old shower head.

He watched droplets run their race down Chuuya's freckled skin, dripping from his eyelashes and landing on the skin under his lower lip, on his shoulders, on the lines of his chest, on the bruises on his knees. He studied his hands, unfamiliar and naked, sunkissed and bloody, human and not quite; carefully, he tried not to touch Dazai anywhere that wasn't the wound.

Plastic, he mused. Was it truly supposed to be plastic, codes, and fake red lymph? Plastic, he mused, why paint freckles on a piece of plastic?

"Hey," he rasped. "We match."

Chuuya didn't even raise his head. A spasm went through his injured hand, though.

Realization slammed into his chest right as the boy leaned down to snap the thread with his teeth. It lasted less than any non violent thing in his life — he felt the wet tip of his nose brush his marked skin, and that thread was dirty and wrong and a terrible idea, and Chuuya's lips were chapped.

"This isn't like Arahabaki."

He flinched. Victory traveled through Dazai's veins; an immoral kind of feeling, ugly the same way his reflection was. Find the target and shoot. Find the soft skin and pierce it. Find the problem and solve it, whether the pained party desires it or not.

"We don't even know if he can control you," he reminded him. "Whatever happened in the Forest was not his Ability. Maybe —"

"Dazai," Chuuya interrupted him. "Shut up."

"This isn't like Arahabaki," he insisted. "This is not you being controlled."

A scoff left his mouth. He threw the needle to the ground and cradled his hurt hand, grimacing. "Like I'd fucking let Arahabaki control me."

"You let him share your space."

"Share space," the boy echoed, sharply amused. "It stopped being funny when —"

His Adam pome climbed and fell. His forehead dropped on the edge of the bathtub, tired rage painting his features ten years older, ten decades younger. "It was never funny."

Dazai tightened his lips. It was cold; he could feel it fully now. They were in a bathtub. There was no one else.

"I'm not going to apologize," he said.

It seemed redundant, to explain something so trivial, when Chuuya had already understood deeper things — less and more important ones, things he'd kept close and hadn't noticed were gone until his hands had felt cold.

He wasn't sure if that was what the boy wanted — he assumed so. He'd learned to tiptoe in an underground clinic, to know what flicker meant something awful and unnatural had left his mouth. His features were a familiar chiaroscuro, one most of those who dared to offer an ear to him ended up being subjected to.

That boy, he just doesn't understand.

Chuuya's wet strands dangled in the air, darker than usual, seemingly longer. The texture of his finger was weird when wet — was weird when naked — but Dazai despised the familiarity their touch in the middle of his forehead arose. It smoothed the creases there out; it left a mark, like all that his mind couldn't quite give rationality to.

Blankly, he concluded: "I know you won't."

"That's good."

"It's not how you work. People are just consequences for you."

"It was an unfortunate consequence," Dazai continued, because he needed him to understand. Because Dante had called them partners, because he couldn't — "Apart from my entertainment. But we needed to fall into their trap, and we needed to see Dante. If everything goes as it should, anyway, he'll be dead soon. We won't let him create problems."

"A consequence," he echoed. No judgement; simply stating a fact. "The brawn of the operation."

"It's just how it is."

"Even if we kill Dante, I will die thirty three seconds later."

"It's a simple possibility," he replied. "We do have doctors."

"Fuck you."

"Consequences are —"

"I don't mind bearing the consequences. I would appreciate being informed of their possibility. I would appreciate," he added, pointedly. "Having the chance to defend myself from them."

"You were supposed to understand."

The boy shrugged. "I didn't."

"You will," he replied. Something in his tone made the line of the other's shoulders stiffen. Dazai searched for a taste in his words, but couldn't find anything particularly different. "I'll get you to."

“I’m not,” Chuuya said, drained, eyes hidden in the white marble. “Your damn dog.”

Dazai studied the black lines pulling his wound together; it wasn’t a perfect job, but it would last until they managed to find a way home. His battered hand called his attention, the crooked tilt of the thumb somehow even more unnatural on the white tiles. It hurt in a deaf way.

Quietly, he settled that mess of bone and flesh next to its twin, on the floor of the bathtub. He could see a scorch of Chuuya’s eyes follow the motion from their hiding place, watching their destroyed fingers lay side by side.

Last thing you need, someone tutted, in the back of his skull; where it was quiet and where it itched, like his skin could only begin to breathe by being scratched by a hand different than his own, for once, is to obsess over another part of him.

Tiredness settled on his bones like a blanket. He could feel his eyes close. To shake his system awake, he wrapped his hand around its twin; he clenched, dead flesh and thirsty bones, wondering if Chuuya’s bones could be rubbed hard enough to make sparks again. As one, they flinched.

“Hey,” he repeated. “Look. We match.”

---

...

---

They crawled their way up the hill until the moon was high in the sky, listening to their squeaking wet soles and heavy gulps of air.

“Look,” Dazai would point out, every minute, wasting precious air for the sake of it. “A toad.”

“That’s a frog, moron,” Chuuya would reply, naked hands deep in his pockets, pointedly not looking at him.

“It’s clearly a toad.”

“Do you even know the difference?”

“Do you?”

“I saw a stone statue of a frog in The Alley. Is The Owner a toads connoisseur?”

A nasty glare.

“Toads are shy,” He nodded. “Look at how it’s hiding behind those horse excrements. I can almost see its blush. Shameful. Look. Look. Are you looking? Oh. It’s eating them. Maybe it’s a frog.”

Another nasty glare. “Frogs don’t eat shit.”

“And toads do?”

““Fuck do I know?””

“Toads hide behind escrement,” Dazai ended up concluding, after a few pensive minutes. “If the escrement are taller. And then they jump and eat the flies. Flawless hiding technique. I wish I was a frog. A toad.”

“For fuck’s sake,” Chuuya sighed. “That was an abandoned paper bag. Not shit.”

Like a mirage, a thousand years later, a rest area appeared at the edge of the highway.

No cars were parked next to the fuel dispensers, oozing off a sharp smell through the cold wind. The entire area was abandoned, apart from strays sleeping the night away. They passed the bright lights and the smell of gas, and pulled the glass doors open.

“It says pull,” Dazai knocked his fingers on the featherlight webs on the glass.

Chuuya scoffed. “Whatever.”

Some wordless song was playing from the speakers, under the sound of tapping fingers on a computer of a bored waitress behind the counter.

She didn’t offer them much more than a nod, eyes passing right through their half soaked clothes and the blood stains on the fabrics. Dazai had finally gotten his coat back; it was difficult to decide which one of them looked more like he’d been run over and killed on impact. He was halfway through a fever.

But the coat. The coat was back.

The waitress flatly stepped to their table to get their orders. She didn’t even glance at their badly wrapped hands. He took it as a compliment, and made sure to send a pointed look to Chuuya — who’d been so ready to criticize his makeshift bandages, cut out of the curtains of the abandoned house.

You’re the mummification expert, I suppose.

(Chuuya had also, quietly, offered him his uninjured hand to wrap in the bright azure fabric. For once in his life, Dazai had decided to keep quiet).

“So, do we believe him?” he started, once their orders had arrived, and they had promptly exchanged their dishes and drinks. “Dante, I mean. On the attack to the Headquarters.”

“We don’t really have a choice,” Dazai made a face at the sound his wet pants made against the booth. “I don’t see why he would lie. He’s probably been preparing his attack for a while now. I doubt the only brainwashed people are the ones we got on file.”

“But how does it work?” Chuuya insisted. “I don’t get it. None of the Souls, or whatever they’re called, looked dead. And they didn’t look like the men in the Under Port. What happens when he saves them from death? Does he just heal them?”

Dazai played with the straw of his drink. He met his reflection on the glass behind the boy’s head; took in his blue and purple eye bags.

He lowered his gaze again. “As for the wounds, you’re the only one who was almost blown up. I made sure to jump as far away from the explosion as possible, and Dante can’t have healed me. He must have tried — the Archives say my Ability only works when I touch other people.”

“Really?”

“Lying on official documents is my favorite pastime,” he said. “Well. My second favorite,” Because lists gave credibility. “I’ve taken a liking to poisoning your food when you’re not looking.”

Chuuya’s mouth dropped slowly, giving him a rather disgusting sight of his munched food. “There’s no way they didn’t check to see if I was actually dying. They must have a method by now.”

“If we assume Dante’s Ability heals physical wounds while putting people in that limbo — pauses them too — your wounds might simply reappear once he’s dealt with. As for the healing itself,” he hurried to continue. “I think it might have something to do with V’s Ability, not Dante’s.”

Chuuya tilted his head. “But that was Dante. He’s just — broken in the fucking head or something. Grief induced split personalities?”

“That’s a nice way to call it,” he said. “But it’s weird. Didn’t he feel a bit — underwhelming to you?”

“You think that was V? But why would he play Dante? And why would Beatrice go along?”

“If they’re ever aware of it.”

“Why are you so sure V isn’t dead?” he insisted, abandoning his food after four bites. “Beatrice said he was their first attempt to create a Soul, and it failed. You think that they were wrong? That Dante only realized he was alive after Beatrice left?”

He bit down his lettuce. “I don’t know.”

Chuuya frowned.

“I’m being serious,” he swore, whining. “I’m not omniscient. The facts are the facts: that man introduced himself as Dante, and he did use his Ability on you. Or, at least — the Forest did.”

“What’s up with that, anyway?”

“Ability-related incidents can modify reality,” He shrugged. “Places where Singularities happen are basically a nuclear field. I’d assume the lab where you were trapped is just as dangerous, to this day.”

A strange face faded under his drying curls.

“His plan is also what we thought it would be,” Dazai continued. “Beatrice is under his control, so I don’t know how much we can trust anything she told us. I don’t even know if we actually escaped or if he let us go. Maybe he hopes you’ll join the conflict and turn against the Port Mafia.”

Chuuya studied the blue fabric around his hands. “And the only way to find out if I’m actually under his control is to wait.”

“Yes,” he agreed. “Basically.”

The music changed to a familiar tune, a rich voice filling the empty bar. Instinctively, Dazai raised his eyes. Blue and amber ones were already there, though they were quick to lower again, quietly scolding themselves for their reaction.

And they’ll never catch us, Hirose Fumiko belted out. They can try, try, try, though.

He tried to comment on it — whether positively or mockingly, he wasn’t sure — but a fit of wet coughs wrecked his chest. His eyes watered — a mixture of headache, pulsing bones, and the flames carving circles inside his throat.

Silky ice tickled his forehead. He had to wait for the thunder to pause to look up — when he did, he met Chuuya’s reddened ears and the hand he was hurriedly taking back.

“You’re burning like a fucking toaster,” he muttered. “Could you let me know if you intend to pass out any time soon? I’ll just leave you in a bush or something.”

“I don’t want to die in a bush,” he replied, mildly offended. “You could at least abandon me near a beautiful woman. Possibly a dead one.”

“You’re disgusting.”

“I would also appreciate it if you could refrain from putting your slug hands on me. The drool left on your wake annoys me.”

“Try not to fucking die,” Chuuya spat out, venomous. “And I won’t have to worry about your shitty body.”

“Aw. You’re worried?”

“About what Mori might do to me if I come back with your corpse, yeah. Never about you.”

That almost made him smile. Tauntingly, as ostensibly as possible, he sing-sang: “Does that mean I’m forgiven?”

Chuuya’s eyes snapped up, repulsed. “That would imply there was something to forgive. And that would imply I ever had any sort of positive expectations from you.”

“I think you really do,” Dazai mused.

“Trust me. I don’t.”

“I don’t know if I trust you,” He shrugged, settling his eyes on the azure maze of bandages on top of the table. Blood had seeped through the boy’s wounded hand, staining the fabric in blooming shapes. His twin fist twitched on his lap. “But, as per your own actions until now, you trust me.”

Chuuya bit his cheek. “You fucking trusted me enough to expect me to understand what your stupid tapping on my hand meant.”

Why, Mori asked him. Mori wasn’t there, he told himself. Why, Dazai?

“That was a wrong calculation on my part,” he replied, bored, dangling his legs. “Oops.”

“Yeah,” the other boy grunted, raising his free hand to pull at his choker. His eyes settled on Dazai’s plate — a bit further. His hands. “Same here.”

They’ll never catch us, Hirose insisted, lingering on the last note. You know it and so do I.

“Did you actually burn off your fingertips, or is that just one of the Mafia’s stories?”

Dazai wiggled his hands melodically, watching his eyes follow. “Why, you want to do it too?”

A childish, unspoken yes settled in his traits. “Kouyou said that it’s — Well, did you?”

“Guess.”

He reached forward, taking his hands into his own; thought hard and deep about it, squinting at the scratches down his palm. The process behind it was too stupid to follow; eventually, he said: “Why do you have this many scars? Boss is a doctor.”

Not exactly what he had expected. “Mori believes in the value of perpetual remembrance,” he offered. He hardly recalled the first time the man had explained it — if Dazai ended up under his tools, he’d get a reminder out of it, necessary or not. “If he stitches me up, he has a right to make it ineffaceable.”

Chuuya hummed. “And what did he think about the burned off fingertips?”

He grinned. “That it’d make for a great Mafia story,” He took his hands back; stretched them, a strange feeling lingering. “Why the choker, anyway?”

“What?”

Dazai hadn’t exactly planned for the question to leave his mouth, so he was left to scramble for an appropriate reaction. “The choker. Why do you wear it? Is it like your weird gloves thing?”

“I like it.”

“You like it.”

“Not everything has to be deep, asshole. And not everything has to be monumental,” he muttered, a hint of blush covering his freckles. “I liked it. It’s cool. Lippman used to bring us dressing props from his sets. Can’t I just like it?”

He could, yes, but Dazai had also the permission to be weirded out by it. Sometimes it felt uncomfortable to think of Chuuya as someone who had actual interests — who’d had friends, who had once had a family, who listened to music and perhaps even had a favorite color, apart from a favorite brand of bullets.

It went against everything he had told himself from the first moment they met, when he’d decided perhaps the whole deal about not staring into the sun made sense.

“Well,” he concluded, moving his empty plate aside. “I suppose we’ve rested enough. The Yokohama highway is a nightmare at night, so we should probably go.”

“Yeah,” Chuuya dragged out, exaggeratingly turning his head around. “On foot, right?”

“You can fly. Why are you even complaining? Your concern about me and my physical prowess is touching, but —“

“I didn’t —“

“How does the flying thing work, anyway?” he insisted. “I’ve always wondered. Do you just reduce your body mass? Do you change the gravity in the air surrounding you? Are you just so small the wind can carry you away?”

Chuuya opened his mouth — either to answer or to curse him out again — but he was interrupted by the bell of the entrance doors.

A man walked heavy strides inside, half burned out cigarette in his mouth. Grizzled hair covered a surprisingly round head, that fit a bit weirdly on his overly muscular body. He leaned fingerless leather gloves — bright red, a match to his jacket — on the counter, and waited until the waitress nodded and made her way to the back, playing with his keychain.

Once again, Dazai met his companion’s gaze.

Both their eyes turned to study the parking space outside the windows, landing on a beast of a motorcycle that had been left in the dead center of the empty area.

The greatest surge of pain he'd felt that day birthed a whine in his throat. He thumped his forehead on the table, ignoring the sharper-than-a-razor smile tearing Chuuya's face apart — and the glee with which he grabbed his hand and dragged him out.

Motorcycle Guy ordered a simple coffee, which he downed without blinking. He threw a few bills on the counter, either blind or uncaring in the face of the waitress' scoff. They waited for her to disappear in the back of the shop again — jumping over the counter to lock the door behind her — and followed him.

"We couldn't even pay," Chuuya muttered, as they pushed the doors open.

"Now you're an upright citizen?" Dazai replied, disbelieving. Let me peek inside your head just once. I'll even clean the blood. "But when it's about caging a poor woman in a kitchen —"

"Don't you start."

To his merit, it didn't take the man long to notice he was being followed. After crossing the first row of fuel dispensers, a few strides away from his ride, he turned. His eyes traced the evidently shorter figures making their way to him, unhesitatingly.

He curled one eyebrow.

"Hey," he drawled. "What d'ya kids wa —"

Dazai raised his gun and put a hole in his head.

Chuuya didn't even stop to watch him fall to the ground; he skipped over the pool of blood, enlarging a bit more every second, and hurried to the motorcycle. He found him in the middle of tracing the black paint of the ride, hungrily studying the shiny clutches and the maze of controls he didn't even want to pretend he understood.

"This is a Harley-Davidson," the boy told no one in particular, the firmament upon their heads trapped in his eyes. "This thing is a jewel. The most expensive of the collection is worth more than Hirotsu makes in a year."

Dazai scrunched his nose up. "I should have known your materialism had fueled your hunger for the Executive position."

Money was a complicated deal in the Port Mafia. There was tons of it; every man and woman knew, in a corner of their brain, that they walked and breathed bloodied richness. It was hard to be sure of where all that money ended up, of course; Dazai had never actually received a paycheck. He just always had money in his hands and zeroes on his account.

Ane-san had a treasure room in her lake house; Hirotsu a wallet filled to the brim with credit cards. Mori never had money in his pockets; Dazai always had to pay when they were out together.

Chuuya ignored his retort, easily. “Albatross would go nuts over this thing.”

“With that hand of yours driving it,” he considered, because his fever was spiking and his tongue was hungry. “I’m sure you’ll be able to show it to him in no time.”

The pun got him punched right where the badly stitched up bullet wound was. It was pushed down, then — because there wasn’t time, he knew; because it had been expected; because.

After grabbing the keys from his lifeless hands, they abandoned the body to bleed out on the concrete, and climbed on the motorcycle.

“Can’t I drive?” he dared, hopeless.

“You exploded the only car you’ve ever driven,” He pulled him in by the tie. “Tough luck.”

Much like Chuuya’s own bike, the beast came alive with a roar that Dazai felt all the way to his teeth. Much like Chuuya’s own, mere seconds after they entered the highway, Dazai immediately decided he despised it.

No amount of screaming and kicking and scratching got him to slow down, though — Dazai could print his fingertips on the sides of his ripped shirt as they sped down the empty road, faster and faster by the second.

He sighed. He spent the rest of the journey watching the way his red locks whipped the night air.

---

...

---

Despite how impossible the concept had seemed, the appearing Five Towers at the edge of their vision made Chuuya accelerate.

“Is that,” he said, barely audible over the roar of the wind — unstable in a dangerous way, promising. “Is that fire?”

One particularly sharp turn painted a whole 180 degrees circle on the road, making Dazai clench his thighs around the seat. Fast as they were going, he could count Chuuya’s ribs under his palms; loud as the air itself was, he could feel his butterfly heartbeat under his fingertips.

“What are we expecting to see?” he asked.

“Quite frankly,” Dazai replied. “Hell.”

He was never good at descriptions. He had always, however, had a talent for predictions.

The first traces of blood appeared two blocks from the Headquarters, darker than petroleum and the moon’s newest puddle-mirrors. The bike skirted upon them, leaving red wheel prints on the ground.

Deeper they went, the less traffic they found; at some point, the only vehicles obstructing their way were the ones turned upside down and abandoned in the middle of the street. Flares lit up the sky; the orange and white lines of explosions surrounded them like thunder. It took them another three turns to find the first corpse; the bike jumped over his severed head, but Dazai saw a piece of skin stick to the back wheel.

Gunshots appeared abruptly — a symphony so disharmonic and evident he wondered how it had been muffled. Perhaps his ears were too used to the statics.

Corpses lined the streets, limbs spread out and brain blown out, splattered against cars and halfway through escape. Giving your back to the enemy was not tolerated in the Port Mafia — obeying honor was not tolerated in the mind of a dead man walking. The balance was there, somewhere.

“Shit,” Chuuya’s hands tightened around the clusters until his destroyed fingers had to be hurting. His eyes searched for familiar faces on the ground.

Dazai’s eyes set on one of the buildings to their left. Right as the motorcycle brushed the ground to avoid a bundle of fallen bodies, he leaned forward and whispered: “Kingstain.”

The boy’s lungs constricted under his hands. The bike swerved — they bumped against a car so viciously both vehicles were rattled, neatly avoiding the quick sequence of bullets from the hidden sniper.

The gunshots painted a scattered line behind them, stalking the motorcycle; accelerating, they managed to outrun them, running over dismembered body parts and abandoned blood pools, mere bumps under their wheels.

“Words, shitty Dazai,” Chuuya snapped, barely a breath against the wind and the orchestra of open fire. “Not metaphors.”

“No,” he taunted. No time for pettiness, no time for victorious shivers. No, no. The Headquarters appeared at the edge of his vision, at the finish line. “Get it yourself.”

Blood had gifted a new face to the second tower of the Headquarters. It poured down the shingles and the glass doors — melted down the stairs until it was hard to distinguish where the red carpet ended and the stone started. More and more bodies rested on the steps, their wide eyes and shattered bones almost too scenic for it to have been pure chance.

The butterfly wings under his hands stuttered, gasping. Judging by the way Chuuya stiffened, at least one of those actors was someone he knew.

A metallic clang called their attention; men and women in Kevlar vests jumped out of upside down cars and bundles of flesh, and started firing to the entrance. Silhouettes in the Port Mafia's black suits responded to the call, setting the night on fire.

"Protect the Boss!"

The voice was a siren, rising like fireworks from the bundle of Black Lizards hiding behind a van they were attempting to turn upright. Through the glass, he saw the crimson of a familiar scarf.

A kick hit Dazai's chest.

He barely had time to understand that the cold thing he was laying on was too physical to be a simple pool of blood on the ground — a woman's corpse, her lifeless eyes stuck on him — the tense line of his driver's shoulders meant rage, and —

Chuuya was speeding away, entering the funnel wave of projectiles with a roar that might have come from the vehicle — might have come from him. He disappeared in a cloud of dust, of too bright lights and deafening white noises, cutting through the line of bullets Mori was being hidden behind.

"Protect the Boss," they kept chanting. Dazai was stuck under flesh. "Protect the Boss with your life!"

Silence fell; dust dissipated. The motorcycle had stopped in the dead centre of the battlefield. Bullets — so many bullets he could have spent a day counting them, and another shooting them all — were stuck to his body, glimmering scarlet, trembling, a beacon on the night.

Chuuya grinned.

"Get fucked!" He pressed his foot down and drove straight into the crowd of enemies, sending the bullets back to each body he encountered with twice the impact they had originally had.

It was hard to see much more than this: red lighting meandering through obstacles, taking down dozens of them with a single skid. He was fast, but not fast enough — it only took the fallen a few breaths to stumble their way up again, uncaring of the bleeding holes all over their bodies, dragging themselves up the asphalt, climbing the stairs.

Dazai opened his mouth, but his suggestion was never offered.

A feminine hand clawed at his neck in a death grip, tearing even the bandages apart with her nails. He met the eyes of the woman he'd thought dead upon him — she threw him to the ground, deaf to his shoulder's protests, pushing against the stitches.

His hands searched the ground. Only after slamming it on the Soul's head, watching it breach through her eye and appear on her nape, he realized he had grabbed one of the small Japan flags that decorated the Headquarters entrance.

She fell backwards, arching until the weight of the flag abandoned her on the ground.

“Sama!”

Through the smoke and the rising flames of a row of cars Chuuya’s intervention had blown up, Dazai set his eyes on the van the Lizards had managed to get started. Mori’s silhouette was unmistakable — his scarf slapped the air behind him, a single arm reaching out even as his guards pulled him towards the vehicle.

Running straight into the projectiles of three firearms from the other side, Sama offered the Boss one last bow before firing.

Dazai didn’t know how many she took down — it was hard to hear more than the squelch of flesh and the moans of the dying; hard to forget she was the most capable of the Lizards. He only knew when she went down — Mori’s face shut down with the ease of a falling petal.

Amidst the smoke and the lighting, he met his eyes. Anything unrecognizable was wiped clean; what was left of his traits shaped itself into mere observation.

He nodded at Dazai, and stepped into the van.

Stuck on the ground, his pierced attacker’s eyes rolled around lazily.

Lights flared in the corner of his gaze. He hurried behind the nearest car, sneaking his arm inside through the blown up window and firing his answers to the dark silhouettes on the other side of the street. Taking them down wasn’t an issue — their motions were too mechanical. Keeping them down was.

Glass rained from the sky; Port Mafia’s rifles shot in quick succession, bullets bouncing on the concrete and decimating the waves of Souls coming from nowhere at all. He stepped on a corpse, sinking his foot in the torn well of his chest.

Over his head, the moon was obscured — he tilted his chin just far enough for his eyes to register dirty metal and wheels rolling pointlessly, as the seven-seats van Chuuya had just thrown towards a small group of Souls flew over his head, landing with a roar so impossibly heavy, he almost fell to his knees.

“Bad dog!” he whined, though Chuuya was nowhere to be seen — only the sound of his war cries echoing. “Don’t throw cars, Mori will put them on the shared Damages Account!”

A lingering presence tickled his nape; he didn’t turn until he’d already shot it down, but when he did, he recognized his devastated face.

“Sir!” a voice called.

An organized battalion was making its way to him. Led by the man Dazai had never named his second, they took down Souls on their way to him. With a single loss, the Secret Force Unit reached him, crunching down in front of him behind an ambulance.

They didn’t look panicked — they never did; whether professionalism had been stitched on their faces, or driven by the desire to appear as stoic as their teenage leader — but a quick count of heads revealed a decisive decrease in number.

They bowed to him, with evident nervousness. “Sir, we were waiting for your orders.”

“Waiting for my orders?” he repeated, unimpressed. “That’s boring. You just sat around while the Headquarters got attacked because I didn’t give you orders?”

“No, sir!” the unofficial second hurried to stutter. “We just — The attack came out of nowhere. Most squads haven’t been alerted, we were called by the standing guards —“

Car alarms started blaring louder. “What’s the situation?”

“They appeared from the apartments in the area and — and, the sewers? No cars, not that we could find. And —” He gulped. His hair was paler than the full moon taunting them in the sky; he couldn’t be younger than Hirotsu. Young people weren’t allowed near Dazai. “Sir, Matsumura, Sumida, and Makawa, they…”

“Let me guess,” he interrupted him, “They, seemingly without a reason, deserted and turned on you.”

The man paused. Sweat slid down the barrel of his gun. “You — You knew, sir?”

“What did you do with them?”

“We — We’ve been trying to kill them.”

“Trying.”

A mumble went through the battalion. They exchanged hesitant looks. “The men, sir — They’re not dying.”

What’s your theory, then? What am I doing?

Abruptly, Dazai made a decision.

“Aren’t they,” he insisted, skeptical.

“It seems to be a common factor amongst the attackers, sir,” another man intervened, bravely. “That’s why they haven’t been stopped yet. Their numbers won’t go down. We tried everything — guns, sneaky traps, explosives —“

“Yes, thank you,” The icy undertone of his voice stiffened the lines of every back. “I’m well aware of how to kill someone.” He stood up, unsurprised when the rest of the squad remained kneeled on the ground. “You’re telling me the Secret Force of the Port Mafia isn’t, though?”

A wide range of reasons to rage and fear battled on the men’s faces. Dazai studied the balding tops of their heads, and mourned his console.

The back window of the car acting as their barrier exploded; a blank-faced man peeked in, rifle in hand and eyes on Dazai. He took him down with a shot in the throat, meeting his hazed gaze as he slipped down the side of the vehicle — until he disappeared under the sharp edges of the window.

Right before he fell, his head tilted to the side, eyes focusing a inch more, as if listening.

He scratched his chin with the mouth of the gun, dragging his attention back to his cowed men. “What’s your name?”

The silver haired unofficial second blinked, eyes wide on the corpse, startled. “I — Ikeda, sir.”

Amusement curled under his lungs, easily muffled. “Ikeda, then. By the time I come back, every man in this street must be dead. Must you burn them to ashes, tear them to shreds, lock them in the sewers again and have them eaten alive by rats — I don’t care. Kill them. It’s what gets your pockets all full, correct? I have faith in you. I’m sure you’ll do just fine.”

“Sir —“

“You wanted orders,” Dazai insisted. His hand pulsed; his shoulder ached. He wished, for a blink of a moment, that he’d let Chuuya keep the coat; his gravity would have fought the weight that seemed to pull him down. Hush, hush. “Here’s your order.”

A car skirted in their direction, thrown backwards by the impact of an explosion on the other side of the street. Dazai was still looking Ikeda right in the eyes when a stray bullet pierced his temple — splattering what was left of his head against the car.

His brains dripped down his cheek, slowly and quietly, wetting his eyelashes and his upper lip. When he fell forward, none of the wide eyed men behind him tried to keep him upright.

“Oh,” he shrugged, gently kicking the corpse away. “One of you gets the lead. Congratulations.”

A familiar roar cut through the fog. Chuuya’s stolen bike braked close enough to their group that Dazai’s coat fluttered behind him.

Right before it could crush them to dust, his gloves hand sank in the metal of the car coming towards them at bone shattering velocity. It rolled and rolled down the street, tearing itself apart a bit more against every obstacle and Soul it crashed against.

“Move,” Chuuya ordered, parking next to him. “Boss arrived at the extraction point. We need to check the main building, right now.”

“Bossy,” he commented, mournfully climbing on. He nodded to his men. “Do your job.”

They crossed the space between the towers at maximal speed, ignoring the lifeless crunch! of bones under their wheels. Stillness and suspenseful silence alternated the drumming rhythm of bullets and screeches, vanishing behind buildings.

Slowly, the corpses began to look familiar.

The night was a veil; it was hard to distinguish their own from the enemy — and known faces couldn’t be trusted. The bodies struggling to get up again, though, were easily grouped — X-shaped slashes ran down their chests; some had their heads busted in and a collar full of jewels around their too pale necks. The Executives were on the battlefield.

“That’s bad,” Chuuya commented, taking a sharp turn and a road sign with them. Dazai bit his tongue, again. “If even they’ve intervened —“

“Their subordinates would eat them alive if they hid while the base gets attacked,” he replied, keeping his eyes forward. “It’s a declaration of war.”

The main building had already been breached. Men in black suits appeared and disappeared from the doors, as windows of the higher floors shattered behind corpses getting thrown out. Outside, a familiar squad was trying to stop the second wave of advancing Souls.

Purple lighting was waiting for them on the sidewalk. Much to his enemies’ chagrin, Ryurō Hirotsu had removed his gloves.

“Keep up!” the man was ordering, directing his Lizards with the ease of a smoked cigarette. “Don’t let them cross these doors!”

Right as they slammed the bike onto a group of three Souls, a body was thrown back by the impact of the manna Ability. Chuuya barely managed to pull back before it could land on them; instead, it crashed on the concrete in front of the bike with a sick crack!, blue eyes staring at them through their haze.

Dazai jumped down the bike, kneeling next to the woman and grabbing her arms. Hirotsu’s Ability had broken her ribs; her breaths broke free from her shattered lungs in whiny puffs, mouth gulping air with a desperation that didn’t match the absolute emptiness of her pale features.

“It’s not working,” he concluded, running his hands down naked skin. Her chest was coming apart under his fingers; he could feel the cracks and turns of her fractured ribs. “It won’t nullify. I have to touch Dante — it doesn’t work.”

Something bright — something untranslatable — bloomed in Chuuya’s eyes.

Before he could speak, he stepped forward, nearly throwing Dazai to the ground in his effort to kick his shoe through two flying Souls.

“Grandpa!” he yelled. “Stop fucking throwing corpses at us!”

At last, Hirotsu turned deady focused eyes on them. His hair was more dishelved than Dazai had ever seen on him — clothes so thoroughly stained in red even the hints of black had disappeared. There was a single crack in his monocle.

“There you are,” he commented. “Chuuya, Executive Kouyou has been calling you for hours now.”

Dazai had it on good authority that if the boy had actually brought his phone along, it would have been laying somewhere under the Kitanai Kawa, by then. Still, Chuuya ducked his head. “I had it on silent.”

“Care to tell me why a quarter of my own men decided to kill another quarter?” Hirotsu asked them, bending the nearest thing he could grasp — one of the flags — into a U shape. As soon as two Souls managed to reach ten steps from the entrance, he threw it with the ease of a frisbee. “And why they’re joining the Nine Rings?”

“It’s,” Dazai briefly, he considered the possible consequences of playing run from the handler right in this moment. “Complicated.”

The air sizzled. He felt the hair on his nape stand, sweaty bandages sending shivers down his spine. Later, he would remember meeting the blurry eyes of the man that had managed to sneak past Hirotsu’s solitary fight — the blinking red light.

Surprisingly enough, the explosion hurt his hand the most.

Debris from the blown up stairs surrounded them, rising with a grey cloud and a roar — and being mostly thrown back by the gravitational threads Chuuya trapped in, swimming in a protective bubble around them.

Hands and bodies pressed on the chapel of debris, pushing against the gritted-teeth defense. Dazai couldn’t hear a thing over the white noises; Hirotsu almost — almost, because he was smart enough to stop — gripped his shoulders. He shouted something. Plan, he thought. Plan, what’s the plan?

The entrance of the Headquarters was burning. The glass doors were nothing but sharp edges surrounded by flames, a portal to the dozens of puppets dragging their deadly wounded bodies inside, eyes aimless but intent.

“Chuuya,” he called. “You need to make a fire.”

Understanding settled on his features. “We need to get them all in one place.”

“How do we gather all of them?” Hirotsu insisted.

“Drop a building on them, for all I care,” Dazai replied. “You need to get every single one. We only get one chance to do what I’m thinking.”

“We don’t know which ones are still with us and which ones aren’t,” Chuuya reminded him, a hint of hesitance on the fight-hungry lines of his arms.

“It hardly matters. Get everyone.”

A flash of anger tightened his lips. “We can’t just kill everyone —“

Dazai gripped his wrist with his wounded hand — still pulsing, still childishly begging for an inch of his attention, still matching — and pulled him closer. The waves of gravity around them fell to the ground; the Souls stumbled, trying to regain their footing before Hirotsu’s immediate reaction could get them.

“Get everyone here,” he spelled out. He leaned forward, studying the reflection of raising flames in his eyes. “I’m not an idiot. Can you trust that?”

The thing moving his pupils back and forth along Dazai's face was anything but reliance. "Your Ability doesn't work on them."

"It doesn't," he agreed. Another inch, another cold breath on the dried blood on his face. "Yours does, though."

Chuuya pushed him back, vicious enough to make him stumble. Grasping the throat of a Soul who had tried to attack him from the back, he didn't look at him when he concluded: "Hurry up, Mackerel."

Gun in hand, Dazai sprinted down the sidewalk, climbing the stone stairs three at the time. The ricochet of fired bullets was barely felt; he kept his eyes on the shimmering, broken chandeliers inside — throwing himself inside the moment a projectile entered the parted lips of a makeshift guard.

The marble ground was nowhere to be found.

Red lakes had filled the streets — but it reached his calves, in the Entrance Hall. His shoes made a sound as they sank in the stream, wet and sticky. Before he could decide if it felt good — something brushed the top of his head.

Tilting it, he studied the lifeless bodies in black suits hanging from the ceiling, dangling quietly amidst the muffled sounds of chaos coming from outside.

The hall was almost empty; he trapped a few Souls under heavy enough pieces of furniture, not bothering to follow the blood footprints climbing the stairs. There was nothing they could find in there that Dante hadn't already put his hands on.

It has to be somewhere, he mused, searching the room. A pair of shoes brushed his hair; he stepped further into the hangman forest. Where?

A whine pierced the silence.

He stilled.

You can keep your eyes closed, Mori has reassured him, once. The stick-and-pull of thread and needle was hypnotic; Dazai didn't remember what he had done, only that he hadn't laughed as it happened. That Mori was there. You don't have to look. Two eyes are such a burden sometimes, are they not?

"Ah," he said. "Ah, Tanaki. Of course."

Loyal until the very end, she laid behind the secretary desk. The silver of her hair disappeared in waves of crimson, blooming startlingly intense against her pale skin. Tears disappeared between the two lines of scars of her face, landing on blurred tattoos.

Her abdomen had been ripped apart.

"The baby," she whispered, eyes frantic, stubbornly searching the room before returning to him, insistent. "Is my baby okay?"

He sat next to her, knee deep in her blood and shattered pieces of glass, watching the chandeliers dig caves in her skull. She raised a hand, fingers shaking so badly it looked almost voluntary. A deep breath left her mouth; he saw her viscera flutter along.

Behind the desk, ruby letters stared back at him, slowly melting down the wall. Justice incited my divine creator.

Under that, like an afterthought — a claim of sorts: Kanai Chikako.

Dazai offered his half shattered hand. Tanaki's fingers gripped it so tightly his vision blurred.

"You're going to be fine," he assured her.

"My baby," she insisted. Her voice was a butterfly in the eye of the hurricane. "My baby, Dazai, I — I can't feel my —"

Sirens blared outside. He stared at the crimson void under her weakly beating heart, and felt young — a child kneeling on frescoed tiles, watching his fingers redden with each hit. Just speak, they would say, merciful in assuming him more capable than he was. Just past your lips and speak.

The problem with giving an answer, he mused, distantly, was that people expected him to always have another one. They wouldn't like his words either way, but the expectancy in their eyes wouldn't quit.

"It's gone," he explained, as easily as a prodigy could. Then: "That's why you can't feel — them."

Confusion clouded her eyes. How did she get those scars, he wondered? Had there been more blood than this? "Get them back, then."

He resonated — the fight would be over soon. They would storm the hospital, the one Mori had bought from the underground to the roof, and they would patch her back together. Dazai was an academic liar, baptized in deception summa cum laude — but he made the effort of saying: "You will be fine."

Chuuya stormed inside, a red dot landing so violently on the ground that another crater opened under his feet. Blood covered him head to foot, like hair melted down his skeleton.

"I dug a pit," he explained, breathless, head snapping back and forth. "It's not gonna hold them long, we need to —"

A breath. Even the blood bumping inside his veins seemed to petrify.

The red outlines of his body faded, quietly. His face was an empty canva; a controlled cage of rage and confusion and disbelief and something, something so cold it spasmed his fingers. "Shit," he said, his voice an echo from behind a glass, "Shit, shit, Tanaki —"

He dropped on the other side of her body, her free hand immediately trapped between his own. Their heads bumped — Chuuya was too busy removing the azure fabric from his hands, spreading it wide to cover the torn cave of her abdomen. Tucking in.

The sight was hysterical. Red bloomed all over the gentle color almost immediately.

“Chuuya?” she mumbled, cheek landing on the floor. Her eyes were rolling back in her head, her throat gulping down air. “Chuuya, where’s my —”

The boy tightened his lips — tightened his grip on her red fingers. Perhaps he tried to say something; whatever it was, it never came.

Recognition fractured his eyes as they settled on the writing on the wall. His knuckles were white; his lips parted. With an anger that shone — every ugly thing in the world all gathered in a circle to follow his self execution — he breathed: “Son of a bitch.”

Say, Dazai remembered thinking, where does a human experiment learn to mourn?

“Hirotsu’s men can bring her to the hospital,” he said, almost surprised by the stillness of his tone. Never surprised. “We need to deal with the Souls. ”

A vein pulsed on his jaw, his teeth gritted so harshly his head was shaking. “Chuuya.” Tanaki whined; a broken thing. The tips of her fingers were turning redder; the boy’s grip was too strong. “Chuuya,” he insisted, easily.

He let go of her hand, letting it fall to the ground. The stiffened lines of his shoulders relaxed, molded themselves into something softer. His bowed head tilted to the side, as if listening.

Dazai felt his bones grind to a halt. “Wait — “

Scarlet glimmered, blinding and hot. Amidst it, Chuuya raised an arm, slamming his clenched fist into Tanaki’s torn chest, sinking the azure fabric inside the wound.

---

...

---

The blur would remain in some corner of his brain, heightened by the insistent ricochet.

Tanaki was screaming her throat raw, blood oozing off her wound with the efficiency of the seas — the sound had left his ears tingling. Dazai could hardly recall the unmistakable sight of Chuuya attempting a new attack — he jumped over Tanaki’s body, arms locked around his stiffened, violent limbs.

They rolled down the crimson river of the lobby, framed by the lights of the approaching sirens, gunshots and shots and the smell of viscera. As soon as he realized his touch was nullifying Tainted, Chuuya focused his nails and teeth into freeing himself, every inch of him working to tear Dazai apart.

[Agreements in the Port Mafia went as such: gravity manipulation was the lesser of problems when one dealt with Nakahara Chuuya].

Tanaki was bleeding out; Dazai could see her gasp for air in the corner of his gaze, as Chuuya's hands closed around his head, smashing it against the ground once, twice — he lost count. His expression was there, behind the blue — blank eyes, not a muscle of his face moving.

The silence was the strangest part of it all — not a victory cry, not a grunt when he slammed his knee on his fractured hand. Whatever it was he was seeing — wherever it was Dante had sent him — it had locked Chuuya's attention shut.

A punch twisted his nose; the next hit readjusted it into its original position.

It took every inch of his body to pulse along to every bruise — Chuuya's naked hands forcing his hands behind his back, teeth so close it was a wonder how he couldn't feel them bite — for his fingers to finally close around his gun.

“Have fun,” he made sure to say.

He cocked the gun and pulled the trigger.

Chuuya's body shook under the impact, as his raised fist stilled, the bullet digging a cave in his chest. Nothing changed in his expression — but Dazai could imagine him blinking, almost surprised. He wished, for one hysterical moment, that he could grab his phone and take a picture.

Instead, he rolled them over and kicked him in the stomach, making sure to sink the bullet deeper and deeper. Managing to slow him down enough to wrap his arms around him cost him sliced red lines down his arms — carrying him outside was nearly impossible, as they half tumbled and half fought down the stairs.

“Hirotsu!” he called.

He found him at the edge of what seemed a smaller copy of Suribachi City, only for a moment — the makeshift crater surrounded by suited men, rifles pointed down. Inside the earthly cage, aimless hands, familiar and unknown, attempted to crawl forward, climbing, dragging, their eyes devoid of any feeling — leaving Hell for the sake of it.

It was the lack of silence that made him pause.

The Souls were utterly silent — only the moans and laments of the fallen through the attacked streets could be heard, too far to belong to the melody tickling his ears. When he managed to squint down the crater, he met the eyes of one of his men — desperately attempting to escape the embrace of two Souls.

Hirotsu freed him from the struggling weight of Chuuya's frustration, pressing his body down with his height advantage. It had been long since either of them had outwardly stepped away from his touch — out of habit, Dazai eyed their connected skins.

He kept his hold on Chuuya's naked wrist.

"What's wrong with him?" Hirotsu asked.

"I'll buy you a drink and tell you later," Dazai lied, pulling the boy's arm just so — enough to hide his vacant eyes. "Is everyone here?"

"Everyone we could find," the man confirmed. "We searched every area that's been breached, and my Ability users verified the upper floors were completely evacuated. Only..."

"Only what?"

Hirotsu straightened his back. "Some of the men were too — suspicious. Kouyou's emergency battalion was almost completely lost. We forced them down there as well, as you asked."

He nodded. "Good."

"Then," the man wrapped an hesitant hand around the collar of the boy's jacket. Dazai was assaulted by visions of strays getting carried by their mothers under the rain. "How do we find out which ones are — the undead ones?"

"Undead," he echoed. "Fascinating name."

The hand he had wrapped around the boy's wrist was the wounded one — he only noticed when he pulled him out of Hirotsu's lion grip, the pulsing of his crooked thumb a bundle of statics. He struggled; in a strangely blurred distance, Dazai felt his nails sink on his cheek, tearing the skin down.

He pushed Chuuya back, slamming his foot in his abdomen, watching him fall into the pit without a sound.

"Hirotsu?" he tutted, throwing his gun in the air and grabbing it as it came down. He aimed it to the only stain of red in that black sea, glowing through the hands reaching for him, crowding him like a savior. "Tell your Lizards to fire at will on the Slug."

Hesitancy parted his lips.

Dazai met his eyes, tasting the blood from the scratches on his cheek as it landed on his lips.

The man sighed. He raised his hand, unmovable against the ground, beginning to shake under Chuuya's counter attack — and when every eye in the street was on him, he cut the air. "Fire!"

The intricate weaving of bodies inside the pit disappeared behind the dust and the flashes of light. Bullets surrounded him, making his coat flutter and his ears pop, all directed towards one target specifically.

Chuuya responded to the attack with enviable vitality, sending back bullets with unstoppable energy. Soon enough, he did exactly what Dazai had thought he would: focused Tainted onto every inch of flesh touching him, until the crater was nothing more than a bacon of scarlet light, bodies floating and throbbing.

He crunched down, holding his knees, eyes on the rapturous expression on his devoid face — the brightest dot in that painting of the damned, hair floating around his skull like a halo. The divine was in the details. “Now throw in the explosives.”

The commander’s facade cracked. “Dazai,” His voice was calming. “We aren’t sure if everyone in there is — our men are there too.”

“The explosives, Hirotsu.”

He didn’t move.

“Don’t tell me you’re doubting my plans, Commander,” Dazai didn’t take his eyes off the crater. “Is my winning streak not enough for you?”

Cautious, he signaled to the Lizards. “How did you even — yesterday, why did you call me and tell me to supply the squad?”

“You know how it is,” He scratched the bandages around his eye. A dozen Souls had sunk their nails into Chuuya’s shoulders — he recalled black wings against the sky, cutting existence. “I’m a man of predictions. Now, hurry up. Chibi’s death can’t come quick enough, can it?”

He raised his chin, a hint of defiance in his ancient eyes. “I’m trusting you on this, Dazai.”

“And I’m trusting you to know Chuuya’s taste in flowers for his funeral,” He yawned. “Never cared to learn. On with the fireworks!”

He had to attend the show from behind an upside down car, hands on his ears and eyes intent as the crater exploded in embers and flying rocks. The red of Tainted shook under the impact — until it broke in a thousand shards, sending every car skidding down the empty street. The suspected Souls were the only ones to scream their throats raw.

Solitary and sudden, a lonely silhouette flew to the sky, escaping the fire. Before the vengeful puppet could decide how to self-implode and take the highest number of corpses with him — a flash of petal-fabric crossed the sky.

A familiar shout filled the night, Dante’s grip on a now useless body unclenching — Golden Demon had sunk her katana in Chuuya’s chest, slashing an impossible number of lines down his body. Abruptly enough to seem unfit, all came to a halt.

Dazai stood up, making his way through the running mafiosi — the meteors of car parts and pieces of concrete, flying by him with the unhurried violence of shooting stars, lighting the night up in warmth.

When he fell, he was there.

The weight was familiar in his too weak arms; he followed it down, concrete under his knees and the sight of Chuuya's eyelids closing on rolled-back eyes a thrill. Corruption, he had proposed, three days after one of two gods had been stopped, as they kicked each other's feet outside Mori's office. Get it? Because it corrupts you.

It's not me it corrupts, Chuuya had replied, eyes settled somewhere else. Dramatic, like always. Somewhat guilty, like always.

From the crater — from Souls that could not force their ashes to move; from mafiosi that had gotten caught in the crossfire — not a sound came.

"I can carry him, if you want," Hirotsu let him know, the back of his legs almost touching his spine — as he directed his men to put out the fires; just close enough to make sure no one would watch them.

Dazai blinked up at him. "It's Chuuya."

He seemed not to have anything to add.

In the corner of his gaze, he saw Kouyou's blood stained kimono run towards them. Ace was barking orders, somewhere — his men were dragging bones and severed limbs out of the crater. He thought of the man from the Secret Force — staring at him.

He studied Chuuya's furrowed face. No spiral scars cracking his skin apart like chasms; no blood that seemed to turn black at the edges. Droplets from the scratches on his own cheek landed on his nose.

Not Corruption, that ugly, known thing in his bones hummed. Not Corruption, but —

"Ah," Dazai whined. "You're gonna be mad at me for this, aren't you?"

---

...

---

The doors of the Hospital's Chapel made no sound when Kouyou stepped through them.

“Oh, there you are,” Dazai sniffed, fatigued, his body almost bent in a half, shoulders pressed against the side of his bed, putting all his might into pushing it backwards. Dozens of Hospital beds had been set up in the Chapel; the unexpected attack had filled every free room. “Put out the house fire just fine, I hope?”

“You’re already awake,” she observed.

“Ah, yes. Drugs never put me out long,” He grunted. “Would you mind helping me? Maybe Mori had a point about eating more vegetables.”

The hem of Kouyou’s kimono brushed the frescoed floors; she dragged fight-broken nails down the pews that had been pushed to the side, studying the sleeping faces in the beds with no expression.

By the time she had reached the corner where both his and Chuuya’s bed — the final line he was attempting to press his own against — rested, she had the grace to offer: “Demon child.”

“Ane-san.”

“All the beds were screwed to the ground.”

He stared.

“Damn it,” He sighed, shoulders digging into the metal of the railings. Under the metallic protests of the IV connected to his arms, he straightened, kicking the pole with little enthusiasm. “I’ve been at it for half an hour.”

He made his way to Chuuya’s IV, reading the blurred, standard information adorning the plastic with squinting eyes. Under the arch of the plastic tube, the boy slept soundly, a mouthful of hair stuck under his oxygen mask.

“Dazai?”

“Was hoping they’d put poison in his,” he lied, with an obnoxious sigh. “Oh, whatever.”

Very loudly, and causing an exasperated frown on Kouyou’s sleepless face, Dazai proceeded to grab the closest plastic seat from the further rows. With morphine-laced legs, he dragged it all the way to the side of Chuuya’s bed — squishing the boy’s interiors with his upper half, and balancing his butt between the seat and the edge of the railing.

Eyes on the paintings on the ceiling, he added: “You don’t happen to have glue with you, do you?”

“Glue,” Kouyou echoed, lost.

“Yes, glue.”

“I’m afraid not.”

“Shame,” Dazai clicked his tongue. “Would you mind checking the emergency cabinets? Yes, there. Right there. Stop looking at me like — Yes, thank you.”

“Sure,” the woman commented, stealing one of the blankets on the altar, wrapping it around her shoulders as she watched him meticulously spread glue all over his unwounded hand. “May I ask what you — Oh,” She blinked. “You just — Alright.”

“Revenge method number one hundred and thirty four,” he recited, gingerly tapping the hand he had stuck to his chest, over his shirt — right where his heart was hidden. “For it may teach you some fucking honesty once in a while. Our little Hatrack will certainly demand revenge for today’s soirée — I’m simply doing my best to get on with it.”

For some very long moments, Kouyou didn’t do anything more than pierce the side of his head with her stare. Dazai counted cracks on the ceiling; when he got bored, he began studying the edge of Chuuya’s oxygen mask.

“How do you even —“ she began, but quickly gave up on that train of thought. “And for how long?”

“Varies. Until it cools off, I suppose? I don’t think Chuuya knows how the clock works.”

“And you’re simply going to do it.”

“Technically, I should be fighting off bullets he would be throwing in my direction, right now.”

“And you would do it.”

“The other one hundred and eighty nine methods are much more aggravating, to be fair,” Dazai let her know, kicking his feet just to rattle the bed. Chuuya still didn’t wake up — lazy enough to sleep through the entire surgery, and then five hours more. “Well — I’m pretty sure he’s doubled up on them, actually. Slugs hardly have much to do in their measly existence.”

“And you’re simply,” she insisted, “Going to do it.”

Dazai squinted. “Yes?”

“Alright,” Kouyou concluded, nodding once — and then never stopping. “Sure. Why not.”

Silence settled upon them like a second chapel; the light snores and the beeping machines of various wounded knocked against it with weak insistence. His ear was pressed against Chuuya’s ribcage; he couldn’t decide if it was better to listen to the heart under his hand, or the one pumping against his temple.

“Hirotsu’s guarding the Chapel,” the woman started again, eventually. “He tried to get you two your own room, but you arrived too late.”

Surprise was reserved for less obvious things. He had to morph his features, nonetheless. “How nice,” he offered. Recalling the confusion that had overtaken him when he’d woken up, he added: “Even nicer of Mori to actually let me in a Hospital. So there is an end to his greed.”

“Greedy is a bizarre way to describe him,” she replied, leaning on the end of Chuuya’s bed. “Boss is simply possessive, I believe.”

The weight on his throat was a mixture of fading drugs and wounds from Rengoku he had only begun to truly feel once they were stitched. He nudged Chuuya’s cast with his identical one. “Possessive?”

His voice sounded strangely young. He wished for a change to retake that scene. Always the issue between them, he supposed — she who looked for a child, and he who didn’t quite know how to be.

“Greed is such a displeasing word,” Kouyou hummed, twirling her umbrella against the railing of the bed. He could never decide if she would care about leaving marks, or not. “Possessiveness, at least, implies protection.”

“Or wishing to hold what you already have tighter,” he replied. “Greed, on the other hand, is never satisfied.”

The Executive paused. Her eyes were all for Chuuya — he recalled hearing tales of her insisting presence at his side, after Verlaine’s days. “If he were easily satisfied, we wouldn’t be where we are now.”

“Ane-san,” he called. He blinked at the ceiling, forcing his eye open until he could see every stain of humidity. “Sit on the other side.”

She curled an eyebrow. “Excuse me?”

“You wouldn’t be visiting my deathbed if you didn’t have something to ask me,” Dazai shrugged, body sinking deeper into the uncomfortable embrace of Chuuya’s rising and falling body. “Unless you just wish to set me on fire and balance it out. Quite a terrible death. If you want to talk, you’re going to sit on the other side. Thanks.”

The look she gifted him was so predictable he could taste it under his mouth. The Port Mafia was a land of fools — which meant that most of its prisoners had given their best shot at figuring Dazai out, at some point.

Because she was smart, with a sigh, Kouyou stood up. She circled Chuuya’s bed, dragging a second plastic chair to settle near his pillow — not on Dazai’s blind side.

“This isn’t your deathbed, lad,” she decided to say, eventually. Her lower lip quivered. Unfortunately, she didn’t add, even if he couldn’t decide if she would. “You have slept less than Mori estimated, actually. Your recovery times are excellent, as usual.”

“You flatter me,” smiled. “Did I get it wrong, by the way?”

“Wrong?”

“Are you here to visit your protégée?” He nodded towards Chuuya’s lightly snoring head. “He’s the one who did those terrifying stitches, by the way. If Mori put you here to make sure I wouldn’t die in my sleep, you can thank him. ”

They both knew that wasn’t the case, but Kouyou still did nothing more than pull a red strand of hair off Chuuya’s forehead. “The wound was infected, yes. But forgive me if I don’t believe he was the one to rip a thread from filthy clothes and use it.”

“It’s easy to make people do what they already want to,” he replied. “The idea of me getting infected gave him the strength of ten lions.”

“And the bad luck of a spider at night,” she noticed, nodding towards his hand. The white plaster around his shattered thumb was a familiar weight, even if in a never-touched-before land. “He has one just like that.”

“Don’t worry,” he assured, conspirationally. “I’ll make sure to draw a little caricature on his, so you can still tell us apart. In case the raw dislike you feel for me doesn’t give you the answer, of course.”

There had already been no hilarity on Kouyou’s features, but somehow she managed to lose every inch of softness all the same. “I do not dislike you, demon child.”

“Obviously not. I terrify you. And I burned down your house. Chuuya helped, though. Fear and dislike are very similar things, to be fair.”

“You make endless assumptions about the human soul,” she observed. “For someone who cannot understand it.”

“And what does that make you deduce about me, Officer?”

At last, she dropped all pretenses. “Where were you?”

“I told you,” Dazai said. “A trip.”

“You were out entertaining that ridiculous theory of yours, weren’t you?” the woman insisted. “That outlandish mind control idea?”

“Ah, let’s turn that question around. What do you think happened last night?”

She scoffed. “The Headquarters were attacked by the Nine Rings. ”

Dazai sighed, kicking his feet until they were hidden under the armrests. All you need is covered feet, he recalled telling the woman, once, when they had been stuck in a stakeout in the coldest corner of the city — stealing her yukata to cover his own. “Yes, that hypothesis would be terribly embarrassing for us, wouldn’t it? We were slaughtered. ”

“It’s not an hypothesis,” Kouyou insisted. “Every single body we managed to recover bore their tattoo —“

“Oh? You managed to find someone?”

Her hands twitched. “Just one person.”

“And he was dead?”

“Of course he was dead.”

“Mmh,” He scratched his newly done stitches, pulling the hems of the Hospital gown. Mori must have fought to keep him in bandages. “And you’re sure he wasn’t one of ours? One of the fallen ones. Not among the many that promptly decided to betray us.”

She flinched.

The stained glass windows of the Chapel painted kaleidoscopic squares on the ground she studied, tracing them with the tip of her umbrella.

“They betrayed us,” she repeated. “And you made Chuuya burn them alive.”

“They were traitors, Ane-san,” Obnoxiously, he widened his eyes. “What did you want me to do, spare them? Scandalous.”

“Ah?” he insisted, when she kept quiet, moving the seat back and forth — and back and forth, and back and forth. “Unless, of course, you agree that there was something wrong with them. Unless, obviously, you agree that it makes no sense for half the organization to suddenly turn their backs on —“

“The Nine Rings have always been nothing but sneaky devils,” she snapped, eyes stubbornly set on him. “I’ve seen them corrupt the purest of souls — the most loyal soldiers. The Port Mafia has been in need of a cleanse of ranks for years. Scum from the previous Boss’ reign still survives, and tonight was the definitive proof. Their execution was inevitable and necessary.”

“But you didn’t want Chuuya to wear the executioner mantle?” he concluded, sighing, knowing he was missing the mark. “How uncharacteristic, for the woman who believes you should poison yourself before someone else does it for you.”

“Some of those men were his friends,” Kouyou said. How much grief can he take before he decides this place is not worth it, she did not ask, just how many blades will it take me to kill him, when that happens? “Some of them had been under his command many times. He has lost much, and blames himself for every ounce of it. Forgive me if I wished —“

Dazai barked out a laugh. He didn’t need to take notice of her flinch to know it had been a horrible sound. “Do you want to protect him, or do you want him to be like you? Your indecisiveness will kill him.”

“And you, demon child, will destroy him.” No fan to hide her face; she would smile even as she bathed in his blood. “You put him in the eye of the storm, and for what —“

“To get rid of the problem with one, singular, big boom,” He motioned an explosion with a single hand, swearing on his honor with the other. “Which I did. I would hope he’d thank me but, well — He does detest Hospitals, does he not?”

A hint of hesitance lit up Kouyou's features. Post Mafia members devoured composure every midday, though — she was quick to hide it. Dazai wondered when people would stop forgetting that Chuuya was just the perfect size to fit in his personal microscope — to be prodded and turned and studied and obsessed over.

“How many did you lose, anyway?”

“I have known you long and deep,” the woman scoffed. “I know you do not care.”

“Ah, but Mori is going to want my report,” he corrected her. “I wish to be as detailed as possible, that is all. You know how much he expects from me.”

“Ask Chuuya. He will know.”

“You know, your protectiveness is moving,” he mused. Chuuya's monitor beeped gently, sharper than the thump! under his ear. A despicable sound — Dazai had torn himself off of it the moment he had woken up. “Or it would be, if it wasn't so damn hypocritical.”

Strident, she tilted her head. “Hypocritical?”

“Yes!” He nodded, enthusiastic. “Chuuya takes the death of those he cares about at heart, doesn't he? How unfortunate, for someone so wonderfully skilled. But you know that already. And yet, you still didn't have any qualms about putting a bomb in the taxi of a man whose death you knew he would blame himself for. Did you?”

Kouyou fell silent.

“You did risk his life there, didn't you, Ane-san?” he considered. His eyes were growing tired of the ceiling; he reached until he found Chuuya's hat on the floor, and abandoned it on his face. “But that was fine, I bet. That was easily justifiable.”

“How did you —“

“A bit of this and a bit of that. I arrived late that morning. Chuuya was already upstairs, and I knew which taxi he had come with, so I thought to myself: why not prepare a little surprise for him?” He shrugged. “I had no bombs to use, but I got one of those prank toys — the ones that spray paint on you when activated, you know? — from the shop next alley. Went to put it in and, oh! Guess what was already there? Nothing at all.”

He tilted his head. “And so I prepared my surprise. I started getting suspicious when you sent one of your men away before the meeting was over. Remember? I thought to myself, she must have a job of sorts for him. But then the explosion happened, and no paint was anywhere! Someone must have removed it when putting the bomb, I thought.”

“And it couldn't be the Nine Rings,” she concluded. From a slot under the hat, he could see the tilt of her lips was — all but friendly. “Because Nakatomi came back with paint on his clothes.”

Dazai hummed. “Precisely. I must applaud your plan, though; blaming the Nine Rings was the perfect excuse you needed to get Chuuya mad, correct? Mad enough to slaughter,” He sighed. “All to make sure he would do his best to get your problem solved.”

Her jaw was a blade, tickling Adam's apple with the glee of her youthful eyes. Golden Demon was nowhere to be found — he could feel its presence all the same. Breathing down his neck, holding its katana on the edge of his lips.

She didn't dislike him; he felt no longing for the one time she had dared to touch him. Hostility was their balance, and Dazai was a person of order.

“The Nine Rings,” she spelled out, quietly and deadly, “Are a threat.”

“Considering what they did to us without us even realizing,” he agreed, aware that they were following two different roads of thought. “But that's not why you're so pent up over this. You're just mad. A mad woman is not the strangest thing in this world — but you're Port Mafia. Your anger can't live quietly.”

“He's my subordinate,” Kouyou replied. “And I knew he would react fast enough.”

“Where does your cruelty start and mine end, I wonder?” Dazai commented, as if he hadn't heard a thing. “Sitting here preaching to me about treating your darling badly.”

“This isn't —“

“What's the difference? That you fool him into wanting slaughter, while I make it clear that he's doing what I want? He chose to be here. He chose to work with me. If he can deal with the consequences of your actions — he can deal with the consequences of mine, and of his own choices. Don't you think so?”

The beep of Chuuya's heart monitor sped up. A mere bump in the system — one that called his gaze down, at least, setting it on the ugly expression he wore in his unconsciousness.

One of his hands was abandoned mere inches from Dazai's shoulder. He planted his cheek where the sharpest bone of his hip rested, and studied the curled up fingers — the gloveless-skin, somehow less realistic than an Event Horizon in Yokohama's backyard.

Touching is not a crime, a cat had once sworn. He pulled the hat up again. A strangely cruel thing to tell a boy whose flesh was a thief amongst the capable.

“Dazai,” Kouyou said, in the shadows of fabric. It echoed strangely across the walls of the Chapel. She always stood at least three steps from him. “You need to stop the Nine Rings.”

Eyes set on a mole, he replied: “With all due respect, Executive — You're a broken record, lately.”

“You need to,” she insisted — the texture of her voice unfamiliar. “Whatever you think it's going on — the mechanics of it don't matter. What matters is stopping the Nine Rings and their new Boss.”

“Your revenge —“

“This isn’t about my revenge. This is —“

The doors of the Chapel opened.

Kouyou didn’t react to the lines of nurses making their way inside. She kept her lips pressed together even when they wondered about her unusual visiting times — did nothing when a pair of them attempted to take Dazai back to his bed, giving up amidst his whines, and refilling his IV while he curled on his side against the hard curves of a slug’s ribs.

“We will talk,” Dazai yawned, blinking at the more and more blurred outlines of her pink silhouette. Underneath the stained windows, she could have been a crucifix herself — unhesitant in her bleeding. “I need to sleep your protégée’s stupid handiwork off. You go torture some more Souls, why don’t you?”

“Souls?” she echoed, quietly. He hated this part of the drugs. He hated knowing he’d wake up. “What a silly name.”

He had to squint to find her through the glimmering shadows, the hat chain glimmering. Something like guilt, he thought — something like heartbreak.

“Ane-san,” he called, uncertain of why. He never did like it when the drugs began to work.

The next breath he took, he was sleeping.

---

...

---

Someone had put a blanket on him, but made sure to leave his feet uncovered.

“That traitor,” Dazai’s numb tongue muttered, shaking his head until the hat fell on the floor. He imagined her throwing the blanket in; making sure her knuckles wouldn’t even brush his chin. It almost warmed his feet with amusement. Sunrise knocked insistently against the stained glass windows, painting blinding squares of colors on the marble.

Breathing steadily under his pulsing head and the burn of his shoulder, Chuuya still slept, drooling inside a blue line of reflected light.

Fingers tapped his IV.

Mori had a box under his arm, and no blood stains on his red scarf. He smiled down at him with the exasperation of a dangling hangman knot.

“You spent two hours in surgery getting that nasty bullet removed,” he started. “Maybe do those poor doctors do the favor of not dying so soon?”

“This isn’t my fault,” Dazai didn’t slur. Never wise to let Mori believe he wasn’t thinking. “You’re the one who recruited the grief-prone atomic bomb.”

A hum. The man’s eyes raced down to their most essential point of contact — the naked edge of Dazai’s chin, brushing a raised edge of Chuuya’s vest over the hip. What does it feel like?, he had asked him, once, over the cold blue of his Ability. To steal it?

It doesn’t fit, Dazai couldn’t recall if he had been bored enough to answer. It’s hungry and it won’t digest it all the same.

“One of your nastiest scars to date, I’ll say,” the doctor offered, instead of a rightful apology. He tapped his saline bag, though his eyes stayed on his bandaged shoulder. “Would you like to sit in a circle and discuss what we’ve learned from it?”

“Supply your villa with firefighters?”

“I will leave punishments in that regard to our dear Ozaki,” A pause. “And to whoever made you glue your hand to your chest,” He pulled his wrist, lips quivering when Dazai didn’t offer a hum at the sound of ripping — palm and fabric. “There we go. In hope you may be more truthful, should we say?”

“How gentlemanly of you.”

A pull; a sharp burn, all the way to his wrist. He watched the bloodied needle of his IV dangle from the tube in Mori’s fingers, knees twitching on the seat — watched as he sat on the edge of the bed, pushing Chuuya’s body to the side only so.

“You’re usually smart enough not to get your wounds infected,” he considered, knotting up the IV, throwing the needle onto the heart monitor. Dazai climbed out of his cocoon to huddle on the seat, studying the chessboard in Mori’s lap. “All those lessons didn’t stick?”

“You believe teaching the suicidal how to stay alive is a worthy waste of your time,” he replied, dividing the black and white pieces in equal halves on the bed, by Chuuya’s knee. “Who am I to fight you on it?”

Their games of chess had gotten boring pretty soon — around the first week of technically not obliged isolation in Mori’s clinic, what with the alternating streams of wins that ended too fast. New solutions had been required — completing a full color set; hiding pieces in shoes and guessing the number; requiring to solve riddles to move forward.

It was a warmer memory; something less stiff than the clinic’s rigor mortis — less connected to the fireflies in a jar and the butterflies on the wall and the glow of Elise’s living corpse. I lost again. Warmth was nice from any and all wildfires.

“Think of it as investment,” Mori winked. He had worn his old lab coat — maybe to mimetize; though he doubted anyone in that Port Mafia-bought Hospital wouldn’t have let him roam freely. “You should thank Chuuya, later. Those stitches were a bother, but they did do their work.”

Pointedly, he turned to tap his oxygen mask, affectionate. The boy didn’t even stir, still drooling.

“You led the surgery yourself,” Not a question. Mori wouldn’t let a doctor touch him. “How come we aren’t in the clinic? Or your office backroom?”

“I barely managed to get the guards to bring me back here in time,” Mori replied, reaching out to move his first white piece. “I simply brought you where everyone else had been. Too many fires to put out to worry about secondary necessities.”

Liar, he thought. Dazai wasn’t secondary. “Did you find Sama’s corpse alright?”

“Missing an arm,” the man replied, not missing a beat. The picture of untouchability, from his gloves to the crinkles around his eyes. “One of the vans ran her over. I do hope her family won’t mind.”

“They fixed up the Hatrack’s friends,” Dazai shrugged, sneaking two black pieces in the sleeves of his coat. “I’m sure they can fix her up. You can mourn all you like.”

“Mourn,” Mori echoed, as if unfamiliar with the concept. Under the Chapel’s lights, he was marble and supposedly good intentions. “I doubt the Mafia will suffer from the loss of a single Lizard.”

“And you?”

A blink. “Same thing, is it not?”

Hilarity pressed against his lips. He bit them.

“So,” he started. “Are they already blaming you?”

“When are they not?” Mori sighed, eyes roaming over the beds of wounded subordinates whose names he didn’t know — and didn’t care to find out; and didn’t mind filling the street with blood in the name of. “Not joining the fight didn’t help, of course.”

“Where were you?”

He watched his black piece eat a white one of his. “Where were you, Dazai?”

“You know,” He motioned his questions off, listening to the vanishing numbness of drugs he had not access to anymore. “Solving your investigation. The one you refuse to inform your ranks about.”

“That’s what I suspected. Tell me about these undead soldiers, then.”

Dazai did.

Pointedly, and with an ease that seemed wanted from both sides, he refrained from mentioning the cross he doubted any surgery had helpfully picked up from Chuuya's insides.

"Traitors could be everywhere," he concluded, by the time nurses had begun to filter inside, checking on groaning and snoring and unbreathing bodies. "If that is how we are meant to call them. Their betrayal isn't quite willing. They were just desperate enough to fall into the Poet's trap."

"And once you nullify Dante's Ability, they will be dead in a matter of seconds," Mori mused, holding two pieces between his fingers. "Whether it's betrayal or death, we have lost a lot of men today."

"At least you don't have to bother with deciding whether they must be buried according to traitors' laws or not," he observed, helpfully.

"You've got something on your nose," the man told him.

"What?"

Mori leaned forward, slipping one of his white pieces in his pocket. His smile had a hint of mirth, something youthful. He was always in a good mood when the chance to fiddle with Dazai's flesh came — when he didn't have to fear Dazai striking right when he was at his least capable.

A rat trap, the man had described him as, once, after observing a line of mafiosi slip past Dazai with their shoulders almost brushing the wall.

"Lack of empathy," he winked.

"Boss, this is so unprofessional."

"More or less than hiding the threat we're currently facing from my men?"

His tone had emptied out again, echoing off the walls of the room. Dazai leaned his chin on his hand. "You can decide that on your own. But how are you going to explain what they fought?"

"The Nine Rings used to be known for their vast range of — unusual Ability users," Mori replied, knocking on the chessboard. "Their tattoo maker, for example. Would it be so hard to believe one of theirs deals with illusions as well?"

"No bodies to prove those declarations false," he admitted. "But we don't know how many more Dante took from our ranks. They could appear at any moment. You could just tell the truth, you know? Dante's threat is not enough to create chaos throughout an entire organization. At least we'll have more men searching for him."

Mori tapped a white piece on his chin.

"The Nine Rings are an enemy we know," he said, easily. "An enemy we've beaten once before, one the men bear resentment towards."

“You refuse to wager on their disbelief?”

“Illusion Abilities aren’t that uncommon. But an Ability that promises a lifelong dream, in exchange for betrayal of an organization most of them only joined not to be alone in the underworld fight?”

Dazai tried to imagine it.

“If other organizations were to find out there is something tempting enough to steal men from the Port Mafia,” Mori continued, “They might react. Ally, even. The underground is already growing restless, and it has been mere hours. They know someone managed to breach through our walls. If they believe it’s the Nine Rings — why wouldn’t they take advantage of a flag?”

“And then the common enemy will be even more familiar,” he concluded, “And the men will give their everything.”

“Which means,” Mori put down his white piece, completing his side of the board. “That while I prepare action against the apparent enemies, you need to deal with the real threat.”

“I thought I had been allowed to stop running around being your detective.”

“I had allowed you to stop hanging out with Chuuya, too,” the man made him notice. The gaze he offered his sleeping trick was honey and thorns, tracing scars stitching themselves up with an unusual buzz. He picked up his medical file; ran a chess piece down the lines. “For some reason, though, you didn’t,” Hilarity pulled his eyes; like one might have said that the sky was falling, he offered: “One might start thinking companionship has made you less obedient.”

“Companionship isn’t quite the word. And I don’t think that’s a fair judgement at all.”

“Don’t whine,” Mori tutted. His smile was a tad too pleasant; his eyes distracted by ink. “Not when poor Yumeno is still out there wandering these restless streets.”

He scoffed. “From the very beginning, I told you I wasn’t made for babysitting. I’m very smart, you know? You should have listened to me.”

“You are responsible for the things you tame.”

“Don’t start quoting books at me. You know I won’t read them.”

“That’s a lot of painkillers they’ve ordered for our Chuuya,” the doctor commented, unbothered by the cheating moves Dazai was putting in place over the edge of the medical file. “Unsurprising. But isn’t it just marvelous, just how fragile a body overflowing with strength can be?”

He pushed back and forth on the seat, listening to the screech of the legs. “That’s what happens when you stick a fake god in a garden gnome.”

“A worthy garden gnome.”

“Nothing worthy about a five years old.”

“My,” Mori tilted his head to the side. “How long has he been sleeping?”

“Enough for me to draw on his face,” Dazai sighed, longing, dangling his head over the edge of the seat. “Were you people to stop interrupting us.”

“Given the circumstances, I do believe it best if he’s on his feet as soon as possible. Somebody needs to deal with this mess — and to find Q as soon as possible, considering the thirst that’s about to swallow us up,” He shut the file, his medical opinion sealed. “You can let the nurses know they should halve the rations.”

Behind the wall of Mori’s candid coat, stained windows tickled Chuuya’s eyelashes, turning his face into a furrowed kaleidoscope.

Can you trust that?

“There is something that might keep Q in check,” It slipped through his teeth; a next breath his lungs wouldn’t let him decide to hold in. Transactionality. “Once we find them.”

A mere blink; he leaned his weight back, hand close to where Chuuya’s hand cast was abandoned. The medical file was still on his lap — still at reach. “In short?”

“It involves blades,” Dazai yawned, cheeks squished against his hand, making pieces dance on the chessboard. Elise had always involved him in her doll games — she had always protested how unbloodied his stories tended to be compared to her own. “A way for their Ability to be chained to circumstances, and not their choice. A leash, if you may.”

“I never asked you to control them.”

He raised his uncovered eye. Mori despised honesty — he wanted craftiness. “That’s what I’m for, though?”

A pause. An held gaze; an idea Dazai knew he wouldn’t be able to refuse. Mori tended to assume his ideas would inevitably be violent enough to work.

He hummed, abandoning the file on top of the heart monitor.

“You need to be careful,” he advised him, uselessly and tenderly and uninterested. Chuuya’s rations would stay. Mori would be less amused by it, in a bit of time. “Discontent is rising through the ranks. Especially after that little show you two put up.”

“It was to be expected, wasn’t it?” he replied. “Men don’t particularly enjoy kids being better at things than they are. How do we deal with them?”

“Oh, I don’t know. Surprise me, won’t you?”

Their game went on and on. Playing with him was both endlessly exhilarating and predictably boring; a reminder of old camaraderie and of its insufferable ephemerality. Mori wasn’t a match. He was just bright enough to give up on the race before it even started.

His victory came with no surprise. Mori offered him his usual glance — defeated; satisfied. Dazai's successes were always the cause of joyous grief. He knew Mori liked to believe he had created him from scratch. He knew a smarter man would have regretted it.

"Congratulations," Mori told him. "What will you have?"

Favors after a win were a tradition. Back in the clinic it had been easy — the right combination of medicines that would kill him; dials on the panel the TV would be set on; the right to decide which men put in that afternoon suicide squad. In the highest floor of the Headquarters the stakes grew, crawling up his skin and shining bright in his eyes.

In a Hospital room, he settled on something that would benefit the both of them.

"I want two things," he said.

Mori curled an eyebrow. "How unusual."

"If I'm keeping your secret, I want something in exchange," he replied. "Unless you prefer I explain the wonders of mind control to the Port Mafia."

Transactionalism was a language they were both fluent in. An inch from amused, the man nodded.

"First," He pushed the chessboard to the floor, ignoring the startled glances thrown in his direction. "As precisely as possible — How much control do we have on the city pharmacies? Drug stores and all?"

The question surprised him, evidently. He was quick to hide it behind intertwined hands. "We control the market. You already know that."

"And we could, theoretically, stop one specific type of medicine from entering the city?"

"With important economic consequences, yes."

"Good. It will be on your card. I'll write you down what I want out for the next few days."

Mori sighed. "I suppose. And the other thing?"

The Brutus between his ribs buzzed in fear.

It was nothing new. His carcass rejected him, day after day, against all that the mind that controlled it decided was law and was fair and was needed. Would you listen, if I didn't despise you? "Lessons."

The man twitched.

"You haven't needed lessons in almost a year."

"I'm getting compliant," Dazai sighed, laying back against the seat, lonely eye on the rise and fall of Chuuya's chest. "Losing my touch."

“Alright, then,” Mori gathered all their chess pieces, fixing them inside the box. His eyes moved frantically around. The curiosity of a scientist; the impatience of a doctor; the pain of a creator. “We’ll take care of it as soon as you can leave the hospital.”

“When can I?”

“Oh,” The ghost of a smile appeared on his face. A nurse would approach soon; the man would pat her shoulders, and tell her not to change a thing about their medical files. “When your doctor says so.”

Chapter End Notes

mori, manipulator: would be a shame if i refused to give chuuya medicine dazai, problematic: what if i put blades on a seven years old

you notice how q’s the real victim? hey there! i hope your month has been going nicely. i was vaguely worried about this chapter — fight scenes are a new thing to write, and my vocabulary is sort of limited on that matter. but the first scene of the chapter was actually one of the first scenes i’ve ever thought for this fan fiction; i’d been told a story by a friend of mine about how her parents met by having to share a shower at this one beach after they’d swam in a sea they hadn’t noticed was absolutely LITTERED in sewer remnants.

it was also important to me to show that dazai has a complicated relationship with skin in general, and that chuuya has his own way to be mindful about it — even with the little context that he has about it. it’s one of the side stories i’m more excited to share, so i hope you’ll like it!!

also... caught the shame and toad reference? ;)

see you soon, and thank you for reading :)

ME

Chapter Summary

They were the first words they exchanged in a week. Neither seemed eager to add to them. He had a vague memory of Chuuya grabbing the side of his shirt to pull him down the crosswalk, before their teams went their separate ways for a mission; after that, radio silence.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter vii.

---

Case number: 00087357

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On ***/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. spontaneously committed the following insubordinations: property damage, [...]*

---

The pipes on the ground floor of Building Two had been raining from leaking slots all morning.

Only lonely, shower-water drops had landed on the marble floors across the week following the attack; amongst the chaos of reconstructions and the mutters of men unused to any shape of defeat, most failed to notice the tears falling from the ceiling — until they turned into blown-out waterfalls.

“An underrated showdown,” Dazai — who had tampered with the piping system for seven days straight, until it had bowed to him — commented, huddled under his umbrella, watching buckets of rain bounce off his shoes. Yokohama had copied the HQs; or the other way around. “You know,” he added, eyes to the Church, much to the goon who had driven him there’s lack of interest. “Everybody is so focused on scrubbing off the stupid blood from the carpets, they’re not even paying attention to my work.”

A lie, of course. Mafiosi had been avoiding his gaze since the attack; their eyes were too heavily stuck on the floor to be sure, but Dazai was sure he would find the reflection of his makeshift explosion cage in their shivering pupils. Grief; perhaps — never rage. They all knew better.

All the same — at least, tall and busy as they all were, they made sure not to bump his shoulders. Not that they ever did.

[In the quiet, was a certainty: Mori only ever raised weapons Dazai had put in his hands.

Books had been the start of it — pictures of bodies with no skin and bones with no walls; eyeballs staring right at him through a page; thin lines connecting never ending letters he couldn’t read, if he tried too hard. He had read all of them. Then, he had nudged the corpses on the floor with the shoes Mori had given him.

“Now, now,” the doctor had said.

“Sorry,” Dazai had replied, out of need. He hated pain. That curious doctor seemingly knew many ways of making it hurt. Their deal might not last, if he was found lacking in these aspects.

Polite, she used to hum. At the very least.

That night, once the blood had been scrubbed from the floor of the clinic and the stolen weapon supplements had been fixed in place — once the screams from the man’s gloves and the victims' bones had echoed off into nothingness, and into the curve of Elise's smile — he had sat on the medical bed, stared down the tied up men begging with their eyes, and said —

“Show me where it hurts.”].

Cursed by Port Mafia trademark efficiency, the never ending sea of coffins had been organized in rows through the pews, new wood shining under the stained glass windows. They would be brought to the Under Port by the end of the morning. Not yet, though.

Minimal time to grieve, with no grave to cry to, Mori would say, even if he refused to change old traditions — seems a bit distasteful, yes?

Through the tufts of grass in black clothing and tears-carved cheeks, Chuuya had blessedly — voluntarily, he imagined, studying the curve of his spine as he offered his condolences to every soul in that place — forgotten his hat at home.

[“To hurt others,” Mori had asked, unblinking; a collector watching his ceramics shake under the kicks of playing children, “Or yourself?”

“I don't like pain,” An obvious conclusion, he assumed. Bullets were easy to find in any city; Yokohama, and the Port Mafia territory, might have begged him to put a revolver to his temple. “I assume nobody does. Their screams would be less loud if they did.”

“You want to make yourself useful, then?” he had joked. It had sounded like a joke. Dazai couldn't pinpoint when the doctor had decided there were uses to the corpse on his porch; perhaps immediately.

I want to watch them beg for it, he had thought about saying. I want to watch their fingers cling to it. I want to watch them crawl towards the silence.

Not out of any true cruelty; just to see how it felt. Just to feel a spark of familiarity; some bone in his skeleton that would pulse along and say, see, see, see, you too are —

“Hush,” Dazai had sighed. “I'm just bored”].

Chuuya spent a good half an hour pretending not to acknowledge his presence. He had his rounds to do, after all — Dazai sat on the last pew with his console, and watched him help faceless mafiosi carry the coffins to the cars, in various states of disguise; counted tears on a painting of a Madonna as he talked tales of the dead to the grieving ones.

Mourning should be of some use, he had spied him saying to Kouyou, months before.

Because dogs tended to be stubborn, he kept the act up until every working mafioso was soaked to the bone, and some old woman screamed her heart out on top of one of the few coffins left.

When he dropped on the other end of the pew, he left no trace of water.

“You can manipulate the single raindrops?” he asked, not raising his voice over the shrieks and sobs — not raising his eyes from the aliens on his screen.

“Takes some concentration,” Chuuya said. His voice was rough at the edges — the bullet Dazai had fired into had hit him at the end of his vocal chords. “I mostly don’t bother. Worse things to be soaked in.”

A grave nod. Some younger men dragged the woman away from the coffin, building a wall of dark clothing and tissues to hide her from sight. Over the altar, no statue answered her prayers. “Blood.”

“Piss.”

“Soy sauce.”

“Shit,” A pause. “Sewers shit.”

“The pipes at the Headquarters,” Dazai had the grace of informing, “But that water is from the showers, at least.”

A glance. The lack of his hat shouldn’t have been as disconcerting as it was, considering the short time he had spent surgically attached to it. Dazai kept expecting the light not to bounce off his unmatching eyes so devastatingly intensely. “The what?”

He hummed. “You’ll see.”

They were the first words they exchanged in a week. Neither seemed eager to add to them. He had a vague memory of Chuuya grabbing the side of his shirt to pull him down the crosswalk, before their teams went their separate ways for a mission; after that, radio silence. Then again, Chuuya always grabbed people’s clothes before crossing the street — perhaps, a remnant from days of children’s sticky hands stuck to his, in a crater with no streets at all.

They sat, half a city and two matching casts between them, and watched the funerals end.

[“If you don’t want to suffer,” Mori explained, sensibly, hovering right at the outskirts of his numbness — right by the bleeding flesh of a crying man — “Let yourself unlearn it.”

He wanted to ask: when did we learn pain? Why would we do that?

Childish laziness, ancient skeleton. He stared at the light, instead; the whitish ring that shone bright around Mori’s head, an unlikely halo for an unlikely person. Somewhere, muffled by the dirty windows of the clinic, the stars were watching. Mori never touched him; to demonstrate on Dazai’s own body, as he requested, he only used his voice to direct Dazai’s own fingers.

A dislocated arm. A clean cut down the nerves that would hold still where chains might not. Spots that tickled; spots that should have tickled, but didn’t.

Just you wait, they swore. Just you wait].

“That guy from GSS,” Chuuya spoke up, once the tap-tap of raindrops had grown unignorable. It took him by surprise. “The one you were shooting.”

Dazai would forget, eventually. “Yes?”

“Was he the first person you killed?”

Some kid who did not understand grief was wandering through the Church; the sound of his small hands on the unguarded organ startled every chest but theirs. “In some ways.”

His next glance was dirtier.

“Pity doesn’t give any secret-giving points.”

“Don’t pity me,” Chuuya scoffed. “I’m not the one in a casket.”

You’ve been ignoring me all week, he could have whined. Everyone had. Dazai had woken up with his head on an empty bed and nurses whispering about the kid who really didn’t like Hospitals, left in such a hurry. Afterwards it had been papers and executions and the yellow tapes of reconstruction sites — and the curious sight of Chuuya pretending he hadn’t helped set men he knew on fire.

One had to start ignoring the blood under their nails, at some point.

“Do you consider Suribachi City your first?” he asked, instead, because it would sting.

A grunt. A smaller coffin being carried away; rain entering through the open doors, standing the frescoed marble. “Do you consider yourself?”

Dazai felt his smile stretch across his face.

He pocketed his console under the winning jingle; crossed his legs on the old wood, and informed him: “Mori said the picture came out nicely. He will hang it.”

The boy’s grimace was more funerary than any of the half-stolen flowers around the Church. “I still insist you’re the one who suggested the tradition.”

“You’ve never visited the Hall?” he replied, as obnoxious as he could. “It’s right by Mori’s office. All those nice pictures of relevant figures in the syndicate, all framed and on display for his power thirst. He just wanted to add his youngests. Shame Q isn’t around.”

“He’s not power thirsty,” Chuuya corrected him, because he occasionally dabbled in intuition. Then: “Control thirsty, at most. Isn’t it sort of stupid, putting every high position on display?”

“Only trusted ones and traitors reach Mori’s floor,” Dazai shrugged. “Only two ways to leave.”

The whole photograph-taking business had been sort of a farce, especially in the middle of a starting civil-underground war — both Chuuya and the photographer had sent looks to the windows every few seconds, watching gangs unionize under the sygyl of the blade scratching the Port Mafia’s throat.

Very much official, the rest of it — orders to smile, but not too much; requests that Elise stood straighter, if she could, of course; the sight of Chuuya's jaw tightening uncomfortably under that unorthodox procedure, shoes smelling of sheep.

The photographer had had the worst time of them all, evidently. Morality made men weird. Not reluctant; nothing money and pointed guns couldn't buy. Only — realer. Smart enough not to pity them; careful enough to fear.

“Boss still pissed off?”

Are you?, he could have said. It sounded nicer in his mind than, what did Dante show you? “His maybe most powerful Ability User was out of town during the Apocalypse. I ate all of his breakfast yogurt,” he listed off. “In all, we're not allowed to join today's moving forward meeting.”

“Wonder why said-User wasn't exactly around,” Chuuya muttered, uglily. “Piece of shit.”

“It's not like I dragged you to Rengoku.”

“It's not like you told me Rengoku was a trap, either, you absolute —“ A breath. Clearly not lined in his colors; perhaps one of those decorations Kouyou liked so much. “I still don't think it's a good idea.”

“What is?”

A pointed glare. “Not telling anyone that I'm,” He frowned; kicked the ground, disgusted. “You know. We can't risk them ending up in my possessed radar.”

Dazai studied the assortment of letters on the tip of his tongue; a name neither of them had dared to whisper that week. The secretary desk at Building One had been ghostly empty; Chuuya stubbornly quiet. He never met him in the Hospital halls; Tanaki never said a single word.

“We can't risk them locking you up, either,” he replied, eventually. “Mori's considering keeping every vaguely suspicious man away from the battlefield. You might make him hesitate, but I'm not going to rely on that doubt.”

“You could just say you need me to kick ass for you,” Chuuya let him know, unimpressed. “We all saw you fall on your face trying to judo flip Hirotsu.”

He gulped irritation down. “I was letting him win.”

“Sure you were.”

“Are you being sarcastic?”

“Are you being a dumbass?”

“Underestimation,” he insisted, “Is an underrated advantage in any and all fights, and given so many people were watching —“

“Don’t uncover your darkest plans so soon, man,” Chuuya stood up, brushing invisible dust off from his jacket. His casted hand allowed no glove; the sight of his naked fingers was a complicated matter. If his body was hurting, as Dazai knew it must be, it didn’t show. “Well?”

He met his expectant glance. “Well?”

“I’m going to tear Dante’s jugular out of his throat with my teeth,” he explained, easy and unguilty, framed by the electrical lights forming a halo around the crucifix. He wondered if Arahaki was humming down his bones. “I’m assuming you want to help.”

“Office work,” Dazai replied. “So what. That’s a thing now?”

“What’s a thing?”

“Us,” A bad taste gathered under his tongue. He didn’t know what face he made; he imagined it was something classier than the retching lines of Chuuya’s sudden face. “You want to play fighting duo?”

“God, no.”

He stared. “But you want us to work on this together,” he echoed, needing him to see the point.

“Yes,” he confirmed, making his way to the doors, undeterred in his face. “Kinda. Want is a strong word. You’re occasionally useful. And I can’t exactly trust myself right now.”

Dazai had to run to catch up. “What makes you think you can trust me?”

“The hit I got to the head, probably,” Chuuya murmured, sticking his hands in his pockets. “Don’t get weird ideas. This is temporary. You get me out of mind control, I make sure your ass doesn’t die in the effort it will take.”

“That’s not in my interest —“

“And buy you a hangman knot afterwards,” he interrupted, stepping out in the rain — no umbrella to cover him; raindrops escaping him all the same. He turned to look at him, pointedly — determined. Mourning should be of some use. “So. What’s the plan?”

“I want something different —“

A huff. “Which is?”

Dazai thought about it. “What does Corruption feel like?”

A breath. Chuuya stared, not even angry, as if he hadn’t been expecting it. Perhaps he hadn’t. Perhaps he hadn’t quite talked about December out loud, outside of late reports. Perhaps the fever Dazai could feel in his throat had blurred his vision, only pretending the boy’s burned eye was sending off flares.

Longing, he thought. Running.

At last, frowning at the closest, least gleeful of the Madonnas, as petulant as a throat that had screamed under electricity could be, Chuuya offered: “Like they were all lying when they told me I could bleed.”

[“There is no point in a wound,” Mori liked to tell, as he stitched him up — as he made sure it would scar; made sure it would be visible, every single time, to one or two eyes or none at all. “If you can’t learn from the blood.”].

Dazai watched his back until he was a mere dot under the rain. He followed.

---

...

---

The walk in the rain to Building Two was the last straw of Dazai’s already wavering immune system, cracked by the diving experience in Rengoku. By the time they crossed the doors — amongst mafiosi hurrying to a meeting they weren’t invited to; offering him petrified gazes and venomous whispers — he was sneezing at every breath, bent in a half over a cough.

The broken pipes didn’t help.

“He gets fevers every week,” Elise whined, at the very end of one of the long tables of the canteen.

She was miraculously untouched by the waterfalls falling from the ceiling — the umbrella Chuuya was floating over their heads and the house doll she had set between them to blame. “Rintarou used to make me play nurse for him,” she continued, kicking her feet in the most efficient way to bump against Dazai’s back. “I had to wet his stupid face, and change his stupid clothes, and make sure he didn’t eat too many of the stupid fever pills.”

“And I’ll never forgive you for that,” Dazai murmured, curling onto himself tighter. The floor under the table was soaked, but discomfortly familiar; he set his eyes on the metal straps of Chuuya’s boots and sneezed.

“Given that he looks like he was born with the Bubonic Plague up his nostrils, I’m unsurprised,” was Chuuya’s only judgement.

He sounded distracted — he wasn’t sure if his eyes were following the mafiosi coming and leaving from the ballroom, where Mori was supposedly giving out new instructions, or just staring unamously at the storm-like texture of the falling water janitors were desperately trying to gather.

“Why are you mad at him?” Elise asked.

“I’m always mad at him.”

“He sucks,” Dazai answered, coughing.

“You’re madder,” she insisted. “Has he been silly? I approve. Crash him with gravity! He threw my dolls out of the window the other day.”

“You’d filled them with hornets,” he noted. “I was doing everyone a favor. Didn’t even put them in the Slug’s office or anything!”

“No, you just burned my fingertips off while I was in medical coma —“

“You said it was something you wanted to do —“

“— and you didn’t tell me about Rengoku, and you got me poss —“ He could see the glance he threw in Elise’s direction. “And you’re you. That’s more than enough reason to be mad at him, until he does something about it.”

Dazai plastered his face to the floor, groaning through the irritation and the fever. Everything was too cold and too warm and too sticky; strange visions of Mori’s doctor gloves and disapproving expression blinked behind his eyelids. “I’m not doing the song.”

“Oh, you are.”

“I’m not,” he hissed, through snot, “Doing the song. The song was made for you, and your inability to admit when I win. I don’t do the song.”

Chuuya stepped on his hand. “We’ll see if —“

A hellish screech echoed across the canteen, startling the stained glass windows. From one of the pipes closer to the buffet tables, a heavier rainfall came tumbling down.

“Lise,” Chuuya said — brave enough to interrupt the mumbling dialogue she had begun between two of her mauled dolls. “Tell me again. What’s this about the suicide pills?”

Her huff rattled her whole body. Dazai crawled forward through the cold water, using the edges of her gown as a blanket. “I told you, it was boring.”

“But you must have heard something —“

“Just that we can’t risk more men to end up under the influence of whatever the Nine Rings are doing, blah, blah,” Elise yawned, dolls bumping against the table. “Every man has to carry one of the pills, just to be sure. I assume Dazai doesn’t get one — I’m not babysitting him!”

He studied the crowds of suited legs and wet — but polished — shoes under the other table; gathering as close as possible to murmur about whatever Mori had come up with. His head was pounding, still; he settled a hand on Chuuya's leg and tapped.

It took a small sequence to make him bend over and curl an eyebrow to his face. "For the last time, I don't fucking know Morse code."

"Then learn it," he sniffed, annoyed.

"I don't get the point of staying here," the boy insisted, frowning. "We should be out, looking for one of the Souls — how else are we meant to find Dante?"

"Who's Dante?" Elise chirped.

"The Bad Man who steals kids' belly buttons," Dazai replied, unmoving. Under her gasp, he said: "We can't move in Mori's opposite direction without being sure of what he's ordering. This suicide pill method means we can't count on any new leads for Souls."

"Then let's sneak in," Chuuya insisted, as he had since their first wet step inside the Building. His entire body seemed to be pulsing with energy, uncaring of new scars or curved shoulders; perhaps rancor from being interrupted too soon. "Kouyou said you used to scare Boss by haunting the vents. We could —"

"That's just a story!" he whined, kicking his feet in the water until it splashed Chuuya's face. It startled a burning cough through his lungs; amidst coughs, he spat: "Why is my unblemished character constantly being slandered under the attacks of any forked tongue —"

"Chuuya," Elise whined, for the thousandth time. "Chuuya, Chuuya, come on, he's boring, you said you'd play with me, come on, come on —"

"Chuuya?"

A series of sounds followed — Dazai grabbing the naked portion of Chuuya's calf to hide the Ability influenced umbrella; Elise and Chuuya's consequential curses and shrieks; the gasp out of Officer Matsuda's throat as he watched Dazai's reddened nose and wet eyes peek from under the table.

"Oh, hey, Officer!" Dazai waved, started by the nasal texture of his tone. "What brings you in the devil lair of corporate weapon factoring?"

"What the fuck are you doing here?" Chuuya snapped, succinctly, standing up from his bench. "You couldn't pick a less rainy day to snoop around?"

Matsuda grimaced towards the small umbrella he held by the elbow, clearing his throat. "Not quite my decision, boys. We were called to fact check some violations after the attack," Thin, suspicious eyes laid on Chuuya. "You know. When the Mori Corporations base was stormed by a gang without a clear reason."

"We fabricate weapons," Dazai insisted. "I can think about one or two reasons."

“You look like a bowling ball,” Elise offered.

Laying his eyes on her for the first time, his skin seemed to gain some pallor. With a hint of nausea that fit right in with the glances he sometimes threw to the building he was walking through, he asked: “And you are —“

“Boss’ daughter,” Chuuya cut through. “Not that it’s any of your business. You may want to tell your men not to touch any of the rice.”

“Voices are that it’s actually made of small pieces of concrete,” Dazai said. “Or cocaine.”

“Not cocaine,” the boy jumped.

“No, I really do believe —”

A strangely sharp, distinctively inhuman sound came from inside the man’s coat.

“Oh, no,” Dazai shivered, eyes wide.

Chuuya had stilled so suddenly it might as well have been rigor mortis belatedly settling in. Eyes on the heart pocket, raindrops dripping down his utterly calm face, he dared: “Was that a —“

“Puppy!” Elise screeched, stepping on his hands to jump across the table, almost flinging herself onto the man in her efforts. “There’s a puppy!”

The small commotion had probably not been in Matsuda’s intent, given the complicated glances his colleagues offered next to blank-faced mafiosi — and the curious eyes settling on their table, distracted from the nightmarish meal in favor of staring at the ball of fur the detective settled near the dollhouse.

It was a small thing, fluffy ears and black fur, happily wiggling its tail and sniffing Elise’s immaterial hands with something akin to confusion. Stiffen and tight-lipped, seemingly petrified with repressed euphoria, Chuuya kept staring.

“Keep it up and you’ll explode as soon as you pet it,” Dazai scoffed, through a sneeze.

“Go fuck yourself,” Chuuya said, toneless. He reached out with a hand; when the dog growled at his cast, mistrustful, he almost expected to watch him pass out in joy. “Oh, God. ”

“You’re very red,” Elise noted.

“Oh, God. ”

“Not a fan of dogs?” Matsuda asked, from the outskirts of that circle of cooing, blinking at his curled up silhouette — at the very end of the table.

“Hellish beasts,” He sniffed. The redhead had taken off his jacket, shielding the dog from rain with it, despite the weak bark it was directing to him. “I’m unsurprised Chuuya appreciates it, as offspring. What’s a detective doing with a dog in his coat?”

“It’s a lead,” A conflicted glance. “We saw three dogs following a suspect around the city; though they were always gone when we got there. This is one of them. We’re hoping he might lead us to the others.”

Dazai did his best to appear innocent — rubbed his nose to make it redder, allowing the fever lingering around his bones to make him look tired. “Who’s the big shot committing crimes with a gang of puppies?”

“I don’t know if big is the right term.”

He leaned his chin on his hand.

Matsuda’s glance was unamused. “Come on.”

“I know, I know, you don’t trust us —“

“You’re victims of a system,” the man said. “It’s not a matter of choices.”

Near the doors, a small group of mafiosi kept their eyes on the officers walking away from them. It wasn’t quite mean, the glint in their eyes — just calm. Unworried; unhurried. Aware that the prey would have to slow down and find water, eventually.

“Let me guess,” Dazai said. “An Ability User who’s a bit younger than your usual gigs?”

A flash of surprise. “How do you —“

“You work with kids, old man,” Chuuya was the one to intervene, this time — speaking over the shaking-with-rage shoulder of the puppy. The evident dislike didn’t seem to surprise him; not to discourage him from adoring from afar. “It wasn’t hard. You think the dog can lead you to them?”

“Don’t worry about it, son,” Matsuda replied, clearly disgruntled. “You’ll know once it’s resolved.”

“You don’t know how right you are,” Dazai sighed, eyes squinting to the ceiling, through the rain — settling on a particular grate. “Chuuya, let go of the trashcan on paws. We have things to do.”

The dog attempted to bite his nose off. Lighting shone in his eyes. “Oh, now is when your ass wants to do things —“

“Chuuya.”

“Aren’t you sweet,” the boy cooed, uncaring about the fists Elise was raining on his shoulders, and the nearby foam between the animal’s fangs. “Aren’t you the coolest dog in the world. Aren’t you a kickass dog. Aren’t you perfect. ”

“His name is Keru,” Matsuda informed. “He’s peed all over my car three times just this morning.”

The dog growled some more. Chuuya cheered: “You’re so good.”

Dazai stared at the ceiling, unreligious and with snot on his lips. He removed his coat, cursing under his breath, and pushed it onto Matsuda’s hands. “Do you mind holding this for a moment? Yes? Thank you. Everyone, if you could!”

Every head in the canteen turned to watch him struggle to climb on top of the table, vision blurred and expression perfectly blank. Keru let out a questioning bark.

“Oh,” Chuuya’s grin grew mean. “Oh.”

He stared off into the nothingness.

Raised his arms.

“I’m a sore idiot,” he half-sang, blankly, among the utter silence, refusing to move. “I’m a proper idiot. My uttermost apologies for the inevitable,” He opened his arms. “The inevitable is that I’m an idiot.”

Back in November — when Dazai had forced Chuuya to perform that same scene in the meeting room, following his unofficial, much-discussed loss of the Great Prank War — the boy had finished it off with middle fingers. All he managed to do, between the fever and rain-wet clothes, was slip from the table.

Not a soul in the canteen dared to say a word.

Thankfully, he managed to tear Chuuya from the dog — it was dragging his roaring-with-laughter body out of the room, swiftly, that became the true mission.

“Come on,” His snorts of laughter were more than disgraceful, rolling down the stairs. Hanging off him, legs stumbling from hilarity, he insisted: “Come on, at least they weren’t looking at you like you’re the goddamn devil anymore, come on — “

I didn’t know you had noticed, Dazai could have said, had his laughter not muffled the idea.

Ugly and high pitched of a sound as it was, it stubbornly ricocheted against his skull and the soaked hallways of the building, startling questioning glances from the few mafiosi they bumped against. Stealing his hat and dashing away with it calmed the hilarity down considerably — pushing the boy up the secret entrance to the vents quietened it down completely.

“You said it wasn’t true,” Chuuya accused, as they crawled through the suffocating walls.

Dazai, who was still considering the advantages of turning around and leaving very quietly, only to nail the entrance door back in place, offered: “I said it was slander. Pay attention. Cockroach!”

The thump! of his head hitting the roof shook the entire structure.

An endless time of slithering forward later, the throat-thin space widened near a striped vent, allowing them to sit facing each other. A few pushes and winces from their matching injured hands settled their legs, calves intertwined and the smell of sweat clogging their noses.

The ballroom several feet underneath their point of view must have been vertiginously beautiful, in its better days; it had struggled to claw its way out of the darkness, even since the former Boss had turned it into another workplace. Bright red curtains had been watered down into the shade of fresh blood — the chandeliers were skeleton hands reaching up.

“ — good idea?” Ace was saying, pacing back and forth as elegantly as possible, eyes in some stash of documents that had his forehead wrinkled. “The pills were already a vow of faith. This might —”

“Circumstances have changed,” Mori replied. “Disliked issues require disliked solutions. We can’t lay our decisions in the hands of the masses.”

The two Executives, Mori and a trio of Black Lizards led by Hirotsu’s pensive frame were a too small crowd inside that endless meeting room. Light from the rainy sky reflected on floor-to-ceiling windows, painting composed caves on their faces.

“Our numbers have been dented already, and we can’t afford for the other organizations to witness what they believe is mass mutiny,” Kouyou intervened, twirling her umbrella on the carpet. “Launching close attacks, spreading voices, securing economic ports — That is the priority.”

“I am perfectly aware, Ozaki,” the Boss assured, not quite reprimanding. His hands were crossed on the desk; he laid his chin on them with the glee of a child. “I am merely suggesting giving control of these actions to an — unexpected factor.”

Dazai sneezed.

Chuuya offered a disgusted glare.

“The men will comply,” Hirotsu intervened, at last. As perhaps the closest thing that makeshift Council had to a spokesperson of the common rows of men, they all turned to listen. “It might take some time — There might be some resistance. Nothing they can’t take. Nothing that could ever truly overrun their respect for our Boss.”

He had watched the faces of every man leaving that ballroom — the glazed sort of absence in their eyes, something between fear and admiration. Mori had that effect on men, cowardly sadistic as he was — he pulled their strings until obedience seemed nothing more than the easiest road to survival.

After the former Boss’ reign, anything and all had seemed merciful. Crush their bones and their spirit, the man had echoed. It should not be hard. My men are rarely incapable, are they not?

“Don’t know how he got them by the throat,” Chuuya muttered, squinting through the grates. “The lower gangs in Suribachi were so damn convinced he was nothing but a puppet for the true Boss.”

He shrugged. “No one wants a bullet in the head.”

“They would take one for him,” he insisted, with the unawareness of someone who had managed to temporarily drag Mori’s heart-wrenching interest from Dazai. “Loyalty is more complicated than survival.”

There was an understanding of sorts between them — one Dazai was only welcomed in under the guise of a clever mind. Two Bosses who would have done too much for their people. Rarely was any door shut in his face; but he’d watched Chuuya orbit around Mori’s venomous gravitational field from behind a glass. A car accident witnessed from a plane seat.

Loyalty is flesh, he thought. Mori never refused flesh.

He tapped his fingers on the cold metal. “Nobody wants their city destroyed,” he concluded.

“It’s a risk,” Ace insisted.

“Not any more than other decisions we have been forced to take,” Mori replied, easily. “We have had long conversations on the matter, have we not? You are all perfectly aware of my intentions for them.”

“Plasming the demonic is more than risky,” Kouyou muttered, squeezing water out of an edge of her kimono. “Relying our strengths on their unwilling alliance —“

“It might start voices, too,” Hirotsu added. He offered a small nod in the doctor’s direction. “Sir, you know what some of the men say in his regards —“

“He’s free to slit my throat and take my seat, and make our little god his second, if he so wishes,” Mori interrupted them. Dazai stiffened; from the other side of the tunnel, he felt Chuuya do the same. “I’m one to encourage success. Shall we take it as an occasion to verify its likeness?”

No one said a word.

“Is he,” Chuuya started, “Talking about —“

“Starting from this very moment, and until this little boring matter is solved,” the man concluded, “As we will inform our subordinates, every member of the Port Mafia is obliged to offer aid, temporarily obey the orders, and officially act under the command of Dazai Osamu and Nakahara Chuuya.”

“What?”

The unfortunate combination of vents with admirable acoustics and a room warped in pensive quiet birthed an echo strong enough to rattle spines.

Their reaction was lightning quick — Dazai almost missed the impact of Chuuya's gloved hand slapping itself onto his mouth, just as he was doing the same to the boy's own. Breathing was an abandoned chore; their eyes met, filled with blame.

Shut the fuck up, Chuuya threatened.

You shut up, what the —

Hirotsu's fingers massaged his temples with admirable efficiency. Executive Ace widened his arms in a giving-up gesture, dropping onto the nearest seat.

"Well," Mori said, cheerfully, eyes settled right where their vent resided. Dazai could see him look straight at him; could see his arms overflow in papers he would leave in his prodigious hands. Give me a miracle, yes? "What a shame. Clearly we need ask for a check-up in the vents as well."

---

...

---

"Two questions," Hirotsu began, as Dazai did his very best to put the key into the ignition. "Were you to blame for the pipes?"

"Obviously," he confirmed, voice nasal, tongue between his teeth, impatiently knocking his fingers against the wheel of the man's Camaro. "Place needed a wash up. Plus, Mori wanted to introduce those environmental temperature sensors? The ones that match the outside? Done."

"That's not what that means."

"No, no, I'm rather sure. Second question?"

A single beat of hesitance. Then: "Given the circumstances, don't you believe you might have more important matters to care for than driving lessons?"

Over the windshield, on the other side of the underground parking lot of the Headquarters, Kouyou watched Chuuya shoot a quick sequence of bullets towards Golden Demon's unimpressed frame.

"Fuck!" the boy snapped, annoyed, when the ricochet bumped against his casted hand. He leaned down to pick up the fallen bullet; threw it with enough force to tear a hole through a parked car.

Golden Demon clapped.

“It’s not just driving lessons,” Dazai concluded, sneezing.

He didn’t particularly want to deal with one of Mori’s lectures on public property damage. They had been there since the beginning of the afternoon; the stone columns and most of the parked cars had learned the shape of the Camaro intimately — nonetheless.

“Hey!” he called, leaning through the window. “It’s my turn with Golden Demon! Stop being mean!”

“She’s not even corporeal,” Chuuya screamed back, raising the 629-44 mag to his nose. “She’s much more useful here with me, instead of getting ran over by your personality defects.”

“Driving is not a —“

Hirotsu’s head bumped against the headrest, violently enough to startle a cough. “The wall!”

The car screeched. A thump!

“You’re doing just wonderful, demon child,” Kouyou called, hurriedly fixing Chuuya’s grip on the gun, taking several steps back once she was done. “I can hardly wait to free you into the midday traffic.”

“Thank you, Ane-san!” he called, obnoxious.

“You only need to be gentler,” Hirotsu said, as pale as someone could be, patting every inch of the car he could reach. It was more than new; the explosion they had caused before meeting Beatrice had left the older one irreparable. “It’s a pedal. Not the head of a traitor on the curb.”

“How could I ever mistake them.”

“That’s what I’ve been asking myself,” the man sighed. “Didn’t I once see you fly a helicopter?”

“That’s what I said!” he lamented.

The car swerved at the last second, missing one of the columns. Hands clawing the seat, Hirotsu said: “You drive around just fine. Somewhat. You must relax your grip on the wheel, though. Pay attention to your surroundings.”

“I apologize, Gramps,” Dazai said. “Running Chuuya over has been a recurring dream of mine. I can hardly control myself.”

“I heard that!”

“He really takes pride in being a walking tennis ball shooting machine, doesn’t he?”

The Commander rubbed his temples.

He didn't speak again for the rest of the drive around that section of the parking lot, as his hands spasmed with the need to take the wheel away. Dazai was more and more cheerfully astonished by the discovery of a new natural enemy — by the time the car somehow began to do donuts, he was laughing.

"You know," a slightly nauseous Hirotsu said, as he watched the world around them spin, "I learned how to drive in an underground tunnel in Italy. I had a bullet in my left thigh, and my future life companion was trying to gouge my eyes out. It was more peaceful than this."

Dazai squinted, slowing down on the donuts to raise a cloud of smoke — messing up Chuuya's aim behind them. "You really dropped a bomb there."

"You must have heard stranger things."

"I didn't know you were married, old man."

"Could you refrain from —"

His car door was almost torn off its hinges. "Grandpa is married?" Chuuya echoed, speechless.

"Might as well be," Kouyou intervened, with a smile that tasted of strawberry where blood usually was. "He all but melts around his adoratissima. You boys should see him and Miranda together."

"Gross," the boy retched. "Mackerel, get out. It's my turn."

"I don't need shooting lessons," he reminded him. "Unlike you, I am a resourceful member of this syndicate. And an Executive candidate."

"Over my dead fucking —"

Hirotsu and Kouyou only withstood the wrestle match that followed — Chuuya's efforts to pull him out of the car; Dazai's nails leaving indents in the leather — for an endless instant, before they bodily intervened to separate them.

"Come with me," the woman ordered, fishing for something in the car. "Lessons are the weapon of the most capable warriors, did you know?" She raised her hand. "This will calm you two down, hopefully."

"Executive —" Hirotsu attempted to protest — to no avail; Dazai and Chuuya grabbed ahold of two of three cigarettes she was offering like starved children, bickering over the man's stolen lighter. "At least give them a few years and massacres before they lose their lungs for good."

"Beat it, I smoke," Chuuya grunted.

"Of course you do," Dazai replied, as obnoxiously as possible.

Golden Demon hovered closer. With a single slash of her blades, she brushed Kouyou's last cigarette with their edges, lighting it up with a hiss. "Why delay the inevitable?"

Dazai met Chuuya's eyes over the car window.

Hell, he mouthed.

Hell, he spelled out.

"Why am I not surprised that you smoke like a child?" Kouyou commented, several minutes later, as they settled near a column to watch Chuuya grasp the fundamentals of driving. He was, apparently, excelling — much to Dazai's dismay. "Inhale. Not digest."

"Unrequited commentary," Dazai coughed, his eyes teary, unsure of whether the sharp tone of it was a consequence of the fever he could still feel through his soaked clothes, or the smoke. "I'm an innovator. Not my fault if Chuuya grew up in a baby gang of ten years old alcoholics."

"Just how sick are you right now?"

He sneezed — holding eye contact, right on her umbrella.

The woman scrutinized him. With a sigh, long and deep, she removed a layer of her sash, and settled it around his shoulders like a scarf. Not quite touch — but almost. He huddled in it; sneezed on it.

It was quiet.

Cigarettes were interesting enough. He could not die from it, if not long-terminally — but there existed a category for all that could temporarily take the place of longing. "I didn't expect you to approve of Mori's new hierarchy," he said, eventually, to fight the sluggish fall of his eyelids. It wasn't quite sleep; Dazai rarely felt the need for it, if not its absence. "You must know it will start a revolution through the ranks."

"Horrible decisions tend to strengthen respect towards figures of power," Kouyou replied, composed. "If they think Boss insane, they might just be curious enough to see where it goes. You two, of course, will take the blunt of it. Expect assassination attempts."

"Cannot wait," he sighed, sliding down the column until he could sit on the floor. From the slowly accelerating car, gaining more and more confidence, Chuuya whooped. Dazai made a mental note to send an anonymous note about him to the police. "You can't be happy about our collaboration."

"I don't believe men like you are meant for collaboration," she said. "And I don't believe men like Chuuya are willing to be led all that easily."

He snapped his tongue. "That's where you're wrong."

A car appeared at the edge of the parking lot. It took one look at the scenario and backed away up the climbing ramp, finding the rain again.

“I asked him if he thought it was a good idea, back then. He told me only diamonds can polish other diamonds,” Kouyou lowered her gaze, studying him. “I did not understand. I still don’t.”

“I agree. Chuuya is more of a ruby.”

“He’s pushing you towards the spotlight in an attempt to put you where you cannot fail. He fears you might never achieve the greatness he predicts, if not forced to.”

“A sapphire, also,” he commented, pensive. “His eyes and all. Well. Eye. What’s a brownish stone? His Ability is pretty red, though. Maybe ruby is fine. What do you think I am?”

Kouyou kept her eyes on him. “In my short experience, neither one of you needs any encouragement to bounce back into the other. I’m not sure that is a good thing.”

“Maybe a bloodstone? I do like those.”

“If I didn’t know any better,” she concluded, her smile pleasant, “I would say you’re both desperate for this ferocious partnership you claim to despise.”

Partnership.

“If you’re reading Q’s Bible, these days,” Dazai offered, through a yawn, “You should definitely know better than to believe what your eyes tell you.”

A call on Mori’s mysterious battle teams called Hirotsu away from his Camaro; Dazai settled in the backseats with his console, humming too loudly and only vaguely listening to the gentle hums of Kouyou’s severe instructions to the shorter driver. Lacking the silvery undertone of respect Hirotsu’s voice never lost, she made for a good lesson.

“You two,” she said, some infinity later, as the little sun from the climbing ramp faded into darkness. “How do you take an organization down?”

Quietly, Dazai met Chuuya’s eyes in the rear view mirror.

“We let the bastard run them over?” the boy offered, halting the car to a stop. She didn’t smile. Mori would have asked it differently, he knew — why would you take it down? Or, what would happen if you —? A man of syllogism; who somehow found poetry in the act of knowing.

“Cut down what keeps them together,” Dazai said. “Who.”

“Their Boss,” Chuuya frowned. “Or the thing that makes them the Boss.”

“The Nine Rings seal,” Kouyou studied her pale hands, thin scars and freckles; nails blood red and sharp. “As long as it exists, they will simply keep rising from the ashes. Men don’t need much to have faith, and their latest Queen has all that is required.”

It made sense. And yet — “How do you know the Nine Rings’ Boss is a woman?”

Her reflection had golden outlines, stolen from the sun-fall. That mirror of herself, he thought, looked like Golden Demon — only younger. “Beatrice and I go a long way back.”

Chuuya’s head snapped to her. “You —“

“Of course,” Dazai’s mind was swimming; thread upon thread of things he had kept where they couldn’t quite form the right shape. “Your lover joined the Port Mafia from the Nine Rings for you. But you had no reason to detest them — It was our syndicate that killed him. Unless somebody from their rows had something to do with it.”

“Beatrice,” the other boy echoed. “Did she rat you out to the former Boss?”

Kouyou smiled. It was grievous, how beautiful it made her wrath seem — his statuary she was, in more pain than Dazai had ever felt for someone.

“Kanechi wasn’t my lover,” she concluded. It was a concession; the way she pulled onto her gowns was a nineteen years old facade. “Only a man I loved.”

His name was a pond; an ocean. He watched Chuuya stiffen from the heaviness of it; watched his eyes soften imperceptibly, only at the edges — a recognition he had spent months denying to a woman who he still didn’t fully trust.

Dazai wondered how much of it had been planned.

“I never had an adoratissima ” she added — somewhat superior; somewhat jealous. “A personal light of sorts. I was born in these shadows we live to defend, and if I wasn’t, I do not remember it. Kanechi was a blind man,” With a breath, Kouyou conceded: “Beatrice wasn’t.”

He attempted to imagine her younger than she was now, less secure — a girl in an overgrown kimono, waving her Ability like a flag until it got her out of the Pomegranate. A younger Beatrice, who was as ageless as she always seemed.

“He wanted to save her too. He thought we could be a — trio, of sorts. We both despised the idea,” She shrugged. “Until I didn’t. My mistake was believing she had changed her mind as well.”

“But why would she betray you both?” Dazai asked. Chuuya, pointedly, didn’t speak.

“Oh, she loved Kanechi more than existence,” Kouyou corrected him. “I’m sure she believed only I would be punished. I suppose I thought...”

She trailed off. Her smile took a cruel tilt. “Who knows, truly. We used to walk all over each other in an effort to have Kanechi all for ourselves. We both failed to understand his love wasn’t weak enough to die out on a single person — we were both too starved to see it. But slowly, in time — I used to bring her jewels stolen from men at the Pomegranate. She used to make me little doodles of Golden Demon, all horrid,” Her head tilted to the side, almost curious. “It took us both some time to realize Kanechi’s idea had some truth to itself. I just wanted her to look at me.”

His console flashed a GAME OVER sign on his display. He stared at it, head tilted.

“You stay where you begin your existence,” the woman said, “And you die there. The ground soils you in a way that is foolish to escape. I loved Kanechi for all his light, and I got him killed for believing otherwise.”

They made her do it, the voices said. She never put an end to them. Guilt, Dazai thought — a trial she would never be granted. Made her stand and watch him be tortured until she put him out of his misery.

“And now she’s back,” Kouyou spat. Vicious enough to sizzle with the air around them. “Believing she can take something else from me, like God justifies it. And I will destroy her for it, if I have to die as my sword falls on her neck.”

She turned to look at them so suddenly it was startling; the red around her eyes utterly maniacal. “Do you understand? This is a real threat. You cannot waste time with theories. Mori has bestowed you with power, and you need to use it as it should be used.”

“Ane-san,” Chuuya started. “Listen —“

The high thrill of her cellphone cut through the tension; Dazai did nothing more than stare as she straightened, face devoid of any semblance of reaction, and brought the phone to her ear, leaving the car.

“I’ll arrive shortly,” she promised. “If any of you allows them to bleed out before I can burn the skin off their bodies —

He kept his eyes on her disappearing silhouette even as Chuuya moved onto the passenger seat, settling his feet on the dashboard with a sigh. Dazai kicked more than necessary to settle on the driver spot, dropping Kouyou’s scarf somewhere in the middle — that the boy barely retorted, said enough.

Hirotsu was still digging the concrete with his steps. Dazai could only imagine the reports he would have to deal with.

“I’m killing him,” Chuuya stated, eventually, unnecessarily. The car seats seemed strangely wide compared to their shoulders. He had a gunpowder stain on his cheek. “Whether you help me or not.”

He settled his knees against the will. “I know.”

“She’s fighting the wrong enemy, but —“ His jaw set. Dazai wondered what it felt like — to crawl through the borders of what Nakahara Chuuya deigned worthy of protection, and finally being allowed in. “It takes some — bravery. To be willing to kill a friend for the sake of something greater.”

I couldn’t, he didn’t say. The Port Mafia air wouldn’t quite allow it. I never could.

Dazai hummed. “You think Shirase is brave?”

“I think Shirase is a child,” he answered, some petrified seconds later, the curve of his jaw hard.

“Alright. You think Verlaine was brave?”

His fingers clenched around the edges of his pants. His knuckles turned white.

Right when he was sure he was going to be hit — whether by his combat boots or the implosive liquid inside him he called blood — all Chuuya did was deflate, eyes forward. “I can’t give her the truth, but I can give her what she wants. Seal or not, I’m sure Beatrice can bleed.”

“Worry about Dante, first,” he suggested. “As long as he’s around, you’re a walking bomb.”

A scoff. “I’m always a walking bomb.”

“Don’t sound so dejected. You hate it, don’t you?”

“Myself?” Chuuya threw him a glance, clearly riled up. “I’m not you.”

Their matching casts rested near the gear shift. He had made good of his promise to Kouyou; doodled nicely all over the surface, loudly remarking about how distasteful the singular MACKEREL on his own was. Chuuya had been quiet through it.

Chuuya had been quiet since December.

“Are you going to tell me what Dante showed you in your Limbo, or do I have to find out on my own?”

“Fuck off.”

“On my own, then,” he said. “That’s fine. Only so many Hells one can have. Was it that time I filled your office with actual sheep to count because you said I was making you sleep deprived?”

“That was two weeks ago. And I’m surprised the joke wasn’t something else,” he replied, clearly unimpressed. The gentle emergency light of the car had turned on; with no hat to rely on, his face was too naked, and the unruly way his hair was growing far too evident. He wondered if the amber eye ever hurt, like his own did. “Listen.”

“Listening.”

A dirty glance. “You can’t nullify Dante’s shit Ability. Whatever. I’ll kill him. But until then — you can still nullify Tainted. Keep the side effects low.”

“Your side effects stopped the attack last week,” Dazai noted. “Look me in the eyes and tell me there was a better plan.”

Chuuya gritted his teeth.

Balance, Mori would have said.

Hirotsu threw his cigarette on the ground. He stepped on it with vigor; hissed in his phone. He briefly wondered how many of the men in the pit had been his.

“He smokes the same cigarettes Iceman liked,” Chuuya commented, unprovoked. His own had been tossed out long ago; he hadn’t coughed once. He glanced his way; rattled two naked knuckles on Dazai’s forehead, snapping his tongue against the temperature. “That fancy ass smell is unmistakable.”

“That’s interesting,” he said, uninterested.

“He’s the one who made me smoke. Not the Sheep.”

“How,” Dazai spelled out, head lolling back, “Interesting.”

Chuuya’s fingers tightened around the seatbelt, pulling it like guitar strings. No sound came out — only his stuttered breathing; one nostril permanently stuck from whatever cloud he’d inhaled over the field where Verlaine’s demise had taken place.

“Fucker would have smoked sixty a day, if no one stopped him,” Inconsequently, he added: “He had three cigarettes left in his pack when he died.”

The headlights painted a circle on the wall; Kouyou walked right past it, the edges of her kimono catching that fake light to tinge it in rose shades. Dazai attempted to conjure up an image — a room soaked deeply and utterly in blood; the squelch of a boy’s shoes amongst abandoned limbs. Bending down. Stealing from the dead. Inhaling three cigarettes, one after the other. Coughing on burst-open chests.

His lips quivered.

Not quite, he told himself. Dazai didn’t fear showing sincerity; Dazai rarely still hung onto the hope that instinct did not mean lost cause.

Still: “That’s interesting.”

“I’m not saying it for you.”

“Are you having hallucinations?”

Stubbornly, he kept quiet. Dazai suffocated a wave of contempt.

Abruptly, he knew.

“Pathetic,” he sighed, exasperated, sinking the key in the ignition — this time, at a first attempt. “You know, with the things I do for you — you could stand being so much nicer to me.”

Horror had widened Chuuya’s eyes, settling him straighter in his seat. The car lights turning on called Hirotsu’s attention; the man dropped his phone. “Oi,” Chuuya called. “Oi, don’t you dare —“

The engine roared like a dying deity. Run from the handler, he considered, as the car crawled along to the wall of the climb, birthing sparkles, couldn't be all that different on four wheels.

---

...

---

“Life is, occasionally, rather wonderful,” Dazai said in a single sneeze, hand so tight around the steering wheel it was pulsing. “Makes the pursuit of its end even more special. Don’t you agree?”

Chuuya, who had managed to piece the leather of his seat with his fingers in an effort to hold on, only stared forward, petrified with horror, as he parked in the least conventional way possible.

“Yeah,” he said, his voice a thread. “Peachy.”

Then, very pointedly, moving as stiffly as wood, he slammed his elbow between his legs.

[Truly an exaggerated reaction, he considered — the drive hadn't even been that bad, once they had managed to escape Hirotsu's calls and purple lightning attacks. Laws of precedence and crossing escaped his mind, but Dazai honestly believed he had done a good job, nonetheless — only one traffic light had fallen in the middle of the street, destroying three or four cars; and only seven pedestrians had been calling ambulances as they slithered away from their collision.

“Didn't your ass say he didn't want to die with me?” Chuuya had shrieked, amongst the curses, when a turn near the highway had opened his car door and left him dangling against the concrete.

“Live a little,” Dazai had screamed back. He had considered helping him in again. The construction ramp he hadn't meant to drive up — until that very last second — had distracted him].

“Oh,” Chuuya cursed, as Dazai bent in a half between whines, studying the missing piece of the side mirror, tortured by raindrops. “Oh, this is actually gonna make him resign —“

He fell silent.

The insistent orchestra of the storm took the place of his voice, as realization spread across his traits like a contained virus. His borders fought him, pushing swimming reactions over the edge — the curve of his jaw becoming painful, as his eyes ran up and down the neon sign of the Yokohama Hospital.

“They’ve closed the Chapel,” Dazai noted, as if it was inconsequential, studying the maze of recently renovated white buildings — Mafia money. “We’re down to an acceptable number of wounded.”

Chuuya was still staring.

“You’re letting me drive,” he spelled out, some endless time later, somberly. “We’re abandoning this car somewhere far enough that Gramps won’t have time to murder us, tonight. And then we’re going to forget this idiotic idea of yours. Yes?”

“No can do,” Dazai shrugged. “Between the rain and the pipes, I’m already soaked. The bandages get so uncomfortable.”

“I’m being serious.”

“You know, you spend all that time of your life building graves in every non-doctrinal way,” he mused, as if irrelevant, studying the chase of raindrops down the windshield. “Your Flags don’t get tombstones, so you steal strangers’. Your Flags don’t get flowers, so you put yourself under the servitude of some megalomaniac fool, just to rebuild a bar they will never drink in again.”

Something flashed in Chuuya’s eyes. Pointless — they both knew Dazai knew the brink like the back of his palm. They both knew he wasn’t stupid enough to jump — not in this specific void.

Not cruel enough, something whispered, in the back of his spine.

Something. A tad too merciful. A tad too stuck on how distantly Chuuya had stared at it all in the aftermath — one eye burned; one strand of hair incinerated; one lifetime older and twice angrier. A tad too unfamiliar. Dazai never paid it much attention. Dazai had never had something gentle enough to be lost.

“Be so very fucking careful right now,” he spelled out.

“All of that effort for those who you blame yourself for,” Dazai continued, undeterred, “But you can’t even face Tanaki, who is not even in a coffin?”

Chuuya kicked his car door open to storm out, cracking the concrete.

Because Dazai stuck — like a leech; like ivy on a building so ancient it only survived out of fondness and stubbornness and some crueller thing; like the hand he had clasped around his wrist the first time he had watched him implode in an alley — he wrapped Kouyou’s makeshift scarf tighter, and followed him.

“You’re being an idiot,” he informed over the drumming rain, his shadow chasing the other boy’s one to the exit gates, skipping on puddles. The storm was so thick he could barely see him.

“This isn’t any of your business,” Chuuya was quick to bite. “And I fucking missed the instance where I asked you to make it so.”

“We’re meant to work together.”

“This isn’t work, ” He turned around, at last, the cracked ground under his feet threatening — the curling lines halting by Dazai’s shoes. “I agreed to work with you. If you think this is a goddamn slumber party, you’ve got it wrong. Mind your business about the things I’ve done, and this will go just great.”

“I’ve visited her,” Dazai insisted, petulantly. “She’s barely even conscious. What can she have said to turn you into such a coward?”

“You don’t even know if I —“

“It’s you, ” he scoffed, easily. Encompassing truths; no matter how pathetic. “Bet you were yipping like a dog by her door the moment they got her out of surgery.”

Chuuya worked his jaw. His attempt to clench both of his fists was stopped by his cast; Dazai watched his naked fingers spasm under the raindrops, and had the brief thought of wondering if he ever wished to use Corruption again.

“I killed her child,” he spat, sticking the hands in his pockets as if to tear them. “That’s what she said.”

“Did you?” Dazai asked.

“You were fucking — I don’t remember. Just — The name on the wall. The pregnant woman we killed — That was his husband,” He breathed out. “It was for me. She was just there. They’re always —“

He shut his lips.

They’re always just there, Dazai concluded, and I’m always the point.

“The traumatized, barely conscious woman accuses you of murdering her baby while you were under mind control,” he recounted. “And you decide that’s it?”

“I’ve got better ways to make it up to her than staying in a Hospital room she doesn’t want me in,” he insisted, waving the matter away — an assortment of carelessness and devastating care, punching their way through his blankest face. “I can get rid of Dante and of his stupid zombie army. I can make them pay.”

“I don’t think she wants revenge,” Dazai said. “I think she wants her child.”

Chuuya staggered back.

Watching the squares of lit windows illuminate the complicated expression on his face, Dazai opened his mouth and said: “Why aren’t you wearing that stupid hat?”

He snapped. “Why are you pretending you give a damn about people who don’t bother being soulless pieces of shit like you?”

He was soaked to the very bone — so cold he couldn’t even feel it; eyes burning with sickness so steadily it had become a background noise. Mori had no problems with illness at all — it hardly meant Dazai got days off out of it. Complaining, though — Mori had never denied him that.

A crisp on the water. A pebble down the well. In the grand scheme of things, no touch could drown a river. Dazai bit, Chuuya bit back. That was all there would ever be to it.

“You’re being an idiot,” he echoed, tilting his head to the side. “Stop being an idiot.”

The ground cracked a bit deeper.

“You’ve been weird since you came back from your grieving border trip, or whatever you want to call it,” Dazai insisted, taking a step forward. He felt the water fill the cracks under his soles, eyes tickled by the lights of the parked car flickering under the moonlight.

Chuuya stared, unimpressed. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Yes, you do, ” Dazai’s mind was reeling. There were only so many pieces one could change in the view by the window, before he started to notice. Something about his corners felt sharp in a different way. “The hat assures no one but you can activate Corruption. You wouldn’t go out without it.”

“You’re grasping at the straws,” the boy replied. “Not even sure why. We’ve got more important things to do than worry about —“

“You?” he concluded. “Give me a break. Your martyr complex is the least interesting part of you.”

His eyes hardened. “What is that supposed to mean? We’re in the middle of a war —“

“You sound just like Kouyou. What’s with the newfound obsession with destroying the Nine Rings?”

“Fucking forgive me, ” Chuuya snapped, teeth gritted, stalking forward until he could push him right in the middle of his chest, “If I want to make sure I don’t turn into a mindless psychopath because you couldn’t bother to inform me of your plans —“

“You were supposed to get it, ” He squinted. “You always get it. It’s as aggravating as you are.”

“Cut it off.”

“Make me,” he dared. “Stop pretending to be angry as soon as your small brain comes up with a different emotion. You’re allowed not to be angry, did anyone ever tell you?”

Chuuya’s lips parted. Thunder flared behind him, lighting up the never ending buildings of the Hospital; under the porch, a woman dragged her baby away from the smiling nurse by the doors. Dazai’s eyes fell on a raindrop near his nose; caging a freckle.

It fell to the ground when his teeth clenched — so vicious it was felt. “I,” he spelled out, slow, as if it was being pulled out of his chest, “I can’t tell you.”

Dazai followed the frustrated line of his shoulders. “Can’t tell me,” he echoed.

Painfully, lips held together by invisible blood, he hissed: “Can’t.”

“Can’t.”

“For fuck’s sake, shitty Dazai —“

Thunder flared again. As it trailed off, a new, familiar sound shattered the rumble of rain.

They paused.

“Is that —” Dazai started, dread crawling up his spine — he had no time to finish, watching Chuuya make a beeline for the closest of the parked ambulances on the other side of the parking lot, where the insistent barking kept echoing against the cracked ground. “Oh, there’s no way.”

Chuuya stuck his hands under the vehicle. In less than a blink, and with some curses from their owner, they reappeared — holding onto an unmistakable, drenched puppy, wiggling desperately out of his grasp.

“Keru,” the boy exclaimed, doing his very best to pretend his confusion was more overwhelming than his enthusiasm, immediately shielding the growling dog under his jacket. “What are you doing here?”

“Don’t beasts communicate in barks?” Dazai replied, blankly. “Go on. Speak your mother tongue.”

“Matsuda wouldn’t have let him go. He’s the only trail they have to Q,” Chuuya mused, ignoring him. He raised the puppy under the paws, meeting his eyes. The puppy tried to tear a strand of his hair off. “Did you run away from his bald ass? I get it.”

Keru barked cheerfully. Dazai retched.

“What do you even have against dogs?”

“What’s there not to have against them?” He almost spat. The dog had begun convulsing in the boy’s arms, as if unable to maintain all his horror into a single stretch of muscles — when he set his small eyes on Dazai, he took a step back, reaching for his gun.

“Don’t you fucking dare,” Chuuya warned, his eyes widening. “Are you out of your — Hey!”

With an admirable jump, Keru finally managed to free himself from his grasp, landing right onto a puddle with unfiltered enthusiasm. He shook the water off of himself, uselessly, draining Dazai’s pants, and set to trotting towards the exit at maximum speed.

Before Chuuya could say a word about it, the dog turned to stare at them, tongue panting.

“Well?” Dazai crossed his arms. “Go.”

Keru did a spin. Waited in place.

They exchanged a glance.

“It’s a dog,” he begged.

Chuuya raised his eyebrows. “Tell me it doesn’t look like he wants us to follow him.”

“It’s a dog. It doesn’t want anything.”

“Do you think he escaped Matsuda to look for us?” the boy mumbled, under his breath, eyes lighting up with energy. “Maybe Q is sending for us.”

“I think Q must have started to smell enough like street to gather a gang of puppies who are waiting to feast on their corpse,” Dazai replied. “And I think you want an excuse to go on an adventure with a dog. Which is insane, because that dog despises you.”

Chuuya waved the matter away. “All dogs despise me. We should check it out. Just in case.”

He blinked. “What do you mean, all dogs?”

“Current theory in work is that animals react badly to whatever sensation Abilities send off,” the boy explained, shrugging, almost succeeding in looking significantly less hurt by it than he was. “Given I’ve got a Singularity down my throat, I assume it’s worse. I’ve been forcing white noises or nightmarish pheromones on the poor creatures since Suribachi City.”

“So they hate you?”

“Only less than you do.”

“Your own family?”

Keru barked. Chuuya kicked his shins.

“You said we had bigger issues,” Dazai accused. “We were having a conversation. I didn’t bring you here to follow a stupid beast —“

Chuuya wrapped his drenched, gloved fingers around his hand, and pulled.

As it turned out, Keru had exchanged youth with efficiency, or any reliable sense of direction — while the path his small paws traced down the soaked concrete was too intentional to be casual, the dog had no issue getting distracted at every interesting spot; be it an hydrant, be it a particularly deep puddle, be it a seemingly irrelevant spot of street that left the two of them to get targeted by the bullet-like raindrops.

Accepting that his fever would probably never leave, Dazai made sure to pointedly sneeze as often as possible, tightening his grip around Chuuya's fingers each time he attempted to escape the impact.

It took the change of the alleys caging them in, growing more and more familiar the more lanterns that dangled over their heads, for the bitten-down grin to vanish from Chuuya's face.

"You don't think..." He trailed off.

The soaked marathon ended by indigo neon lights, hidden in the under-bridge every homeless man had long since claimed as theirs. Keru paws twirled inside drying puddles — shaking off all rain now that he was hidden from it — trotting to the broken down the stairs of The Alley.

"Well," Dazai commented, getting water out of his hair. "I'm assuming Q isn't here."

Keru was barking, excited. Chuuya lowered to pick him up, wet hair sticking to his frowning face; he studied the under-bridge area, the suspicion painted along his spine too similar to that of a fight. "But how would he know about —" His eyes widened.

"What?" Dazai followed his gaze to the other hand of the street, where an unoccupied bundle of blankets and boxes created a makeshift nest. Given the darkness and the flickering neon, it took him an instant to recognize the bleeding-out body laying face down against the concrete, blooming crimson on the blankets.

Chuuya left Keru on the ground. A blink, and he was kneeling by The Owner's lifeless side.

"What the fuck?" he snapped, turning the man around. He stared at the gashes down his chest, thin lines beginning where his jugular had once been; cuts of a bloodthirsty blade that had left his eyes open and terrified. Dazai extracted his gun, watching Keru bark. "I saw him yesterday. He was —"

"Any particular enemies?" he asked.

"He's made deals with every syndicate he could get his hands on," Chuuya shook his head. Giving up on restarting a long-gone heart, his hands landed on his lap, fingers curling to reach nothing at all. Through his soaked shirt, Dazai saw the scar of the bullet he had put between his clavicles. "And this doesn't look like any particular group's signature killing. It's almost —"

Whatever he was about to say was interrupted by a high pitched round of barking. It took them a moment, and the gleeful wave of Keru's tail, to realize it wasn't coming from him.

Chuuya stood up, frame lighting up red.

“There,” he nodded, voice low, calling his eyes to the warehouse right outside the nearest end of the under bridge. A car passed by, paying no mind to their cautious steps towards the entrance. The barking continued; Keru almost slipped in his hurry to follow them, bumping his paws against the doors.

“Remember the toad?” Dazai whispered.

A glance. Understanding, slow, at the corner of his eyes. “It was a frog.” Nonetheless, he moved to stand behind him, careful to curve his shoulders to disappear behind the thin line of his back.

Keru barked some more. Chuuya reached with one hand, destroying the lock. Dazai pushed the doors open with his foot, gun raised.

“Q?” he called.

The horrifying smell was the first thing to slam upon them. A mixture of decaying viscera, pipe water, and rain long-since turned into mud assaulted his sick nostrils, making his head swam and Chuuya curse out.

The roof of the warehouse had been destroyed — apart from the undeterred rain filtering through the borders of splintered wood, a clouded moonlight fell in, lighting up the drenched devastation left on the ground. Corpses upon corpses — their number never ending on the muddy floor, their eyes stubbornly set to the ceiling, unbothered by the relentless attack of the storm.

Hidden through bloodied flesh and shredded clothes, the once-bright handprint that signaled Dogra Magra’s touch masked every single body.

“Fuck,” Chuuya summed it up.

At their ankles, a pair of small dogs attempted to climb up their legs with their small, identical paws — the moment they noticed Keru at the entrance, they ran towards him, yipping in a bundle of affection, fangs pulling at their three-colored collars.

Dazai kneeled, squinting at the golden tags, his mouth curled in disgust. “Keru,” he read. “Bero, and Su. I’m assuming it wasn’t the brat who named them.”

“Where did they even find all these people? It makes no sense,” Chuuya insisted, studying the dark corners of the warehouse. The corpses covered almost every inch of walkable ground; the sound his boots made as they separated from the dried blood made him cringe. “How come nobody’s found them yet?”

He watched the dogs tumble, uncaring of the dirty ground. Through a half broken window, the tick tick tick of stubborn rain blurred the empty street.

Dazai froze. “Get away from the corpses.”

Halfway through analyzing the handprint on a woman's hand, Chuuya attempted to say: "What —"

"Move!"

At once, as if a switch had been turned on, all the lifeless eyes in the room blinked. They sat up with unexplainable coordination — the woman Chuuya had been studying's arm darted out faster than any eye could follow, closing in a death grip around his throat.

He didn't watch what happened; the sound of her brain imploding under the boy's fist was part of a background of eerie silence and the hush of moving clothes — Dazai threw himself onto the doors, closing them before any of the Souls could reach them, and he almost tripped through the crying whines and agitated paws of the three dogs.

His fingers closed around Chuuya's bloodied wrist. "Come on," he urged, as the Souls began to turn their stiffen bodies in their direction, circling them with ease, wounds no longer even bleeding from their state of decay. "Upstairs."

Unstable emergency stairs led to half destroyed second floor, mostly trustable near the walls, opening up into another chasm at its center — the Souls did their best to follow them up the stairs, their steps mechanical and undeterred, even as Chuuya directed entire pieces of debris straight into their bodies.

"If they only have a torso left they will crawl," the boy cursed, looking around. "They're gonna get out by the windows. We need to get rid of them — they can't get in the city."

A fireplace of sorts rested on the other end of the broken floor, flaming fresh wood peeking over behind ivy-shaped grates. Dazai frowned. "Someone was here, recently."

"Is Q working with Dante, now?" Chuuya leaned over the makeshift railing, eyes running across the ocean of blank-faced soldiers calmly making their way up to them. "Think if I crash the building on them they will crawl out?"

"They don't care about broken bones," he replied, distractedly. "I think we can —"

A wartime laughter of sorts left Chuuya's lips, challenging; the line of fighting enthusiasm that never seemed to abandon his lips. Dazai watched him throw himself over the railing, scarlet edges painting shadows amongst the rain — until all that remained was the sound of his kicks breaking bones, and the dogs barking.

"Show off," he muttered, hurrying to kneel in front of the fireplace. The flames refused to hush under the fractured waterfalls of rain; half hidden behind the stone structure, a dozen plastic bottles filled with fuel had been uncapped — and left untouched.

He squinted.

A horrifying rumble came from downstairs; Dazai recognized the telltale wet crunch of Tainted pressing bodies to the ground, squashing bones and tearing viscera until they became one with the concrete. Given Chuuya's curses, he assumed it wasn't working as successfully as usual.

Rain tapped against the shattered windows.

He picked up one of the bottles, and drenched the ripped curtains in fuel.

Steps hurried up the walls. "They're digging themselves out like they're fucking moles," Chuuya panted, disgusted, holding onto his casted hand with a grimace. "I've blown up as many brains as I can, but the bodies keep — What the fuck are you doing?"

"You're a Soul," Dazai replied, hurriedly, as he sprayed a new bottle down the unstable floor. "Empty the other ones on the ground floor," He picked his gun up from the floor, shooting bullets towards the grates as Chuuya obliged. They bounced back around his face, tearing a scratch under his eye; eventually, the makeshift fence fell. "New strategy: start acting like one."

Chuuya, still stuck to the railing, had no time to rebuke; finally free to filter over their border, the flames immediately slipped down the gasoline-soaked floor, rising with no care for the falling rain.

Running across slowly falling tiles wasn't the most athleticism life in the Port Mafia had requested from him; nonetheless, Dazai spent the entire slip and climb down decaying woods and hanging metal bars whining, tasting the rain sticking to his lips, his heart jumping a bit more each time the flames came too close to tickling his heels.

This, his body told him, almost hysterical in its drunken joy, this, this, this is exactly what —

A body came slamming into his side, sending him flying down the emergency stairs.

For endless, breath-quick seconds, Dazai felt nothing at all. The echo of the rusty metal bumping against his ribs was too violent to be immediately tasted; the heat of the flames climbing closer and closer to where his skull had bumped the ground too distant.

Hands closed around his throat; the man upon him had no expression to interpret and nothing but a familiar set of wounds down his body. Dazai kicked; he tightened his grip.

"That's," he squeaked, annoyed, "Too. Painful —"

A cast, red with blood and viscera and doodles, emerged right from the middle of George Kingstain's chest, naked fingers emerging from fractured plaster to hold onto an unbeating heart.

Surprise, more than any actual sensation, had the hands around his neck hesitate. Chuuya pulled his arm back from the crater he had created through his back; Dazai kicked him into the flames over the stairs, breathing heavily as he watched his skin burn.

"Ouch," Chuuya lamented, ripping what was left of his cast off with his teeth — throwing it into the flames with the spare heart. His hand was slightly purple around the thumb; the whitish scar around it, he could only guess, would match his own. "This is on you."

“Sure,” Dazai climbed to his feet, eyes on the flames slowly devouring the stairs. The Souls on the ground floor seemed to be slowly realizing climbing up wouldn’t be a good idea; nonetheless, their eyes were set on the few steps separating them from their targets with faceless consideration. “When they reach the ground floor, throw me in the flames.”

Chuuya paused. “What, really?”

“Did you not hear me?”

“Some variation of burn me alive is always in the background when you speak,” he replied. “How is that going to solve the issue?”

“They’ll think you’re one of them,” Dazai jumped over the railing, landing shoes first over some almost-decapitated woman attempting to crawl through the grates of the stairs. “They will leave you alone. You’ll get them into the flames. We’ll go home with no civilians casualties complains on the reports.”

His eyes ran up and down the approaching tongues of fire — lit in a glow that reminded him of mouthed calculations right before using Tainted.

He had no time to communicate his approval — a group of Souls attacked him from behind, crashing him against a frail column holding up the last of the first floor. Flames finally touched the ground, swirling at the ankles of slowly blinking Souls.

“All according to plan,” Dazai considered, as he watched Chuuya curse his way out of the mageries.

Then, he started running.

He didn’t make it far, through the maze of fire he had to dodge and the reaching hands half absent in the darkness — the sight of Chuuya’s best attempt at a devoid face was a stark contrast to the familiar grip of his hand on his hair, dragging him towards the flames as antagonistically as possible.

The Souls followed — aided by Chuuya’s occasional, awkward, “Soul life, ah?” and “Praise Dante’s bitch ass, yes?” — bracketing the sides of his path like unlikely guards, allowing the flames to devour their clothes and their skin in an effort to get it as close to him as possible.

They didn’t seem to care about their melting flesh; Dazai kept his eyes on an arm rolling near his feet and hissed: “Quit enjoying this.”

“Uh-uh,” Chuuya said, between teeth.

A bonfire of sorts had risen near the center of the ground floor, bursting brightly against the rain, untouched by the scared whines of the puppies pressed against the doors. Dazai allowed Chuuya to pull him by both arms, keeping his eyes on its swirling flames — he licked his tongue, and tasted fuel.

“Closer,” he whispered.

The ground burned in puddles of black liquid, closer and closer to the shiny tips of his shoes. Trapped in that embrace of bleeding flesh and suffocating heat, the embrace of the infernal landscapes in the frescoes of Kouyou's villa, he breathed: "Closer."

Right as the edge of his pants glowed yellow, Chuuya let go of him, and sank his gloved hand into the fire.

[“Stronger gravity supplies oxygen faster and more forcefully to any flame,” the boy would explain, days later, trapped in Mori's backroom clinic. He would hold a glass over a flame with his newly bandaged hand, the traces of burned skin slowly vanishing — courtesy of an Ability Dazai couldn't claim. “And gravity touches everything, you know? Nothing you can't control.”]

The ejection of flames towards the sky was as sudden as an explosion, filling his visual field in golden and red so vivid they were blinding. The warehouse came falling with a hellish screech, as the Souls were caught in the fire quicker than they could breathe.

Dazai rolled down the soaked path, bones creaking and the smell of burning flesh making his eyes water, unsure of what was water and what was gasoline — until he found Chuuya's gaze; a lonely silhouette surrounded by columns of fire and falling corpses, disappearing between them before he could watch his lips part in a warning.

The ceiling was the sky and the sky was falling — framed by the sharp edges of the fallen roof; littered in pieces of the first floor raining down, fire engulfing them like a blanket.

Reality was a slow motion blink. Flames were curling across the floor, closer and closer to the black stains of gasoline soaking his clothes. This, it whispered, a comfort he had begged not to feel, this is exactly —

A body crashed against his.

It was a blur of motion — glass from one of the shattered windows breaking, sticking into the sides of their clothes and piercing through their hands; the heat of fire brushing just close enough for him to breathe it in, stolen away from the wind as they landed inside a puddle; the unmatching touch of glove and naked skin behind his skull, muffling the impact.

They rolled until they landed against the side of the bridge covering The Alley, the world spinning so fast his lungs were scratched by his ribs. The roar of the explosion snapped against his ears so violently he heard nothing but white noises, tasting rust — by the time he managed to breathe out, rain was striking his face.

“Shit,” A voice spoke through the buzz, as if underwater. Hands grasped at his face, turning it to settle his eyes on a less starry sight. “Shit, shit, shit, Dazai, shit, are you fucking stupid —“

The world focused into two moons — blue and amber. The nearby puddles reflected the sky; the flames refusing to venture further. Freckles and rage and a single pimple on his chin. The grip around him was suffocatingly stubborn. Real.

“Nice of my dog to be worried,” Dazai heard his lips shape, distantly.

A pause. Heartbeat inside two naked fingers; their strangely cold touch kissing the side of his face.

The hands let go of him, landing his head on the ground a tad violently. “Who the fuck is worried?” Chuuya snapped, climbing to his feet, stepping onto his calf efficiently. “You try to explain to Boss that the bag of ashes is his shitty protégée, waste of bandages!”

“Boys?”

They stilled.

Muffled by the sounds of the warehouse falling and the buzzing in their ears, the roar of sirens appeared at the edge of their vision — too late.

---

...

---

“There was an explosion near the Yokohama Hospital,” Officer Matsuda explained, scribbling some kind of report in a small notebook, right in hitting distance of their dangling legs. “Some old Camaro had a grenade inside it. We were called to verify, and then they told us the warehouse had been set on fire.”

“A Camaro,” Chuuya echoed, fighting the blanket one of the nurses on the ambulance was still trying to put around his shoulders.

They had parked by Building Two, right where the unrelenting waterfall of the pipes could be seen, shouldered by the man’s police car and his sighs to their repeated promises of bearing no wounds — Dazai’s hallucination-levels fever, and Chuuya’s ruined hand hardly helped their case.

“Yeah,” Matsuda frowned. “Why?”

Dazai offered a smile. “No reason. A shame such a pretty car would go to waste! Wonder who’s stupid enough to store grenades in the fuel box.”

The frown deepened. “How did you know it was in the fuel box?”

“The dogs,” Chuuya interrupted, sticking his fingers into his side, viciously. The blanket was a bright, obnoxious yellow; surrounded as they were by red and blue lights, the gasoline stains Dazai had passed onto him seemed to shine. “Did you manage to get them?”

A complicated expression marred his face. “It was too sudden. We recovered their bodies. I’m sorry.”

His shoulders curved down. His fingers held onto the metallic edge of the ambulance until they turned white.

“At least one good ending,” Dazai sighed.

Once the exasperated Officer managed to tear Chuuya’s fists out of his body, he glanced around the crowded era — curious bystanders by the yellow tape, workers still fixing the Entrance Hall of the building, and the inconspicuous black cars caging his police vehicle in — and said: “What is happening, exactly?”

They offered him matching empty looks.

“Yes, yes, alright — you’re not Port Mafia, you don’t know anything about that, whatever,” he huffed, stepping a bit closer. “Boys, I have a warehouse filled to the brim in human ashes, and only you two as the witnesses. You must understand what it looks like.”

“Arrest us, then,” Dazai said, bored.

“To get you out of there in less than an hour?”

“The order of things. Bugs and chameleons.”

“What is it that you want?” Chuuya cut in.

“The few faces we’ve been able to scan all fit with the profile of men and women assumed dead,” he explained, voice low. “As far as I’m concerned, not even Ability Users are guilty of killing dead men. And look at you — It was clearly a fight against you.”

Chuuya blinked. “We’re not Ability Users.”

“Yes, Chuuya, alright,” Matsuda snapped. “Is this an issue the non-underground part of the city should be made aware of? All the disappearances, the attack on the Headquarters — I’m here to protect this city. I have reason to believe the Port Mafia wants the same,” He glanced down at their wounded hands; the burned skin peeling from their clothes. A bit meaner, he added. “With wildly different methods.”

“Heroism towards imaginary lambs to the slaughter?” Dazai echoed. He nudged Chuuya’s shoulder. “You were right when you said he was a weirdo.”

“You two did a good job surviving that.”

“Surviving what?” they chorused.

A deep breath. “You’re fifteen.”

“Now don’t get cheesy,” Chuuya retched, mouth curled uglily. “You leave that rainbow stuff for the encouragement papers to the Orphanage.”

“I’m glad you have each other, at least,” He directed a glance towards Building One, blind to the instinctual flinch of revulsion moving them away from each other. “This place doesn’t really seem —“

He trailed off.

“Is there anything,” he insisted, eventually. “At all. That you can tell me, that will help keep the people who are not part of this safe?”

He met Chuuya’s gaze, an eyebrow curled.

The boy munched on his cheek. He studied the detective’s frame — ran over his light beard, the coffee stain on his dress shirt. He had ran towards their bodies on the ground with a concern that had almost seemed honest; had clasped Chuuya’s shoulder and almost — almost — put a hand on his cheek.

“If I was Port Mafia,” he huffed, eventually. “I’d tell you to avoid known people that seem to be acting differently than usual, and to not mind any talks about a so-called Poet.”

Matsuda lit up like a Christmas tree.

He was still mumbling under his breath and scribbling who-knows-what on his notebook as he made his way to the congestion of police cars coming back from the warehouse — the skip in his step was almost offensive, in the face of the officers’ grimaces.

“Is he one of those fools who believes in justice a tad too much, or is he just giddy you seem to show vaguely anti-mafioso traits?” Dazai questioned, as he raised his blanket all the way to his chin.

“Yes,” Chuuya said.

He hummed.

They watched the unconventional nightlife dance under the flickering light poles, bathed in crimson and cobalt and the illuminated cubicles of the Headquarters’ windows. Their team would come up with some story for the warehouse; Mori would sit him down and wonder how his prodigy hadn’t been able to bring him Q with three dogs and an order.

He leaned his head against the metal, and he thought about the racing flames.

“Listen,” Chuuya said, for the second time, his eyes stubbornly settling on every inch of the scenario but him. The frustrated texture of his tone was a, I can’t tell you. “I don’t want to end up like them.”

Dead?, Dazai wondered. Burned without the right to scream? He knew that wasn’t it. He knew if they killed Dante and Chuuya found his body on the verge of collapse — he would do nothing but put his hands in pockets and bless the Port Mafia. Inhuman?

“A somewhat selfish request at the hands of the only canine survivor,” he said. “But I’ll work on it.”

A huff. In another world, maybe — a hiss of laughter.

Some careful planning — pretending a stomach ache with a Oscar-worthy performance — got them out of the ambulance, slaloming between vehicles with their spines curved and hands hooked, climbing the stairs of Building Two with the promise to come back and return the blankets soon.

Dazai expected Chuuya to drop his the moment they entered the empty, pipe-rain soaked Entrance Hall; all he did, though, was watch the corner where Tanaki’s desk would have been, in Building One, watching fake rain land on his open palm.

He studied his new, un-doodled cast; too clean. He recalled a heart that wouldn’t beat, caged between fingers that were never uncovered and that Dazai kept imagining touching the sky. Black wings and red clouds; the possibility of an end — at last.

“I’m not going to kill you,” Chuuya said.

For a moment, he considered the possibility of having spoken out loud. “Excuse me?”

“Not yet, at least,” the boy clarified, following a train of thought he had clearly decided not to offer. “It would make no sense. It’s exactly what you want. I’m not about to serve you victory on a silver plate.”

Using his hands to clean his eyes from the fake-rain like a windshield, he asked: “Did you hit your head?”

The boy raised his eyebrows. “You do realize you keep putting me in situations where the best course of action would be Corruption, yes?”

Dazai blinked, very slow.

“It’s absolutely disgusting,” he continued, his tone too casual. “If I had any time to waste, and if the circumstances weren’t what they are, I would put you under a train for it. But I thought you should know,” He kicked the ground; dirtied the carpet until there was no fuel left on his shoe. “You’re my assurance.”

You’re my, Dazai thought about saying — a sentence made for open endings. Made to trail off. He would know. He shouldn’t.

The occupied seat on the other side of an Arcade station. The most annoying person he knew. A flickering ant stuck to the ceiling — made to be pinched until it fell. Dazai made touches repellant; Dazai repelled all touches. Dazai had wanted to touch him since he had had Arcade lights bleed down his face — had had Arcade lights make him younger, make him hunched on rust-covered baby bones, make him just like him.

I could do so much more with you, he’d sworn, studying Sheep-stained bracelets — longing for a claustrophobic place in his skeptical ribcage. To wound from the inside.

See?, he would have said, from that carcass. You bleed too.

He watched water rain from the pipes behind the glass doors, slithering under them to drool down the stairs, and said: “Go talk to Tanaki. I’ll distract Officer Dad here.”

Chuuya squinted at the glass doors. Maybe he needs glasses, he mused, itching all over. His hair was still plastered to his face; it could have been blood. Maybe it was. Dripping dirty water and cheap fuel on the ground — and then matching casts and matching ages, knuckles purple and red and black, Port Mafia black, all for our organization, Kouyou had said, until our blood runs black.

Maybe, he considered, pained. Mori’s hands on his shoulders; Mori’s plans in his eyes; Mori’s diamonds scratching his scarred skin. Maybe —

“Can you quit staring?” the boy concluded, with a grimace. “Seriously. It’s suspicious as fuck. It’s freaking me out.”

“I’m just hoping she kills you, this time,” Dazai snapped, disgusted.

His eyes flared up. “Fuck you.”

“No, you.”

“No, fuck —” Chuuya set his jaw. “Whatever. I should have left you to burn.” He fixed his blanket in place; stalked to the entrance with the wet squelch of his shoes and of his muttered curses, his shadow growing longer and longer on the puddle-like ground.

“Chuuya,” he called.

He turned like a snap, biting: “What.”

You didn’t, though, Dazai accused. Betrayal was sealed with ivy, and he trusted no one at all. You didn’t leave me to burn.

He wondered if he could see it in his eyes — if he could read rage where he had worn amusement, ever since Mori had first laughed in front of him. Is there any sound we did not invent in fear of the quiet?, she used to say. Is there anything we don’t fear?

“If we’re doing this partners thing,” he said, at last, like a concession, “You’re going to have to ditch the hat permanently.”

Chuuya never feared anything at all, so he didn’t speak. Didn’t move, either — let the word settle there, daring and soaked, asking nothing more than to be allowed to exist. He stalked towards him until the water was tinted red from his guilty soles — haloed by the police lights behind him; nothing more than the picture of reluctant acceptance — nothing more than the silent hiss of a this, this is it, ancient and newborn, scratching his bandages like a dog begging to be let in.

He pressed two fingers to the creases on his forehead.

Hey, Dazai thought. We match.

Raising his unwounded fingers by the wrist, he shook his hand in the thin space between their bodies, refusing to lower his gaze. Dazai gripped it tight; tried to tell himself this wasn't furniture to an empty home — not something to leave behind; not something to let in from the rain.

“Not a fucking chance,” Chuuya swore.

---

...

---

The pharmacy near the port wasn't out of social anxiety pills.

Unlike all the other pharmacies and drugstores in Yokohama and surroundings — if his research had been as precise as his exhausted feet declared. The sudden disappearance couldn't be natural; an entire city wouldn't simply run out of one of the most requested medicines in the market.

When the enemy controlled the market, though —

He entered and bought what he needed. Even in that unlikely oasis, the amount was pitiful. It wasn't that much of a problem, he supposed — the pills were V's fixation, not his. He had never been foolish enough to develop additions — although, under some points of view, running up and down an entire city just to soothe a friend could be considered just as foolish.

The boy was waiting for him.

Obviously.

He was leaning on the railing, as he had the first time he and V had met. Perhaps he lived close — perhaps that place just sold the best kind of bandages. They were weird, the bandages.

A weird addiction of its own league.

He noticed his presence immediately. Still, he didn't turn to face him; didn't even allow him an inch of his attention. When he stepped close enough to see what was keeping him so busy, he found a ruined old photograph held by pianist, scarred fingers.

The picture wasn't much. A man and a child, holding hands and posing just composedly enough to appear vicious; framed by the all-but-unique landscape of a beach. Their kimonos were evidently reused; nonetheless; they were kept with the attention of people who respected objects more than people.

The two didn't share a single feature.

"He was ugly as a child, too," the boy sighed, after an eternity. Hiding the picture in his pocket, he offered him a blank smile. "Do me a favor and don't tell him I have that? I stole it from his apartment. I have no energy to listen to him scream about it."

In the grand scheme of things, lying was a sin. But he had bigger things to worry about. "I won't tell. Why did you bring me here?"

"Me?" He widened his only visible eye. "You're the one who invited me. Justice incited my divine Creator, you said, correct?"

Coordinated in two different intentions, they raised their heads to study the name of the drugstore.

"The owners are foreigners," the boy sighed. "Americans and their weird surnames, am I right?"

"I was well aware you would want to meet," he admitted, smiling. "I just didn't think you would set a temptation for me as well."

The boy shrugged. "Underestimating me is a bad idea. But now you know, so it's all forgiven."

He considered him, silently. Getting his hands on him would have been the work of a lifetime — creating a limbo for him, the masterpiece of this world. What, he considered, defeated before he could start, could be hellish enough for a demon?

"What do you want?" he asked. "To taunt me for my failed capture at Rengoku? The attack on your Headquarters should have erased my shame. I find balance as divine as few other things."

"You and others."

"I assume you brought me here to kill me. To save that friend of yours."

"Ah, yes," He blinked, as if the idea hadn't even crossed his mind. "That would be stupid, wouldn't it?"

He leaned forward. All mirth had disappeared from his eyes; abruptly, he was older than time — a bit meaner than the crueller of the devils to haunt the soiled ground. How foolish, he thought, maybe to V — maybe to himself. Faith wasn't made for men who would laugh if God embraced them and apologized.

“Say, Dante,” Dazai Osamu tilted his head to the side. “Why don’t you tell me everything you know about the Book?”

Chapter End Notes

matsuda: i’ve only had chuuya and dazai for two days but if anything happened to them i would kill the mafia and then myself hey guys!! a bit of a shorter chapter, but again, life is sort of beating my ass right now. but i was very excited about this chapter, and all my wips kept having something i disliked, so i decided to just go for it. that scene of chuuya in the pipe rain being called dazai’s partner for the first time is actually the first scene i’ve ever come up with for this fic i think? or maybe the second? i just have this vivid memory of it; i hope i managed to do it justice.

fun fact! the three adorable dogs (who i personally headcanon absolutely DETEST chuuya, as all dogs, because why not make him suffer a bit more — thought do be patient on that) are named after the romanized japanese translation of “cerberus.” even funnier fact — in the divine comedy, cerberus was a guard in one of the circles, and he was meant to symbolize god’s punishment. as far as i’m concerned a puppy is a puppy.

MOST IMPORTANTLY: kouyou’s girlhood trauma makes an appearance. that part of her backstory, apart from kanechi (whose name i took from one of irl kouyou’s works), is obviously made up — but tell me everything about kouyou doesn’t scream “traumatized by a girl best friend at 14”. can’t wait to elaborate on that.

you might also be surprised that i decided to frame kanechi as not a lover, but someone who simply cared about kouyou — i did this out of habit, since the translation i first read for bsd never truly framed them as lovers. actually, i always interpreted it a lot as kouyou’s own odasaku (can’t wait to elaborate on that too)

i’m gonna shut up now. oh, also BOOK MENTION EVERYBODY!!!

i hope you have a great day if you read all the way here. see you next chapter!

LAUGHING

Chapter Summary

Chuuya's corpse smelled like rotten peaches, old milk, and the unavoidable stench of run-over dog.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter viii.

---

Case number: 98300357

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi. A

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. reported the death of Nakahara C.. Following the
[...]*

---

“Here’s the deal,” he offered. “At least give me a glass of bleach, if not the whiskey.”

Dazai couldn’t have named the part of the job that required him to sit in a corner of a nightclub with a fruit-juice — Boss’ orders, kid, the barman would usually tell him, when he caught him sneaking under the counter — watching Mori charm and threaten his way through wasted aristocrats — the one time they can’t be blamed for their stupidity, Mori would sigh.

He did know Mori enjoyed it infinitely.

The Libelula was what a hole-in-the-wall bar in their territory could only inspire to be — a triumph of neon lights and pricey curtains raining down three levels of open balconies, towered by a flying platform with a DJ station. All the people who danced there were very careful to be out of their senses in a classy way.

“You know, this place wouldn’t have been established without me,” he lamented, as he watched the barman back away with a gulp. “I’m the one who forged the police-proof permits for vaguely suspicious outer border activity — I’m the one who came up with the name!”

“I thought that was Papa’s idea,” the dancer on the stool next to him blinked.

“That’s because it was,” Dazai admitted. “But I gave the thumbs up! Mori doesn’t like things that don’t have my thumb up. What if it ended up being called The Trashcan? I could have given my thumb up to that!”

She hummed, barely audible over the unrelenting thunder of the music. “I think Trashcan has a certain charm.” With astonishingly long green hair and a fluffy pair of cat ears, her almost completely naked body was cursed to be the most eye-catching part of her appearance. “Oximorous and all.”

The hand she was missing was another part of it.

Dazai sucked on his straw, tapping his fingers on the childish cartoon drawn on the juice box, and sighed — loud and deep. On the other side of the bar, sunk in uncomfortable cushions and surrounded by more goons than he could count — plus the trio of fools he was smilingly scamming — Mori didn’t offer him a single glance.

“So your father just got up and left you here all alone?” she cooed, tucking a strand of his hair behind his ear. He blinked at her over the juice, eyes falling on the ivy tattoo connecting her breasts. “Suit-busy type, or is he hoping you experience some wildness while he isn’t looking?”

He sucked louder, pensive. The other dancers — from the countless occasions Mori had dragged him along to meetings that had devolved into a, don't quite need you anymore; only bored, suicidal Dazai didn't quite have anything else to do, and alcohol overdose was classified as painless in several books — were usually nicer.

For one, they always bought him drinks — and they had a tendency to know who he was, which meant they played along with the double suicide bit until Mori got too close. A few of them liked to whisper things in his ears; others to press too close.

Sometimes, — neon lights uncovering eyebags their make-up had masterfully covered; slightly shaking hands accepting the coat he would offer them for a few minutes — and only if Mori was too far to see, they would look at him with a sour-sweet type of pity.

“Oh, Mori is always busy,” he offered, at last. A few dancers were walking on their tiptoes on the closest platform, twirling around a pole sweaty hands were trying to grab. “This time around, I’m pretty sure he’s trying to get the shops on our borders to not let the Nine Rings take advantage of their facade.” A pause. “Either that, or he wants to kill them. All depends on their usefulness! Mori refuses to put a hand on useful people.”

“Aren’t you a funny guy,” Tamashiro Miki — that was what the wall in Chuuya’s apartment said, at the very least — considered. “Very imaginative.”

“I wasn’t kidding about the double suicide,” he clarified, because he always had to. “If I’m allowed, you are rather beautiful. Fits just fine in my plans for my somewhat premature demise.”

A pout. “Young and pretty as you are?”

“You flatter me,” he said, victorious. “My stupid partner says I look like, if a mackerel got mauled by a cookiecutter shark. It was sort of surprising finding out he knows what a cookiecutter shark is.”

A flash of confusion passed by her face. “What is that?”

“A partner?” Dazai blinked. “Being absolutely honest with you, I can’t say I’m sure. But I already committed to bit — Spoke too soon. Seemed right in the moment! It was raining and all —“

“No, I meant the — Cookiecutter shark?”

“That’s a shark.”

“Yes,” she echoed, a bit exasperated. “But —“

Dazai sucked on his straw, noisy.

“I don’t have a folder of shark pictures in my phone,” he offered, apologetic. “I do have one of grasshoppers, though. It’s terribly informative. Want to see it?”

All the way to the couches, Mori leaned over the drink-filled table, offering a hand. The trio of men in black exchanged a glance; the former doctor's smile didn't falter for a single second.

It spoke for his ability that none of the men and women pressing against their bubble of dealing seemed afraid — spoke for his one-day-it'll-be-his-end penchant for comparison. The Libelula and every single night and day activity of their territory had dealt with the Crimson Rains; to most of them, Mori Ougai had been a blessing in disguise.

I hardly need scared tools, the man had once told him, stitching up a wound he had given himself by crashing his head against a glass shelf. In and out; Dazai had giggled and asked if he was sewing his brain. I just need them in good condition.

Are you talking about me?, he hadn't asked.

One of the men shook his hand.

Dazai sighed, abandoning his juice box on the counter. "Listen," he said, spinning his stool faster and faster. Tamashiro Miko appeared in blinks, all glittery skin and hungry eyes and marks of dubious origin. "I have a curfew. I'm simply going to ask."

"Ask away, handsome," she grinned, leaning a bit forward.

"Yes, thank you. How do we find Dante?"

Her smile froze in place.

"We have a new strategy going on, you see," he explained, staring at the neon light dangling from the ceiling until his eyes pulsed. "Well. Plenty of them. I'm trying to get the Hatrack to let me name them, because the names he's coming up with are atrocious. What in God's good name is a Lie of the Fake Flowers? At the very least, Shame and Toad had a point."

"I don't know what you're talking about," the woman snapped, her eyes steel.

"I know, I know, I'm getting to it. See, theory in place is that we can't find Dante unless one of his Souls leads us to him," He offered a courteous nod in her direction. "That's when you come in. So, could you please do me the favor of —"

It came in snapshots — her knuckles clenching around the edge of the counter; the tip of her left foot touching the ground in an aborted run; the life in her eyes leaving, hissing and unreachably, encompassed in a curtain of vaguely sour smoke.

She reached for the nearest bottle, smashed it against the counter, and sunk the sharp makeshift blade right in the middle of her chest.

"Oh, okay," Dazai offered, under the startled shriek coming out of the bartender's mouth. Eyes were turning, called by the sound and the thump! of her body landing on the floor, blood spreading under her limbs like a particularly thick drink.

He slipped away from the stool, watching as a small crowd gathered around the corpse, scream over scream slowly challenging the music and winning — gasps leaving the people's mouths as they realized her body was covered in much different wounds than the simple chasm of the bottle.

“So that's what he meant when he said I would make for a good Soul,” Dazai considered, under his breath, crawling on all fours between the dancing legs of unaware drunks.

Some blood had landed on his cheek; he tried to reach it with his tongue — but all the distraction did was make him bump against a pair of legs.

“Dear,” Mori shook his head, looking down at him with a half smile. His scarf had been carefully tucked under his coat; his lips were shiny with a drink he was sure he hadn't dared to gulp down. “Causing troubles already?”

“You gave me commanding role,” he muttered. “I get to do what I want with it. Are you done?”

He helped him up; rubbed the blood from his cheek, uncaring of the stain that lingered on his gloves. Dazai wondered if he wore them because he was still a doctor, in soul; if he wore them to touch him; if not everything in the world was meant to be about him.

“Yes, I'm done,” the man tutted. He squinted over the congestion of horrified people. “Tamaguchi is only pretending to have agreed, though — Killing him for it seemed slightly rude. You will find me a better way to make him learn his lesson.”

“Surely.”

“Have you learned something new? I saw you slip some manuals from the backroom.”

“Oh, yes,” He nodded. “You know cicadas?”

Mori blinked. “Certainly.”

“They're very fast. Especially in small places.”

“So are you.”

“So am I,” He beamed, barely regaining his balance after some hurried observer pushed past his shoulder. “And they often mistake humans for trees. It often causes their doom. Humans have significantly more reason to kill innocents than trees do,” Dazai blinked at the floor, uncertain if it was blood or vodka sticking to his soles. “I wouldn't make that mistake.”

Mori studied his grin — the refusal from his eyes to move elsewhere than down the planes of his face. Sometimes he got that look — undeniably worried. Irredeemably curious. The moth dashing towards the flame; looking at the stars and fearing, just out of shared brightness.

Count for me, the man would say, as he stitched him up. Sometimes, he considered, he thought Mori just wanted his mouth to do something — if he just wouldn't cry.

Dazai got bored.

“Anyway,” He yawned. “I prefer grasshoppers.”

The doctor’s shoulders fell, purposeful. In a tone that allowed his hand to lay on his shoulder and be worth it, he tutted: “I thought you loved all women.”

“I do,” he assured. All women that haunted the places Mori dragged him to loved him back, too, most times — with their pearls and horrible husbands and power-thirsty eyes. “She would have been perfect! If she hadn’t moved so soon, I could have joined her in an eternal rest from this cursed world.”

“Maybe let us rest later,” Mori encouraged. He put his hands on his shoulders; nodded to the wall of conspicuous Black Lizards, beginning their suffocating march to the exit. Through the black-glass doors, the nearing lights of an ambulance shone. “We have much to do in the morning, do we not?”

“Eight deals of no intervention to the shootout we’re planning,” Dazai recounted, efficiently.

“And?”

“The attack on then Nine Rings’ freight —“

“And?”

He blinked. “Oh, yes,” They crossed the doors; a breathless paramedic almost ran them over, in her hurry to make her way inside. “Chuuya’s funeral, too.”

---

...

---

Chuuya’s corpse smelled like rotten peaches, old milk, and the unavoidable stench of run-over dog.

[“Here’s the plan,” Dazai explained, over the splutters coming from under the old blanket he had thrown over his and Chuuya’s backs, launching himself to the furniture-less ground of his apartment face first. He pinched it under his chin, wearing it like a veil, and proclaimed: “You’re dead.”

The art of sending dirty looks wearing a dogs-patterned blanket was one Chuuya had mastered. “I dare you to say that again, mummy.”

His apartment complex, as most living quarters of the Mafia, fell into a deadly silence the moment the clock struck midnight — either because its inhabitants were all at work, or because they knew better than to dare disturb the night. His living room's light flickered; it made the lines and pictures on his wall seem strangely greye.

Dazai had been sneaking in for weeks. Chuuya had been taking measures against it for double the time. All of them futile; he was now studying a way to get his own coffee cup in the cupboard, purely for a chance to manipulate Chuuya into letting it prepare it for them both and poisoning the boy's own.

“To everyone who's not Port Mafia, you're dead,” he insisted. He pointed a chopstick to the ceiling — a reminder of a dinner he had mostly pretended to much, and that Chuuya had obsessively, mutteringly, saved for later — tracing one name. “Except for one person in particular.”]

The smell shouldn't have been so overwhelming, he thought. Then again, Dazai had hardly ever been to any funerals Mori hadn't dragged him too — show some respect to our dead, Dazai. And then, petulant, you're the one not giving them graves.

The former Boss had had a funeral, of course. A big deal, and yet not at all. Mori had offered a more than glorious eulogy; Kouyou had spat near his coffin when no one was watching. Then, he had been dealt with the way every other Night Warden was — the waves of Under Port.

That funeral, he hadn't witnessed. He could still imagine the grief Mori had worn throughout the whole day.

[“Look how magnanimous I am,” he said, scribbling down ideas on a piece of paper he had ripped from one of his French textbooks. “You can even choose who gets to write and read out your eulogy. Personally, I have been preparing for this day since the first time I made the mistake of laying my eyes on you —“

“Yeah, no, fuck that,” Chuuya interrupted him, slapping his nape. “You're not opening your shitty mouth. Ane-san can do it.”

“Your bias is so unprofessional. What's with that thing she does, anyway?”

“Thing?”

Dazai tapped two fingers under his chin.

“Ah,” Chuuya made a face. “It's a reminder,” He kicked his calf. “Can you go on?” ]

“...young life,” Kouyou was saying, composed. She wore grief like a particularly expensive kimono; since she liked Chuuya, she had conceded to something that looked like tears in the corner of her eyes. “A loyal young boy, as promising as few, whose loss we will feel until the end of our days.”

“Boo,” Dazai echoed, a tad too loud.

An awkward silence took over the Chapel. An unfairly exaggerated number of people had shown up to the function — unaware of the pretense, and honest to God grieving the boy in the casket. Dazai couldn't say he got the enthusiasm, but the first rows had yet to stop sobbing their eyes out.

Or staring at him.

“Dazai,” Kouyou hissed, behind a tissue, in the deadly silence. Was he really friends with all these people? Where did he find the time? “Could you get out?”

“No,” he answered, courteous, sitting down a bit more comfortably on the corpse's legs. He licked the tip of his marker; added a few details to the dog doodle on Chuuya's forehead. “I'm grieving.”

Would Mori show up to his funeral, at last? He probably would; to gloat, at the very least. He would look as he did in that moment, pristine and quiet in the first row. Nothing about him spoke of grief, certainly — but the Boss of the Port Mafia didn't just show up to anyone's funeral.

Hirotsu would feel obliged to come, gentleman as he was. Ace and Kouyou, too, as a sign of respect to the Boss. Chuuya would probably pass by, spitting in his coffin and carving his least favorite Hirose Fumiko's song on the wood.

And Tanaki —

A gently wrinkled hand closed around his wrist.

“Dazai, dear,” Madame Tanaki whispered. She had rolled her wheelchair forward from the edge of the second row; the caves under her eyes were barely deeper than the abyss the thread of her words hung over. “I know. Come on.”

Dazai opened his mouth, and closed it again.

“You got —” discharged, he almost said — then he took notice of the crowd staring at them, and of Kouyou's death-lined glances. He studied the black satin of Tanaki's clothes; the abnormal absence of the bump of her abdomen. Unfamiliar. Complicated.

He got out of the coffin.

[“What's the point of this materialism?” Dazai lamented, dangling his legs from where he had stuck himself in the sink. Chuuya's intelligible handwriting was a torture on his stubborn eyes; he stretched his foot until it touched the boy on the floor. “You don't seem the type to want flowers.”

“Fake flowers,” Chuuya specified, with that sniffing superiority he often wondered if he knew he had stolen from Kouyou. “Inside joke. The flowers are fake and so it's my corpse.”

“We're not calling it Lie of the —”

“My last funeral was shit,” the boy replied, stubbornly, because he liked to dangle the stories he refused to tell him right in front of his nose. “If I go along with this, I want the cool stuff. Also, you’re wearing a suit. With a jacket.” ]

The three layers of clothing upon his bandages were more restricting than any bandages — than the weird feeling on his chest, as he dragged Tanaki’s chair to a darker corner of the Chapel, lulled by the melody of Kouyou’s eulogy.

“I thought they wouldn’t let you out for a few weeks more,” Dazai hushed, crouching down in front of her chair. A crying Madonna offered some shade from the stained glass windows in their alcove; he wasn’t sure if the Port Mafia lingered in Churches out of faith or shared interiors. “You silly woman.”

Her smile was a distant thing, refusing to walk the path to her eyes. “There are things to do,” she said. Her vocal chords sounded ruined; her hands closed on the armrests of her chair every few seconds. The space she had occupied had been halved, and she dragged that newly found emptiness with tired fingers. A bit quieter: “There are always things to do.”

A glass cage, he thought, studying the swarm of curved shoulders. Little rats who knew they were being studied, and still refused to knock against the wall. The finish line was only a slightly colder Hell; and yet they ran, and they ran, and they ran.

I was wrong, he had told Verlaine.

“It’s like,” she started. Her fingers kept pulling at the silver strand of hair under her ear; the edges were ashy, uneven in the shakingly ritual he could envision her feeding them to. She cleared her throat — stared at the ground as if it would do her the favor of digging out its dead. “Ah. Uhm — It’s like it will never stop being quiet, ever again.”

Her jaw set; unclenched again, along to a weak exhale. She pulled so hard her scalp had to burn with it; pulled so devotedly Dazai almost expected the absent bump under her sternum to reappear. “I don’t know if I’m quite here.”

Behind the stained windows, some passing kids in a bicycle laughed with their entire chests. It echoed against the marble; some younger girl, one of either of Kouyou’s ranks, stared at the ceiling, praying.

“I’m sorry,” Dazai offered.

“I don’t need you to be,” She tightened her lips into a deadly white line. She only seemed tired; her hands wouldn’t quit searching. “There’s hardly any time for it. I cried my tears over a sink of hair and Ryoru’s lighter. And it wasn’t your fault,” A tremor. “It wasn’t Chuuya’s, either.”

Men slowly gathered closer to the coffin, their last greetings trapped between gritted teeth. Chuuya didn’t often receive subordinates; voices were that he preferred working alone, or that he simply did it better, or that none of them were the Flags. He had a tendency to be everywhere that was needed, nonetheless — their shaking fingers proved it.

“He came looking for me,” Tanaki whispered. Every vowel was contained in a snowflake; her eyes were so wide her whole face trembled with them. “Stayed all night, but I wouldn’t wake up. And before that —“

“You were so high on painkillers and loss you blamed him for it all, because your memory was too foggy?” Dazai met Mori’s eyes, as he made his way to the coffin. He put his gloved hand where Chuuya’s head would have been; curled an eyebrow. “I should rather think he was never mad about that.”

A sound came out of her throat. “Oh .”

“Tanaki,” He cleared his throat. “Listen.”

“I was unfair to him —“

“This is your pain, not his. He understands.”

Her eyes widened. “Oh, Dazai, dear —“

“No, no — You misunderstand. Listen to —“

“Forgive the interruption.”

Hokama Shigeo was a sick man. Describing him in any other way wouldn’t have done him justice; his complexion was paler than the marble under their feet, his eyes and nose redder than the fake flowers. His hands spasmed at his sides, caging legs who seemed not to care about standing — addiction wasn’t his best look.

“Forgive the interruption,” he echoed, eyes moving frantically from his interlocutors to the casket, as if expecting it to disappear. “I — I work under Executive Kouyou. Nakahara and I, we — we knew each other. Not that well, but — A hard loss, isn’t he?”

[“I told you about him,” Dazai nodded towards the ceiling. “The one who joined to repay his father’s debts. Dante didn’t use him for the attack at the HQs, so he must be hidden in the ranks to spy.”

“He can be the one to inform Dante I’m not as useful as I used to be,” Chuuya concluded, grimacing. “Are we betting on him not feeling my death?”

“I doubt he’s keeping track.”

He squinted. “How do I know you’re not doing all of this to be the only one in command?”

“It’s a temporary measure,” he complained. “A great number of men will know you’re alive, anyway. Most of them. Some of them. Stop being dramatic. This funeral is purely a cut down your credit card.”

“You mean our credit cards.”

“Not what I meant with partners.”

"I told you," Chuuya spelled out, "Not to call me that.""].

"Certainly a pricey loss, alright," Dazai sighed. "How am I meant to successfully publicize the Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter if everyone is busy grieving for him?"

Hokama seemed slightly confused. He bowed his head, nonetheless, doing his best to focus his eyes on him. "I didn't know the two of you were close. My — My deepest condolences, sir."

"It's alright," he reassured. "I'm probably in shock, right now. What do you think, Tanaki? Am I? Oh, I hope not to disturb your grief when I throw myself into his grave. Again. Tearing my hair out."

Madame Tanaki stared at him.

Clearly, though, the drugs made Hokama rather tolerant. "Don't worry about it."

"Since you asked," Dazai started, again. "It was a terrible accident. Ever since the Boss asked us two to direct the counter attack, we've been so busy. A month of successful hits, and the upper hand of the conflict finally in our field... Poor Hatrack," He sighed. "To think the men were just starting to respect us."

Respect, he echoed.

No one had dared to voice their complaints, after Mori had officially directed every kneeling man of his organization towards their frames. It hardly meant those complaints weren't flooding the pipes — hardly meant they could bring themselves to remember just how creeped out they tended to be by Dazai's presence, and just how much they appreciated Chuuya's Ability.

Mafiosi liked power, and they liked trustworthy people even more. They tended to dislike when the two came too close into contact.

They had obeyed their orders — had stood straight and quiet as two boys, not even sixteen of age, walked back and forth, climbing ranks they wouldn't even touch, in thirty years. They had fought by their side, celebrated with them — and they had waited for them in the darkest alleys, knife in hand.

[“It needs to be realistic,” Chuuya insisted. “And just organized enough — just reasonable enough — that it could actually bring me down. They’ve been planning to eat us alive for a month, now.”

“So what,” Dazai asked. “Could they do it?”

A strange glance. “It’s me. No, they couldn’t.”].

"He was betrayed by someone in his squad," he explained. "We sent a battalion to follow a weapon train GSS was sending to the Nine Rings, to blow it up. The mission went well, but someone unknowingly put a bomb in Chuuya's compartment. He wasn't quick enough to escape. And his corpse shows it, doesn't it? They spent five hours putting it together."

A sound like retching came from Tanaki's seat, shattered in the middle and stuck in her throat. Dazai cringed. "Tanaki, about that —"

"How could they do that?" Hokama said, forgetting to look particularly upset.

Dazai shrugged. "Men have done worse things in the name of envy. We're currently looking for the culprit. Worry not, though! Your friend will be avenged."

He paled some more. "Traitors should get what they deserve, I suppose."

"They should," He nodded. Looking right into his eyes, he added: "And evil people should receive the right punishment, shouldn't they?"

Chuuya's funeral lasted two hours and fifteen minutes in total. Kouyou's sob-tearing eulogy was widely appreciated — even Mori pretended to bow his head, grievous. Tanaki stared at nothing at all, holding his hand too tightly. On the other side of the room, Hirotsu smoked four cigarettes in total.

When it was Dazai's turn to tearfully murmur something into the casket — only pushed forward by Madame Tanaki's hands and her whisper of, give him sincerity, at the very least — he skipped his way down the aisle of horrified mafiosi, crossing his arms on the edge of the wood.

Finding a redhead hadn't been heard, Dazai considered, tapping the unfinished dog doodle on his forehead. Finding something short enough, on the other hand — he had hoped some of his feet would vanish, after he had thrown the corpse in a secured room and blown it up.

"Hey, there," he chirped, chin on knuckles. He could feel Mori's facial muscles quiver. "Slug. Hatrack. Chibi. Petit Mafia. Thing-that-got-stuck-under-a-tacky-hat. Bane of my existence. I must thank you for your sacrifice."

"Thanks to you," he continued, ignoring the way the entire room was holding its breath, "My very own torment — my greatest fear — has no reason to exist any longer. Through my researches for a painless suicide method, I couldn't help but worry — What if you constant yipping around me ended up involving you in my death? A fearsome possibility. Luckily, I shall not fret about it any longer."

With a kick and a bounce of energy, Dazai pushed his body up, framed by the gasps of the crowd. He balanced himself on the edge of the casket; opened his arms in an empty embrace, pointedly ignoring Kouyou's manicured fingers massaging her temples.

"Chuuya once told me the universe we perceive is less than 5% of its true total," he declared. Hirotsu had picked up a fifth cigarette. "He liked Physics facts. He was a nerd like that. It was as useless as every other Physics-For-Dummies' fact he ever dumped on my poor self — And the reason why I threw all of his books out of the window."

"I do believe," he insisted, "Now that you are gone, that humanity might flourish. In your name, we shall learn to perceive 6%! Amen."

An hesitant wave of murmurs appeared.

“Amen,” some voices questioned.

He had a hard time climbing down; hushed the crowd with reassuring motions when his foot ended in the corpse’s face, and fixed his hand so that the left one would show the middle finger only. Appreciate it, he sent over, mentally.

It took another half an hour for the room to be emptied out. Dazai watched them cry over the wooden box some more — waved cheerfully behind Kouyou’s back, arm intertwined with hers, as she reassured guests about the young boy’s trauma. She received most of the condolences; no one else quite fit the criteria.

Eventually, it was only him and Tanaki left.

He met her expression, and didn’t quite find it in himself to be mean. Instead, he extracted his console, curled on the bench next to her seat, and waited.

Curled under the altar, a Peruvian cat blinked.

“I wish,” Tanaki said, very quietly, after some old clock had ticked — not differently than before. Her eyes were set on the invisible; she kept tracing her tattoos, comforting centuries old ink. “I wish that life could be respected even where light cannot touch.”

Life, Dazai thought. Useless to linger on it; better to watch it float through the currents of his mind, one fish too small and too big to bring home. A mixture of breathing and suffocating; an eclipse between wanting and never having. Death, he mused, while being fundamentally the same — was much simpler.

“You don’t respect life,” Dazai offered. “You just learn to share space, I think.”

“If you’re done with bullshit,” replied a new voice, emerging from the unreachable balcony on the other end of the Chapel, walking down the columns with his hands in his pockets, “We’re going to be late.”

Tanaki stilled.

In an effort to maintain secrecy for the eyes they would meet, Chuuya had picked, as it fit him, the worst wardrobe possible. The scarlet under jacket was a light in the night; the hat had simply been switched, so that the chain dangled on the other side of his face — he had, though, worn a face mask of the same material as the Black Lizards’ onyx bulletproof vests.

A bit too elegant for a Sheep, given the custom shoes; a bit too ragged to fit a hardened mafioso. Just pathetic enough to fit him, though.

“So while I was standing here watching people cry over you, you got to go shopping?” he lamented, uselessly. Chuuya had eyes for one person only. “I didn’t even get to read my full eulogy. It was twenty eight pages long!”

“Chuuya,” Tanaki exhaled, hands trembling. Her eyes followed his every step down the aisle — the reluctant taste of them, which Dazai bet she wouldn’t notice; the stubbornness to advance forward. “Chuuya, how — You were —“

He closed the distance between them with his fists clenched so tight Dazai could see them through the pockets. When he came to a halt in front of Tanaki’s wheelchair, he paused — the time it would take for a breath to get stuck — and he kneeled.

She flinched.

Oh-oh, Dazai thought — watching the line of Chuuya’s shoulders stiffen; watching Tanaki regret it in the time it took for the spasm to reach her nails, bitter and involuntary and never to be erased again.

“I will not ask for your forgiveness,” Chuuya said, forehead to the floor. His voice was a blank canva; Dazai, enamoured with clouds and hanging hooks, had never seen him touch the ground, since they had met.

“Chuuya, it wasn’t —“

“But I will,” he insisted, intent, as if she had not been a bleeding bird — emptied of its song long before his eyes could grow nimbly vacant, “Make up for it. Save the salvageable. I promise you.”

Tanaki’s eyes filled with tears. “Chuuya,” she whispered, reaching forward. Her skin seemed thinner than usual; he could see bones push through, breaking flesh to sink into his face and force him to look at her. “Chuuya, dear, listen to me —“

Dazai left them, quietly.

The cat had the good grace of following, steps always a bit quicker than his good soles could follow. He studied their matching shadows on the concrete; sat on the edge of the sidewalk and watched traffic pass by, pretending there was nothing out of the ordinary in the feline keeping guard.

“Or am I the guard, here?” he questioned, a bit amused. The cat blinked. He huffed. “Yes, yes. I know. I’ll tell him to hurry soon. If I don’t set this thing between them into a path of resolution, do you know how annoying he’s going to be? Guilt tends to weigh people down. He is hardly more interesting.”

A purr. He shrugged. “I know better.”

Plump clouds made their way through the sky. Gingerly, he pulled at the leather of his shoes; pocketed the console and settled back on his elbows.

“It’s a long story,” Dazai told the cat, sighing.

Three weeks prior to the funeral.

“So,” Akamine Mizuki, head of the Nine Rings’ overseas drug deals, started. “Why did Boss let two brats in, again?”

An irrelevant detail most of the Port Mafia would probably not be privy about — given their eyes low gun high morale and the resident gravity manipulator’s distaste for technological devices — was that Chuuya’s destroyed phone was, in short of better words, absolutely engulfed in phone charms.

Albatross’ idea, he had commented, only once, flippantly, after Dazai had lamented the unusual weight to hit his face. The guys’ thought it fucking hilarious.

Observation with a cause: if Chuuya hadn’t found it hilarious as well, the phone wouldn’t have been so overwhelmingly adorned. Deeper observation with a deeper cause: he rarely kept his phone in hand, lest he started playing with charms, and allowed his eyes to get lost somewhere.

“She’s smart,” he offered, eventually, under the roar of the crowd, eyes on the anonymous police report he was sending from that particular phone.

Bodies pushed him back and forth through the circular storm of the underground room; the eye of it was almost too far away to find through the sweaty, cheering skeletons — red hair flashed through the neon lights, regardless.

“The Port Mafia has a tendency to take in all rejects — the younger, the better. A magnanimous vein, perhaps — Or an understanding that subtlety is at the base of success. Two kids would go unnoticed, if they infiltrated,” He shrugged. “Plus, I heard their Boss is a creep.”

“And you’re supposed to fuck the weirdo?” Akamine made a face. “Can’t say I see your little friend being successful. Men don’t like it when they bite.”

A wet crunch! filled the room, followed by the crack of a snapped bone and a groan of agony. The crowd went crazy, victory and defeat alike, throwing money lost and gained towards the makeshift ring. A man grabbed Chuuya’s wrist, raising his arm with a roar.

He pointedly lacked the sea of bruises, scratches and bleeding wounds the man gasping on the ground was covered in — and his unnaturally bent leg. Lowering his head to toss his hair back, Chuuya offered a slightly confused grin to the crowd, sweaty shirt barely hiding the Port Mafia tattoo on his chest.

“I suppose not,” he agreed, tipping the hat that had been abandoned on his head.

“You could work something out, though,” She had entire portions of her skin littered in tattoos — snakes and thorns and flowers, and a spider right under her eyes. A cross, somewhere inside her. “Heard their Boss was a doctor. Maybe he’s got a sickly child fetish. Have you ever slept, kid?”

“Last time I tried to kill myself,” he offered. Another competitor jogged to the ring; Chuuya licked his teeth. Dazai tapped his coat, where he had pocketed the money from the evening.

At least the dog has a use, he considered.

“Anyway, we’ll probably infiltrate the side that deals with trading,” he continued. “Ace, I think the Executive’s name is?”

“GSS is already taking care of interrupting the trades, though,” Akamine considered, unaware of his silent memorization. “They could take the Mafia’s place in the oversea market, with a little push. And taking it from GSS will be plenty easier.”

“Always found them a bit pathetic,” Chuuya flipped his opponent to the ground. “Didn’t they join forces with that ridiculous kid street gang?”

“The Sheep?” She snorted. “The lost boys went their separate ways months ago. A weird move from GSS, yeah, but they did hold control over Suribachi. And when their King was with them, I could understand the appeal.”

“A King?”

“A devil,” Akamine leaned closer, lowering her voice to say: “You know, there are voices the little shit joined the Port Mafia.”

She was rather pretty. The dip of her hips was covered in ink — she had that calculating look women usually wore when faced with Dazai. A mixture of assessment and discomfort; eyes tracing the bow of his lip and his bony wrists, fingers searching for sharpness.

“Say,” he mused. “How would you feel about a double suicide?”

Chuuya slammed his opponent against one of the rock pillars inside the fighting circle; it should have been impossible, but it still shook the entire room.

Distractedly — annoyed by the way his head had been snapped away from his question — Dazai wondered if the bitter-faced legions of suited men Mori had offered them had felt the impact too.

If his plans were being followed — which was a guarantee only in the name of commutative fear, given the sneering his involuntary voice crack had caused — they should have currently been massacrating guards from the Nine Rings with Black Hounds weapons. An excuse to start a fire somewhere the Mafia wasn’t.

It would take a while. Thus, he and Chuuya could take care of their side gig.

“Double suicide?” Akamine was frowning, still, as if sure the rumble of the ecstatic crowd had created a misunderstanding. Her expert eyes ran down the pills Dazai was shaking into his palm. “Don’t recognize those.”

Dazai shook the pill bottle, instead of clapping, as Chuuya snapped his opponent’s arm. “Kids need their vitamins.”

“Even kids who want to kill themselves?”

“Especially!”

She pressed a little closer. “How did she find the two of you? The Nine Rings are mostly old fanatics and vengeful widows.”

“You’re not either, though.”

“I’m not, no. Thank you for noticing.”

He paused, given that every wasted second made the possibility of Chuuya being punched more realistic. “How did you end up here?”

Akamine made a face. “Got kidnapped when I was little,” she said, around the mouth of a beer. “Sold around. Found out people worshipped whatever fool got ahold of a sigil. Ended up here, because it sounded fucking cool.”

“What did?” Dazai curled an eyebrow. “The pseudo-cultism of it all?”

“You tell me. Or were you just looking for a place where your friend would get to kick as many idiots to the face as he wanted?”

“Something like that.”

Amusement curled her lips up. “And what were you two brats doing before coming here?”

Dazai watched a spat teeth roll between shoes and throwing-up drunks on all fours, until it was mercilessly crushed under a heel. Green neon lights shone down the side of Chuuya’s curved frame — the bullet scar he had given him glistened like ivy.

“Ah, we’ve been very busy,” he offered.

[“How come you didn’t feel that coming?” Chuuya frowned, dragging Okano Goro’s — ex member of the Port Mafia Intelligence; eight fingers cut off for his wrongdoings; just vigil enough to steal Dazai’s gun from his hands and shoot himself in the forehead before they could get their hands on him — away.]

“Oh, I’m sorry,” Dazai muttered, pulling the corpse to their stolen car by the legs. “Because I’m the one who went to check the wines in the cupboard.”

Okano barely fit in the hood. Trying to push his legs inside and keep his head still took several tries and most of their patience; when he slammed the hood shut, he almost snapped

Chuuya's hand in two with it. Would have been a shame, given their matching scars.

Dazai had officially been banned from touching a wheel; Chuuya drove instead. They took the body to the nearest dumping site that wasn't his, and they sat on the ground with cigarettes stolen from the corpse's pockets, watching him burn from the flame of Hirotsu's stolen lighter.

"Nice work, partner," he concluded, just to be annoying.

"Don't call me that," Chuuya snapped. "Who's next?"]

[Kitagawa Usagi was a low rank drug dealer — a fifty years old woman who lived in a makeshift tent in an alley near Yamashita Park. While their squad took care of the Knights, they had sneaked away — only to have the woman impale herself on a loose piece of the metal fence as soon as she had seen them.

Dazai scribbled her picture out of Chuuya's wall, using red sauce from the take-out kebab they had ordered.

"That seems a bit," Chuuya started saying. The smell of food distracted him soon enough.

The missions had led to more and more time spent in the hole-in-the-wall the boy called his home. The sight of empty floors, green thread, and the ripped pages from astrophysics books that Chuuya had, for some reason, the tendency to hang on his ceiling had slowly become more and more familiar.

It had led to unusual discoveries.

Chuuya slept on his stomach, at all and any times, unless he had to keep an eye on Dazai — relegated to the floor on the other side of his futon-occupied room. Sleep, of course, was a rough definition for both of them — whereas Dazai had a tendency to turn on every home appliance and spray water at him the moment he heard him snore, Chuuya had gone through the issue of connecting speakers to the bike in his garage, making it roar as soon as Dazai's head touched the pillow.

For good measure, he bought his own speakers, assembled with disco neon lights.

Chuuya woke up as soon as the sun appeared in the sky, no matter if the curtains were shut. He scrubbed the letter N off any and all romaji written text he encountered. Sometimes he got stuck in a series of short, involuntary blinks, that he apparently calmed down by pinching a specific spot near his fourth rib. He only ate half of any meal he was given, and would allow Dazai to steal off his plate after seven-point-five slaps.

He had a lot of scars. Whenever a mission was miraculously treacherous enough to scratch them, some shade of chronic pain would settle his legs on the floor and grit his teeth to destruction — refusing to let him move. Refusing to be helped, too.

Dazai would whine until he got to lay down with him with reports he would force him to do. For good measure, they cracked the screen of his console, going back and forth.

“Celebrating the dead means disrespecting them, sometimes,” Dazai reminded him. They were eating on the floor. Chuuya had spent the entire evening insisting he left. Dazai left pieces of food under the few actual pieces of furniture in the house; Chuuya caused him an mild allergic reaction by adding too much spice in his food in secret.

“In fact, I think she’d be happy for us.”].

[The highlight of Horiuchi Shigeru’s failure was the ruined deck of cards Dazai found in the Hall of his apartment complex, waiting for him to come home.

“Chuuya wasn’t particularly impressed with my magic tricks,” he sighed, later that day, to some of their subordinates, knuckles white around their rifles. They did all hate when he got jovial; it was usually followed by an execution “But I did see him attempt to change an Eight of Hearts into a King of Flowers, at one point. So he just sucks.”

It took the CEO five hours to make his way into the building, three women in his arms and a face that seemed to have met Death and bargained more times than it was comfortable.

He was the closest call — Chuuya managed to sink his fist in a non-vital portion of his body before he could smash his head against the desk; Dazai had spent two days sneaking into the apartment to get rid of any and all possibly lethal substances and weapons.

It didn’t stop Horiuchi from pulling the golden collar on one of his terrified women’s throats, and offering no expression when an entire portion of the skyscraper blew up.

They landed inside the private pool of whichever tycoon lived downstairs, floating inside the unsalted water for infinite seconds. Jumping out of a window was pretty high on the list of suicide methods Dazai kept — it seemed a good way to go. The idea of flying was an enchanting one — in his mind, though, the sound his bones would make against the concrete seemed painful.

They climbed out, sighing and shivering, praying that the useful documents on trades Horiuchi had been helping the Nine Rings with would survive. The sky was flames.

In a rather unusual show of tact, Chuuya did not ask about the smile he had seen appear on Dazai’s face as they fell].

[Konya Maki; prostitute, snapped her own neck. Uyemura Tadashi; an untalented serial killer who’d jumped out of the window and then ripped himself out of Chuuya’s grip when he’d followed him. Tsutsumi Akira; thirteen years old and prey to the monsters of the Yokohama’s train station where he slept — whose stolen Nintendo DS had disappeared with him when he’d gotten himself run over by a train.

“Hey,” Chuuya called. “What did you mean?”

Without interrupting his Hopscotch on top of the abandoned train compartments, attempting his best to reach the electrical wires with his fingers, he said: “You’ll need to be more specific. I don’t speak dog.”

He dangled his legs over the edge of the train, studying the two rats running across the blood stain on the tracks. “When you said the Sheep asked you to join. You were bullshitting me, right?”

“Not at all,” He twirled Chuuya’s stolen hat in a finger, hopping on one leg. “Is it so hard to believe your Sheep might have hidden something from you?”

Chuuya made a face. Yes. “Whatever. Tell me.”

He jumped forward, barely managing not to lose his balance. Transactional in nature, Mori liked to say. “If you tell me what you saw in Dante’s limbo.”

Unmatching eyes stared him down. Sunrise made the amber one seem too strangely bright; a glass cage someone was always knocking behind. He wondered if there was a difference between a real god and one made of codes; if it was all in a name, and the way Chuuya sometimes reacted when their skins came into contact.

Chuuya was weird with touch.

He was weird with everything, to be fair — he refused to buy pricey shampoo, and hoarded food like winter was coming, and got half of his pay removed for property damages in advance. But he always left space between them when they sat; and he pulled at his gloves, whenever Dazai was near — as if to calm down an itch. An itch to reach out.

Perhaps that was Dante’s limbo, he considered. An infinite landscape; an underground lab. All of it — the space itself; the gravity he ruled; his brother’s hands — touching him, and refusing to let go.

“Race you home,” he concluded.

They crossed out three more pictures on the wall. Chuuya, last he heard, did not go to any of the funerals.]

“Hey, why the bandages, anyway?” Akamine asked, with the tone of someone who had had to repeat herself a few times. Dazai blinked. “Did you get that fucked up?”

“I got my eye ripped out,” Chuuya was a black and red dot, shirt covered in dust and strangers’ blood. The other man had managed to land at least a hit, it seemed; his lower lip was broken, liquid ruby dripping down his chin and onto the floor.

Dazai met his eyes right as he sunk his elbow in the man’s nose; he put a finger under his visible eye and pulled the skin down, mocking. “Say, sweetheart, you don’t happen to have heard anything about a supposed Poet?”

She offered him a curled eyebrow at the name; but her stiffened shoulders were impossible to mistake. “You may want to lower your voice,” she said, glancing around. “Some people are really into that street myth. Gullible enough to believe any of us could ever be sent to Heaven.”

“So that’s what the whispers say?”

A huff. “Promised help to any and all desperate souls, or something. It’s probably drugs, if you wanna hear my opinions. But I’ve got some stuff that could actually bring you to Heaven.”

Dazai blinked. “You think it’s a prank?”

“Of course it’s a prank,” Akamine made a face. “Listen, kid, the Nine Rings are a nice enough bunch. Alright? You seem smart, and your little boyfriend is surely strong enough to get you by. Don’t get tempted by shady shit. Life fucking sucks, but you can make it work.”

He wondered if she was lying to herself, or to him. Could Dante change one’s personality? Arise a wave of unexpected optimism? Perhaps she had been a hypocrite even before the brink of death.

“Of course,” he conceded. “Don’t worry. Hold my drink for a moment?”

A sweat-matted Chuuya had officially defeated his sixth opponent of the night. Pushing through the enthusiastic bodies forcing money in his palms was an experience of its own right; luckily, Dazai could see the advantages in being just another body in the crowd.

He found him crunched on the ground, ignoring the hands patting his shoulders, as some men carried the bloodied victim away. “Good game!” Dazai explained, with his fakest smile. “I knew you could do it.”

Chuuya had to do a double take, frozen with his mouth around a water bottle. They had offered him alcohol, but ever since the Beatrice Accident, he had been spending too much time looking at wine catalogues. “Yeah,” he said, slowly. “Thanks, man.”

Still smiling, he kneeled in front of him. “That last hook you did was something,” He wouldn’t say what. “Are your knuckles broken? You should get rid of the gloves.”

Keeping up the small talk for the sake of the curious eyes, he pledged his hand to the sacrifice of touching Chuuya’s damp skin — brushing the cut on his lip. “That’s nasty,” he taunted. “I thought you were supposed to be untouchable.”

With his thumb, he tapped, lose the next one.

His eyes widened a fraction. He wrapped his fingers around his wrist. “I am, asshole. You’d be dead meat after the first hit.”

What? Why?

Bet money on your loss, he tapped. Ruin. Not. My winning streak.

“I heard they’re bringing out a guy called the Demolisher,” Somebody behind them whistled. Pretend to get hurt, I don’t care. We need to get her out. “Feeling up for the challenge, Slug?”

“Obviously.” I hope you die.

Get me my money. He stood up, patting his head, and got a punch in the knee for his trouble. I'll pay for dinner.

"You're a filthy fucking liar," Chuuya snapped, as they dragged him towards the ring again. "You've never paid for goddamn dinner once —"

[It was, fundamentally, a lie. Dazai had paid for dinner exactly once, obliged by the circumstances. As it went, only he knew where the phone in Mori's office backroom — a clinic of sorts, with a single Hospital bed and strange butterfly stickers taped to the wall — rested.

"You should be thankful," Dazai made sure to say, curled where he was with his console at the foot of the bed. Chuuya had gotten the pillow, because Mori clearly had a favorite — despite the both of them being littered in the aftermath of a badly disarmed bomb. "The older one is supposed to pay for everything."

"I don't even know when your birthday is," the other boy replied — like he didn't really care, but had needed a rebuttal.

"Guess."

"I'm not gonna fucking guess —"

"Then pay!"

The console was the least bloodied thing they had seen in weeks. The half-eaten chicken between their legs would not be finished. His foot attempted to grab his nose. Dazai retched, pushing it away, grabbing his other ankle to pull him down the bed, choking on the kick he received between his own legs.

Chuuya pulled onto a bird-shaped charm from his phone and said: "The Flags never let me pay for shit. Unfortunately for you, I'm not them."

Nothing said in such circumstances — their mud-dirty socks attempting to get stuck in each other's mouths, spicy sauce on the sheets Mori would make them wash by hand, and the intoxicating smell of blood from the wound the doctor had burned as Dazai watched Chuuya's pupils grow — should have sounded quite so grievous.

Chuuya didn't even know his birthday, he thought.

"You owe me seven tickets at the Arcade," Dazai warned, like it was a favor. Chuuya punched him.].

The slight difference between watching Chuuya lose and watching him do his best not to win was a thorny road, boring in nature. Dazai accepted Akamine's newest beer, and enjoyed it all the same.

If the woman found his enthusiasm at the sight of the boy going down bizarre, she didn't do much more than offer him sidelong glances. Soon enough — though longer than it had taken any of Chuuya's opponents, given that he was a petty child — the crowd roared their disappointment, watching their champion dramatically land to the ground.

They carried Chuuya to the stairs, one arm around each of their necks. Dazai got his money; Chuuya got to not move a finger.

See? We all win, he tapped on his wrist.

Subtly, the boy raised a middle finger.

The heavy stone walls of the stairs muffled the chaos from the fighting ring, dragging the upcoming Spring wind down their sweat-matted skin. The chains in Akamine's clothes dangled melodically along.

"Thank you for the help," Dazai told her, once the door had been kicked open, and the end road of abandoned warehouses welcomed them in. "Bit of a lightweight, this one. In all senses. Right, partner?"

Chuuya stepped on his foot. The lower half of his face was covered in blood from the broken nose he had allowed his opponent to give him.

Chuckling, Akamine moved closer to the one light pole in sight, as if trying to finally get a good look at both of them. "You're younger than I thought."

"What's with age and criminals?" he lamented, tapping his thumb on Chuuya's waist. "Since you're so worried about darling little us, though, you're more than welcome to call us a taxi."

It was a cheap trick; he assumed that was why it worked. Make it quick, he always underlined Mori's strategies with. Don't let them remember. A figured out trick is a trick you can't use anymore. Akamine huffed, grasping her phone from her pocket. The well oiled machine of Dazai's latest toy was brought to life, erupting with a vicious spark.

Chuuya's hand dashed under his coat, fingers closing around his gun.

Akamine's parting lips and widening eyes followed the motion as he threw it into the air, too busy dealing with the immediate follow-up of the boy's body onto hers to focus on the landing.

Gloved fingers sunk in her throat, lighting both of their bodies up in red. Their feet dug a new road in the concrete, gravity sinking the woman down until the bones of her legs snapped. Dazai reached his hand out, waiting until the gun landed on his palm.

"Your timing was off," he commented, jabbing the mouth of the weapon into the back of her skull. "I'll give your throw a seven, also."

"Your distraction was stupid," Chuuya replied, sinking his fingers into her carotid. "And you need to be quicker with the damn gun."

"How come?"

“They need to feel threatened immediately, or instinctual fear will have them kicking. That’s the whole point of Lie of the Fake Flowers. ”

Dazai almost dropped the gun, exasperated. “For the last time,” he spelled out. “Lie of the Fake Flowers is fake-death under the eyes of sobbing fools. This is Rain Behind the Window. ”

“No, it isn’t, ” Chuuya snapped. “Rain Behind the Window is pretend to be the enemy but don’t shoot above the waist, unless forced, and prepare to be punished for it. ”

“That’s so prolific — And that’s Shame and — “

“Shame and Toad is height disadvantage but don’t call it being short — Are you actually obtuse? ”

“What’s with the big words?” Dazai widened his eyes. “Should we thank Dante? Kouyou will cry. ”

“You — “ Chuuya inhaled through his nose. He massaged the bridge of his nose with the gun. “Can we get on with it?”

“Sure, if you’re a coward,” He tapped the gun on her neck. “Do you reckon she could escape, at the moment?”

The line of Akamine’s spine was rigid. Her fingers had sunk into the chasm of the concrete, out of desperation; when Chuuya tapped two fingers on the side of her neck, and snapped his head to the side — her throat-caged bones followed.

“No,” the boy cursed. “I reckon she’s already dead.”

With practice ease, he stared up. “What?”

With a tsk!, Chuuya slammed his foot on the woman’s chest, releasing her from the puppeteer strings of his Ability. Her body dropped all crookedly, pupils-blown eyes staring up at the sky. Something sandy and fetid dropped from her mouth, sticking to her lip ring.

Dazai pocketed his gun, sighing. “Overdose.”

”Out of nowhere? ” Chuuya kicked her side; then, courteously, he extracted her from the concrete. “You didn’t notice anything in her mouth while you charmed your way into a shared grave?”

“She was clearly high,” he replied, sniffing, crossing his arms to focus on a non-mortified part of his body. “Given she spent the night talking about her job, I expected her to be used to the daze.”

Embarrassingly obvious. Each death they had witnessed had been somewhat in character for the subject. The same old problem resurfaced, still — how did the Souls always seem to know when they would come, and prepared accordingly?

“The suicidal maniac can’t stop people from killing themselves,” Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “This must be a slap on the face, ah?”

“I’m maturely taking this adventure as a learning experience,” Dazai waved the matter away. “Even the Suicide Guide, despite its merits, will grow obsolete, eventually.”

He stared. “The what to what?”

Delighted by the opportunity to rant about his latest expense to someone who had somehow missed the memo, Dazai refused to shut up all the way to their extraction point with the squad.

A mixture of Dazai’s Secret Force Unit and the side of Kouyou’s men that was most familiar with working with Chuuya was waiting for them, carrying badly covered corpses to the SUVs at the entrance — the least antagonistic group they had managed to form through the bitter-eyed rows of the syndicate.

Sticking out like odd flowers, a few men that had never fought with either of them were muttering between themselves. The sea of black and Kevlar jackets didn’t even bend at the knees; they did exchange heavy glances when they stopped in front of them.

“Report,” Chuuya ordered, going straight for business.

“Did you and the Demon fight?” a voice snickered, somewhere near the cars. Most of the men hadn’t even stopped what they were doing. Yawning, Dazai twirled around the string of Chuuya’s deteriorating patience, playing Hopscotch. “Can’t believe the psycho actually got a mean punch.”

“The day Dazai lands a punch on me is the day I’m dead,” the boy corrected him. “I’m sure he would do a wonderful job with some of you spineless jerks, though. Now, if you will — report.”

“Everything went smoothly,” a woman replied, flippantly, holding a piece of fabric to her bleeding temple. “As our commanders would have known, had they been there.”

“The Boss did appoint us, ” Dazai confirmed, mid-jump. “Which means we get to know all the little secrets cattle don’t know.”

“Don’t call them cattle,” Chuuya warned. Then: “Maybe next time presume we’re busy with something a bit more relevant than shooting a few bastards down. Unless that was difficult?”

A few murmurs. “Sanitation and wide scale shootouts are the easiest Port Mafia protocol,” he continued, almost losing his balance. “But I will be happy to let Mori know his men need two brats to vigil over their jobs,” Under the thunder-texture of their glares, Dazai clasped his hands. “Now, something a bit more detailed? Don’t be shy.”

Someone cleared their throat.

“H-Half of the cargoes were blown up, as you requested,” Koda Katsumi stuttered, cleaning the neck of his rifle with a bloodstained cloth. “Part of the squad is currently driving the remaining ones to section 37 of the Port. The boat should leave by morning.”

His name had unwillingly gotten stuck in the back of Dazai’s head — he was one of the few mafiosi who weren’t actively, and not even subtly, organizing an assassination behind their backs. Even worse — he was a friend of Chuuya’s.

“So the deal with Le Directour is fine,” Chuuya muttered. “Let’s hope they don’t do a background check on the weapons.”

“It’s the black market, Slug,” Dazai reminded him. “No one does background checks.”

“Well, I do. And that’s why our weapons are always the good ones. ”

“Weren’t you on the jewelry team?”

“The j-jewelry team takes care of the chemical weapon market too, sir. Since last year,” Koda spoke up. When he turned to look at him, he added: “Sir.”

He was a short man, which was a reasonable explanation for his friendship with Chuuya. Dazai vaguely remembered his pale, freckled features and blond hair from the first days of Mori’s reign; someone who had survived the shift, no matter his whole — deal.

Koda, for the little Dazai had seen of him, seemed perpetually on the verge of a panic attack. Eyes plastered on people’s chins; hands wrapped so tightly around his weapons they shook with effort. For some reason, Chuuya seemed to find it entertaining

“Yes, thank you, Koda,” the boy said, pointedly. “The numbers?”

Dazai spent the time of the full report meeting every stubbornly skeptical gaze thrown his way. Most eyes lowered; some pretended to look around. Still, he considered — and subtly, so not hiding a thing, since those people wouldn’t care if he started doing cartwheels, he put a hand on Chuuya’s back.

Stiffened shoulders motioned understanding.

“Tomorrow, then. You already know where,” the boy declared, muffling conversations. Without a blink, he added: “Noguchi, you might want to know that we aren’t leaving in the car we came with.”

Utter, breathless silence fell.

A buzzed head appeared through the parting crowd — being not even the seventh time the man was called out, Dazai suspected they had all started expecting at least one reprimand per mission.

“Ah?” he spat out, munching on a cigarette. He had dropped his extravagantly muscled body on the nearest wooden box, hands fiddling with a taser. When he turned it on, bluish sparks illuminated golden teeth and a fish-bone tattoo down his left eye, covering a scar. “The fuck do I care?”

“Just thought you might be interested,” Dazai intervened. “The fireteam is using the SUV.”

“You know,” Chuuya concluded. “In case you didn’t want to blow their asses up.”

Murmurs spread like a wildfire, followed by the most awkward exchange of glances he’d yet seen through their unwilling squads. Koda blushed to the root of his hair.

Noguchi threw his cigarette to the ground, looking as unbothered as possible. For a newbie — according to his research, he had been recruited in October, and passed from squad to squad until some accident involving his latest commander — he seemed to wildly disapprove of the concept of authority.

The first time they had showed up, he had walked up to them — plastered so close to their faces Dazai could see the scar lines underneath his tattoo.

“My most sincere apologies,” Noguchi said. “I really don’t know what you mean.”

“That’s a shame,” Dazai matched his golden smile with a wide one of his own. A bit louder: “Everybody, please, offer your deepest condolences to our fire team. It is, after all, the last time we see them.”

The glances of the crowd sharpened.

Chuuya’s sigh interrupted the staring match. “Whatever,” he muttered. “Tomorrow. Don’t be late. Be sure to pass by the Infirmary, and stay there.”

On their way out, Dazai made sure to brush one palm down the hood of the vehicle he was sure no one would ride. He met Noguchi’s eyes over the roof; waved, cheerful.

“You’ve got to work on your spelling,” Chuuya hissed to him. “You wrote atomic bomb. Why the fuck would Noguchi put an atomic bomb under our car?”

“Have you seen how he looks at us?” Dazai justified. The man still had his eyes on them; unsubtle, Chuuya coughed in his fist, raising a middle finger. “It was a sensible mistake.”

---

...

---

Two weeks prior to the funeral.

In a more human shape, Dazai detested dogs.

The sound of their claws against the ground curled and echoed in hollow bones, as irritating as an itch his arms couldn't quite reach. Fear had never truly been an option — as a child, watching a muzzle peek from the dining table, he had gone for despise.

Strays always pooled wherever the Port Mafia brought its deals, begging for food they didn't have and growling rather impolitely when unsatisfied. Most of all, dogs detested Dazai back.

"Ugly mutt," he hissed, glaring at the beast a few inches from his face, over the shaking metal fence, rattled by his paws with all their might. The crowd around the ring was roaring their approval. "Can't wait to watch them put you down."

Pressed against him in the sweaty darkness of flickering alley lights, painting a distinctively hostile canva, Chuuya slapped his nape.

"What do you even have against them?" he challenged, one hand still barely keeping itself from reaching through the bars to pet. "Want to take their place, asshole? I'd gladly watch you get put down."

"So would I," Dazai blinked. "That's the whole point. I don't understand how you keep forgetting it."

"They treat the poor creatures like shit," Chuuya insisted, undeterred, eyes digging flames into the men in black directing clearly drugged dogs inside the ring. The one he stared at the most would have been taller than the boy making heart eyes at him, if standing. "Shirase was obsessed with dog fights. He knew a guy. Did you know they stop feeding them for days at a time if they refuse to attack their pups?"

It was astonishing, he considered — just how easily a five foot tall creature could make his blood boil.

"We kill people," he reminded him, because few beings were as unapologetically destructive as Nakahara Chuuya. "You just smashed a guy's skull in with a pipe, ten minutes ago. Yesterday, you set fire to a makeshift clinic at the underground border. But making dogs fight is where you draw the line?"

"People can be blamed," Chuuya replied, too blank to be joking. "Retaliation is necessary."

"That wasn't retaliation. That was an attack first strategy. We are no Sheep," And his morale, his old sheep song — kill only if hurt first — had no place in the Port Mafia. For some reason, Chuuya had accepted to bend it for Mori's sake.

"Dogs have never done shit to anybody," he said.

"Mutt lover," he concluded. "Of course. You're one of them, after all."

And how unfair it was, he didn't say — that Dazai lacked the something to truly despise them; that his bones felt too distant from it all; and if he didn't have a favorite, how was he going to have a least one? How unfair it was, that Chuuya had floated in a mad scientist's fist, only so different from Mori's own, and yet he still had space in that stolen ribcage to —

Their in-ears buzzed.

“All in position,” a woman announced. The metal fence shook with such violence that the entire first row had to take a step back; the jaws of a dog filled his vision, as the beast struggled uselessly against the chain stuck to the ground. “S-Sirs,” Koda added.

“Adorable,” Dazai murmured, watching the beasts foam at the mouth as they looked at each other.

“Yes, thank you, Koda,” Chuuya made sure to say. “Stay put until we say so. We need to check on one of them personally.”

“Who?” another voice asked. “It wasn’t part of the plan.”

“Don’t worry about it,” Dazai replied. One of the managers — a member of the Hounds, judging by the tattoo behind his ear — threw a piece of meat right at the center of the ring, too far to reach. Four Nine Rings men pushed against the crowd, nailing the chains holding the dogs tighter. “You better have eyes on the other dog’s cages.”

“Dazai is a scaredy cat,” Chuuya explained.

“And Chuuya is about to get devoured by his favorite pets — who don’t even like him,” he replied, blankly. The chains were removed. “How entertaining it will be.”

The lighting-fast bundle of moving fur was a void to stare into, but Dazai couldn’t keep his eyes away. The dogs jumped to the sole piece of meat the moment they were released; their eyes frantic and their muzzles desperate, sinking their teeth in whatever was at reach — air, food, other dogs, themselves.

The crowd appeared on the verge of a similar madness, pushing and crawling and dragging the fence closer, cursing out lost bets and falling for blood. The glance Chuuya pierced them with spoke clearly — he would have enjoyed exchanging them with the dogs much more.

Men, at least, he considered, didn’t hesitate before biting down.

“Seven’s gonna win,” he whispered, keeping his eyes on the devastated stage. “Youngest and hungriest.”

Said dog clenched his fangs around Three’s neck, pulling and pulling, unbothered by Eleven’s nails in his side. Fourteen laid on the ground, exhausted, until the managers slipped a taser between the bars.

Grimace tightening his fists until the gloves creaked, Chuuya snapped: “This proves what I said about you needing a few combat lessons.”

“You’re still on that?”

“You hate pain,” he insisted. “I don’t believe you when you say you got beat up on purpose — “

“Black Widow is filled with gossipers,” Dazai brushed the matter away. “It was useful. No need for you to cry over my ouchies.”

“Who the fuck is crying?” A disgusted glance. “I’m just scared of what people will say if I’m seen fighting with a walking scarecrow.”

“In case you haven’t noticed, no one in the syndicate has enough guts or sanity to give me a karate belt,” A pause. Mori had been angry enough over that unplanned detour to the Black Widow; he had locked the cabinet with the exotic poisons. So — “In any case, I broke into your apartment for painkillers.”

Eleven threw Three against the fence, rattling it over the roars. Chuuya squinted, stuck in a glare for that last sentence. Something passed by his eyes, too quick to pause — something he didn’t say.

“Well,” he muttered. “Fourteen. ”

“Of course you’d bet on the underdog,” Dazai groaned, annoyed. “You’re so predictable, it’s not even amusing. And amusement is the main and sole reason why I accepted to be your partner —“

“We’re not partners,” Chuuya replied. “This is a temporary collaboration. You should look for old ass Mochizuki.”

“He’s not going to turn up until Seven rips the other apart. He bet on it, remember? We spent three hours spying on his Hotel room.”

Chuuya clicked his tongue. “You think Seven’s too young to accept to die?”

“Somewhat, yeah.”

“Aren’t you being hypocritical?”

“That’s a dog,” Dazai said, slow and helpful, as if talking to an idiot. Kicking one of his combat boots to direct his gaze down, Dazai twirled his fingers in the air, signing: I’m a real boy, now, father.

Unmatching eyes traced every motion, rapt, one only brighter than the other in purpose. As bored as he pretended to be about Dazai’s response to his lack of understanding of traditional codes, — learning an offensive amount of them — the root of their every interaction was a challenge, and Chuuya would never back away from those.

Perhaps he hoped not to repeat Rengoku. Perhaps he was glad not to have to admit his lacks in ink strokes. Perhaps he just hated losing.

Since coded messages weren’t new — and Chuuya had a repertoire of mostly useless skills from his year in the streets; while Dazai had endless knowledge on things that were only alive in a bored child’s game — they had decided to take a dip into originality

[“Russian?” Chuuya echoed, peeking under his kitchen table, where Dazai was training his hands in a mixture of French, Japanese and Russian sign language — not easily detectable, he had explained, to a very skeptical Chuuya, who had eventually picked it up like a native. “Why Russian?”

“My nanny taught me Russian,” he replied. “Did you find the book?”

His head bumped against the wood. “You had a nanny?”

“And an unicorn named Cindy, yes.”

Chuuya huffed. “Figures, asshole. You expect me to believe you didn’t, like — spawn from the shivering hellfire or something? I can see you as the pissy rich little prince, though.”

The question made his lips quiver. The curiosity on his traits was more open than it had ever been; Dazai fumbled for a way to use it, and yawned behind the cover of the French textbook.

“I’m not an orphan,” he said, finally.

Skepticism made him squint. “Yeah, right.”

“No, seriously.”

“Yeah, right. How would someone with a family end up in the Port Mafia?”

“How does an eight years old get a funeral first thing after he joins the Sheep?”

Chuuya’s mouth opened, then fell shut again. He concluded: “Bad luck, I guess.”

Balance, he told himself.

“What’s ‘blood’, in Japanese?” he asked.]

Morse code had been somewhat touchy. Dazai had refused to teach the standard on principle; instead, they had personalized knocks and light sequences.

They had spent an entire night memorizing it, playing with the only two lampshades in his apartment or kicking their shoes on the broken pipes of The Alley. They had barely managed a full conversation as the sun rose behind the floor-to-ceiling windows — for some karmic reason, it was the trick they were having the most trouble picking up.

[Was it really necessary?” Dazai questioned, as they watched the piece of paper burn on the stove. Chuuya had no pans to put it in.

“No point in breaking our heads over it, if anyone can find it and figure it out,” he replied, as if obvious. Perhaps it was. Dazai hadn’t slept in three days.

They watched the flames.

Chuuya's apartment hummed. It was a constant buzz; a mixture of electrical wires and the faucets Dazai always turned on when the boy was distracted. He had never lingered in a place that wasn't metal and vacancy; those walls were just as naked, but the sharp tone of the boy's barks filled the corners.

And he hadn't even noticed the DOG #1 print he had stuck to his coffee cup yet.

The boy moved to grab one of the lamps they had dragged into the living room, scoring the walls for a free outlet. The skin under his eyes was blue, and tiredness got in the way of his desire to bash Dazai with it. "You up for one more try, before I kick you out?"

Not quite a lie, just a fool's valiant attempt. There was a spot on his bedroom floor with a curled up blanket and a pillow with little fish drawn on it — a joke by Albatross' hands, Chuuya had scoffed. Fits you just fine. Dazai only walked back home when he started picking at his bandages — or when the disco-lights speakers got thrown out of the window.

Dazai ended up under the table, holding his lamp like a guitar; Chuuya floated in the air with a smaller one, connected to the outlet on the ceiling. They shut the curtains; one used the lamp, the other knocked on the floor — then, switch.

Pettiness made the process slow.

"Favorite. School. Trip?"

"Is. That. Reason. You. Learned. That. Word?"

"Not. Answer."

"What. See. D-A-N-T-E. Limbo?"

He went home that night, because despite his best attempts, the slide of Chuuya's eyes down his spine — a bit calculating, but in a sort of innocent way; sharp like a pocket knife, dirtier than his streets — wasn't worth the damage. He collapsed in his bed, unable to sleep.

In the stillness of his refuge, where no one would understand and the one person who could wasn't around, he tapped his fingers on the boy's stolen photograph.]

Tracing kanji on reachable skin, because Kouyou was still insisting on the calligraphy, and they didn't speak about the way Dazai would nudge him towards the correct reading of a word; blinking codes they had made up stuck in a SUV to the Nine Rings' ships, because mistrusting squads were listening; titles of their least favorite Hirose Fumiko's songs, because they lacked originality in some things.

"Fourteen," Chuuya insisted, grimacing at the blood-splattered floor inside the ring.

"That's a stupid bet," he insisted, over the low barks and whines. "Seven is —"

"What do I get if I win?"

*Transactional*ity, he thought. As familiar as the hat Chuuya had stubbornly picked up again. “What do you want?”

“What would you give me?”

“What would you take?” he insisted.

A pause. “A favor.”

Oh-oh, Dazai thought, suddenly interested. His eyes surveyed the cage with newfound illumination; he came to a different conclusion. And now?

Curiosity or pride?, Mori questioned, with that tilt that meant he was smiling. Always amused by what he was willing to give up in the name of a quicker heartbeat.

“Fine,” Dazai concluded, loss in his pockets. He pressed two fingers on his in-ear, eyes on a man making his way through the crowd. “Get ready.”

They had studied that one specific dance down to the detail. Dazai felt no need to check around; as disliked as the two of them were, Mori never offered men who could not do their job.

It was born quietly — barely a whisper in his ear, tickling the skin of his neck. Through goosebumps, his eyes studied the dogs on the other side of the fence — the ones caged behind it, dozens, waiting for their turn. His fingers twitched around a gun that wasn’t there. The world felt taller.

Devastation came in two shapes: bullets from a rifle, and the lockets landing on the ground.

Tainted painted bright blood traces on the walls, gifting a terrifying background to the running shadows of the dogs and the falling jaws of the crowd. He ducked, hands in pockets, and took a flight to the buildings caging them in.

Dazai didn’t move.

The escaping crowd almost tore him off his feet, pushing at his shoulders over the sound of their own shrieks, the beasts salivating at their calves. It was all a house of cards, and the wind had woken up with vengeance in its lungs. Dazai didn’t move, and bullets began falling from the hidden men in black through the windows, never touching him.

He met the eyes of one of the dogs.

A hand was grabbing his calf, crazed eyes and scratches, begging for something he couldn’t hear. The dog was missing its right eye; it growled so viciously its entire body was shaking along with it, steps strangely controlled through the storm of its brothers in arms devouring the men who hadn’t been fast enough to escape.

The smell was intolerable. Dazai didn’t move.

What a painful way to die, he considered, with a bit of a whine. The dog was always under the table, no matter the polished tiles, begging for food. He would kick it with no mercy; it would smile, almost. What a —

“Dazai!”

The pain didn’t register, at first; since Mori and his lessons weren’t to be wasted, it didn’t register when he lowered his eyes to the rope whipping his wrist — an attempt to drag — either.

He stared at it, watching it dangle uselessly — petty in its impossibility; aiming to hurt where it could not give results. Kick, if not keep out. Dazai stepped on the man’s wrist, ran to the trash bins, and he jumped, hands around the window seals, teeth snapping at his ankles.

Natural agility did what his lacking strength couldn’t offer. By the time both his feet had landed on a protruding corner of the framing buildings, the dogs only had a defeated look to offer him — before going back to the hell under their soles, ripped off flesh and wandering viscera, wet noises over the screams.

Nine Rings corpses, on the ground.

A hand wrapped around his collar, pulling him forward. “Where the fuck is your gun?” Chuuya demanded, over the rumble of the massacre. Behind him, see-not-see silhouettes of their men studied the agonizing mess, mumbling about escape plans in his in-ear.

Dazai shrugged. One of the escaping fools had dragged their fingers down his cheek; blood was soaking his bandaid. “Left it at the Headquarters.”

“Did you intend to get trampled to death?”

Another shrug. He swung his legs back and forth, because he knew childishness tended to make something in Chuuya’s shoulders stiffen. “Absolutely. Where’s Mochizuki?”

Chuuya clenched his jaw. He nodded down.

It was hard to identify anyone in the maze of white, red and black — by the third round, his eyes found a familiar face, spied for hours from a balcony of the Pearl Hotel. Part of his jaw had been bitten off, the wrecked skin climbing all the way to his temple; the eyeball had been torn from the nerves, dangling down his cheek.

More than one dog was feasting on his ribcage — enough limbs ripped off that he couldn’t move.

He blinked. Seven was curled in one corner of the cage, sleeping.

“Threw himself onto the dog before I could temporarily bash his skull in,” Chuuya cursed. “Must have noticed us, somehow.”

“Impossible,” Dazai replied, distractedly. “I always know when someone is watching.”

“It has to be — “

He shook his head. “Something’s wrong. They can slip through our fingers once, twice — But this is a pattern. He knows. ”

Discomfort pulled his traits. There had been no Soul moments from his own hands after the first attack; he knew his muscles were tense in wait, still. “We’ve got a mole for sure, then?”

“Dante’s entire army is a mole,” Dazai said. He raised his fingers to his in-ear. “But, yes. Hey, there? All done here. Put the dogs to sleep and get the bodies to the Under Port. ”

No grunts or complaints appeared outwardly in his ear — but it didn’t matter much, when he could hear them in real life, even over the macabre sounds. Koda, a lonely voice, muttered a yes, sirs. Noguchi, drenched in red and perched like a hawk over their heads, muttered.

“Hey,” Chuuya called him, emptily. “You smell like a sack of blood. Walk along the perimeter; better if they don’t smell you from too close.”

The man blinked, taken back. “Whatever.”

One of Ace’s highest ranked women, now one of theirs — as for everyone in the organization, much to the Executives’ ticking eyelids — had taken care of bringing sedatives along. She was a green-haired thirty years old colossus, who hadn’t even blinked at the order for enough morphine to put an elephant to sleep.

Drugs in general were not Port Mafia business — Mori had refused deals that would have turned every lower rank mafioso into a billionaire. I dislike weapons that travel too easily, he liked to say. Wouldn’t want our men to fall for it. Do kill them, if it happens.

“Not so quick,” Chuuya called, as soon as he moved to slip down. “You owe me a favor.”

He curled one eyebrow. “Do I?”

With contained amusement, the boy nodded down again. His eyes found the target easily, this time around — Fourteen was happily munching on a wide eyed body; a few steps behind, the sleeping Seven had stopped moving completely.

Nuisance, he thought, his fingers spasming with the first electric shocks of the evening that tasted of normality. Vexation, annoyance, irritation, every similar word in the dictionary. Chuuya’s smile was the most horrid sight in this world.

“Fine,” he breathed out. You brought this on yourself, didn’t you? “What do you want, Slug?”

They made their way down, walking through the too distracted beasts and their meals with little fear — animals, Dazai knew very well, weren’t selfish. Still — Chuuya was entirely too confident for someone who made dogs want to tear his jugular out on sight.

His eyes followed the scene. That would be childish, he mused, through the already settled motions. He lowered, grabbing a fallen revolver. This will be unbearably childish of you —

He shot a bullet straight to Fourteen's head.

Chuuya, busy ordering some of their men to the SUVs, didn't even flinch. His eyes watched the pool of blood under the beast widen, as it fell forward on the corpse it was devouring; then, he looked at him.

"You know, it was easier than that," Chuuya let him know, vacantly.

"Was it?" He scratched his head with the gun.

"It wasn't about betting on the underdog. He got tased seven times in five minutes. He would win. He had to," He shrugged. "It wouldn't stop, otherwise."

Childish, the voice insisted.

"Well," Dazai concluded, making his way out of the alley. "It should thank me, then."

The woman who had gathered the sedatives was called Tsuchiya Yukio and, unsurprisingly, Chuuya knew her. She introduced herself with a half-assed bow and aggressive eyes, helping them carry the sleeping dogs inside the van that had been used to bring them.

Whoever had taken care of it, certainly didn't care about numbers. Eventually, they started stacking the bodies on top of each other.

"They'll sleep for a few hours — probably won't even be up by the time they're found," Tsuchiya warned them. "Make sure to get there fast, and leave information on the doors of the van, or the surprise is going to be — entertaining."

The SUVs had long since left them behind, barely offering a nod — apart from an uncomfortable Koda, who had admitted to having owned not one, but four dogs, before running away.

"Am I better off at the one near the HQs or the shop near the port?" Chuuya asked. He, of course, wasn't dirtying his hands at all, floating the dogs inside. He felt the urge to shoot another bullet. "Who's less likely to call the police?"

"The Hinata should be fine," she said. "They should do their best to get them back to a less — murderous state of mind."

"How do you know so much about the devils?" Dazai asked, squinting. Her features were vaguely familiar; she looked like she knew how to kill — less common than one would have believed, even in the Mafia.

"I'm a vet," she responded, refusing to meet his eye — but speaking with a stiffened ease that said she didn't quite respect him, as much as wondered what the whole Demon Prodigy thing was about. "My Ability gives me a certain degree of influence over the lifespan of animals — It helps control them."

Chuuya whistled. "I don't remember that from the Archives."

“My sister steals all the spotlight, I fear,” Tsuchiya slammed the doors of the van close.
“Tsuchiya Mi. You should be familiar; she works at the Hospital.”

Dazai newly-freed from cast hand pulsed. Not meeting Tsuchiya Mi even once would have been nearly impossible — she was the most skilled doctor in the organization, thanks to her Ability-influenced tools, acquired — according to the archives — through a protector who had been an actual User.

It was an interesting story. Abilities were a mystery society accepted as normal; stories that got more complicated than a simple, I exist and I burn for it — they tended to grab his attention.

If I cut off my finger, he had once mused to Mori, and stick it somewhere Chuuya won't notice, do you think he'll go crazy trying to understand why his Ability isn't working?

“A doctor and a vet?” Dazai echoed. “Mommy and Daddy must be proud. Chibi, hurry, or I’m leaving you here.”

Tsuchiya didn’t speak again until the two of them were settled in the booth of the van, Chuuya’s foot pressing the accelerator. Dazai wanted to question if his sporadic driving lessons meant he could drive a van around; he was still deciding if putting the seat belt on was wise or not, when the woman knocked on his window.

“Was the mission successful?” she asked.

Refusing to meet Chuuya’s eyes, he replied: “No mission is successful until the war is over. This is the Port Mafia.”

“And you think you can end the war?”

“I enjoy war quite a lot. Ending it would be a pity.”

“If you want another speech, you’ll have to wait for tomorrow,” Chuuya intervened, slightly annoyed. “Not that they seem to work much. Say, how many from Ace’s side are thinking of putting another a bomb under our car?”

“We have an ongoing bet,” Dazai explained.

Tsuchiya munched on her lips, hesitating. With a sigh, she offered: “You’re young. You’ve got a position that’s never even been a thing, before. They will never accept you.”

“See, that’s a common mistake,” Dazai settled his legs on the dashboard, searching inside the box. He lit up one cigarette, attempting to keep the coughs in. “We don’t really care about your acceptance. You’ll just learn to do as we say.”

Chuuya scoffed, but didn’t comment.

The Hinata Veterinary Hospital was predictably closed; the neon lights depicting a stylized dog and cat, surrounded by happy kids, were still on though — intermittently raining on the sidewalk.

He didn't move a finger as he watched the boy hurry to scribble down a note on a flier, and stick it between the doors of the van. "I still think it would be funnier to leave it here with no explanation," he huffed, playing Hopscotch on the sidewalk.

"Shut up."

"Just imagine," he insisted. "You see a van. You think, oh, what could it be? You go and open it and — surprise! A furious herd of devil-sent beasts jumps you. You're covered in blood. You're dying. Your intestine is on the floor. Everyone is happy."

Pausing, the boy glanced his way. Tentatively: "Are you absolutely sure you haven't watched 101 Dalmatians?"

"You do know they'll put them down, yes?"

"Not necessarily," Chuuya replied. "Some of them are young, and a good breed. They could retrain them, if the blood doesn't turn them into cowards."

Dazai leaned on the doors, batting his eyelashes. "Truly a puppy-oriented Charon, partner."

"I don't care if they put them down. Better than a bullet. They've met enough assholes for four lifetimes," He glared. "And don't call me partner."

"I sincerely don't get your complex. We agreed on collaborating. I lowered myself to your level!"

"Partner sucks. There are so many options."

"Like what?"

Chuuya seemed sort of lost. "Uh. Colleague. Comrade. Brother in arms."

"The Mafia is not a corporation," Dazai listed off, "Very communist-sounding. And if you were my brother, I would snap my own neck."

"What do you have against communism?"

"Nothing. Of course the street kid would say that."

"Excuse me?"

"I'm not discussing geopolitical matters with you," Dazai hushed him, waving. "You learned to write eight months ago, or something. I'm not doing that. And partners it is, get used to it."

"You want adoption papers, along with that rainbow scenario in your mind?"

"I'm relieved you finally seem to understand your lost bet made you my dog for life, but —"

“I’m too tired to walk home, so I’m stealing that car,” Chuuya announced, the two fingers he stuck to his forehead as effective as if they had pinched his lips. “And then I’m running you over with it.”

Dazai fired a bullet into the surveillance camera upon the Clinic. He didn’t stay to watch it break — he skipped his way to the red car whose window Chuuya had already unapologetically shattered, kicking the side of his shoes to get him to hurry.

They paused.

Swiftly, Dazai moved to the other side of the car, holding the boy’s seemingly uncaring gaze over the hood. He laid his chin on his hand over it; tapped, as he said: “I still don’t get the hype around a movie with that many dogs. Hundreds, seriously?”

Chuuya hummed. “That’s because you’ve got some serious case of loose boots in the head.”

“Who told you that?”

“You don’t look very stable.”

Gloved fingers knocked on the hood — thrice. Dazai put his fingers on the trigger of the gun.

They appeared from nowhere — arguably, the worst hiding place. By the time one of the men had jumped on Chuuya’s shoulders, slamming a hand on his mouth, Dazai had already shot him in the shoulder.

The shadows behind him solidified — he stood still, forcing his heels to perceive the goosebumps down his spine as a non-reactors factor. The ground shook and lit up, embracing his pursuer body — Chuuya’s hand crashed onto the car hood, sending him flying to the other end of the street — digging a hole in the wall right next to the Clinic.

The sound of bones echoed through the silence of the night — Dazai studied their faces, recognizing them from the rows that were supposed to be at the Under Port, feeding their enemies to the oblivion.

He slid over the roof, landing on Chuuya’s side, right as the man he had shot gasped under the viciousness of the redhead’s shoe sinking in the wound. “Seriously? Just two men?”

“We’re doing something wrong,” Chuuya said, disappointed. He dug deeper; the man screamed. Dazai slammed his shoe in his open mouth. “Noguchi thinks he can take us down with just two sons of a bitch. We are definitely doing something wrong.”

“Not even a bomb,” he whined.

“Not even a good fight,” he sighed. “And we’re at the seventeenth attempt.”

“I told you we should kill him.”

“Killing them won’t get them to obey,” he replied — same old argument. “We will just have less men. And we’ve already lost enough.”

“It worked just fine with the Secret Force. ”

“Did it?” His attacker had left a scratch down his cheek, trying to hold on after being shot. Matching, Dazai thought, feeling his hand tickle. Was Arahabaki there — in the few drops down his skin? I’m not going to kill you. “Has your dear squad done anything to get the others to listen to you? Or have they just gotten braver, now that more are contesting you?”

Dazai sunk a finger in Chuuya’s cheek, where a drop of blood was. “Look at you, all strategic. I could sob from the second hand embarrassment.”

His hand was snapped away with a sharply canine growl.

“The Port Mafia protocol is don’t get found, ” Dazai reminded the man under his shoe, as Chuuya boredly climbed into the car. “You’re alive, so you are Port Mafia, still. You can either pick up you and your friend and fix this mess, or you can stay here and die. If we get notified by our policemen, I will kill you. Yes?”

The man didn’t answer. After a kick to the side, he whimpered a yes.

“And tell Noguchi to try harder,” he added, slipping into the car. “If we have to witness his slow descent into madness and betrayal, I would at least like for it to be entertaining. He could have stolen some morphine and put us to sleep; Tsuchiya would have hardly noticed. We could be knocked out on the brink of death, right now,” Dazai sighed.

Chuuya’s hand pressed on the horn, making him jump. “If you could stop giving the enemy ideas, fucking moron?”

“We’re all Port Mafia,” he muttered, closing his door. “There are no enemies. Just bad children. Go to the left.”

“The HQs are in the opposite direction.”

“Well. I’m hungry.”

A glare. “I’m not buying your lazy ass dinner.”

“I’m sure you will reconsider,” Dazai reassured him, encouraging, patting his hand. “For now, let’s go exploring. ”

“Depends,” Suspicion bloomed all over his face. “Are you going to purposefully get us lost?”

“The plan is more to drive myself off a cliff, but you’re here, so,” He shrugged, sliding down the seat. “I know every corner of this city. I know you do, too.”

“I won the damn bet,” he mumbled — pulling the skin under his chin, for good measure.

By the time they managed to reach a diner, the sun had turned the sky into a golden fleece, curling orange at the seams and blinding their tired eyes. They had growled through every alley and climbed every undrivable street, though, arguing over video games and destroying two corners of the car. They barely managed to sit down and exchange their plates when ordered — when Dazai made one dog comment too much, Chuuya clenched his hands around the edge of the table too hard; and some drunken man in the further table called for a fight.

They were kicked out — between broken windows shards, a crying College-age waiter, and leaving soy stains on the tiles — and banned from ever coming back to Momo's Diner.

---

...

---

One week and six days prior to the funeral.

There was blood on his hands. He scratched away another name from Chuuya's wall.

Ace had refused to ask them for help, which wasn't weird, on its own. Still, one of his men was the next suspect on their list, so they quietly followed that large portion of volunteers from their ranks. It was simple enough: protect the cargoes making their way to the port until they actually boarded — make sure the Nine Rings wouldn't try to sabotage one of the most important deals of the year.

There was an issue that was — in Dazai's opinion — at the root of most complications his and Chuuya's partnership had. In the end, it was easy enough: Dazai found the — short lived, yes, but real — demise of the Port Mafia terribly entertaining to watch.

"They have to learn that they need us," he explained, sinking his nails in Chuuya's wrist to keep him from joining the brawl on the street. One of the cargoes had already been blown up; GSS and the Nine Rings were on their way to the others. "They have to learn to ask us to win this for them."

"This trade is important," Chuuya hissed. He could have freed himself from his grasp, though, if he really wanted to — that was how Dazai knew he understood. Perhaps, one simply didn't want to fail at ruling twice in a lifetime. "We're going to lose a good chunk of payment."

"And Ace's going to beg us for aid," he replied. "And every volunteer who went with him will be under our command, once again. Think of the irony."

Dazai was fairly good at his job — his predictions came true. A hit was planned on trains transporting GSS weapons, for a few days later; the mission was left in their hands.

From behind closed doors, they listened. Mori asked Ace: “Say, why not recruit them?”

---

...

---

One week and four days prior to the funeral.

There was blood on his hands. He scratched away another name from Chuuya’s wall.

“This Dante you talk about — He is playing with you,” Mori concluded, hands behind his back, walking gentle steps up and down the red carpet of his office. “I’m surprised you would let him.”

“Respectfully, sir,” Chuuya intervened, the two of them still kneeling. “Neither party is enjoying the game.”

“Then you must have a solution, I presume?”

Dazai knew what was going to leave his lips, so he pinched his side. The chances that Mori hadn’t noticed were low, but he kept his eyes on the ground and his weight on one leg, and pretended not to see Chuuya’s gaze on him. They were making their stumbling way through several more languages, but none would ever be clearer than that.

“You didn’t tell him either?” was the boy’s question, as soon as they left. “Are you mental?”

“Why are we taking the stairs?” he complained, breathless, hands on his knees. “The elevator was right there. It’s so many floors. It’s a skyscraper .”

“Don’t change the subject,” Chuuya insisted. Although, like he had been doing for a while, he was the one who changed the elevator subject.

Dazai had thought about inquiring on his sudden penchant for climbing — had considered suggesting a few more trips to the gym instead of that herculean torture. But that could have brought some questions about why, exactly, Dazai himself followed him. “Mori doesn’t know that Dante — He doesn’t know about me?”

“Scream it, why don’t you,” he muttered. “Of course he doesn’t. He’s the last person who should know it. Did you want him to lock you up with Q? You said it yourself. You’re a walking bomb.”

“He’s the Boss. You can’t just lie to the Boss, he’s gonna kill you —“

“Well, I’m the boss of you, so I forbid you from telling him.”

Predictably, Chuuya kicked his side. “You’re not! You’re so not —“

They went on, fighting some more and guiding some men who didn’t trust them and watching their loose leads kill themselves in front of them. Dazai thought he could see the realization neither of them wanted to linger on, hanging in the space between their curling hands and new languages.

Still, the seesaw stood.

At night, ripping the corners of his stolen photograph — just to be petty; to remind himself he could return it whenever he wanted — he didn’t think about what reasons he might have had for not wanting Mori to take a bomb away from his hands.

Dazai, he reminded the shadows on his metal walls, had never denied wanting to die.

---

...

---

One week and two days prior to the funeral.

There was blood on his hands. He scratched away another name from Chuuya’s wall.

---

...

---

Seven days prior to the funeral.

Chuuya dragged him by the hair, gloves soaked and arms pushing against the waves, landing the two of them on the riverbank with a coughing curse.

“Next time,” he threatened, starfishing next to him on the muddy grass, staring at the sun as if it would personally extract the water from his lungs, “I’m putting rocks in your pockets.”

The sky was devastatingly clear — the blue of a gem interrupted by the one blinding spot, making his head spin. Dazai was soaked in uncomfortable places; too dry all the way inside his skull, like a failed baptism.

The rumble of passing cars on the highway shook the ground; he held onto the grass, strangely — burning.

[It was a last resort plan, for one of the last pieces of paper hanging from Chuuya’s roof. Undoubtedly — if the barely contained enthusiasm and the lack of a reaction to Dazai’s taunting about the milk in his fridge meant anything — it was a plan the other boy was looking forward to.]

Either that, or he just had a thing for stars.

The Yokohama Observatory And Astrophysics Museum rested at a fifteen minutes car ride from the outskirts of the city, in the middle of wild grass and old highways. There had been no need to bring any of Mori’s men along, and they would have certainly been more useful in the city — nonetheless, Noguchi had led five mafiosi in their direction, with accusations of secret business on his lips.

“Maybe you were right about killing him,” Dazai watched Chuuya mutter, hiding behind a twelve feet tall reproduction of Saturn, as the boy’s side bleed into his gloved hand.

The shootout had dragged all the tourists out in a screaming marathon, and the alarms had yet to stop blaring. He wasn’t sure if the Nine Rings squad had found out about their trip, or just followed the mafiosi’s clumsy chase to their own mission — he did know Noguchi had almost stopped breathing from a stray bullet, and that Chuuya had pushed him to the side.

“Fucking morons,” he was saying, between teeth. He had been pulling Dazai by the wrist right as it was happening; the bullet had easily grazed his ungodly skin — not getting stuck, at the very least. “Fucking idiots. Is the woman gone?”

Dazai lowered his head as a bullet flew by. Noguchi was directing the shoot-out much better, now that his eyes were stuck in the widened astonishment of watching Chuuya scream, go, you fool, at him.

“She threw herself from the balcony of the fourth floor,” he let him know, voice rough, fighting his skin to get out. His eyes found the splattered frame of Professor Hinata in the middle of the floor; he forced out: “Bounced onto the Earth statue, I’m pretty sure — No other way of losing her head. Oh. There it is.”

The lifeless skull rolled their way, right as some screaming fool barreled behind their hidden spot, his rifle shooting in quick succession. Chuuya didn’t even raise his eyes or pause his cursing — kicking his leg so high from the ground it formed an angle, stopping the bullets on impact; then, sending them back.

“Whatever,” he snapped, inconvenienced. “We need to get out of here. Can we kill them and be done with it?”

Dazai tried to sense disappointment in his tone. He had been yapping around pretty pathetically the whole day — jumping from stargazing spot to stargazing spot like an overly excited child, armed with knives from teeth to toes; he hadn’t even pretended not to gape at the Dark Room with the universe projections they had been supposed to find the Professor in.

He had had to pull him away, eventually, once his neck had started to break from being tilted. Venus and Uranus had painted his silhouette in bright colors; he had been only slightly more interested in the signs than in the Professor’s absent smiles.

Now, he was bleeding on a fresco of the Milky Way. Dazai shrugged. “Yeah, we’re done here.”

A boring matter — escaping. He slid down to steal fallen bullets; blindly threw them in the air, not even waiting to check if Chuuya would jump in the right spot to grab them. The blur of a solved business and some ancient astrophysicists’ statues ran across his eyelids, weighing down bones that hadn’t slept in three days, and spent all of those days near Mori’s intertwined hands.

Dazai was never really tired. Sometimes, though — occasional enough to never enter Mori’s notes — he was quiet.

“Sir,” one of Noguchi’s men snapped, clearly aggravated, once silence had fallen, almost slipping on the fresh blood from the fallen Nine Rings. “Sir, this isn’t right —” Dazai wiped dust from his coat, thinking about the ripped pages Chuuya had hung in his room, “Forgive my words, Dazai, but Executive Kouyou wanted them alive, they were direct orders — they need more prisoners to —”

He cocked his gun and shot him in the head.

The man fell abruptly, without a gasp; Dazai was scarcely reminded of Elise’s complaints that killing on TVs never looked like the one she had witnessed. It had been quiet before; it suddenly got quieter.

“Words not forgiven,” he concluded. He nodded to the remaining mafiosi, petrified. Noguchi’s nostrils were flaring. Dazai only met his eyes. “Let this be a lesson on appropriate intervention, yes?”]

*“Oh,” Dazai heard his throat push out. Spring was at the door; the wind was freezing, nonetheless. He realized, rather abruptly, impolitely, that he didn’t exactly remember how he had ended up in the river — he had been inside a car, he was sure. Not speaking, but still — seated. Breathing. Corporeal.*

The asphalt had burned one side of his chest. He must have jumped out. He wasn’t sure of why he had been followed; it had been painful.

It had felt —

His ribs were soaked too. They pressed against his lungs; spread and tightened, pierced the skin until Chuuya's curses and spats were a background issue. He had floated rather peacefully. His throat had been filled with water. There had been no need to speak at all. It had felt —

"Oi," Brusque in nature; hands always covered, even as they caged his malfunctioning rib cage from the front and the back, pushing him to sit up. The river was right there, floating aimlessly between ripples and pollution. Its trace on his flesh was the realest thing around. "You're fine, idiot."

I am, he didn't lie, because Mori had trained him for this, even if he had never realized. Dazai knew when his body was betraying him; knew better than to let anyone else perceive his fist against a traitor.

And yet, it had felt —

"Alright, no," Chuuya snapped, pushing him to the ground again, right an inch of an instant before he could throw his body over the riverbank again. Again, he called, again, again. The moment he felt him fight back, his grip became less of a push and more of an outward wrestling. "I'm not fucking dealing with — Hey!"

"Think you can manage not to be a problem for ten minutes?" Dazai snarled, as they rolled around the disgusting grass, kicking and punching and looking at the rushing waves as if they would come alive to help him.

"Think you can manage not to be a freak for ten minutes?" Chuuya snapped, crashing his head against the ground. Dazai bit him in the arm, where his jacket had been ripped; he cursed out, kneeling him right between the legs. "Fucking piece of fucking bandaged shit!"

"You suck," he whined. The fresh water was a siren; the silence and the compressed lungs and the fear; deep into his bones, urging him to swim up, to long for — "You suck."

In a distant portion of his brain — as faraway as the riverbank slowly got, as their brawling dragged them further and further away; Dazai's reaching hands impossibly useless compared to Chuuya's — he felt Chuuya's blood stick to his clothes.

"I told you," Dazai panted, backing away with his arms stretched, once they managed to climb to their feet. The boy was caging him in — the feeling of a cornered beast in an alley made him grin, almost — except his face pulsed. He walked to the side, slow, attempting to escape, and said: "This partners thing needs to have some ground rules."

"We are not," Chuuya snapped, charging him like a bull, "Fucking partners!"

The landing was so hard on his nape that the world spun without mercy — he could only kick his feet and whine and throw as many insults as his throat allowed, each sound so heavily distant from his own control it was an outer body experience, as the boy grabbed him by the legs, mercilessly pulling him to the road.

Childish, Dazai considered, but he wasn't sure of which one of them he was meant to insult. He knew aggravation worked, most times, so he kept it on — not really sure of what the result was meant to be.

But it works, his never delirious mind assured. It always works, so it's fine.

He dragged him all the way to a laundromat on the other end of that portion of empty highway, only hurling back insults at him when his whines grew louder in tone and purpose. Even there, once Chuuya let go of him, he took his good time kicking against the floor, lamenting the horrible circumstances inside his wet clothes.

The laundromat was small and rusty, lacking any life outside of the two of them. Empty dishwashers creaked sporadically, in tandem with the flickering light panels on the ceiling. Chuuya wasted no time and no hesitation removing his clothes, scouting inside the free clothing box in bright red underwear.

“Done with the temper tantrum?” he simply asked, when he saw him loudly drag his feet to the rows of dishwashers. The cold had started to settle in his bones; if he could have torn his flesh off his skeleton, he would have. He didn't know if the two were related.

“You're one of Mori's spies,” Dazai accused. “He sent a dog to sniff out my attempts, so he can sit in his stupid chair and do his stupid paperwork and lie about his promise.”

Chuuya offered him a glance over his shoulder, pressing an obscene amount of tissues to the bleeding scratch on his side. The brawl couldn't have helped; his dirty glare assured it. “Promise?”

He sighed, tormented, falling on the ground again to watch the boy's clothes spin. “He'll find me something that will kill me as painlessly as possible. He didn't swear on it, but he wasn't smiling — And it's Mori. Elise pinky promised me in his name.”

“Uh-uh,” Skepticism painted his tone. “Then why did you just try to off yourself?”

“Because he's taking so long.”

“You're his favorite little soldier,” He shrugged, eyeing the bite mark on his arm with a grimace. “I can't see him helping you snap your own neck.”

“Too bad,” Dazai replied, darkly. “He has to.”

“You know,” he commented, clearly disgusted — and wasn't that something to stare at. “If I didn't know you're too lazy to keep it up without cause, I'd assume you're just too into the bit to let go of it now.”

“Don't ever underestimate my motivations.”

“You don't have motivations. You have plans.”

“Is there a difference?”

“I don’t care,” Chuuya said, very honestly. “I think the way you treat life is absolutely revolting. I just refuse to deal with your paperwork. Die where I’m not a witness.”

He scoffed. “I intend to.”

“Good.”

“Good.”

The lights flickered some more. Stubbornly, he refused to undress.

“What’s with the stars, anyway?” he muttered.

Chuuya, sitting upon the driers in stolen clothes — certainly in the middle of informing Kouyou of their irritating detour, given his annoyed pulling at the angel-shaped phone charm — curled an eyebrow. “What?”

He tried to blow some hair off his forehead; they were too wet to move. The bandages were the worst part of it; Dazai never regretted any attempt, but he did regret the consequences of failure.

“The astronomy book pages in your room,” he listed off. “Your dog tail wagging at the Observatory. Are you planning to do everybody a favor and desert to become an astronaut?”

“Fuck you,” Chuuya said, almost distractedly. His skin was littered in scratches Dazai didn’t really recall giving him — he tried to recall the moment he had grabbed him and broken the river surface, but couldn’t. He tried to imagine him driving away with an open car door and not a care in the world.

“I thought Physics was your thing.”

“Astrophysics is Physics, asshole,” He shrugged, shoulders closing in on himself — a cornered animal; no weapon in sight but his own need to give blame to his own thoughts. “The night sky was the first thing I saw.”

Dazai watched the dishwasher spin. He tried to imagine it, painted through the valleys of wet clothes — a crater of ruins and ashes, echoing in children’s cries and creaking bones, illuminated by nothing but merciful stars. Hands, pale from a life under lab lights, digging through maceries Arahaki hadn’t been kind enough to move for them. Blue eyes settling on the infinite of a devastation they had birthed.

“Did it look beautiful?” he asked.

Chuuya had had no way to follow his train of thought. Nonetheless, with the same careless he reserved for all that touched him deeper, he said: “It all does when you’ve made it. Then you change your mind.”

His lips twitched.

Calling me a freak, he thought about saying.

“If only No Longer Human could be turned off,” Dazai sighed, again, climbing to his feet. “I don’t think I would mind death by religious weirdo’s Limbo too much. It might just be very peaceful.”

A blink. His shoulder blades attempted to dig holes into the wall of dishwashers, feet slipping down fallen detergent and never-cleaned tiles; Chuuya’s face appeared so close to his that it tickled his nose, the boy’s grasp around his shirt collar unmerciful.

“Do you know,” Chuuya questioned, showing his teeth, “Just how many of our men have died since this shitshow began?”

“Speak your truth,” Dazai encouraged. He still had his few inches of height advantage like this. It was strangely satisfying. “Do I know that you might die in the name of this farce, and me — the ungrateful moron whose demise you’ll have to explain, one day — might just survive it all and waste it?”

His eyes tightened into two unmatching lines. He wondered if the burned one ever hurt; if when Corruption had taken over, he had seen the world more clearly with it — if he had seen something worth it. If it had been disappointing enough to keep his hands in his pockets. “Not everything is about you.”

“Not everything is about your guilt either,” he informed.

Chuuya stiffened.

Behind his legs, the dishwasher keeping his clothes trapped let out a ding!

“It is, for you,” Chuuya concluded. His disdain was tactile; the something under it was locked away with enough precision that even Dazai’s lock pick fingers couldn’t find it. He tried to pretend the urge to dig into his ribcage and scoop the viscera out to find it was normal; tried to imagine understanding. “Or you wouldn’t be pulling at it all the time.”

He let go of him; fixed the baggy pants and shirt he had worn in a hurry, muttering when he found the blooming blood near his hip. Dazai didn’t move.

“It’s like Dante said, I think,” he offered, eyes to the light panels. “Somebody needs to decide what the appropriate consequences are.”

“I’m not a consequence,” Chuuya informed.

“We all are.”

“To your plans? To Boss’? The former Boss? Rimbaud’s, Verlaine’s, Beatrice’s?” He threw his head back in a humorless laugh; stuck his hair under his hat like it was a job. Dazai thought about his pillow on his floor; tried to match it with the contempt in the eyes he kept laying on him. His first memory — his hands pushing the water out of his chest.

“I’ve got no intention to live like that,” Chuuya let him know. “Constantly wondering whose game I’m playing. I have my morals. I have my rules. I’m surviving this, and when I become Executive, I’m getting Elise to double up your pinky promise.”

“How kind,” Dazai commented. He wondered what he had done with all the objects The Owner would never receive; if Mori had already played his affectionate card for the Old World. If he was mourning again. “Somewhat stupidly idealistic, too.”

They held each other’s stares, silent.

Temporary association, he considered. He could hear Mori chuckle in the background. Stupidly, crazily idealistic — believing the game could be escaped by pure strength of will. Believing Mori hadn’t seen something the first time they had been surrounded by the valley of a massacre, endlessly intertwined, endlessly fighting against it — believing he would simply live on, accepting to never see it again.

“Ten tickets at the Arcade if you manage to flood this place with a single move,” Dazai wagered, at last.

---

...

---

Four days prior to the funeral.

The Pomegranate was, not unlike its Madame, disturbingly good at hiding dirt under the carpet.

It was a Japanese architecture fanatic’s dream structure, and no one had changed it once since it had been built — a block of nature and custom in the middle of the maze of skyscrapers in one of the best areas of Yokohama. No one had ever, as far as Dazai’s memory and the archives went, referred to that cage of perpetually singing women as a brothel.

No dirt, no suffering faces. Beautiful women with a graceful sort of composure, smiling as soon as their eyes met.

Rather hard to see that happen from the vents.

“What the fuck are you doing here?” Chuuya snapped, crunched down where the grates of Dazai’s current stop appeared in some indistinct room. The hems of kimonos and dusty boxes surrounded him; he assumed the vents had landed him in a backroom.

“What are you doing here?” he hissed. “Your schedule said you had to lead Team 56 to the assault near Chinatown —“

“How do you — What? ”

“You should come up with better passwords, if you don’t want your business to be found. All thirteen of them were exceptionally easy to guess. Good job on adding ten more, though,” Dazai waved the matter away. “If you could? I have a Soul to kidnap.”

A pause.

Chuuya stuck his fingers in the grates, pulling it out with such violence, he wasn’t sure if Tainted had done anything at all. Dazai squeaked as he was pulled out by his tie, flagging his arms out to hit back.

“Only one Soul left on my damn wall,” the boy threatened, on his feet, standing over his fetal body, “And you’re playing the lonely game? Now? You said you were still planning out —“

“I’ve come to the conclusion that perhaps — you bring bad luck to my otherwise ineccepibile success rate,” Dazai interrupted him, crossing his arms, eyes to the ceiling, stubborn. “I wanted to prove my theory.”

Chuuya stared at him.

When his foot came flying down between his legs, Dazai barely managed to roll away, grabbing onto the nearest object in that barely breathable space — a photo album of sorts — and throwing it to his face. “Bad dog!” he cried. “You lied too. Why are you here!”

Calling the tint up the boy’s ears a blush would have been rather dramatic. Chuuya didn’t get awkward about things; even less did he get embarrassed. He was too endlessly careless to. Still, he cleared his throat, and blurted out a: “I’m helping out one of the girls.”

Dazai stared at him.

It was only surprise that allowed him to almost — almost, but still too close for Nakahara Chuuya, the Port Mafia’s future greatest — hit the middle of the boy’s forehead with a second object — a half empty, clearly expired detergent, this time.

“Bad dog!” he echoed, desperate. “You found a suicide companion before me?”

“What?” Chuuya shrieked, a voice creaking splutter. The detergent had landed in his hands, he blinked at it, squinting. “These were the prices, back in the day? They’re fucking robbing us these days —“

Dazai could have cried. “You have an issue.”

“I don’t have any —“

“You have a real issue, and you need to —“

A crowd of giggles passed behind the door, a small interruption in an otherwise melodical song. The undeterred, deafeningly hypnotizing hum of female voices had disappeared in the background after a few minutes there — once he noticed it again, it was impossible for his ears not to follow along.

They measured each other, rats in a cage. In the end, with an exasperated sigh, Chuuya pursed his lips — whistling a short tune.

Truce?

Dazai sighed even deeper.

[“Birds?” Chuuya asked, frowning at the search page on the laptop, bathing The Alley in bluish light. The twelve-hours-and-seventeen-minutes long video hadn’t started yet, but the stitched picture was that of a cartoon seagull waving at the screen. “Why birds?”]

“I like birds,” Dazai shrugged, because if he said so, then Chuuya would despise them on principle. “They’re ugly. They defecate on people. Did you know they have bags inside their body that they can fill with air, in case their lungs aren’t enough?”

“You want us to go around imitating birds,” he insisted, “To communicate?”

It wasn’t even the weirdest proposition for codes they’d come up with in the pauses of their war-directing — if anything, they were coming up with more than were needed, desperate to one up each other for the most outrageous idea.

Dazai pushed his own shoulder against his. “Just think about how annoying it would be. I know for a fact that Hirotsu hates whistling. We can make it a bet — who manages to make him snap at us first.”

Competition did to his unmatching eyes what a particularly adept painter could do to the ugliest son in a family picture. Squinting at him, he promised: “You’ve already lost, shitty Dazai. I can imitate up to twenty different species of birds.”

“Wow,” he sighed, unimpressed. “You really were bored in the Sheep, weren’t you?”]

Dazai huffed, settling straighter against the abandoned boxes. “What kind of help?”

“The asshole client kind of,” Chuuya replied, as if it was a code he was supposed to understand. He knew for a fact Kouyou wouldn’t approve of his presence there — given she had hushed him away from the gates more than once, muttering about, not any place for children — and he wondered if it was an order he refused to obey. “What kind of Soul?”

“Not sure,” he admitted. “I do know he’s the side piece of one of the women here. Apparently, he’s the brother of a faithful patron, who has no idea his favorite client is head over heels for his — Why are you looking at me like that?”

Chuuya might as well have swallowed a lemon. He opened his hands, as if tempted to choke the life and the story out of him; ended up breathing very deeply from his nostrils.

“Furata Yoko,” he said. “The chick. Yes?”

He blinked. “Seriously?”

“She wants me to kill a faithful patron for her,” he confirmed, kicking the wall. “Apparently, the man has been crazy obsessed with her for years. His brother and her have a secret thing going on — he has currently hit the jackpot, and he’s about to buy her out of the Pomegranate.”

“And we can assume the jackpot is the pay that the Poet offers to uncertain possible clients?”

A huff. “We can assume.”

Silence stretched out, lulled by the hymns.

“Well,” Dazai concluded. “I suppose she might just have to lose them both, then. Pity. Perhaps, it will make her more amenable towards a double suicide!”

Planning was a quiet thing, curling inside his brain and racing to his fingers — to be traced on reachable sides of Chuuya’s body, as the boy snuck them out of the backroom. Before they could cross the threshold, one of the thrown photo albums was hit by the light of the interior gardens, showing off the set of pictures dangling from the open pages.

“That’s —“ Dazai blinked.

“Ane-san,” Chuuya concluded, sounding as if the words had never left his mouth before then.

A much younger, much more severe Kouyou Ozaki was looking straight into the camera, leaning on the edge of a fountain. Her kimono was a darker shade of pink than her preferred shade; her hair was pinned up on her neck, wild strands framing intent eyes.

Her gaze lacked something distinctively hers — something gracefully resigned.

“I think it was his album,” Chuuya said, as he leaned down to pick it up. Picture after picture, she was there — devouring an apple pie with braced teeth; pulling a boy, a few years older, towards a street graffiti; tilting her head to study the pouty, blond girl next to her. “Kanechi. And that must be Beatrice.”

“Pretty sure she took some of the pictures,” he replied. A younger Beatrice was staring at something out of the camera, framed by the blinding sunrise — unlike most pictures in that collection, she hardly looked angry.

“She was pretty,” He scrunched up his nose, seemingly disturbed by a photograph of the young Executive wearing a pair of sunglasses.

Dazai clicked his tongue. “All women are pretty. But don’t let her hear you say you used the past tense for her,” He paused. “Chuuya, did you have a plan to get rid of your woman’s tormentor?”

“Huh? Yeah, I was —“

“Scratch it. Come with me.”

The boy spluttered.

“What in God’s good, execrated name,” a too familiar voice questioned, behind their stumbling frames, right when Dazai had begun to grow confident in his plan, “Do you boys think you’re doing?”

“Keep walking,” Dazai encouraged.

“There’s no fucking way you actually believe that is going to work,” Chuuya hissed back, despite only speeding up their descent down the corridor. The hems of their stolen kimonos caught under their feet; when they almost bumped against a passing woman, Dazai offered his best high pitched apology.

“Don’t do that, you buffoon — “

“We,” he whispered, singing, “Are supposed to blend in.”

“She’s already seen us!”

“There’s no way she recognized us from —“

A luminescent blade sliced the air, mere inches from their naked throats. Chuuya pushed him back so fast he landed against the wall, losing his balance on the wooden sandals — when he fell with a squeak, he pulled on the boy’s ankle before he could run, landing him on the floor.

Towering upon them, shouldered by Golden Demon and her blank-faced ire, Kouyou crossed her arms, smiling with all the anger of a block of ice.

“Well,” she offered, with a tone that spoke of doubling up the calligraphy lessons she had promised, following her house fire. “Dare I say, Chuuya, dear — Purple isn’t quite your color.”

Finding clothes hadn’t been hard — none of the doors in the courtesan house had keys, and there was an abundance of colorful fabric to pick from.

The obi of Dazai’s green, female-model kimono was too high, and the lack of hakama was a strange change from the New Year’s parties where Mori had forced traditional clothing on him — but he thought, despite the lankiness and stubborn bones, he had done a good enough job, between that and the wig.

“We’re just —” he said, easily, “Taking advantage of the wonders of childhood.”

“Isn’t that nice.”

“Ane-san,” Chuuya intervened, pushing the sides of the too-grown kimono, struggling to stand. The golden flowers sewn on his collar matched his eye; the flower piece holding his hair left his face devoid of unruly strands, rendering it too naked. “Listen.”

“I am,” she assured. “I cannot wait to hear your explanation for this. All those times I begged you to let me play dress up with you, and you refused — “

“Except you don’t exactly have a right to ask for an explanation,” Dazai intervened, mourning that story. He stood as gracefully as he could, blowing hair out of his lipstick-sticky mouth. Proudly, he recited: “All and any members of the organization are required to allow Dazai Osamu and Nakahara Chuuya to proceed as they judge best.”

Kouyou stared him down — still smiling. “You truly want me to believe this is about the Nine Rings. ”

“You have no idea,” Chuuya muttered. “How about this — Ten days of non-complain obedience in your assistance if you pretend you never saw us?”

“Tempting,” she admitted, waving her hand to vanish Golden Demon. “But you’re already a pearl of obedience, dear. And you two know you’re not allowed in here. Not as visitors; not as clients —“ Her smile cracked. “Most certainly not as workers. ”

“Can’t two boys have some semblance of fun?” Dazai insisted. “These are stressful days, you know? The battlefield grows tormenting even for — Hey!”

“Blood isn’t a good look on any sleeves. Particularly, not ones in my service,” the woman let him know, patting down the side of his kimono with attentive hands. “You better hope this isn’t from my girls — Commander in chief. ”

“Of course not,” Chuuya intervened. His head piece had begun falling to the side, despite the little effort; murdering Mihara Gouta had hardly taken any effort, given his drunken, nonchalant stance on the bed he had been watching them approach from. “You’re the one who doesn’t want any dirt on your grounds, aren’t you? Only the respectable kind of assholes —“

“Language, little god.”

“ — and it’s not even the first time I’ve helped you out with that.”

“No,” Kouyou conceded. “Just the first time you have required the aid of such cute looks. Ah, look at you —“ She let go of Dazai’s clothes, moving to pinch both of Chuuya’s cheeks, despite his protests, under the giggles of the singing women passing by. With a clenched-teeth smile, she added: “First time you require assistance, too!”

“Chuuya is training me,” Dazai lied, easily. The boy’s head snapped to him. “I’ve decided to trust his dog instincts, for once, and accept that his street days might have taught him some — very few — moves I —“ He swallowed around his pleasant grin. “ — lack. ”

“Two boys as cute as you?” she cooed, not quite touching Dazai, but patting his head gingerly. “If you went around like this more often, wouldn’t it be so nice? You will grow soon, you know? You won’t be so adorable for much longer.”

“Field training is the best option,” Chuuya insisted, muffled by the pull. He raised his arms, as if to slap her hands away — stopped at the last moment, resuming to simply shriek: “Can you quit that?”

“We’re done here, anyway,” he concluded. “The little speck of dirt has already been taken care of. In a better world, you would thank us for it.”

[Mihara Pao was a tall man with too tight clothes and sunglasses that were definitely too small for his face. He had latched onto Dazai the moment the door was opened, which solved their doubts on his supposed similarities to Furata Yoko — with him came the stench of tobacco, and Chuuya’s dropped jaw.

He had died rather disgustingly, the hard line in his pants offensively evident and the bloodied sheets under him sticking to his swollen fingers.

Something had unscrewed enough inside his drunken mind to make him decide Yoko wasn’t all he needed; the glance Chuuya and Dazai had exchanged over opposite sides of the corpse, kimonos unable to have been removed by Mihara’s inebriated senses, had been carefully devoid of anything but distaste.

“I don’t think this is what Boss meant with our free planning,” Chuuya commented.

He was wrong, but Dazai kept quiet about it].

“I suppose you aren’t wrong,” Kouyou sighed, eventually, dragging the tip of her umbrella down the tiles. “I’m not, unfortunately, allowed to question your current actions. I have to believe they have been done for the good sake of our syndicate.”

Her gaze turned sharper; pleasing until the very last inch of her curled lips. Dazai felt the air sizzle with the hiss of Chuuya’s fighting instinct, involuntarily.

“I would very much like to believe that,” she added, somewhat unnecessarily, staring right at Dazai. “Should you prove me wrong, I’m sure Boss would be delighted to receive my report on your behavior. It will certainly come of some use, in the wake of Executive nominations.”

You cannot waste time with theories, she had said, eyes blinded by rage — and the shadow of a girl that occupied most of that dusty album, kept in an old backroom of the place she hated most.

Chuuya stared at the floor, fists tight, resolutely stubborn. Lips stained in makeup and kimono slipping down his shoulder, Dazai got the feeling the situation should have felt less heavy.

Like a current, Kouyou’s face lost its sharpness. “Anyway,” She clasped her hand under her chin, sweet, “I will let this go, this one time. We will deal with your consequences once this overpowered Silver Oracle of yours is dropped. Now, Chuuya — Why don’t you give me a Rich Girl?”

The boy’s expression morphed into horror. “No fucking way.”

“Rich Girl?” Dazai echoed.

“It’s nothing,” Chuuya snapped. “Nothing at all. We should go. Right now.”

“I hardly think it’s nothing,” Kouyou cut in, blinking slowly. “It’s good tradition. All the girls who work for me are subjected to the test. It’s all in good fun — Merely to get them more comfortable —“

“I’m not a girl,” he reminded her, eyes flashing. “And I’m not having any fun.”

“You work for me. You’re wearing girl clothes.”

“That’s not nearly the same —“

“Should you be resistant still, though,” she sighed, flagging her fan open to dramatically cut the air in two, “I might have to bring you to my office, and have a more detailed conversation about your actions in my territory. Silver Oracle or not — What Boss doesn’t know won’t hurt him, will it?”

If Chuuya’s burned eye had been half as cursed as the daily glances it received swore it was, Kouyou would have been a pillar of salt. Dazai was very careful not to say a word, lest he reminded the boy of his near existence.

Hesitance moved Chuuya slowly — he stood straighter, pushing the inside of his knees together, tilting his body forward. He refused to drop the woman’s smiling, unmovable gaze.

Sudden enough to startle him, he raised his arm and pointed an accusing finger at her. Pitching his voice so high it was unrecognizable, he warned: “Next time you won’t be so lucky!”

The silence that followed was abyssal.

Undeterred, Kouyou clapped, polite.

“Don’t say a word,” Chuuya warned, between teeth, voice much lower, not moving an inch.

“Was that,” Dazai started, petrified.

“Don’t you fucking talk.”

“Was that,” His entire face seemed to shatter on impact, destroyed by a growing grin.

“I’m gonna fucilate you —“

“— A Hirose Fumiko’s Rich Chick reference?”

Some unfortunate worker had to wipe the tears of hilarity Dazai spilled from the ground, even as the statuary Executive did her best to hide her own behind her fan — an enraged, screaming-like-a-banshee Chuuya had to drag him to their meeting point by the collar, holding up his laughter-stricken spine with the pure ire shaking his fingers.

He had barely managed to get himself into some semblance of composure, when Furata Yoko’s crazed, gleeful eyes appeared — behind the ajar door of her room, hands stained with the blood of the corpse they had covered upon her bed.

“Oh, dear,” she offered, barely a whisper. She was a thin woman, pale and corvine, with eyes so wide they looked strange on her face. The bandaid on her left one had allowed Dazai to keep his bandages on; her companion, Komako, was staring at the blood that soaked it with concern.

“You two did a wonderful job,” Yoko stared at her hands, lips trembling in an attempt to smile. “Isn’t it just wonderful?”

She brought her hands to her lips. Komako, hair red where her cheeks were turning bloodless, turned away.

“Yes, absolutely,” Chuuya agreed, curtly, clearly done with the day’s tribulations. He had removed his clothes on their way down, leaving them on the floor; his nails were still sinking in Dazai’s wrist. “We did our part. Now bring us to him.”

“Koyama,” Yoko called, not moving. “Bring these gentlemen to the basement. And tell Pao — Tell him I’m doing this for his own good, yes?”

[“Mihara Gouta has requested me every night since the day we met,” Yoko began, as she helped set their costumes into place. “I’ve been working here since I was sixteen years old. I thought I would have to live like this until the end of my days, and — then, he came.”

“His brother isn’t like him. Pao — Pao is good. One night, Mihara was too drunk to even leave my bed, and he ran here to bring him home. When our eyes crossed — He asked me my name. It was a nice change. They usually tell me their own first, so that I can know what to scream.”

Dazai thought all stories from the Pomegranate were the same — slightly too romantic at the edges; too sensual. A rose fragrance, insisting to the point of nausea.

The first Boss of the Port Mafia married a prostitute from the house, he had told Chuuya, in some diner they had been kicked out of for a brawl, after a failed chase. She used to scam secrets out of powerful men in the city. That was how he got the idea to turn the House into a valuable asset.

Kouyou’s spies, the boy had recited, dutifully. And the woman?

He had shrugged. He turned her into a whore of occasion, when he needed information.

That’s like — fucking gross.

Don’t let the men hear you say that, Dazai had tutted. They all like that old story so much. The older ones will tell you it’s poetic — Our syndicate thrived thanks to the love of such dedicated people.

Dedicated?, he had insisted. To what, each other?

No, Dazai had clarified. To ruining each other’s life so thoroughly. She ended up murdering him; she, in turn, was murdered by his heir, and had her corpse left in a cell to decay. As per the former Boss’ instructions.

“He asked me questions,” Yoko sighed, still. “He wanted to know everything about me. I told him I wished I had more time to read, that I used to devour entire books in a few hours — and the next day, before his brother arrived, he brought me a book. A book of knights and queens and love, and I...”

A haze covered her eyes, englighting their color. “Ever since then, we’ve been hiding from Mihara. He would kill us both if he found out. But Pao — Pao has been working. He wants to pay me off, free me from the Pomegranate. He came to me, one day, screaming victory. He said he’d met a man who’d promised him everything he wanted in exchange for something of little value. ‘My life,’ he told me. ‘He wants my life, but I can keep living anyway. And soon I’ll get you out of here.’”

“Ever since he made the deal, he was — he was different. Everything about him was dimmed. I asked him to tell me what the deal had been about. Pao said he’d been shown what Heaven looked like. That he could go there whenever he wanted — that I should go, too.”

“He told me about Dante and his Souls. I was terrified. I procrastinated. I told him I would think about it, and secretly I began searching for someone who could help — but no one seemed to know about Dante, or what was happening.”

“Until one day,” she laid her eyes on them, intent. “Until one day, he complained about two shadows working to ruin Dante’s plan.”]

The closer they got to the basement, the less furnished and elegant the road became: no chandeliers or pricey wood, but air that smelled of dust and louder unmistakable sounds. Their guide didn’t stop until they went down the last flight of stairs, marching to the door at the end of the corridor.

“We need to be quick,” Chuuya whispered. His mouth was still splattered in lipstick. “If he knows we’re here, too — He’s our last chance.”

Dazai cranked his neck. “Break his jaw and his hands. Don’t let him digest anything — Don’t let him touch anything.”

Koyama fiddled with the lock on the heavy door, the clang of rusty metal echoing off the walls. There were no windows and no light that wasn’t fire; when the door opened, it painted shapeless shadows around them.

A man was sitting at the dead center of the room. According to Yoko, he had been there for three days — kept safe and still until she could finally find who the two shadows he had been mumbling about were.

He looked like every well-placed man Mori had ever let him torture — unfit for prison, with his freshly cut hair and nice clothing, oozing off superiority despite the circumstances. When he raised his head, his eyes were settled on something too far away to even try to imagine it.

Chuuya’s face sharpened for the attack. Dazai’s mouth caught up on the situation before his mind did — he grasped his arm, nullifying him. “Wait —“

“Ah,” Mihara Pao said, blinking, gaze focusing. He offered them an uncertain smile, raising one hand to wave. “No need to worry, little shadows. I have no intention of killing myself.”

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: i like stars because they were the first thing i saw after emerging from the debris of the destruction my own self brought to an entire portion of the city dazai: [idc if you had a happy childhood don't make that my issue.png] hi there!

some trivia about this chapter, to start off: tsuchiya yukio, who we will see more of, is inspired by a irl male author by the same name. her ability is named after one of his works: faithful elephants, a true story of animals, people and war. i just felt like bsd was missing that snow white animal charmer element yk another trivia — the entire last arc of this chapter, taking place at the pomegranate, is inspired by the fifth chapter of the divine comedy, hell section. you might be vaguely familiar with the story of paolo and francesca; if not by popular storytelling, then purely because hozier wrote francesca and ruined my life with it. there are some details i took from their story (which i suggest you check out because 10/10) which made me giggle ngl. pao and furata. subtle right.

and that's pretty much it! as always, i hope you've enjoyed this chapter. we're slowly diving in more into the partnership side of soukoku, and into my personal headcanon that they'd despise talking to enough to learn secret languages instead (like it's normal). i hope you enjoyed, and i hope to see you next time, if you made it this far.

see you :~)!

BECAUSE

Chapter Summary

There was certain an etiquette to follow when welcoming higher ranked members to one's homes.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xi.

---

Case number: 08896772

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. and their subordinates brought fundamental information to [...]*

---

Three days prior to the funeral.

Crimson was the only way to describe the full moon in Yokohama.

Blood-light washed the buildings with unconventional gentleness, smearing through the windows of the apartment, painting the walls in red. It drowned the city in a scarlet wind, an ominous sort of tinge that seemed to recall dawn in its dirtiest shades. When the doorbell rang, the last cloud hiding the moon disappeared, deepening the scarlet shadows.

Hirotsu was waiting behind the door, envelope in hand and a half burned out cigarette between his lips. Composed as ever — if the sight of the red marker lines all over Chuuya's face surprised him, he didn't show it.

"Good evening," he announced. "I believe I might have found something."

"The something, is it a flamethrower?" Chuuya asked, knuckles white around the edge of his door. "Because I'm looking for one."

"Not exactly," Blood stained his collar; a new enough consequence, that his mission must have been harder than usual. Successful, still, given the cigarette. "But you boys do have a mission budget."

"We spend it at the Arcade," He waved the matter away, unimpressed. "Enviably success rate, remember? Shame, anyway. Get out of my apartment. How did you even find it?"

The man's foot barely managed to sneak in the closing door, bones rattled. "Executive Kouyou let me know."

"Traitor," he muttered, with the same vengeance he had reserved for his Boss since the so-called Pomegranate Accident. "I made it clear I'd decide who gets to know where I live."

"I will gladly remove the information from my mind," Hirotsu offered, absolutely serious. "Not right now, though. I looked around for information on the Nine Rings seal, as you asked. I found it."

From his non-ideal perspective, Dazai saw the boy blink, skeptical. "And you personally came to bring news?"

Awkwardness wasn't built for his monocle and white beard; nonetheless, when he settled his eyes over Chuuya's shoulder, he did so blankly. "A great part of the Black Lizards support the quiet campaigns that demand your heads on a silver platter. I decided taking the matter in my own hands would be better."

"That's nice," Chuuya replied, distractedly. "So, no flamethrower at all?"

“Death by fire is not even in my top five most well-considered methods of suicide,” Dazai intervened, spread on the beanbag that was Chuuya’s only piece of furniture. “And death by you is to be escaped at all and any costs. I will have to refuse.”

The cigarette almost fell from Hirotsu’s mouth. He doubted it had anything to do with their matching marker stains, blue and red and vicious. “What are you doing here?”

Panic widened Chuuya’s eyes; served him right, he thought, for spreading the voice that he would put mummy-repellant-mines all around his apartment just to ward Dazai off. “We’re —“ “Having a sleepover,” he concluded, serious.

Chuuya’s flinch was a full body experience. Through gritted teeth, he confirmed: “The Mackerel and I are having a sleepover.”

“This guy has never even heard of the Sleeping Beauty,” Dazai added, subtly rolling a finger near his temple. “And he goes around talking about hundreds of nasty spots-having dogs movies. Can you believe it?”

“Sleeping what?” His nasty glare straightened his shoulders. “I mean — Yes. Whoever makes a dick joke first loses bean bag privileges,” he confirmed.

“And has to steal Ane-san’s favorite kanzashi. ”

“And has to perform revenge method 132. ”

Dazai’s lips parted. “Now, wait a second —“

“A sleepover,” Hirotsu echoed, stuck. His poor cigarette had landed on the floor; his shock had been washed away by bone deep exasperation. “The two of you. Are having a sleepover.”

“Yes,” they agreed.

As if the man hadn’t heard a word, he insisted: “Willingly.”

“That might be taking it too far,” Chuuya muttered, opening his door wider.

Hirotsu frowned, eyes beginning to roam inside. “Why is your computer under the table?”

“I’m under the table too!” Dazai waved.

“Shitty Dazai likes being under the table,” the boy concluded. “You tell anyone about this apartment, I will stick that monocle in your senile rib cage, permanently. Alright?” A nod. “Alright. Come in.”

There wasn’t much to look around for, but Hirotsu tried all the same, polite until his last breath. The mess on the wall was the most eye-catching part, but the man wisely decided to brush past it, studying the concerning amount of medicines on the table. His gaze lingered on the crime weapons: the two markers they had been trying to gauge each other's eyes out with.

That the old man knew where he lived, now, probably meant something to Chuuya — who was fidgeting a bit more than usual, arms crossed and eyes following the Commander's nape like a rifle sight.

It didn't seem to relax when Hirotsu, corners of his mouth tilted downwards and shoes removed, questioned: "Chuuya, did you move in recently?"

"A month after joining," Walking heavy strides to the table, Chuuya proceeded to sneak his foot under it and kick him in the side. "Move the fuck up. There's a guest."

"And you want him to sit on the beanbag?" The spirit of Kouyou Ozaki blinked in his eyes, nurturing his next kick. "Ouch!"

There was certain an etiquette to follow when welcoming higher ranked members to one's homes. Mori had never clarified where their temporary role landed them — there wasn't a name for it, either; except, perhaps, target. Hirotsu fell somewhere under the Executives and over Mori's Intelligence; seniority and survival from the old reign made him more respected than that.

Like most respected men in the Port Mafia, he never drank from already filled glasses.

"I think I can get you tea, Grandpa," Chuuya called, from behind the counter, searching inside his almost empty kitchen shelves. He was standing on his tiptoes; Dazai's mind memorized the free mocking material with unrelented energy. A corner of it counted freckles on the small of his back, shirt rising, shaped like an elephant muzzle. "No, I was kidding. I do have several Zena."

"He also has one teacup," Dazai informed him, taking the envelope from his unresisting hands. He dropped the contents on the floor, eying the scattered pictures critically. "A chipped one. But you can't have the coffee one, that's mine. Hirotsu, couldn't this have been an email?"

"Fuck emails," Chuuya said, with feeling.

Before he could go on a tangent about his in-person preferences, or his deeply-rooted issues, Dazai hurried to add: "Why did you bring me a four years old's drawing of a crane?"

Hesitance slowed down his response.

His eyes had yet to abandon the emptiness around them; he observed Dazai, too — traced the skin under his eyes and his slightly shaking fingers. Good at his job, as always. Good enough, he thought, that he almost managed to be so unnoticed.

"I have drunk enough energy drinks for several lifetimes — so, no," he answered, finally. "And that would be my drawing, Dazai, thank you very much. I had to copy it in less than thirty seconds, before the room I infiltrated blew up. Forgive the hurry."

“Oh,” He hovered the paper upon his head to study better. “But it is a crane, yes?”

“And it’s one of the hints those who search for the Nine Rings’ seal are granted,” Hirotsu confirmed. “Those who wish to try have to be shown the way by particularly relevant figures in the organization — like the tattoo artist Kouyou mentioned. Most of the clues are only understandable to ancient families; it’s all a play on their lore and their history.”

“And cranes, apparently,” Chuuya jumped on the counter, opening his Zena, studying the drawing over Dazai’s shoulder. “Are cranes supposed to mean something different for them?”

“What do they mean for you?”

“Kouyou added a crane to the mural in her tea room,” He shrugged. “Means longevity, she said.”

“It could be the same,” Hirotsu replied, as he leaned down to gather the mess of papers from the floor — reports over reports, photographs stained in blood at the edges. “Each hint describes the seal in some way, supposedly. I hardly doubt it to be the cage of some forgotten power, but it might be connected to an Ability.”

“Like Tsuchiya Mi,” Dazai considered. At the man’s face, he clarified: “The doctor. Her medical tools are infused with their first owner’s Ability, but she’s the one who actually exploits the power.”

“Even if you wanted to ask, she’s currently out of town,” Hirotsu said. “Ace brought her with him to the extraction point for the chemical cargoes.”

“He brought our best doctor on a possible battlefield?” Chuuya snapped. “Is he insane?”

“Boss and Executive Kouyou are testing an old theory,” the man replied, perfectly balanced. Mori had always liked to test out his sleepless nights’ thoughts during bloodbaths. Typical of a doctor. “He believes the men aren’t giving everything they could yet. Deprived of our healing grace, they might start pulling their weight. Between the pills and the battle, we’ve already lost too many.”

Dazai squinted at the scribbled cane, dragging his nails down the paper. “Slug, how likely is Yukio to put poison in our food if we ask about her sister?”

“Do I look like I’d eat anything offered from a mafioso, at the moment?” he scoffed. The Commander made a face. “I don’t know. I can ask Koda to talk to her, but is a link all that possible? For all we know, the seal isn’t even special. Beatrice said it was all symbolism.”

“Beatrice?” Hirotsu asked.

“Don’t worry about it,” Dazai replied, swiftly. “Remind me our numbers on the southern border? I have reasons to believe the Nine Rings will target the Kimoto trade, next.”

We have to find it anyway, he traced on the paper, keeping his eyes on Hirotsu. Chuuya leaned a bit more on his back. If we don’t, the Nine Rings will keep coming back. Getting rid of the syndicate once and for all would do wonder for the Mafia’s name.

Chuuya's hand sneaked on his shoulder. Do you think you could nullify it? Tsuchiya's tools don't work on you.

It would prove whether it's Ability-infused or not, he considered. Step one. We need to find the seal. She must know where it is.

So we have to find Beatrice, he sighed, staring at the ceiling.

Brings us back to lobster.

A pause. Lobster?

I said lobster.

What?

One. Step one.

How are they similar?

“—not counting Ace's battalion,” Hirotsu concluded. “What makes you think they will target the organ trade? It seems counterproductive. Even if they're trying to shut us off economically, why focus on a market they can't join? It would —

Dazai threw the papers on the counter. “Don't worry about it, old man. Just considering. This whole war thing is getting boring.”

“You can say that,” Chuuya scrubbed his eyes with his palms. “Not even that much ass to kick.”

He had opened two buttons of his dress shirt, or perhaps lost them during their marker fight. Apart from the red lines all the way to his Adam's pome, the edges of his Port Mafia tattoo peeked between spiral, unnatural scars.

I'm not going to kill you.

Was Hirotsu's mark still as visible as it had been the day he had gotten it? Had he frowned as he got it, or kept as still as he did surrounded by bullets? Perhaps he had been old even as a youngster, muttering about ink tainting his skin.

All of Dazai's scars looked out of place on his body — the tattoo included. It hardly mattered, he considered, because scientists wrote entire papers on the death of the sun and then went on with their day. Dazai would never grow old enough to witness it.

“Excuse me,” Hirotsu was asking, looking around with the politeness of an expert liar. “Could I use the bathroom?”

Busy as he was chugging his drink, Chuuya just nodded towards the hallway. Alarms blared in his head; he smacked a hand across his back, making him choke.

“No!” Chuuya yelled, between coughs, turning a startled gaze on them. “No — No, you can’t. Sorry. No bathroom.”

Calmly: “Why not?”

“You know how it is with gravity manipulators,” Dazai intervened, vacantly, while the other boy fished for air. “He got mad at me for one small comment on his height and boom! Bathroom soaked. All kinds of stuff on the floor. I’d steer away.”

Hirotsu stared at them. Keeping his eyes on him, Dazai sunk two fingers in the boy’s side, forcing the coughs out of Chuuya’s frame.

He sighed. Massaging his temples, he walked into the kitchen, pulling the closest drawer open. “I’m going to pretend I believe you, and we are not going to talk about this. ‘That fine with you?’”

“Absolutely,” Dazai jumped up.

“Fucking great,” Chuuya mumbled.

“And,” Hirotsu insisted. “You’re going to swear that whatever is in that bathroom isn’t going to cause Boss more problems than he already has.”

Quietly, they shared a glance.

Ten years more dug ten lines more on his face. “Lie to me, boys.”

“There’s nothing in the bathroom, sir,” Chuuya crossed his hands behind his back. “And if there were, it wouldn’t cause Boss any problems.”

Hirotsu nodded. Motioning towards the door, he declared: “Your neighbors — I don’t know why they all closed their doors in terror when I passed by —”

“They’re afraid the bastard will bring out the bunnies again,” Chuuya explained, with no context.

Clearly exhausted, the man nodded again. “Go ask them for plates. And glasses. And chopsticks. I can gather something to cook you dinner.”

Dazai paused. He listened to the rattle of the few pans that had just been discovered, the pop! of plastic bags for food he doubted Chuuya had bought himself. Perplexity was painted on the other boy’s face, too — but a sharper kind of confusion; fragile, glass shards at the edge of a precipice.

The old man had gone out of his way to give them clues. He deserved a chance to correct his mistake.

Tentatively, he pushed: “Why are you doing that?”

“Have you already eaten?”

They exchanged a glance. “No.”

“When’s the last time you ate?”

“What is it to you?” Chuuya insisted.

“I have read your personal reports,” Hirotsu shrugged, dropping rice in a container that had never been used. “Assassination attempts, high value missions, Boss’ secret instructions — I’m not trying to lecture you. I know you’re — self-sufficient. You don’t want people in your business. I get it. It’s an age thing.”

An age thing, he mouthed, just to taste it.

An age thing, he thought, lips quivering. An age thing, like almost sixteen were an illness of kinds, a virus no one had yet found a cure for, a caress with too long nails — sinking in a child’s skin and filling their head with foolish things. You used to be so nice. You used to listen so well.

The pettiness of adolescence — Dazai scraping at the dirt under fingertips and staring at his ceiling for hours at the time, sleeping with a gun under his pillow. An age thing, as if Chuuya living in an unfurnished house was a matter of laziness. He’ll buy a couch when he stops being a teenager. He’ll fill the fridge when he’s all grown.

Hirotsu — uncaring or unaware that no one cooked them dinner, — insisted: “But Dazai looks like he hasn’t showered in years, and you, Chuuya, almost passed out during regroupment this morning —”

The boy sputtered. “No, I didn’t — “

“You’re no use to Boss if you’re dead,” the man insisted. “You have men. Use them. You don’t always have to be on the field. When’s the last time either one of you slept?”

Dazai opened his mouth to answer, but a pointed glance to the skin under his eyes told him it would be useless.

Discomfort was pulling Chuuya’s eyes in every direction. Scoffing, he concluded: “Whatever. I’ll get you plates. You play chef, since you’re so damn knowledgeable.”

He stalked out of the apartment, leaving the door open — possibly, unwilling to slam it. Their teeth wouldn’t end on the curb, if their pranks hadn’t landed them there — but he knew Kouyou wouldn’t forgive the disrespect.

Mori would sigh. An age thing, Dazai thought.

“I’m going to help,” he announced grandly, wiping his features clean. The wind from the open door tickled the sweat stains of his shirt; everywhere Chuuya lived always felt too cold. “We don’t want the dog to bark all over the neighbors’ porches, do we?”

Hirotsu hummed. “Certainly not.”

“Isn’t it sort of peculiar, how we’re all hardwired for three meals a day?”

“Can’t say I ever thought much about it.”

“Oh, I have!” Dazai twirled to the door, the ground a razor-sharp edge to the blade on his wrists. “How does that saying go? Eat or die. Work to make bread, and eat that bread. How aggravating.”

Inevitability and blindness were much the same. Dazai and Chuuya and their handler. “Get salt, too,” Hirotsu called, as he skipped down the hallway.

Finding Chuuya was easy — he had left thin cracks on the ground with every step, all the way to the floor over their own, landing on the dimly lit threshold of apartment 908 — right over his.

The door was open; inside, to put it concisely, was chaos.

Not a piece of furniture matched the other in color, style, or state of destruction. The wallpaper was a bright yellow, patterned in little parrots — the walls were littered in rifles, revolvers, machetes, and weapons of every kind, some of them covered in stickers. The map of the apartment mirrored Chuuya’s own; on the other side of the counter was the kitchen, littered in Polaroid pictures and magnetic souvenirs.

An enormous chandelier dangled from the ceiling, each crystal piece — real crystal, if his time in Chuuya’s old job had taught him anything — a different color. It painted colorful squares on every surface, raining on the exaggerating number of couches in psychedelic colors — two of them pushed together by a sheet with an enormous replica of a seagull.

No, he corrected himself. Not a seagull.

“Robbing a dead man’s house? Seems tasteless even for you,” Dazai called, making his way inside. A squeak! under his heel started him; the neon green wolf shaped toy stared back at him.

The squeak! reappeared — this time, though, from the colorful parrot perched on the windowsill. A beautiful animal, with disconcertingly intelligent eyes — it tilted its eyes as soon as Dazai entered its visual field, as if more than ready to attack.

“Your bandaged ass ain’t ever seen taste,” Chuuya said, unimpressed. It took him a moment to find him — he was kneeling behind the counter, searching for plates in the lower kitchen doors.

“Kouyou has brought me to wine tasteries too, you know? I was just smart enough to escape,” Dazai jumped over a plastic bag of cutlery and chopsticks.

Dropping to the ground, he waved at the mistrustful parrot, studying the curved line Chuuya’s shoulders drew against the kaleidoscope-like wall. There was a stiffness to it that was strangely malleable; the sort of fragile allowance a wounded beast might concede in the darkness of an alley, away from eyes.

He hadn't worn it around Hirotsu. Dazai didn't know what to make of him wearing it around him.

"How come Albatross owned all this silverware?"

"He liked parties," He shrugged, casual and fake, head stuck inside the door. "And he liked money. Most of all, he liked impressing people. Pretty sure this collection is from Brazil."

"And so is the parrot?"

"Ōmu?" Chuuya glanced over to the bird, rubbing at the marker lines on his face. "I'm not sure. The thing might come from another planet, honestly. Creeps me the fuck out."

"Fuck!" Ōmu repeated, cheerfully.

He blinked. "He called his parrot, parrot?"

"Yeah," His deep sigh was too fond to be fully exasperated. "He did."

Accepting it, Dazai surveyed the apartment again — scattered clothes on the floor; old knick knacks and reports; pictures half extracted from their frames, and never fixed. It didn't quite look like a place that had not been lived in in months.

Tilting his neck until it burned, he marveled at the ceiling — almost every inch of it was covered in movie posters, crooked and faded, of every genre. Only one factor grouped them together: Lippman's face, and the full exploitation of his public relations facade. One of the best Executive candidates, Mori had said.

Like every other Flag, he considered. Verlaine had been smart in many ways.

"A dramatic idiot," Chuuya agreed, eyes stubbornly on the plates. Stuck between the pictures were post-it notes and excerpts from journals and books; the closest to his face recited, in curling letters: when a loved one dies, you have got to kill youeself. "But yeah, I suppose. Smart."

Dazai didn't waste time wondering how he had followed his train of thought. "Someone was a big fan," he commented, instead. He remembered the media talking about Lippman's death for weeks. A gas leak. He wondered if his fans mourned not having a place to shed their tears on.

"Or a big piece of shit," Chuuya insisted. His fingers twitched on a photograph; he didn't know if it was remnant frustration or affection. He didn't know the difference. "I was never sure. He'd beg Lippman on his knees to bring him on set, and he'd make us go to every single first show, and he'd do stuff like this. Either he was a master of sarcasm, or he sucked at it."

"Was it your idea or Albatross' — to move in under his apartment?"

Chuuya squinted. "What's this, 20 Questions?"

“Gathering data,” he specified. “Off-limits. It’s the best explanation you’ll get. But you want to babble on and on about them, clearly, so I don’t see why we shouldn’t pursue a situation which benefits us both. Say, is Dante’s Limbo this place?”

On the window seal, Ōmu screeched. Chuuya had his jaw clenched so tightly it was pulsing. “You’re nothing but a miserable waste of medical supplies —“

“I’ll tell you about the Sheep recruitment,” he interrupted, fiddling with a peculiarly shaped fork — the end resembling a skull. “If your material is amusing enough.”

“Who cares about your amusement?” the boy mumbled, slamming the kitchen door like a gunshot. As one, as if electrocuted by a sound they had both been expecting, they flinched.

The silence took a more fractured note.

The ocean of pictures badly stuck to the walls and the kitchenette fell into his eyes. Red hair and a permanently complaining mouth ruled most of them; not all of them were stolen candids, though. As quietly conspiratorial as possible, he offered: “You want to go back to Hirotsu’s sudden guilt complex turned housewife tendencies instead?”

His grimace could have rusted the silver.

“It wasn’t like I had anywhere to stay, after the Sheep,” Chuuya vomited up, clipped, dragging his nails up the crack in a ceramic plate. “Kouyou offered me a room at hers, but I don’t —“ A pause. “Didn’t, I guess — trust her like that. Stayed at this one motel, and Albatross found out. He saw a spider in the shower and screamed like it was the damn plague. He dragged me here. End of your stupid story.”

“And he didn’t suggest you buy furniture?” he asked, a tad too petulant.

The aggravation of an owner whose dog had run off too far away. Dazai had never contested the Flags — not the way he had whined behind Kouyou’s gowns, going on and on about how he had dragged Chuuya in for his own entertainment. It had never seemed worth it; he knew how to pick his winning battles.

Between pranks — torture training, Mori had called them, once he had explained them in detail — and creaking Arcade buttons, Chuuya had only existed as long as he was in his visual field.

“Wouldn’t shut up about it, actually,” Chuuya replied. “He had planned this — trip, I guess? Wanted to go to the nearest IKEA and pick the most outrageous furniture. Iceman kept sighing. I kept delaying. I don’t really — this stuff, I forget it. I lived in the streets. A bed is fine.”

Dazai met the parrot’s eyes again. Despite its clever eyes, the stubbornness with which he was trying to bite the window handle off was astonishing.

How despicable, he considered, almost a whine. Understanding seldom wasn’t.

“Did you buy the apartment?”

Chuuya shrugged. “No, but he did. He had no living family, though, and I was the only one there to hear his last words — at the Old World,” A pause. “Boss is rebuilding it, you know. Told me I should have just let him know about the issue — that the income would be great, or something.”

Of course, Dazai didn’t smile, because it would have felt too mean.

He had seen the boy pass by the street where reconstruction was happening — all under the grasp of Mori’s sweetest smile. All he had seen on his face was longing, and the distinct awkwardness one might feel after summoning a disappointing ghost.

Distance, she had told him, once, is merely a word. We made it up not to leave it empty.

“I just claimed he had left me the apartment, like the motorcycle,” Chuuya dragged his eyes to a picture, pinned with a sun magnet. Pianoman’s face was covered in paint; Doc was attempting to clean it. “I mean, it was the best choice for everyone. Wouldn’t wish this ugly wallpaper on anyone. And you haven’t seen the bedroom mural —“

“So it was better to keep it where you could reach it?” Dazai concluded. “Where you could freely lock yourself in, without anyone complaining to the landlord about the grieving garden gnome?”

“And you’re better off pretending you’re not ecstatic about Hirotsu playing the caring game?” Chuuya snapped.

Disbelief soaked his laughter. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Come on,” He scoffed. “Your whole face lit up the moment he put on that stupid apron. Where does a freak like you get a thing for homemade meals?”

“I don’t know,” he replied. Cut after cut, a seesaw going up and down. He knew, distantly — it would have been easier to talk if they got off it. “Your Sheep promised me one, though.”

Chuuya sneered. “The only things the Sheep could offer were booze, bread, and tight babysitting hours.”

“And lies,” Dazai reminded him, easily. “I was thirteen, and I was dressed nicely, under all the dirt. You look like a smart kid. Want to join?” He snorted. “They told me I’d finally get a nice meal. I was all bones. I’m not surprised you don’t know about me, though — I slipped right through their fingers. They were probably too embarrassed to report their failure to the boy sweating off to make them a feared syndicate.”

“Why?” Chuuya asked, so deeply annoyed by his own curiosity one would have thought he wasn’t the one feeling it.

“Why was I all bones, or why did I refuse?”

“Both.”

“Your stories aren’t that entertaining.”

“Oh, for fucks’ —“ He seethed. He breathed. “Alright, so you were clearly living in the streets. Why did you refuse? The Sheep had a good reputation, and with the spike of human trafficking cases caused by the previous Boss —”

“Do I look like someone who would get human trafficked that easily?”

“They would have kept you safe.”

Dazai leaned his chin on his hand, looking up at him through his eyelashes. “You would have?”

His full-body, revolted shiver was tactile. “In case you don’t remember, I told you I would have murdered you on the first day. And you said you’d have me assassinated. Probably steal my supposed throne as well.”

“Oh, so now you remember it?”

His forehead didn’t feel creased; when the boy’s fingers pressed against it, though, he felt his eyelids flutter — breathing out. “Irrelevance tends to cause forgetfulness, did you know?”

“Dazai Osamu, King of the Sheep,” he drawled, theatrically. “Dazai Osamu, best martial artist in the Port Mafia. Dazai Osamu, Arahabaki vessel.”

Chuuya snorted. “Nakahara Chuuya, Demon Prodigy?”

Their knees brushed against each other, legs crossed and an absurd amount of silverware between their bodies. He studied the naked border of land between the boy’s gloves and his sleeves — the whitish scars peeking between freckles, unrealistic in their undeadliness. He wondered if it was obsession, too — even if it burned.

“I didn’t accept because it wasn’t what I wanted,” Dazai said, eventually. “Your Sheep promised me a chance at survival. Unfortunately, there was nothing I wished for less. A scrawny thing like you will end up dead by the night, they told me. I prayed they would be right. The idea of joining them seemed so —”

He scrambled for a metaphor, something to make a woman who had hated his stuttering ways proud — for something to accurately depict the sheer loathing he felt. “They looked like what they turned out to be: loudmouthed traitors. All so unbearingly boring.”

“Boring,” Chuuya echoed.

His tattoo peeked through the sides of his shirt; his hands had ripped a few pictures off. There was no secret method to print memories on fingertips, but he tried, and he tried, and he tried

“Them asking me to join — it was everything. Suribachi was hell, and I was a bomb ready to explode. Again,” Something like a grimace pulled his face; the vulnerability at the edges was more violent than any bullet. “If they hadn’t — I don’t know. Shirase gave me a piece of bread. Fuck, I didn’t even know what bread was.”

“That’s sad. Bread is very good.”

“It is, ” Chuuya frowned. “They didn’t need me. They just needed everything I had to give,” The huff out of his mouth sagged the air with bitterness; then nostalgia; then something Dazai was not like-them enough to understand. “Jerks. But they were kids. I can’t — I know they sold me out. Blaming them seems fucking cheap, though.”

An age thing, Dazai thought. A council of thirteen, piling up stolen cargoes on Mori’s desk — and only one person to throw rocks at. The face Chuuya had made as he watched Shirase embark. An age thing — allowing something as unfruitful as codependency to mold you into a thing made of loyalty and sweat.

It was despicable. It was always in his visual field.

“Alright, so you owe them everything,” Dazai conceded, bored. “But what did the Flags even offer you, to make you so loyal to them?”

“Nothing phenomenal, asshole,” Chuuya mocked. “I didn’t stay with the Sheep for a stupid piece of bread, or a roof, or the stolen cough drops. I don’t get sick. I could have survived. Doc, Iceman, Pianoman —” His lips turned white; he pressed them hard enough to taste blood. His or theirs, he didn’t know. “The Flags were everything the Mafia is meant to be.”

On the reports he had read out of spite — to be mean was to be precise; and he hadn’t thought there was anything wrong with it, until Hirotsu’s mouth had curled down — the Flags’ deaths had been praised. They died, essentially, it had read, in an effort to give Nakahara more time, so that he might kill Verlaine and save our Boss. As we are all bound to do.

The Port Mafia conduct was admirable, in theory. Dazai didn’t doubt all those flashy shows of loyalty — something he felt in his bones — had roped Chuuya in with the efficiency of a light to a moth.

They died, essentially Dazai had thought, where Mori couldn’t look him in the eyes and remind him that he was necessary for that city, which would have not been a lie — for nothing.

“Nothing special,” Chuuya echoed. “They were just my friends.”

The kaleidoscopic chandelier fractured his eyes, staining their already unmatching color further. Back when he was younger, people had called them the devil’s mark.

Chuuya had disappeared for a week, as soon as the Hospital had let him hop around with his black hole wounds. His reappearance at the Headquarters had come with distracted condolences and questions about the red sky — he wasn’t allowed to answer.

They had met again on one of the couches outside the meeting room, where Mori had asked them to wait. They had kicked each other’s feet and decided Corruption was a good name for a bad deal. He had made a tasteless joke about most of it — except for the human shaped question mark hover on his lips. He felt no need to mock irrelevant doubts.

His hat was in place. Red strands had been styled to cover his right eye, expert in the way only someone who had gotten a fair shade of black eyes could master. When Dazai had mocked, what's with the new look?, Chuuya had, surprisingly, only looked up.

He had fallen utterly quiet.

"Physically unable to get sick?" he questioned, finally.

"You can bet," Chuuya climbed to his feet, grabbing all his stolen goods. He flicked his forehead. "Nothing like you. Never had a fever, never had a cold, never had a sore throat. Arahabaki is — rather efficient in eliminating threats. He wouldn't appreciate it if I died so easily, I suppose."

"Wouldn't he?" Dazai replied, surprised. "I had assumed he wanted nothing more than a chance to rip your tiny body to shreds and escape."

He tilted his head to the side; an ear offered to a sound no one else could perceive. "He doesn't really want anything. He exists, so he destroys. I'm his cage and his only possibility to actually do either. Breaking free would mean putting an end to anything he might ever wish to annihilate."

They were simply my friends.

Dazai couldn't quite wrap his mind around it. Even a tenth of what Chuuya had wasted so freely and easily on all those people would have cost him everything.

"Chuuya," he called, as he locked the door of Albatross' apartment. When he turned, his amber eye was the soiled ground in the backyard of an old house — unfit to ever grow anything but poison. "Chuuya, what did you see in Dante's Limbo?"

It twisted his mouth: "Why can't you just —"

"I don't know," He shrugged. Dazai liked having him in his visual field. Dazai wanted to tear his eyes out before they could roam. Dazai wanted to see him be an Event Horizon again — if it killed him, if it killed them both, if it killed everyone. "You didn't refer to Arahabaki as a him, before."

Silence embraced the hallway; Albatross' door closed in the space between them, a soft thud that failed to startle them.

The skin around Chuuya's lips turned whiter and whiter; when he tore them apart, they were ruby and bitten. "Let's just go."

Dinner was a strangely light affair, crawling up the naked and crime-lined walls of the apartment — not unlike the nights Mori had left him and Elise alone in the clinic. Hirotsu had given his all with the little he had — Dazai hardly recalled the last time he had eaten something not quickly swept off from a street vendor.

Chuuya eyed the maze of rice, vegetables, and meat distrustfully.

“It’s not going to attack you,” Dazai assured him, switching their cups with ease. “I get that you and a carrot are barely different in height —“

“I will tear you apart.”

“That’s not nice,” He broke a protein bar the man had thrown into the mix in two, forcing one half in his hand. “Come on. Partners need to share.”

Hirotsu got the bean bag, because the ghost of Kouyou Ozaki hovered in the corners of the kitchen. “Th’s ‘s ac’ually good,” Dazai nodded towards him, mouth stuffed with food. His body would regret the sudden interruption to emptiness, but he knew how to harvest. “Like — se’iou’y, g’anpa.”

“Is the nickname truly necessary?” Hirotsu had hung his coat and scarf to a nail he had mistaken for a hook — it was actually Dazai’s failed attempt to find a pipe and flood the apartment. “Your compliments are appreciated, though. Miranda dislikes my cooking.”

“You said you met her during a mission?” Chuuya asked, distractedly dividing his rice in portions with his chopsticks.

A hum. “More or less. I had never looked for anyone to spend my life with, but — abandoning her seemed impossible.”

“That’s so romantic,” Dazai sighed. “If only I could find someone that dedicated to commit a double suicide with me. Do you think Miranda would do it for you?”

“I — hope not?”

He made a face. “Then she isn’t the right one. I’m not sure of what a right one is, though. You know, Madame Tanaki says her husband wouldn’t hesitate!”

“She says it to shut you up, moron,” Chuuya explained, helpfully, with the same noncommittal tone he reserved for the secretary these days. “When did you meet?”

“Oh, it’s been almost ten years now,” Hirotsu — he didn’t quite smile; almost. “Coincidentally, it was the mission that landed me a spot in the Black Lizards. I didn’t become Commander until Boss’ reign — but joining the Lizards had been something of an obsession for me. Miranda was my luck in a bottle.”

“For Mori to give you that much power, you must have been a vocal denouncer of the old Boss,” Chuuya observed.

“Not at all. In fact, as far as I know, I was the first man to attempt to assassinate him.”

A pickle fell from the redhead’s lips. “What?”

“I remember that!” Dazai jumped in, gulping down his food. “Mori was absolutely terrified. You appeared out of nowhere, all obscure and vengeful. I’d never heard Elise whine so loudly.”

“And you weren’t executed?” the boy insisted, eyebrows brushing his hairline. “He promoted you for trying to get rid of him?”

He raised his chopsticks. “I would.”

“Boss saw my potential,” Hirotzu explained, wiping traces of sauce off his mustache. He recalled the first time they had eaten together — one of the vague afternoons after Mori’s take-over and before Chuuya’s existence, back when Dazai would twirl around in boring circles and annoy people who didn’t even turn to look at him; facing each other in a booth in some Western franchise shop, as the man nodded politely at the torture methods he’d come up with.

“He thought he and I were more similar than I had first assumed. He’s a terribly smart man. One conversation, and laying my life in his hands seemed the most obvious choice.”

“I’d been loyal to a fault to the previous Boss. I don’t know if you remember, Chuuya, but when we first met, I told you I understood your attitude,” He stared down at his bowl, pensive. “I, too, had once relied solely on my Ability and strength. When I was a bit older than you, I was proved wrong. If the previous Boss hadn’t recruited me, I — Wouldn’t be here.”

Hirotzu sunk his chopsticks on the last piece of meat, squinting the eye behind the monocle to study it. “All old stories, anyway. I don’t suppose —” He raised his gaze, meeting their matching expectant looks, slowly crawling closer on the floor. A sigh. “Well.”

“I was trained by a stubborn man,” he offered “For two years, I wasn’t allowed to use my Ability. By the first week, there was no one I hated more than that man. I told him I wished to offer my life to the Boss who had saved me. He told me — over my dead body you’ll join my Lizards.”

“Is he dead?” Dazai guessed.

“He is. He was wounded to the point of no return during that mission, ten years ago. I killed him, out of his own request. His last order was my appointment as a Black Lizard,” Hirotzu raised his glass, a silent toast. “And Boss’ first order in his new role was my appointment as commander.”

Chuuya still appeared unconvinced. “If you detested him so much, how did he gain your loyalty?”

“I don’t know,” Hirotzu offered him a blink. “How did he gain yours?”

The answer was either too complicated or too easy; nonetheless, the boy went for the cowardly road of changing the subject. “Miranda — Does she know about — you know,” He moved his chopstick. “Your occupation?”

“I assume so,” The man shrugged. “It’s not exactly a topic of conversation. During the previous Boss’ last months, she went through a phase of cutting my shirts into shreds whenever I came back home late.”

“I did that to Chuuya!” Dazai gasped, happily. “It was for a greater good, though. Those tacky pants he had started wearing —“

“That was you?”

“That was after you tried to lock me inside the trashing tunnel at Building One —“

“Which,” he spelled out, “Was after you filled my taxi with flour, and started spouting bullshit about blocking my airways —“

“If you hadn’t so rudely interrupted your Free From The Sheep party, I wouldn’t have needed to —“

“Some more ramen, boys?” Hirotsu asked. “Or would you prefer me to list off every cruelty you’ve put me through?”

They ate.

They talked more, twirling Hirotsu around militia, future plans and nostalgic stories, framed by unofficial suggestions on what to do about the lack of acceptance their command was receiving — and then, when Chuuya’s alarm ticked midnight, they called it a night.

The door closed behind the commander with a soft thud, undeterred in front of the still-concerned gaze the man threw to the apartment once more.

Chuuya laid his back on it, meeting his eyes. “He’s gone.”

“He’s gone,” he agreed.

“Not much time left,” the other echoed. He moved away from the door, and nodded. “So. What the fuck do we do about the man in my bathtub?”

---

...

---

Two days prior to the funeral.

Mihara Pao fit surprisingly well in his makeshift cell. Although, Dazai supposed, shattered legs fit almost everywhere.

They had tied shreds of one of Chuuya's old shirts around his mouth, wrists and calves, but the man hardly looked wishful for an escape plan. He had laid his head down on the floor of the bathtub; his pained, permanent frown assuring that he wasn't under the effects of Dante's Ability.

"Then," Chuuya started, fiddling with Hirotsu's stolen lighter — watching Mihara struggle against the light without making his legs creak. "One day in solitary got you bored enough to talk yet?"

"Boredom is such an abstract concept," Dazai replied, crouching down next to the tub. He was more eye-catching than his brother had been; whinier, too. "Having fun with one-self is fundamental."

"You got much experience with sitting alone in the dark for hours?"

Savageness curved his lips upwards; their recent prisoner whimpered, eyes widening. "Oh, you have no idea."

They dragged Mihara to the main room, legs sweeping the floor and quiet sobs tumbling down. A seat stolen from the open window of a neighbor was settled in the middle of the space; the man's head rolled back and forth on its edge, begging for the cooperation of a tired skeleton.

Every lamp was turned on; Chuuya threw the lighter into Dazai's waiting fingers and moved his hair back. Echoing Mori's most collaborative minutes, he offered: "Hit with purpose, not with violence."

"Shut your damn mouth," Chuuya replied, automatically. He brought his fist back and, ignoring Mihara's muffled screams, he swung at his face.

Over the years, Dazai had decided torture was a simple thing: a rhythm. Hammer over nail over bone; thump after thump — knuckles over flesh over scream — shriek after shriek. He watched Mihara's face turn from one side to the other, spitting blood on the floor under the glow of Tainted; he counted, tip, tip, tap.

If he tried hard enough, he could see the clockwork of Chuuya's physics-oriented mind calculate each possible outcome in a fraction of a second. A child learning not to strangle the newborn left in his arms. Hurt, don't break. Break, don't hurt.

The wet crack! of bone severed the night

"You said you're not like other Souls," Chuuya reminded him, pulling the piece of fabric on his mouth down. His wounded cheekbone followed the motion, tilting unnaturally. Making sure to be louder than his screams, he insisted: "What did you mean? Why didn't you die as soon as we came to you?"

Dazai twirled behind him, busy in a new round of Hopscotch through the sauce lines on the floor. "One question at the time," he reminded him, turning on the lighter. "Yes and no questions first."

“No one asked you.”

“But lessons are the weapon of the most capable warriors,” he quoted, dragging the tip of the flame by the boy’s jaw, lighting his mismatched eyes like fireflies. He pushed his hand away, face stubborn. “You insisted on taking care of the cockroach yourself. Least you could do is do it properly. One question.”

Still seething, Chuuya repeated: “Are you really different from the other Souls?”

Mihara stared at the ceiling, blood splattered through his chin and lips. He might have answered, if given a few moments more. Since they didn’t have that kind of time, Chuuya raised his foot and kicked one leg of his seat — when it lit up red, he rotated his body and slammed his combat boot straight into Mihara’s chest.

The chair stood still under the kick; instead, the man’s rib cage shrieked in protest. Chuuya kept his shoe where it was, pressing harder and harder as leaned close. “You look like an absolute wimp. Be true to your shit nature and start spilling your guts.”

“Don’t humor him —“

“Would you shut up?” Chuuya directed his next kick to the chin. Mihara’s head snapped back with a sharp shout; a tooth flew out of his mouth, landing on the floor.

Violence could hardly be taught — Mori had often insisted on that point. It could be directed, perhaps; a fountain in peculiar shades of red, kept from the streets and ordered to flood the marbled halls.

It’s very easy, you see, he had explained, in lack of a manual, enthusiastic. You’re angry, but not really. He’s the cause, if you are. Is he, really? It doesn’t matter. You’re not angry, but you will look so, because it’s his fault, and he should know. Angry people are always right. You want to hurt him, and you have a right to. Because he’s the cause, and you’re angry.

Who is he?, Chuuya hadn’t exactly scoffed.

He had shrugged. Whoever Boss says, I guess.

Chuuya’s gloves were dripping coagulations of blood onto his floor, by the time Mihara’s screams had turned into little more than whines. He had rolled the sleeves of his shirt up, but it had served little help. When he pushed his hair back, he left threads of blood all over the strands.

When he breathed in — the sides of his lips curling at Mihara’s useless attempt to slide back; the strange, instinctual spasm of his thumbs humming in finally, finally repaid energy — Dazai felt it burn through his lungs.

“Y-yes —“ Mihara gasped out, through his half shattered jaw. “Yes, yes —“

Chuuya pulled him forward by his hair. “Are you currently under Dante’s influence?”

“I — nh — I, he —“

His free hand wrapped around the man's chin, clenching around the fractured bone. His mouth was forced open by his thumb and little finger, pressing into his cheeks until his lips shaped an infinite sign. "You heard the asshole. Yes or no?"

"Nuh — nh —"

Clenching deeper, "Can't hear you."

"No!" He shook his head as much as he could, frantic eyes traveling to Dazai, mistaking him, for some bizarre reason, as a possible saving grace. "N — nuh, no —"

The boy pushed him back into his seat, shrugging his hand to get rid of lingering dirt. "Great. Now give me a sentence, yeah?"

It seemed like the challenge would tear Mihara apart; threads of reddened drool stuck from his bleeding teeth to his lap, to the floor. When he tossed his head back and forth, moaning, another tooth fell out. Every motion caused his legs to tense, and every tense leg caused a scream; Dazai could see the muscles twitch in the points where Chuuya had slammed his gravity-altered foot: femurs, fibulas, heel bones.

Dazai dangled forward, bored. He leaned his chin on Chuuya's shoulder; informed him: "Mori's books say the ribs hurt the most."

Promptly, glimmering fingers merely knocked on the man's chest. His shout was animalistic, dying down the final vowels into nothing more than voiceless white noises, drowning through the snot and the blood.

"Have you ever been under Dante's influence?"

Mihara breathed. It came out in sharp, hoarse whistles. "Y-Yes."

Pushing forward, Dazai intervened: "Do you remember being under his influence?"

"He'll — H'll k'll — me, he'll —"

Chuuya grabbed his face again, ripping a groan out of his throat. "Worry less about what he might do to you, and more about what I'm currently doing."

He whimpered.

"Say, Pao," Dazai jumped the distance between them, leaning against the first shoulder the boy had fractured. "Don't tell me Dante was clumsy enough to build you upside down."

"No reason to let someone so willing to talk go, though, is there?" Chuuya replied, settling one hand on his other shoulder. He leaned all his weight on that support; no red glow appeared, but the bone cracked under his fingers all the same.

Mihara retched; Chuuya was quick to push his jaw up, black fingers a stark contrast to the deathly white skin scarlett stained, closing the gate before any actual vomit could get out. He bit his tongue in the process of swallowing — as soon as he was allowed to separate his lips, he spit blood and drool on the carpet with a guttural burp.

“He —“ he gasped, uselessly backtracking on his seat, eyes so wide they were escaping their sockets — planted on their faces. “He made — mistake, he... his Ability didn’t work. He killed me. He thought he killed me. I just — I ran. I ran —“

Suspicion tilted Chuuya’s eyebrows. “How did you end up under his influence if he thought you were dead?”

“Answered — I — Answered the call, everyone answered the call — attack the Headquarters — I heard the order, but I — nuh — I didn’t have to —“

They exchanged a glance. “You chose not to answer the call?”

“I can — hear. Hear him. His orders. His Limbo, I... I only saw it once,” Tears filled his eyes. “Oh, it was — it was...”

Dazai nodded. “And that’s how you knew about the two shadows, right? He must have been sending orders for the mass suicide during our search.”

“And how come he failed?” Chuuya insisted. “He just — I don’t fucking know. Fed you the wrong cross? Counted twenty seven seconds wrong?”

“I didn’t — he —,” Mihara gulped, shaking his head. “You can’t, I can’t —“

Scoffing, the other boy stole the lighter from Dazai’s hands, throwing it in the air. When it landed in his palm, turned on, and he settled the flaming tip on Mihara’s cheek. Undeterred by the scream climbing up his throat, he pressed down harder.

Mihara retched, again, blood dripping from his mouth in sticky coagulations. A sharp smell was slowly poisoning the air; he had squatted in enough latrines to recognize it. Confused, senseless sounds left his agonizing lips, growing louder and louder. Only when Dazai tapped Chuuya’s elbow, signaling him to lower it, he let out a long, pained whine.

“Didn’t want any —“ He gasped, breathless, wryly. “I don’t, and he said — it was supposed to — work, I swear, I swear; — I don’t know why it didn’t, but — know too much. Too much, he — he will — Furata said —“

Humming, Dazai crossed his arms over the back of the man’s seat. He leaned over his bent spine, broken and panicking, nearing his face to Chuuya’s own to stage-whisper: “Look close, yes? This is where you should start paying attention. They always blabber about their loved ones, at some point. It’s the guilt making them talk.”

Chuuya didn’t look anywhere but at him, one hand still holding onto the man’s throat. “Guilt?”

“He stumbled into Dante’s hands because he was looking for money to buy her out, correct?” he explained. “If Dante is convinced he killed him, though — how does that work?”

Understanding morphed his eyes into tight lines, surveying Mihara's face carefully. He leaned gloved hands on the edges of the armrests, tilting his face to find the man's hazed gaze. "Oh. I know how it works. Suribachi City overflows with assholes like you. You made Furata your pledge, didn't you?"

Broken veins were scattered throughout the white of his eyes; as soon as he registered those words they seemed to multiply, red webs injecting terror and shame in the faded green. "S-She —"

"She told you she could wait," Chuuya interrupted him, moving closer. Mihara's flinch shook even the seat. "But Dante must have promised you a shit ton of money, plus a visit to Heaven, right? Told you you'd get everything after the war, at the simple cost of temporary ownership over your girl."

Dazai hummed. "Is that why you allowed her to keep you in the basement? You're big and strong. You could have escaped. You must have known her looking for the two shadows would have brought you problems. What, did you feel guilty?"

"You — You don't understand!" Mihara stuttered, frantically. "You — He, you have no idea of what — this is my fault. He promised me everything, but the Judgement failed, and — and now Furata..."

"Furata is his property," Chuuya concluded. "And since he thinks he killed you, you have no way of saving her — unless you reveal yourself to him. At which point he will definitely rip your face apart."

"The Judgement," Dazai echoed. "Is that the process that gets you under Dante's influence?"

Hesitant, he nodded.

"Beautiful name. Onto the important stuff. You're still a Soul, even if mysterious circumstances supposedly gave you autonomy, correct? That means you can bring us to Dante."

"Not that you have a choice," the other voy clarified. "You're telling us where he's hiding. Every Soul must know, or there wouldn't be any need to kill them off. Where's the fucker?"

Silence.

At the man's stubborn refusal to mold his whines into something comprehensible, he moved his hands from the armrests to circle his wrists, right upon the rope.

Tightening his fingers, slow and with intent, he spelled out: "This might come as a surprise to you, but you're dead meat all the same. No need to fear Dante's gonna get you. He isn't," Chuuya's voice stayed casual; he nodded along to the man's shaking, horrified head. "I'm gonna get you first."

"Y-You —" Mihara stammered, fingers spasming in his grasp. "You — If I talk, can I —"

“Can you go?” Chuuya concluded, in his stead. “Fuck, no. You think I’m a moron or something?”

Clearing his throat, Dazai offered him a smile. “You’re being too tough, Hatrack! I beg you to forgive him, Pao. It’s a newbies’ method.”

The wood creaked under his grip, his teeth gritted against each other. “Who the fuck are you —“

“Listen, why don’t you see it like this,” he insisted. “If you talk, I’ll get you a quick death. I’ve got a gun, you know? Freshly recharged. You won’t even feel a thing. No one more than me understands the hideousness of unnecessary pain. In fact, wait here a second —“

He skipped his way behind the counter, humming cheerfully as he searched. “What the fuck do you think you’re doing?” Chuuya called.

Victorious, he showed off a bowl with leftover vegetables and a pair of chopsticks. As soon as he got close enough for the smell to fill his destroyed nostrils, Mihara eyed the food as if he had never seen anything quite similar. Dazai dragged his sleeve lower down his hand, covering the side of his palm — ignoring the man’s flinch as he got closer, he wiped the overflowing blood off his lips.

“That’s better,” he said. “Now, say aaaah...”

Under Chuuya’s suspicious glance, he dropped the food between Mihara’s shaking lips. Starved and exhausted as he was, it only took him three bites to finish everything off.

“We’re on a bit of a tight schedule, you see,” he continued, apologetic. “We need you to collaborate. You’ll die at the end of it, yes — but we promise to free Furata in your stead. That would make you happy, wouldn’t it? Who wouldn’t want to die happy?” He sighed. “If you don’t want to, though — I’m sure my partner here can make sure your death is everything I’d never wish mine to be. He’s got magic fingers, did you know?”

The spider crawling up and down the cracks in his eyes was a terrified creature. He was Port Mafia — but the lowest kind. Any higher, he wouldn’t have said a word. Any higher, he would have probably pretended not to fear the two of them.

“So,” Dazai asked, tapping his lips with the chopsticks. Blood and sauce mixed with snot; he dragged them down, painting lines on his chin. “How do we get to Dante?”

Mihara gulped, unable to look away, powerless to resist the need to keep his eyes on Chuuya’s own as well. A whistling sound left his throat, caged by lips moving aimlessly in the air. “You c-can’t stop him.”

“We can decide that on our own,” Chuuya reassured him. “What are you, Input Man?”

“No, you don’t — you can’t. He’s — He can end it all whenever he wants. He’s just waiting for — for you. He’s just waiting for you,” Breathing harshly, sharply, he begged Dazai with his blurred gaze. “And the Book, you know it — The Book will —“

He paused.

There's a room, Mori had explained, his palm somehow both cold and sweaty on his eyes, his voice the only lighthouse in the sea of shadows. Dazai had learned to walk his way down darker paths, though; he could feel every piece of furniture, every smile lingering on the doctor's lips. There's a room, and you're the only one allowed inside.

It has wide walls and no windows. The door is only yours to use. If you ever need to see with both your eyes, that's where you need to go.

Distantly, Chuuya's voice was a distorted murmur, scratching all the wrong parts of his mind. What book? Mihara was still staring at him, still talking with his deer eyes, still talking. Dazai couldn't remember if he had been smiling — he knew he wasn't anymore. He knew his arms burned, and his legs were there, attached to his body, and that he was real, and wasn't that a grievous enough thing?

The chopsticks shook in his hands, following spasming fingers. Lisichka, what's that in your hands?

Someone was screaming. It was a distinctively irritating sound. It took him a moment to realize it was too close; Mihara was tearing his vocal chords to shreds, struggling against his seat, eyes —

No.

No eyes — Dazai's chopsticks had sank into each of them, bloodied and cracked all the way to their middle.

“Oh,” he said. There's a room. “See, that's what happens when people change the subject.”

Swiftly, he extracted the chopsticks. They made a wet, visceral sound; splattered blood onto his face, warm and sticky and distinctively vicious against the bandages. Under Mihara's howls, he met Chuuya's unimpressed gaze — he hadn't taken a single step back.

“That's disgusting,” he made sure to inform him, still. An entire fraction of his eyes was evaluating Dazai head to foot, hidden behind Arcade screens and voice cracks. “And if he passes out, I'm blaming you.”

“Soul,” Mihara gasped, through the screaming and the sobbing. “You, Soul, Soul — find him —“

Politely, Dazai reminded him: “Yes, yes, we're aware. Which is why you need to —“ Realization hit him straight in the head, leaving him breathless.

“Oh,” he corrected himself. “Ah. Now I get it. You're saying he can do it?”

“Need to —“ the man swore, blinking destroyed eyelashes upon ruined organs, suffering with every movement. He sobbed like a child, loud and desperate, whines breaking the sounds at the tips, as desperate as gulps of air. “Need to — his influence, need to get him — He can get you to him. He can.”

Dazai squinted. “How do I know he won’t get him to commit a good old style suicide?”

“Too precious. Too powerful. Can’t risk to lose him, can’t — you, you demon — I promise, I promise, stop, I promise, I promise, I promise — “

He sighed, throwing the chopsticks aside. “This is rather embarrassing. I was considering leaving you alive, but you’ve witnessed my obliviousness — Chuuya, please, go ahead.”

“Wait!” Mihara screeched, fighting against his restraints, tearing his skin apart. The seat shook so violently it almost fell; when Chuuya raised his fist again, he contorted his head, trying to push himself back with the sheer power of will.

It was, as most fights were, useless. His hand lit up crimson, bright and vivid, charged to its maximum weight. The sound it made when it crumpled against one side of Mihara’s skull wasn’t familiar, but it fit to a point in an orchestra Dazai’s had never missed a concert of. The hit snapped his neck on impact — dropping the dead weight of his head against his chest as his body shut down.

In the silence, Chuuya cracked his knuckles.

Over a corpse, dropping blood onto the carpet with the efficiency of a clock — torture is rhythm, he reminded himself, is tic, toc, toc, tic, scream — both their hands dangled at their sides, stained and sticky.

On the ceiling, the lights seemed to flicker.

Dazai knew to expect it, so he watched the rush of energy leave Chuuya’s eyes — sudden like a fever. It left him swaying forward, for a single moment; hands reaching for something else to decay. When they didn’t find it, he set his jaw — clumsily wiping blood off his face like a child.

“I’m him, aren’t I?” Chuuya asked, a life later, voice blank. He raised his eyes from the corpse; met his own like he knew he had been watching, and couldn’t quite think of a reason to tell him to stop. “I’m the one who can get us to him.”

Dazai snapped his tongue against the roof of his mouth, tasting rust. He shrugged his hands, watching blood drops land on his lips.

“You’re a Soul, yes,” he confirmed. “A Soul with a valuable Ability and great connections, who he’d be a fool to kill,” The abandoned rice on the ground had mixed with the blood, almost turning into that strawberry flavor Elise liked to pretend to eat. “Who he would be afraid to lose.”

“But,” Intolerance battled angry features — but felt a descent into default. “But I don’t know where the fucker is.”

“Because you’re not under his influence,” He shrugged, sharply turning around to study their map. A smile made its way up his lips; he passed his palm over it, unsurprised when all that came off was red. “The solution is pretty easy. You might even like it.”

Chuuya sighed, kicking the corpse starting to stink up his living room. Not quite Mafia etiquette; given the way his foot almost got stuck, Dazai politely averted his eyes. The first time he had tortured a man, Mori had locked him in the bathroom of the clinic, devoid of all that was sharp and poison.

Come out when it feels like it was wrong, he had said, with a smile that reeked of affection. Dazai had never understood if he believed inflicting those lessons would birth empathy or hatred. Then we start again.

He wondered if the Sheep had ever stayed to watch him do it.

“Alright,” Chuuya crossed his arms. “How do we get me under mind control?”

---

...

---

Ten hours after the funeral.

There were two police cars at the entrance of their meeting spot — just far away enough for it to be a coincidence.

As soon as his feet touched the roof of the first of the warehouses, Dazai studied them. Apart from the silent police lights on top of them, they were barely visible — he knew cops patrolled the Port area every night; they usually kept away from the deepest corners of that Mafia territory, though.

“— number of disappearances has doubled up in the lasts month alone,” the distant voice of a radio was saying, through statics and the shattered windows of the warehouse. It had attempted to be a Nine Rings base, until they had led a squad to get rid of them; it seemed they had left some equipment behind, though. “— authorities — can’t help but wonder — what is the real nature of these mysterious disappearances? Does it have to do with the rising levels of gang violence our city has experienced in the past weeks? Can the police be blamed for their leniency in —”

Dazai yawned.

He had felt his presence as soon as landed on the roof. Chuuya wasn't any sound in particular — built for unicity, yet unable to accomplish it. But he was loud. He'd electrified the air since the first moment Dazai had laid his eyes on him, leaving the taste of a storm bound to come on his tongue. Louder than anything else.

He walked to the edge of the roof of the abandoned warehouse. There was no railing; when the tip of his shoes caressed the dark emptiness under his eyes, he bent his body ninety degrees. "Aren't you supposed to be lying low, zombie boy?"

"This is the best you get," Chuuya replied. "Any lower, I'd have to be in your pathetic shoes."

A faint red glow surrounded his body, cooling the air he occupied. He was sitting cross legged on the front wall of the warehouse, mere feet from Dazai's bent body, their chest parallel lines.

Wisely, he'd settled just far enough that he couldn't reach out and nullify him. He watched the sleeves of his coat float. "Anything yet?"

He shrugged. "No. Should my self-esteem be dented?"

"It depends. Is Dante your type?"

"Not really," His black mask hid the hesitance he could see crinkle the skin around his eyes. Slowly, he dared: "V, on the other hand —"

"The dead boy goes for the dead man," Dazai conceded. "Happy ending for everyone involved."

Chuuya snorted. His camouflage would have been more trustable if he'd gotten rid of the hat as well — but they were still laying their anti-Corruption faith in the metal lining inside it.

"We should rob a bank," he suggested.

Chuuya glanced up. "Boss would get mad."

"We should rob a bank naked," he replied. "We're basically kids. Nobody can look at the security cameras."

Confusion swam between his eyes. Eventually, he blinked. "That can't be right."

"That's easy, then," he said. "Just trust me."

He made a face.

His camouflage, he considered, would have also been less suspicious if he had refrained from defying the laws of gravity. The warehouse was one in two lines of identical buildings facing the port; waves crashing against the railings filled the night in a lonely symphony — but Dazai had never been so foolish as to believe silence meant absence.

The police car lights flickered.

“If I ask you not to run, do you think your Soul -self will listen to me?” he wondered. “It’s such a beautiful night. Perfect for a walk by the ocean. Perfect for a suicide, actually.”

“Control your urges,” Chuuya grunted, fiddling with the buttons of his jacket — the only true sign of agitation. “We’re not trying to serve Dante victory on a silver plate.”

Tension hadn’t marked a single inch of his body since the plan had been sent into motion — true to his stubborn nature, he’d sworn a lot, bought himself a bottle of wine to celebrate his funeral, and trained by punching holes on the concrete.

“Was it that you didn’t want to feel like you had with Corruption again,” he questioned — because at times, he caught him looking at his own hands as if uncertain of their true owner, “Or that you didn’t want somebody to fiddle with your body and mind again?”

Chuuya’s blue eye had disappeared through the dim waves of flickering light poles; the amber one, though, settled on him, battling the outspoken desires of his turned head.

“Both, I guess,” he concluded, blankly. Then, as if it was nothing: “And the thing you want from Dante — just how much did it need me to end up under his influence?”

He paused.

Miscalculation, clearly. The brain and the brawn, they went around calling them, still. Another mistake on their part — Dazai, who downed companionship with the same boredom he dedicated to the pills in his pocket, that will never kill him but might, and that Mori disliked vividly, still would never willingly work with someone who wasn’t —

Mori would have knocked on his forehead, amused and absolutely enraged. Little prodigy with stage fright. How dare you give keys out freely and forget to change the lock?

“Heavy accusations,” he sighed, dramatic and unserious and a warning, one that he already knew wouldn’t be taken for what it was. “What gave me away? Enlighten me.”

“You freaking the fuck out the second time someone mentioned this book was certainly a clue,” Chuuya answered, easily. His hair floated like a halo around his face; underwater and sinking in the midnight air. “I also believe that if you wanted Dante dead, he’d be dead. You’re sneaky like that. You enjoy watching the Port Mafia struggle; it’s why we’ve been stuck for months. If he’s alive, that means you think you can get something out of him. Something you need.”

He tilted his head. “What’s your theory, then?”

“Who knows. Maybe you do want me dead.”

“You ever doubted it?”

“You’re not really like me,” Chuuya answered, which wasn’t an answer at all.

“This might surprise you,” he replied, sincerely. “But your demise only interests me in the realm of what I consider personal entertainment. Who knows, I might have even grown fond of you!”

“Don’t make me throw up.”

He deflated. “Whatever.”

“You know who I almost miss?”

Dazai blinked. Dared, “The... Flags?”

“No. I mean — Yes, but. Adam.”

A vaguely metallic sound echoed in the back of his skull. “I think I’m slowly convincing myself I made him up.”

“Fucking gum-eating android,” he muttered, but the fondness was there — the same shade of red and green of Albatross’ chandelier, the same tilt of his mouth when he remembered Iceman’s favorite brand of cigarettes. “You know what his greatest dream was?”

“Dystopian robotic apocalypse in the form of political overthrow by his peers?”

Chuuya huffed. “Not at all. But he did watch shitty apocalyptic movies whenever he was feeling down. I think you’re kinda like that.”

Privately, Dazai wasn’t sure of what he was supposed to be more upset about: being compared to a British automaton or being compared to someone who’d ever get bored enough to fantasize about a political coup d’etat. “Sci-fi isn’t exactly my genre.”

“No, like — whenever something doesn’t go like you expect it to, you just revert to your. I don’t fucking know. Your, I am omniscient and you are all chess pieces to me,” He rolled his eyes so far his head could have fallen with the weight. “You said you wouldn’t hide stuff. Then Dante started one-upping you, killing his Souls right under our nose — and you immediately returned to your obsessive megalomania. Boring.”

There were many words he was saying.

Dazai could hear them, so obviously, they were being spoken. Perceiving their hum wasn’t hard; it was concentrating on what their association meant that challenged him. He blinked, opened his mouth — closed it again.

“You think you’re a chess piece?” was all that left his lips.

Chuuya hummed. “Everyone is. I find it interesting that you don’t believe I’ll make you pay for it someday.”

Dazai leaned forward — dangerously so. He tasted the salty oxygen drying his lips, ignoring the metallic pull of his own gravity. He could have lied to him. It was rather easy, lying to dogs. They usually came barking and wagging their tails soon enough. Short memory or foolishness to blame; Chuuya was neither of those things.

“You’re not,” he concluded, calculated, “Just a chess piece.”

“Thank you. I aspire to be multi-faceted.”

“If you think I treat you like one, you clearly haven’t seen me interact with most mafiosi.”

“Most mafiosi are assholes.”

“Hey,” he remembered, suddenly. “We are mafiosi.”

“Yeah,” he shrugged. “I’m an asshole. That’s fine. You know, Q once told me they think it’d do you good to admit you’re one too,” A frown overtook his traits. “Wonder where the brat is, right now.”

“To both our displeasure, I promised you to actually work together,” Dazai said. “Here’s promise number two: I wasn’t lying about the partner thing.”

“And promise number three?”

The sea hummed; he echoed the sound, minimizing it, trapping it. “Trust.”

His head tilted back, further and further, exposing the pale line of his throat, the black circle breaking it in two, his Adam’s apple. How many hours had he spent in that same position, ever since he’d broken free from the military facility? Perhaps he’d been a normal sight in Suribachi City — don’t freak out about the boy sitting on the walls. He’s just bored.

“Here’s promise number four,” Chuuya told him. “If you fuck me over, I’ll kill you.”

He watched his arms reach out — studied each fraction of movement, each ounce of air moving aside to let them through; counted the leather lines on the gloves a mere rock-throw from his nose.

An offering, hesitancy put aside; a pale copy of eyes that still matched putting their fate in his hands, even at the cost of the answer they wanted the most. It seemed so long ago. What a rare thing it was, to not be a giver.

“Worry about the bad guys,” he told him. “That’s who we’re killing.”

“Silly fucking moron,” was his sugary sweet remark, unfit for all his leather and all his vibrant red. “We are the bad guys.”

Dazai grasped his hands.

No Longer Human tickled the hollow caves of his bones, reminding him of its constant presence, dormant but never gone. Something in nullifying others emptied out every artery in his body. It was a pain he could stand — a pain he would stand until the rest of his days.

Silly, he thought — every nerve in his hands struck by the sensation of leather and sweat, twinning his fingers, holding tight. He wondered if his flesh could shock him; if he blamed him, even just a bit, be it for an electrified spear or the way he left his shoes all untied in his genkan or the way Arahabaki had shrieked, free. Nullified, Chuuya weighed as much as the coat on his shoulders — but it felt less like incumbency, and more like a debt he'd never repay.

Silly, I'm not letting you fall.

He pulled the other boy up; rock-climbing to the edge of the building, Chuuya didn't let go of him until his feet were on the ground again.

After brushing invisible dust off his clothing, he huffed: "You know, with this forced cooperation thing, you'd think we would have more casual conversations."

The idea was laughable, of course. "When we try those, we get kicked out of diners," he reminded him.

Another huff.

Most days, he wanted to know what he thought about time travel — what his physics textbooks said about space, what he believed God looked like, what he supposed the Book was, what his mind — so similar to those he'd spent his entire life around; so different in heart — would say about the things Dazai's own conjured in Mori's torture books.

Some days, though —

"Alright," he said. "It's your birthday soon, isn't it?"

Chuuya blinked. "Of course you'd know, you creepy fucker."

"I respect my elders."

"Why don't you respect this —"

"Oh," he interrupted him, squinting at the darkness of the street. "Here they are."

When they stopped in the makeshift square at the center of the warehouses' ground, Koda Katsumi was scratching the edges of a brightly white emergency kit with nervous, well cut nails.

"You didn't seriously bring him along," Chuuya wasted no time hissing, a familiarity in his cadence that grated against Dazai's nerves, and his eyes set to an unassuming pick-up truck parked a stone-throw from them. "I said someone reliable."

"He wouldn't let Tsuchiya come alone," the man explained, apologetic, glancing shyly in Dazai's direction. "Not after —" He trailed off.

"After the engagement?" Dazai blinked, owlsh. "I'm a bit offended we weren't invited."

Koda made a face. “T-They aren’t —“

Clearing his voice, Chuuya cut in: “Where the hell is Tsuchiya, anyway? ‘S cool if she brought you, but I specifically requested —“

“Ah,” he interrupted, glancing anxiously at the car. His breathing was shallow. “Yukio is — There’s been an accident. We came straight from the extraction point; that’s why Noguchi followed. With — with Executive Ace’s team.”

“Executive Ace’s team?” Dazai echoed.

Something akin to a shut door turned the other boy’s features into stone. With a voice softer than impudence, he dared: “Doctor Tsuchiya?”

A vein in Koda’s clenched jaw trembled. He kept his gaze on the vague silhouettes behind the truck’s windshield; he shook his head.

Dazai took the hit in silence.

“Shit,” Chuuya said. His hands fell out of his pockets; he kicked the front of his shoe against the concrete, opening a small crack. With feeling — though Dazai couldn’t guess which one — he insisted: “Shit.”

They didn’t move to trace letters or knock combinations; but when Dazai met his eyes, the message was clear. They had asked Tsuchiya to investigate her sister’s second-hand Ability. Ace’s mission hadn’t been without risks — it didn’t necessarily mean anything, apart from future complications for the Executive.

The timing, though, was too precise.

Dazai opened his mouth to get on with it; he was interrupted by Chuuya’s complicated gaze, set on the car. “How’s she holding up?”

“I don’t think she’s had much time to think about her shit at all,” a new voice intervened, right before Koda could open his mouth. Noguchi was carrying a rifle behind his shoulders, arms raised, rendering his frame ever bulkier and taller than it normally was — venom had turned his eyes red. “Hard to, when her superiors put her in charge of the extraction team.”

“It’s not like we knew,” Dazai lamented. “You’re always so quick to accuse. Condolences for her loss. Her tools. Are they safe?”

Noguchi’s face turned blank. In front of him, Koda flinched, alarmed, turning paler than his whitish-blond hair. Sending a pointed look to Chuuya, he started: “Sir, please —“

“She can have tomorrow off,” the boy said, eyes running across calculations they couldn’t see. Dazai knew their numbers, though; knew there weren’t enough people to trust with the job. “But I can’t do more than that. We need everyone we can get our hands on.”

“Not like you got a day off when Verlaine was around,” Dazai muttered, eyes to the sky. “The meaning of emergency is self-explanatory.”

If gazes could have killed, Chuuya's own would have turned him into a dusty trace on the wet concrete. Still, something was stuck in the corners. "Her sister died. Shut the fuck up."

"You know better than me that we can't afford to waste time on sympathies," Dazai said, much lower, leaning his face down. The thing on his face, rotting wisteria and blank eyes — he'd seen it countless times. As he followed his brother's traces up and down Yokohama, ignoring how the blood of his friends was still stuck to his soles; as he barked and dealt with Dazai's schemes with a knife wound in his side and the handprints of his only family on the blade. As he mocked Dazai's insistence that he could — that he would — come up with a plan that wouldn't cost him the only proof he could ever obtain about his past. "Do as you preach, or don't preach at all."

"I know my limits," Chuuya replied. "You won't make me decide others' own."

"I'm not. The Nine Rings are."

The fish tattoo on Noguchi's face moved with him when he laughed humorlessly, breaking their stare down. Koda took a step back. "What else should one expect from you two."

Chuuya glared. "Excuse me?"

Noguchi almost took a step forward. His whole body was sharp lines and hostility; distantly, Dazai considered that his hands were definitely big enough to crush both of their skulls. The man didn't add anything; he seemed content to stick his tongue in his cheek and glare at nothing at all.

"Sir," Koda stuttered, eyes flying from one glacial face to the other, hands torturing each other. "Chuuya, it's just — we came straight from the announcement meeting, she's had no —"

"Half of the syndicate has lost someone in the past few weeks," Dazai commented, idly. "If we had time for that, we would switch from weapon manufacturer to funerary house."

Noguchi's nostrils flared.

"I'm sorry for Tsuchiya," Chuuya said, harsh and sincere. A car crash coming to life. "But you're slowing down the process. Mourning is her right — I understand. We're giving it to her. But we need to understand the damage the organization has suffered because of her loss. That is what I need to be concerned about."

At that, even Koda looked startled.

With a snarl, Noguchi pushed him to the side, walking right up to Chuuya's nose. He was several heads taller than him, much wider — his grip on his gun was easy enough to interpret.

"Take it back," the man warned, barely a whisper. "Take it back right now, bastard."

"Noguchi," Koda hissed.

“Shut your fucking mouth. This is the son of a bitch you want me to trust?” He spit on the ground; the coagulation of bitter drool landed right between Chuuya’s feet. A few droplets hit Dazai’s shoes. His lips quivered. “Him, and Boss’ psychotic bitch? With their shit plans no one is allowed to know about, and their fucking little theatre plays of funerals? Tell your buddy to apologize —“

“I can’t,” Chuuya replied, untouched by the scrunched up tattoo on his face — calmer than he had expected him to be. “And I bet Tsuchiya understands it, too. Where is she?”

“You think I’d let you —“

“This isn’t your decision to make. Tsuchiya Mi was a fundamental asset. We’ve just lost one of our most useful Ability Users. Since you’ve been going around claiming you should have been made commander instead — I’m sure you understand how much of an issue that is for every single one of us, correct?”

“Fucking idiotic me, expecting you to have some respect for the dead,” Noguchi growled — a tad too meaningful for it not to hide information. A tad too grieving, for a grief that wasn’t even his.

He put two hands on Chuuya’s shoulders. He pushed.

Oh, Dazai thought, dangerously amused, watching the other boy stand incredibly still. His crimson glow painted the air with barely repressed ferocity — sunset over a war field. Bad choice.

Chuuya stared. “Respect for the dead,” he spelled out, very slow.

One step forward; the faded ground under his foot shattered. Noguchi didn’t move.

“You want to talk to me about respecting the dead?” he echoed, again, something endlessly unamused curling his lips. “When you’ve been sending your men to stalk us for weeks, knowing that they’d be declared conspirators and possibly killed in your stead? When every mission that’s failed has failed because of your petty, childish insistence on being nothing but a stubborn, miserable, inefficient piece of shit?”

Koda held his breath. Dazai watched.

“Do not blame your incompetence on me,” Noguchi warned, low.

“I’ll blame whatever the fuck I want on whoever the fuck I want,” Chuuya snapped. “I’m your superior. You know how many men — how many of my —“ His voice bent on a sound; something a tad too sharp to be anger, “ — Were killed in the last few weeks? She can cry in a corner until someone finds her and snipes her damn head, or she can do something about it. That’s not your decision to make. Whether you like it or not, you’re under my orders — and my orders are to fucking do something about it, so she can cry the rest of her life out in the aftermath. Alive. We keep moving and we make them pay, and we watch each other’s backs, and we shut the fuck up when our superiors are talking. ”

“Enough.”

As if rain had taken the color with itself and bled it down her curved shoulders, the grass green of Tsuchiya Yukio’s hair was messily faded near the tips. Perhaps, Dazai considered, she had missed her dyeing appointment for the war. Perhaps it was the unspeakable in her eyes — the fractured edges of a glass Dazai had never quite felt the coldness of.

Mourning is a waste of space, Mori had said, the day they had passed by the Under Port to wave Sama goodbye. Then, he had frowned. Or maybe the filling of it. I can’t never remember.

“Enough,” Tsuchiya repeated. Her voice was stiffer than concrete. She met their eyes with her chin raised, taking just the inch of a step more to separate herself from Noguchi. “I apologize for the delay. I won’t waste your time again.”

“Yukio,” Noguchi insisted.

“I said enough,” She set her jaw, looking at him with something inscrutable between dried tear tracks. “Thank you. But this is what I’m here for.”

Slowly, Chuuya deflated. The tension was still sticking to his nails, though — the spasms had nothing quite to do with electricity. He gazed at Noguchi like he couldn’t understand what to look for; Dazai felt the pieces fall together with blinking ease. Ah, he considered. Ah.

“Well, this is wonderful,” Dazai intervened, shattering the silence with his most unimpressed smile. This is why I don’t make friends, he thought. “Chuuya, why don’t you take advantage of the situation to explain the plan to our guests? And to ask Tsuchiya if using her sister’s tools will come with a cost or not.”

The boy curled an eyebrow. “What, you’re busy?”

“I’m about to be.” He searched underneath his coat, humming; he extracted his gun. With the wisdom of someone who knew they would be the first target, Noguchi was the quickest to jump ten steps back, one hand outstretched in front of a startled Tsuchiya. Chuuya didn’t move an inch.

Koda went down with a guttural gasp.

“As an incentive to show us your skills,” Dazai explained, nodding towards Tsuchiya with the weapon, as the bony body hit the concrete in a disturbingly wet squelch. The stain on his chest, right upon his heart, bloomed wider and wider with every heavy breath he took — when Tsuchiya yelped and fell to her knees next to him, he settled terrified bloodshot eyes on her. “So don’t get too distracted, Yukio, yes?”

“What the fuck is wrong with you?” Chuuya half shouted, pushing him to get to Koda. But Dazai could see the gears turn in his head in real time, as he watched the woman extract the metal box from her coat. He didn’t pay it any mind.

Snapshots blinded his sight, flashes and bruises — the hands around his collar; the distance between his shoes and the ground; the electric shock that went through his spine when his back was slammed against the wall of the warehouse.

Everything wavered violently, blurring his vision; when he got it back, Noguchi's fish tattoo was mere inches from his face.

Dazai's gun settled under his chin.

"There you are," he said, as the man froze, liquified rage in his eyes. Ah, he thought, that's why Chuuya won't kill him. All bleeding loyalty. "Come on. The smell of fresh blood is horrid. Let's talk in your car."

---

...

---

The pick-up truck smelled of excessively old gunpowder and something specifically more sophisticated. Dazai settled on the passenger's seat, just to make sure Noguchi's trembling fists would not waste both of their time smashing his nose against the steering wheel.

"You fucking tried to kill him to get me?" Noguchi growled, staring through the windshield at the mess of limbs on the faraway ground.

He shrugged. Something emerald shone in between Tsuchiya's hands; Chuuya held Koda's own. "You don't seem the type who would accept a secretary-set-up meeting."

His laughter was humorless. "And when I stick my fist down your throat? Have you planned for that too?"

"Of course," he replied. "That's assuming you're stupid enough to lay your hands on me even more than you've already done, though."

"You think I won't?"

"Yes," Dazai answered, honestly. "I really do think that."

Something in his tone seemed to have convinced Noguchi. Perhaps he'd found his answer on his face; on the falling tilt of his mouth — he could feel it, free of the unexercised strain that sometimes invaded his muscles when he smiled. At your core, Dazai, Mori liked to tell him, I think you're a rather angry young boy.

And you're a sad old man, he'd usually reply, fully aware that the two of them shared their core features everyday a bit more. Who's worse?

The man struggled in his seat. Succinctly, he snapped: "What the fuck is wrong with you two?"

He hummed. "Chuuya could use some dog tendencies less."

"She could have healed a wound. You could have just — cut my skin, or —"

"For my own reasons, I needed to be sure that the tools could bring the wounded back from almost death," Dazai nodded. "There's a reason I didn't stick around to hear Tsuchiya's life story — unfortunately for him, Chuuya doesn't have access to the Intelligence files I have. I know it all — the benefactor who took her and her sister in. The sweet way the man treated Tsuchiya," He tilted his head back. "The sweeter way he treated his sister. That's why the Doctor had it written on her will that the tools had to be destroyed after she died, correct? She didn't want to further that man's legacy."

A muscle in Noguchi's jaw fluttered. He wouldn't answer, Dazai knew. He didn't need him to.

"We can't let her destroy them, of course," he continued, as if obvious. The man stiffened. "Such a powerful Ability — It speeds up the healing process, correct? There's a limit to the people she can heal, but it should be just good enough. I am particularly amused by dying wishes, and I'm sure Chuuya would respect them much more than me — but Mori would never let her proceed. And I act on Mori's orders."

"Leave her alone," Noguchi managed to spit out. "She's been through enough."

Dazai ignored him. "Abilities like that are fascinating, aren't they?" he said. "Abilities, in their most natural state — they're inherent to a person. They accommodate their hosts. For one to be passed down to whoever the User decides — The cases are rare and scattered. There's probably only one more of its kind in Yokohama; two at most."

"She's not an Ability. She's —"

"You're something of a people man, aren't you? I'm sure the team will be ecstatic to have you explain everything to them. They trust you more than they trust the two of us, certainly," Dazai paused. "Or is it respect? Fear, maybe?"

"No," he corrected himself. A complicated expression had taken over Noguchi's traits. "No, it's not fear. You're not that kind of man. You like loyalty. You don't want second-hand respect — unstable, walking on the fragile shells of terror," A scoff escaped his lips. "Chuuya is a bit like you. Less naive, more willing to shoot an asshole in the face. Not you, though. He won't let me kill you."

"And it's unfortunate," Dazai explained, dropping lower on his seat, childishly kicking his feet against the floor of the car. He turned to look at the man; he attempted not to flinch. "Because, Noguchi Toru — I really, really, want to kill you."

His body was tense; his knuckles white around the steering wheel. With a ferocious kind of hesitance, violent in its pretense to not be there, he encouraged: “Do it, then, demon. If you’re so damn sure —”

“If you don’t mind reminding me,” he cut through, nonplussed. “Which one happened first? Me not accepting you into the Secret Force Unit, or Chuuya indirectly causing the death of your beloved superior, Albatross?”

Over the gates of the warehouses’ ground, the distant police lights shone intermittently. Koda was sitting up, healed and breathing; Chuuya was gesticulating viciously, explaining a familiar plan. Dazai had never shot one of his friends before. He could only imagine how well it would end for him.

Noguchi had turned into stone.

“I —” He licked his lips. “How do you —”

He tapped the pin on his tie — some old melody Tanaki liked to hum. “The Hatrack and I are severely underappreciated, — and offensively overworked, by the way — but your antagonism was too vicious to be mere jealousy. I didn’t get it. Going to such lengths just to try to get rid of two brats in temporary leading positions — you even asked the ever-so-neutral Tsuchiya to help. No one else knew where we were going, that night after the dog fight. So much dedication.”

As mediocre as the Secret Force Squad could sometimes be, they were all several steps ahead of the man’s current abilities. As for Albatross — stealing some old documents from his apartment had been much easier; especially, once he’d caught a glimpse of Noguchi’s face in the photographs all over the kitchen.

“My personal feelings don’t —,” Noguchi stuttered, several moments later. Ruffled feathers and mourning lips. “Both of those — it was a long time ago. It doesn’t change the fact that Boss put you on a pedestal you don’t deserve, and yet neither one of you has gotten us out of this war.”

“Yet being the important bit,” he chirped. “If you’ll let me illustrate our plan? I think you’ll like it as much as I do. I need you to spread some horrible, horrible rumors about Chuuya.”

Noguchi paused. “Rumors?”

“Well, that’s the final part. The start — I’m sure Koda and Tsuchiya will be happy to tell you all about it. It’s the middle that’s important,” Ge tilted his head. “Unless you want the war to go all the way to August.”

Predictably, he folded.

Dazai started explaining.

The mess of reactions stuck to his face once he was done was entertaining, but he only studied it to find sincere disbelief. Noguchi seemed to have reached a simple enough conclusion — Dazai usually wore another face whenever he felt like tricking his subordinates.

He breathed out: “But why not tell the men any of this?”

Dazai waved the idea away with one hand. “That’s Boss’ business. Why ask me? Don’t tell me the, Boss’ little bitch, comment was meant to be an honest taunt. That’s nonsensical even for you.”

“But —” he insisted. “This is — Is this why — The suicide pills?”

“I’d almost forgotten — suicide sounds terribly boring when I’m not the one who’s dying. Alas, Boss wouldn’t give me the pills,” He sighed, fingers itching for the things he did have in his pocket. “Chuuya made the same face when he found out about them, by the way.”

Noguchi appeared deeply uncomfortable. “Fuck you telling me that for?”

“I don’t know,” he mused. “Sometimes it’s fun to leave hints.”

“Hints?”

“Yes,” Dazai yawned. The man stood a bit straighter; like most Port Mafia members, he was smart enough to understand when their resident demon’s mood started swinging in the wrong direction. “I want to make this as clear as possible, Noguchi. I would have found you even if Tsuchiya hadn’t chosen to bring you along — I knew she would, though. People are stupid like that. That stupidity is, very rarely, useful — it tells me you won’t mess this up, if you’ve got lives on the line.”

“The Souls are going to die by the end of the week. All of them,” he specified. “The ones from our ranks that we can save, we’ll try to save. It won’t be all of them. Inevitable calculations. Boss will probably appoint me as the official survey for their unofficial return to normality. Do you know,” He kept his eyes to the heartwarming view outside the windshield, “How incredibly easy it would be for me to lie?”

Horror dawned on Noguchi’s face. “You — you can’t just —”

Dazai tilted his head. “Can’t I?”

“What the fuck do you want?”

“Some respect would be nice,” he started listing off, pressing casual buttons at reach. The chant went up and down: “A day off — A new gaming console — to watch most people in this syndicate spontaneously catch fire. To set fire to the rest. To rip your pathetic head off your body and gift it to Chuuya in some pretty box, so that maybe he’ll stop bitching about gaining respect.”

Bravely enough — paler than a sheet — Noguchi didn’t do him the favor of gulping.

“Here’s another thing I want: to tear him apart and listen to his dying screams. People try to kill him all the time, but me? I’d be so good at it.” He sighed. “But that’s stuff I can’t have.”

Not yet, anyway. So here's something more sensible — I want you to do your job well. And if anything you do to complete this job — be it unnecessary risks, or your petty thirst for pointless revenge — ends up bothering me or my unrealistic aims —“ He turned to look at the man. “You’ll regret not managing to put a bomb under at least one of my cars. Alright?”

It was just a look. Nonetheless, Noguchi didn’t breathe.

“Waiting for an answer,” he reminded him.

Something like surrender blurred his eyes. That was good. Dazai thought everybody would have it much easier, once they accepted he wasn’t one born for their rational scrutiny.

“Alright,” he said, quietly.

“Alright?”

“Alright,” he echoed. “Sir.”

Against his lazy shoulder, his car door was almost ripped off the hinges.

Yelping just a tad too high-pitched, Dazai almost landed on the ground. “Alright, alright, you want me to apologize?” he whined, already raising his arms to hide his knees from the rotating kicks that were undoubtedly about to hit him. “Are you mad about Koda? I knew you were going to be mad about Koda. But I knew she would heal him, I just didn’t tell you because you’d be so annoying about it — You’re my dog, I don’t have to tell you anything, anyway — Chuuya, come on —“

Half on the concrete, he paused.

Underneath a layer of freckles and Koda’s blood, over the cage of his lowered mask, the boy’s face was pale — a ghostly veil framing dim eyes, glossy at the edges, as if searching through water; settled on a place so distant it was nowhere to be found. Distance, she always said, is just a word.

His hands were abandoned at his side, gloves dangling. His spine was too straight — was waiting for orders. When he turned to look in Dazai’s direction, he did not know him.

Hesitantly, a mistrustful Noguchi blinked, asking: “Chuuya — ?”

“Show’s over,” Dazai cut through, cheerful, moving to stand in front of him. He knew he was smiling — he assumed his smile was one of those things Mori always scrunched his nose up at, because all three mafiosi — Koda and Tsuchiya having jogged up to join — took a step back. “We have some business to attend to. Tsuchiya, do train until our next meeting.”

“Sir,” the woman attempted to say.

“Tsuchiya,” he insisted. “Do train.”

Her lips parted. She studied Chuuya over the line of his shoulders; nodded. “Sir.”

Dazai kept his smile on until the three of them were nothing more than silhouettes settling inside the pick-up truck — sure that they would turn. Waiting for them when they did; waving through their rearview mirror.

He stuck his nails so deep into Chuuya's wrist that they grew wet with blood — he stayed there; his face stayed blank. Over the gates, the police cars were still there.

“Well?” Dazai asked, shrugging the boy's wrist. “Where are you taking me?”

Chuuya blinked, looking right through him. It was insufferably detestable. Devoid — amongst negative objectives about Chuuya he sometimes listed off whenever he couldn't sleep — wasn't meant to fit the pimpled wrinkles on that bothersome forehead.

He turned around; tilted his head to the side, as if listening. Wordlessly, he started walking towards the gates.

“Hey!” Dazai was pulled along with surprising strength, but little attention — as if he could have been run over by traffic, and Chuuya's Soul-mind wouldn't have particularly cared. He barely managed to tear his nails out of his wrist; instead, he stuck his coat over the boy's shoulders, holding onto the flagging belt of it.

Leash, he thought, hysterically. Then he saw a familiar back near the gates, and his face fell.

“Boys?” Officer Matsuda blinked, hand and face turned towards the radio-microphone pinned to his shirt. His colleague was still in the second car; when he walked away from his own to meet them at the entrance, the eyebags he sported were lit by its lights. “What are you doing out so late?”

“Fish watching,” Dazai offered. “You?”

“Patrolling,” He squinted. “Is that a code?”

“Yes. For watching fish.”

Chuuya attempted to walk straight into his car, not granting a glance to the man. The makeshift leash pulled Dazai forward — when he stepped on the Officer's feet, the man instinctively laid his hands on his shoulders.

A certain merit had to be recognized — he let go the moment he felt him stiffen. A certain intuition; most never noticed Dazai's discomfort. Mori did; Mori hardly cared. Mori hardly touched him — he was too smart to.

“Sorry, kid,” Matsuda said, taking the first step back. A certain merit — weirdness. His eyes flickered over to Chuuya. “What's up with him?”

Dazai's mind was running. “He's drunk.”

“What?”

“Horridly drunk,” he insisted. “He’s got a thing for wine, did you know? Unfortunately, his tolerance is despicable. Given his stature, I can’t say I’m surprised,” As if he had heard, somehow, Chuuya’s pulling force got more stubborn, burning his palm. “At least he’s walking. Last time, I had to piggyback him. I’m always doing that. How annoying is that?”

“You two are too young to drink,” Matsuda let him know, frowning at his companion. “Are you absolutely sure he’s okay? This isn’t exactly —“

“What one would imagine Chuuya to be like when he’s drunk?” Dazai thought back to his screaming matches from the top of the movie theater. “I understand,” The pull grew even stronger; he squinted at the insistent direction of his feet — stared at the police lights until they made his eyes burn. His mind followed. “Officer.”

“Kid?”

“Do you have time for a lift?”

---

...

---

“You don’t have a license,” Matsuda hissed, in the middle of an undeniable panic attack. His hand was so tight around the door handle, it was white. “You are drunk. This is a state-owned vehicle. Tell me why I’m letting you do this.”

“You’re exceptionally well-intentioned,” Dazai answered, elbows between the two front seats, chin on his hands. “And you and Chuuya have got a weird non-mentorship thing going on. Red!”

Chuuya’s foot slammed onto the brake. His face stubbornly stayed blank through it.

“I’m going to get arrested,” Matsuda was still chanting, eyes so wide they seemed ready to jump out. He had attempted to clench one hand around their driver’s arm; the Soul had simply slapped it off. “I’m going to get arrested. Why am I letting you do this?”

“You like Chuuya,” he insisted.

“Not very much, as of now! What’s even — “ They turned the corner at the very last moment; Dazai ended up splattered against the car door on the left. It was clear the boy knew where they were going — it was also clear he didn’t care about the state they got there in.

“Why isn’t he talking?”

“He’s a quiet drunk,” he lied. “Truly, why do you even like him so much?”

“I’ve known him since he was a brat,” the man gulped, frantically studying every mirror in the car. His fingers were slowly tickling up his chest, maybe in an attempt to reach the radio — Dazai pulled it off, and threw it out of his open car window. “Hey!”

“I’ve known him for almost a year,” he insisted. “My opinion of him has only worsened. What’s even yours and that Murase’s excuse?”

“The bridge!” Matsuda hissed. “Watch it!”

Chuuya accelerated, blankly.

“Well?”

“You’re not fearing for your life, kid?”

“No,” He shrugged. “Death is natural, and I have looked for it longly and attentively. I do hope I don’t die with Chuuya around, though. Boss would make fun of me for the next century. Do you presume you’re attached to him because he’s set on refusing you guys’ redemption?”

Matsuda gulped again, teeth clenched and face pale, studying the boy’s blank profile. “He’s a kid.”

“Yes,” Dazai agreed. “A petty child who needs way more milk than what he consumes. The milk thing is a myth, actually, but don’t tell him that.”

“You’re a kid too.”

“Meh.”

“You are,” the Officer’s feet pressed against pedals that weren’t there, hysterical. “I don’t care what those — those people fill your head with. I don’t care what you’ve done. Under the state law, you’re a kid.”

“What if there wasn’t a State?” Dazai asked, as leaned back onto Chuuya’s seat. He was still wearing his coat; he grabbed the belt, knotting it around his arms as annoyingly as possible. “What if we were just existing people, living and eating and loving and dying. Would you care about what age is legal or not?”

“I would care about how many years you’ve spent on this God forsaken earth,” Matsuda snapped, seemingly closer to believing the situation to be an attempt on his life by the second. “I would care about making sure the few years you’ve had haven’t shown you more blood than anyone has a right to see in an entire lifetime. Red light!”

“How romantic,” Dazai sighed.

“What is?”

“Hope,” He shrugged. “Light. It never made a difference to me, but it’s nice to hear arguments about it. Nice to see both sides are as stupid as it goes.”

“Stupid,” he echoed, disbelieving. When he met his eyes in the rear view mirror, his stubbornness was equal and contrary to the glimmer in Kouyou’s most outwards gazes. “There’s nothing stupid about second chances, kid.”

Dazai clicked his tongue, amused. “You’re the stupid one if you think those are a thing.”

The car halted so suddenly it screeched; it sent Matsuda flying forward, despite his belt — he almost smashed his forehead against the dashboard. “Kid!”

“Seems we’ve arrived,” Dazai blinked, hands spread on his window, trying to locate their spot. It didn’t take long; the bitterness stuck to his tongue curled his lips. “I owe you one, Officer Hope. Have a good patrol.”

The man attempted to protest. Their Soul driver exited the car without a word; Dazai followed.

The road home was easy to recognize — as thus, he began to reconsider their whole plan long before Chuuya effectively walked through the borders of his dumping ground.

“Of course,” he sighed, as the belt of his coat pulled him through the nonexistent gates of the site. “He couldn’t have picked the drug store?”

He pushed all his dismay down; ignored the grip of its nails down his bones, ignored the sound it made — the attempts to climb to his throat by the handlers of old resentments, and the coagulated cold air that always filtered through the shipping container’s broken door. They left footprints in the mud.

Close. No close enough — but too close .

Never stop thinking, Mori had never told him; so Dazai had made it a rule, instead — never stop thinking; he is here.

“It’s very rude to show up at people’s houses uninvited,” he made sure to explain to his uncaring companion. His steadfast beeline was challenging him to keep up; but Dazai had longer legs and a tickle of sorts in his veins, so he knocked his side against Chuuya’s. “We’re not even friends. The partner privilege doesn’t grant you guest privileges — Those are mine to grant . You’re being terribly rude. Kouyou would throw a fit. Do you hear me?”

Chuuya, of course, couldn’t hear him.

His eyes were set on the mountains of trash around them, unnaturally sure of the direction he was pulling them into. He had blinked a few times, surprisingly — eyes moving frantically underneath the eyelids, undecided on what reality they were supposed to perceive.

He wasn’t paying any particular attention to their surroundings — he wasn’t seeing them — and yet the skin under Dazai’s nails was itching. Everyone knew better than to step near a place the Demon Prodigy dared to sleep in.

“I’m not forgiving you for this,” he swore.

He wouldn’t remember, probably — Dazai didn’t care. He didn’t want his pupils to be stained by that unreachable memory — Dazai’s panorama and Dazai’s house, Dazai’s path and Dazai’s —

“Oh, look,” he said, eyes settling on the only other silhouettes in that rusty desert. “What did you call them? Adoratissima and Grief-Induced Split Personality Disorder, reunited again.”

Beatrice and V had made for a sadistically entertaining pair, inside the plastically real woods in Rengoku. Not quite V — but Dante bore the same dark curls and t-shirts with unlikely puns on them. His latest one — amusingly enough — portrayed an angel; the bubbly text around it read: 99% An Angel. Worry Not About The 1%.

“Nice shirt,” Dazai called, startling their guests into a fighting stance. “A young coworker of mine would like it.”

The sparkling flames of a little fire burned between their crossed legs, burning old books and wanted posters against a polluted firmament. The heavy wool of V’s — Dante? — clothes couldn’t hide the goosebumps on his knuckles; Beatrice’s Western white dress strangled her figure in a severe, unmerciful way, reddening her wrists. The fire had carved lines of terror on their faces.

Chuuya’s reaction was the most sudden of them all, though — he dropped to his knees the moment he entered the duo’s visual field.

“Oh!” Dazai said, barely managing to save his shoes from the face-plant the boy did onto the ground, eyes rolling to the back of his head. The belt still tied around his wrist was pulling him down; he attempted to undo the knot, lamenting: “Now, that’s just sticky —”

“He’s alive,” Beatrice breathed out. Relief was like gasoline to the small fire; the flames in her eyes shone golden. “Oh, thank God, he’s alive —”

“I told you it wasn’t possible,” V said, with a hint of the same exasperation that had stained his words that day, at the fighting ring. It had nothing of the poeticism Dante’s monologue had torn lashes on their dying bodies with. He never did like me, Beatrice had told them. “He’s too much of an asset — and the boy wouldn’t have let him die.”

“That is one heavy, baseless accusation,” Dazai jumped in, eyeing the line of drool on the side of Chuuya’s cheek. “I shall let you know — Ever since meeting this dog of mine, all I’ve done, day and night, is come up with ways to cause his ultimate demise.”

“But you’re clever,” V insisted. His eyes refused to meet his own — frantically, they scattered across every piece of trash in the dumping site. “And he’s powerful.”

He sighed. “That’s how the voices go.”

“The Port Mafia wouldn’t let such a card fall from their hands. The funeral, the set up — you just wanted to find Dante. Didn’t you?”

“Wake him up,” he said. “And I’ll tell you.”

Beatrice scoffed. “Wake him up? In his state, the most you can accomplish is momentary shared consciousness. Please — Don’t tell me you’ve believed one thing he’s told you since he was Judged. If you did, you’re much stupider than V has been trying so hard to convince me you aren’t. And you’re no use to us.”

Chuuya’s eyes blinked to life. They were unfocused — moving like a sleepwalker, he sat as politely as possible; legs crossed and gloved hands intertwined in his lap. Dazai’s coat fell from one of his shoulders, swiping the ground as he waited; tickled, Dazai fixed it up.

“V is a rather good judge of character,” he concluded, tilting his head. “Which is why I don’t see why I should trust either one of you — or your ‘momentary shared consciousness’ moment.”

The two exchanged a look. “Do you have a choice?” was Beatrice’s question.

He hummed, conceding the point. With his free hand, he grasped Chuuya’s shoulder, easily settling himself next to his kneeling figure. Still giving all his attention to the skeptical gazes set on him, he cocked his gun and lazily pushed it onto the boy’s bruised temple.

Surprised, undignified gasps left both of their mouths — nothing of Dante’s and Tenshi’s composed blankness, tranquil even as it roamed through blood stained waters. Their fingers flew to the weapons in their holsters; pale and hesitant, Beatrice ordered: “Wait — “

Dazai tickled the trigger with his forefinger. It made an audible sound; both his guests were just smart enough to freeze, still on the ground.

“I’m sure Chuuya’s ego would get a nice boost from your deep concern for his well-being,” he started, unconcerned. The silence had taken a lighting-like taste; over the popping cracks of the fire, not even the mountains of trash dared to breathe too loudly. “I, however, am not plagued by such thoughts. Now release him — Or you lose the weapon you’re so protective of.”

“You won’t,” Beatrice insisted, fingers tense around her holster. She seemed too cautious to look anywhere but at his face. “I know you won’t. He’s more of an asset to the Mafia than he will ever be one to us —“

“He’s an unmeasurable bother and an unworthy competition for a role I’ve got my eyes on,” Dazai replied, batting a mosquito off Chuuya’s vacant face with the barrel of the gun. V made a sound, at it. “And people are really dying quite easily these days, aren’t they? I’m sure Boss will understand.”

V gulped, frustrated. “Beatrice.”

“You should listen to him,” he encouraged. “I only witnessed violence wake him up one time, but it was a good enough example. Though — I’m not sure how much can be attributed to Executive Kouyou, and how much to Dante’s tempism.”

The woman hesitated.

Whether it had something to do with the name he'd mirthfully offered or whether she was unsure about his real intentions — he supposed it didn't matter much. With a muttered curse, V was the one to move: he raised his unarmed hand, and drew a lopsided circle in the hissing air. No sound left his lips — instead, they gently shaped a few words into the silent night, too delicate to catch.

Underneath his grip, Chuuya stiffened.

"Thank you," Dazai said, courteous.

A nonexistent electric shock ran down his spine, making his shoulder jump ten feet — rattling his gloved hands so harshly, the everyday spasms seemed to be nothing more than tremors. He almost fell forward, palms scraping at the ground and his lungs releasing horrifyingly sharp sounds, begging for air. The moment his eyes gained an inch of focus, he went for Dazai's gun.

Dazai let him.

Lazily, he raised his hands near his head, as he waited for him to scramble to his feet and point it right to his chest. Glossy eyes; blown pupils. The strands of hair framing his face were blood trails on his cheeks. The world forced itself into his visual field — Chuuya looked at something else entirely.

A moment later, over the bridge of the gun he now knew how to fire, he looked at Dazai.

"Hello there," Dazai greeted. Blue and amber followed the motions, clearing a bit more with each word. What did you see?, he didn't ask. Would it scare me too, finally? He twirled one finger in the air — signed: safe.

Chuuya blinked.

"Adoratissima and Grief-Induced Split Personalities Disorder?" he snapped. A hint of hilarity tickled his throat; Dazai munched on it violently, pushing it down. "What are you doing here? We were looking for Dante. He's clearly the one worth shit."

Dazai sighed, petulantly, dropping on the ground. "He's back alright."

V was quick to offer his palms; a thousand times more distraught than Dante had been by the sudden absence of social anxiety pills. "I'm V, I — I swear it on my name. And this is Beatrice. We — Dante sent us to verify your condition, after the news from the funeral. But he — he doesn't know we're free, right now. We're here to talk."

"Free," Chuuya echoed, squinting. "You got me out of the Limbo, didn't you?"

The man gulped. "Yes."

"Is that your Ability?" Dazai intervened, curious, leaning his chin on his hands. Seated next to him, Beatrice threw him a careful glance — as if waiting to see what his lighter mood would do with the gun between his calves. “You can pull people out of Dante’s trance?”

“His Ability?” Chuuya repeated. “Isn’t he Dante? He’s got the Divine Comedy thing.”

Something vaguely tired pulled V’s traits, dragging at least ten years more down his face. Grimacing, he and Beatrice exchanged a glance. “That is — That’s what we would like to discuss. As for my Ability, not exactly. I believe — it should be something more akin to your nullification.”

Chuuya’s eyebrows flew to his hairline. “No way. The freak’s one of a kind.”

“Chuuya,” Dazai gasped, hands to his chest. “That’s almost touching!”

“I need to know the name of the Ability,” V explained. “If I whisper it to a person who’s a victim of that Ability, I can more or less free them from their influence. It requires some good will from the victim — It’s not as direct as your own.”

“Dante got himself some undoubtedly compatible friends,” Dante commented.

“Trustworthy, too,” the other boy added, squinting. “And yet, here you are.”

Beatrice exhaled. Under the unforgiving moonlight, the cross around her neck glistened gently, pressed against scars Dazai had given her. “Listen,” she said. “We know you have no reason to listen to a word we say. But you searched for us. I assume you’re looking for answers.”

“Not exactly,” Chuuya shrugged. “We were searching for Dante to rip his dick off and watch him bleed out. We’re done with this war. That goal is very much attainable.”

“That is —,” Dazai intervened. “As long as V is Dante.”

“I’m not,” V hurried to say. “I’m not, I’m just — It’s very — It’s complicated. But we’re not — The two of us. We don’t agree with what he’s doing. Beatrice didn’t even know about the ways she’s been used until we found each other again.”

“I wasn’t lying,” she agreed, a tad desperate. “That day, in my office — I wasn’t lying. I didn’t know — according to V, he’s been using me for —” She gulped. “For so long. I didn’t know. After Rengoku, I just — We woke up at the same time, and V helped me catch up. I didn’t even know he was alive. I promise you. I wasn’t lying.”

Appearing a bit perturbed by the notion, V confirmed: “She isn’t. Dante’s been commanding her for months now.”

“And you never tried to inform her, the same way you suddenly decided to do now?” Dazai concluded. “Your petty rivalry truly goes behind the rational.”

He grimaced. “It wasn’t — It’s not that easy. Dante wasn’t always like this. His plans — they used to make sense.”

“Of course they did,” Beatrice murmured.

“And they didn’t to you?” V snapped. Flinching, she lowered her eyes. “Last I recall, it was a three-people-effort that got us where we are now.”

“Last I recall,” she muttered, all the same, “I’m not the one who stayed.”

It was the man’s turn to cower. His hands grasped at each other — fingers twinning and strangling, knuckles turning white. “I made a mistake. I admit it. That is why I’m here, trying to fix it.”

Chuuya still looked distinctly unimpressed. “Alright. I’m still waiting for an explanation of your split personality trick back in Rengoku?”

“I have a theory,” Dazai pushed a rock away with one finger. If he searched far enough, he could see the edge of the crater his shipping container rested in. “The theory is that you’re here because you need our help. I’d like to be proved right as soon as possible. Thus — what do we get in exchange for believing a single word out of your mouth?”

The duo exchanged a glance. Reluctantly, V offered: “We help you kill you Dante.”

He could have turned to meet Chuuya’s eyes, but he didn’t. The sole conclusion shone bright in the space between their bodies all the same — tickling their napes; throwing the knife until it landed on the only sensible option on the wall. “How tempting.”

The flames twirled. Still utterly cautious, Beatrice and V held their breaths.

“Wonderful, then,” He threw his gun a few steps away, using his free hands to attempt to tear unburned pages out of the fire. “Shame Beatrice didn’t bring any Petrus, this time around, ah? Doesn’t matter. We shall take your story.”

“I’ll decide if I still want to play safe and tear your heads off your necks once you’re done,” Chuuya concluded, dropping onto a pile of tires — kicking at his wrists to tear his hands off the flames. For his own amusement, he imagined his next meeting with Officer Matsuda.

“Be convincing,” Dazai concluded, offering his widest smile. “You don’t want to make the man you sent to Hell mad.”

chuuya, face covered in blood from torture:
dazai: [hope this doesn't awaken anything in me.png] hirotsu: damn bitch you live like this?

SO! if you're still reading — damn. thank you so much for that. this chapter actually contains one of the first scenes i ever thought for this story — specifically, the one with chuuya seating on the side of the warehouse and dazai looking up at him. it's just an imaginary that i've always liked (as anything related to chuuya's ability lol).

we finally got some info about chuuya and the flags! if you've read stormbringer, you know the famous "albatross, your floor is my ceiling" line (iconic). i kept thinking about what chuuya would do with albatross apartment, and in the end, it seemed unnatural to me that he would do anything but unhealthily fixate on it. its okay, he's a kid and he's dealing! can't wait to get more into this plot with the next part of the series (that's coming in just two chapters btw... that's so wild to me. chuuya pov incoming).

as for easter eggs in this chapter: the "when someone you love dies, you've got to kill yourself" quote on albatross' kitchenette comes from irl nakahara chuuya's poem "spring's day caprice", a three part work that was inspired by his son's early demise, and that i highly suggest you check out. lastly, the "three meals a day" speech dazai does to hirotsu comes from no longer human (one of the first chapters, forget if i can't quite recall).

as always, thank you so so much for reading, and do let me know what you think of it! i hope you have a great day, and see you next time!

MY

Chapter Summary

“Alright,” he said, like he hated him for it. Somehow, it sounded brutal — the ricochet of his exhaustion against the walls, more vicious than any of his screams had been. “When did you figure it out?”

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter x.

---

Case number: 73937393

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

Document Type 11: Secretive. Access guaranteed to: Mori Ougai.

*On **/** of the current year, the following information was acquired by Dazai O., regarding the origins and plans of the Nine Rings leader, Beatrice [XXXX12], and her allies [Identification Name: V and Identification Name: Dante]. Ability Users: confirmed unregistered.*

Current state: deceased.

V [...]. Cause of death: severe blood loss. His Ability [Dido; AB6774] allowed him to release a subject from the influence of an Ability, erasing the effects while maintaining the state itself. Necessary elements — [Knowledge of the Ability's name] ; [Physical presence of the victim]. Registered as dead for seven years, before his reappearance. Cause of previous death: Dante and Beatrice.

Under the belief of having caused his demise, B. escaped the town of R. The grief sent D. into an unstable state; in his confusion, he was unable to understand that V had actually turned into a — as previously referred to by Dazai O. and Nakahara C. — “Soul” [666GHI — Check The Codes].

As such, D.'s first experiment was doomed: incapable of giving him orders, he instead “fused” V's true conscience with his shattered mind, creating both a double and a spokesperson. [Check File: “The Metamorphosis of Author]. Whenever he was being used by D's Ability, V acted and talked as if a portion of D.'s mind had been situated inside him; it is unclear whether this occurred solely because of the mistake D. made seven years ago, or if D.'s conscience was somehow restored, making the cognitive choice to have his first Soul do and say what he would have in his stead.

It is unclear whether V's part in D.'s plans can be faulted to himself or not.

[...]

[Continue reading] [?]

Five days before the report.

“Say,” Dazai shut the car trunk, leaning on the heated metal. “What would Chuuya like for his birthday?”

Over the bluish flame from Hirotsu’s third stolen lighter, the boy’s glance was less than amused.

He had gotten rid of the mask, at last, seeing how all who needed to believe him gone already knew he wasn’t. People at the HQs had been gaping at him for three days straight. The falling sun had painted a border between the upper and lower side of his face; he looked haunted, and ridiculous. “From you?”

He shrugged.

“You mean you didn’t ominously discover the alleged date of my birth just to put itching dust on everything I own?”

“Unoriginal,” he huffed, wiping sweat. Beatrice’s car was a white box that seemed ready to collapse under the weight of four full grown people — three, Chuuya excluded. The color was a blinding sign even under the sun; at the very least, the men who were supposed to follow them would have no issues. “You did that in my office already.”

“Oh, yes,” He blinked, snapping the lighter shut. “That seems — a shit ton of time ago. Why didn’t you retaliate?”

“You mean you didn’t receive all those publicitary calls I paid for? That Korean food place took so much convincing on my part.”

Chuuya’s head snapped up. “Fucker, that was you?”

“Hey,” V interrupted them. He was walking towards the car, the phone he’d been muttering into now hidden in the pockets of his latest hoodie — I’d Jump Into Flames For You (I’m Water Man) — and a permanent grimace on his face. “Are you ready to go?”

“Waiting for the boss,” Chuuya muttered, nodding towards Beatrice. “Whenever it suits her to put an end to her personal tragedy.”

The deep blue satin of her dress fluttered along to the Spring wind, dramatically framing her joined hands and tilted head. She was a delicate pillar; the eyes she offered to the sky were rancorous.

Apparently, she was praying.

“I thought she didn’t believe in God,” Dazai commented.

“She believes in herself,” V replied. A hint of pettiness made its way through the slightly panicked features that had warned him outside a pharmacy. “I’m sure she’s convinced it’s almost the same thing.”

Chuuya's mouth curled downwards.

Delivering Beatrice's head on Kouyou's porch still seemed pretty high in his list of priorities; it ought to be admirable, his resort not to. He knew he had met the Executive's gaze at every occasion, since that night at the dumping site — he was many things; a good liar, occasionally, too.

The after — that would be on him. Beatrice and V had asked to be freed; to be allowed to die. Dazai thought it slightly stupid on their side — no one wanted a suicidal freak's definition of freedom.

"Tell her that her temple will take four to five working days to build," Chuuya slid into the backseat, immediately plastering his shoes against the leather. "Let's go."

The streets of Yokohama grew brighter at night, revealing a new firefly-made skyline that Dazai's retinas would never stop finding blinding. Blurry reflections passed them by in the water — floating lanterns and the insistence even poorer neighborhoods had to illuminate along to the firmament.

He wished, suddenly and agonizingly, to have brought his gaming console.

Instead, he kicked the back of Beatrice's driver seat. "Are we there yet?"

"Not yet," she said, startled, between a curse.

He waited a bit. "And now?"

"We're not doing this."

Dazai changed strategy — he kicked Chuuya's calf. "So? What is it that you want?"

"For you to forget I have a birthday," was his distracted answer. He was unsubtly observing every turn of the woman's fingers, refusing to relax even once the highway appeared behind the windshield. His dirty glance — along with Beatrice's — stopped V's awkward attempt at starting the radio.

"How do you have a birthday, anyway? You did say alleged," Dazai mused, ignoring him.

"Boss told me." Of course. Mori's peaceful smile was all too easy to visualize. Chuuya had joined out of sheer need for what he was missing; feeding it to him piece by piece would keep him where he was. Lovingly abandoning trivias in his hands to keep him warm during the wait — to make him thankful. "I just counted the first day of the year, before."

He blinked. "So this is your first time celebrating it?"

"I'm not celebrating, beanpole," he scoffed. Dazai found it depressing — the immediate certainty that he would spend the day at the Cemetery, sitting with stolen graves. "I'm a bit busy, if you haven't noticed."

“Sixteen and you haven’t grown an inch,” He sunk a finger in his cheek, compassionately. “I suppose there’s not much to celebrate.”

Somehow, the kick managed to land between his ribs. “I’m still growing!”

Again, V cleared his throat.

“So,” he spoke up, finding his eyes in the rear view mirror. The man had spent the first part of their journey plastered against his door, throwing not quite undetectable glances to Beatrice. To encourage him, Dazai set to rolling his creaking car window up and down. “It sure took us some time to find you. Up for some betrayal yet, Tenshi?”

“Should be used to it,” Chuuya muttered.

Both their guests’ hands tightened — around a steering wheel; around an old revolver. I can put it away, V had offered, in good faith. Dazai had shrugged. I don’t usually get hurt when Chuuya’s around.

That’s nice, he had said.

That’s horrible!, he had whined.

“Survival is survival, no matter the means,” Beatrice bit out, clipped. “I’ve lost entire months of my life doing someone else’s dirty work. The sooner Dante is gone, the better it is.”

They didn’t exchange a glance.

“As for Ozaki,” Beatrice said, barely a whisper. “Kanechi should have known better than to welcome anything the Port Mafia had touched.”

Chuuya’s flinch shook his bones all the way to the half-moons he had printed on his palms. “And he shouldn’t have known better than to welcome a traitor who sold him out on a jealous whim?”

“I didn’t mean,” she insisted, “To hurt him.”

“That’s nice,” Dazai intervened. “You did kill him. I’m sure V here could relate.”

The man stiffened. Beatrice quietened down.

“She didn’t mean to,” V studied the metal tunnel of his revolver, just a hint petulantly. Dazai had imagined him more rancorous, from the stories. Perhaps he had been a bitter boy — all he could find, though, was a nostalgic type of animosity. Too angry; too lost; too tired to be either.

“I didn’t mean, she didn’t mean,” he huffed. “Why are people so obsessed with intentions? Facts are facts. My dog died. End. Why philosophize whether their heart had meant to stop beating or not?”

Chuuya made a face. “I hate your dog metaphors.”

“Because you’ve accepted your true nature?”

“I’ll shove a this car so far up your nose, you’ll —“

“Her power is... unpredictable, at times. Paired up with Dante’s, accidents were bound to happen,” V interrupted them. “She’s always been the smart one. The smart one, the good one, the whatever Dante says one. If she’d wanted me dead and gone, she —”

“I would have found a quicker way to do it?” the woman concluded, tonelessly.

V’s mouth turned up. “It doesn’t matter. If everything goes as it should, we’ll both be dead soon.”

Beatrice didn’t find anything to add.

The one condition for their help — a peculiar decision, certainly. Chuuya’s godly hands had struggled to grasp it. Dazai had wondered about his own cynicism; one of those ideas that would have had Mori pause and study him under the lights of his clinic.

Tell me, Dazai, he had asked, weird and stupid — convinced he knew him, just because he had seen him bleed. Why is it that you wish to die?

Common mistake. Better question — Tell me. Why is it that you’re still here?

The car jumped. Chuuya sneered. “Wonder just how much of that shit is your own thoughts. ‘You think Dante might be making you forgive every and all asshole move she’s pulled?’”

Beatrice scoffed. Her wristwatch, still rusted and offensively vintage, reflected the blinding lights of a car running in the opposite road. When it blinded her eye, she didn’t blink. “Don’t be a hypocrite.”

“Oh, I apologize. Whose fault is it if I’m in this state?”

“Dante’s,” she relied. “And you know it.”

It was V’s turn to sneer.

Stunned, she momentarily lost control of the wheel, jolting the whole car forward. “What is that supposed to mean?”

“Hey, Traitorous Holy Mary — if you could keep from crashing the car?” Chuuya snapped.

“Traitorous Holy Mary?” Dazai echoed, delighted.

Red bloomed on his cheeks. “It was just — this poem — If you want to bitch about your unresolved issues, let’s exchange seats and I’ll drive.”

V blinked, not rudely. “Aren’t you boys, like, thirteen?”

“We’re almost sixteen!”

“Really?” Beatrice squinted at them through the rear view mirror. “You look thirteen.”

“And you look like a —“

“Kids,” Dazai tutted, just to stress them all out a bit more. “We still have an hour of driving. We could mercilessly kill each other, if we so wished. Does anyone want to play Spelling Bee to pass the time?”

Disappointingly, no one said a word.

His car window rose again, stopping halfway to the end of its road. The cold wind whipped inside, blowing red strands into Chuuya’s eyes; he directed an annoyed look to the perpetrator. Dazai didn’t turn to meet his gaze. All the same, he felt him pause.

Imperceptible and unnoticed, Chuuya’s gloved fingers landed on the buttons of his own car door. Blue and amber eyes kept following the road; every inch as arrogant as the sun — his window started moving, too.

The abandoned hills that led to Rengoku were a blurred line under the moonlight, stiffening the lines of V and Beatrice’s shoulders. Climbing out of the car, Dazai followed the hard light in their eyes, all the way to the main road — empty, and devoid of any light poles. The smell of rain embraced them, framed by the night and the hoots of invisible owls. If he searched hard enough, he could see the outlines of the bridge they had jumped off from — hear the rush of the Kinatai Kawa; the tip-tip of shower water landing on porcelain.

Chuuya slammed his door shut, searching the darkness with his phone’s light, charms whipping his wrist at every step. “Didn’t miss the mosquitos. Shit, is it going to rain?”

Right on time, Beatrice slapped her arm. Eyes on the splattered bug on her palm, she said: “Too many parasites in this place. The explosion didn’t help.”

The glance she directed to V received no response — the man was too busy breathing in, hands flexing greedily. By the time he managed to tear his eyelids apart, only nostalgia was there to be given.

“We’re from here too, Bea,” he reminded her, somewhat desperate. “We can’t just wash our hands of something we were part of.”

The appellative had her spine snap up. Clearly dumbstruck, she stuttered: “V, I don’t —“

Dazai hummed, louder than necessary. “All this talking about parasites — are we playing the cockroach game? I want to be an Ectobius Vittiventris. Chuuya should be a Tryonicidae.”

He stared. “A Tryoni— what?”

“If handled incorrectly, it can release a horribly unpleasant smell,” he explained, excitedly. “It’s been compared to that of a wet dog! Don’t you think it’s perfect?”

Behind them, V and Beatrice were still locked in a gaze. The man was the one to clear his voice. “Ah, well — you know much about cockroaches?”

“And insects,” Dazai specified. He had stuffed Mori’s shelves at the clinic with stolen books from the Yokohama Central Library — and then, with jars filled in something different from pinned butterflies. “And reptiles. And bees, occasionally, but I’m allergic,” He sighed. “Not allergic enough for the anaphylactic shock to kill me, though. They’re nice little creatures — unlike certain dogs I’m involved with.”

“Motherfucker,” was Chuuya’s answer. He grabbed his fingers, pulling him down the valley — after one last, dirty look to their guides. He mimicked retching. “Come on. If I have to stomach their drama while tumbling down a creepy dark hill, I’m going to gauge my ears off. Tell me shit about bugs.”

He lit up, allowing himself to be dragged along. “Really?”

The road was made of eerie noises and dim cellphone lights, surrounded by shadows that seemed to mold themselves into vaguely human shapes. By the tenth rock he had tripped over because of Dazai’s skips, Chuuya gave up on cursing — using Tainted to float a few inches over the wild grass.

Beatrice and V kept a few steps behind, either arguing or reminiscing, or both. The outskirts of old, ghostly Rengoku weren’t all that interesting — they seemed to have endless whispers to waste on them, still.

“Female Lampyridae of the Photuris genus mimic the flash pattern of females from other species to trap the males,” Dazai explained, nodding towards the light-emitting insect held in his cupped hands.

The fireflies appeared here and there through the grass, flying mindlessly around them to join the starry sky. “So, Madame Tanaki,” Chuuya concluded, carefully toneless, turning his body upside down to study one particular bug. “Didn’t she win her latest husband over by dressing up like his ex wife?”

A blink. “That’s a fair comparison. Apart from the reproductive system, which is —”

“Gross,” he replied, grinning savagely. “How many do you figure I can catch in my mouth?”

He huffed.

Sooner than he had assumed they would, the weed-like placed rows of houses appeared at the edge of their vision. A cobblestoned path led them through that not-quite village, not too different from Rengoku — until V’s panting lungs paused to marvel at a familiar, half-destroyed building.

Dazai observed it. He concluded: “Wasn’t this place more blurry last time we were here?”

“You think?” Chuuya replied, crossing his arms. “Maybe it was the mud in your lungs?”

“Who knows.”

The square of ivy-covered bricks had been plastered under his eyelids since they'd stumbled their way out of the river. Jumping over the mountains of trash surrounding it wasn't harder the second time, but Dazai could barely keep his body from laughing from the sheer frustration being back there gave him. Dante had been there for months — and they had missed him, nonetheless.

Mori would laugh, he thought. Maybe not quite.

"Here we are," Beatrice said, no enthusiasm. "Welcome to The Purgatory."

"The only B&B near Rengoku for twenty miles," V intervened. "The director of the Institute owned it — used it more as a holiday house than anything else. The three of us used to come here and —"

Dazai scratched the scar around his thumb. "Plot your world domination?"

Neither of the guides seemed to appreciate the joke. Without a word, they set to pushing the door — tried to; until Chuuya, impatient, rotated a kick into the lock, catapulting the wooden obstacle several steps inside the house.

"It said push," Dazai said, helpful.

He only received a nasty glance.

Their tormented state hadn't allowed them to investigate the place, the last time they had stumbled through its doors — this time, Dazai's gaze roamed over faded wallpaper and cardboard boxes, and the white sheets covering most of the creaking furniture. His shoes seemed to sink in the layers of dust; V sneezed.

Chuuya's floating-self didn't even snicker — proof enough of his sudden alert. Dazai crossed his hands behind his back, humming. "I'm assuming it's the room with the creepy door?"

Beatrice made a face. She did direct them upstairs, though — to the furthest decaying door, splintered at the edges and kept still against the frame with too much tape. An ominous hole shattered the center of the surface — the result of a punch, sealed with cardboard pieces.

"Don't act rashly," the woman ordered. Her eyes were on the door, not seeing anything at all. "You will get your information. We will get rid of him. Just — Don't act rashly."

"Paranoid?" Chuuya mocked.

V gulped, holding onto his revolver. In a slow, calculated motion that stiffened Beatrice's shoulders, he laid his hand upon hers on the doorknob. "What was that old password we used?"

"Abandon all hope," she said.

"Joyous," Dazai commented. "Open up."

The clinic, he recalled, had been as much of a home as Mori's workaholic hands had managed to make it. The beeping of the machines; the abandoned coffee cups; Elise's drawings on the walls; the results of Mori's clumsy motions and Dazai's attempts all over the floors in glass shards — sometimes, he would sit on his stool and spin, spin, spin, and watch the tornado of unbridled existence around him.

Not hell, he would muse, not heaven either.

Purgatory looked exactly like it, though.

Contrary to the rest of the house, every inch of that room was pristine — from the flower chandelier to the silk curtains; floor-to-ceiling bookcases and a wooden desk, strewn with books and a bundle of silver crosses. Medical equipment made up the rest of the space — beeping machines, cables with no starting points, cabinets bursting with pills.

All the mechanical roads carried to the same, sole focal point — the man sleeping in the Hospital bed.

“Are we sure he's alive?” he asked, just to make some noise.

He didn't exactly look alive. His complexion was darker than any comatose patient's relative would have bragged about, with dark curls to frame shallow features that looked a tad too young — but, despite the beep of the monitors and the slow rise-and-fall of his chest, Dazai had been around enough corpses to know the smell of rotten.

A sound climbed V's throat, filling the room. The longing in it didn't quite make sense — when he tried to take a step forward, Beatrice put an arm out.

“Well,” Dazai insisted. Next to him, Chuuya finally landed on the floor, shoulder pressing against his with an energy that told him he should probably hold onto him — just to make sure he wouldn't rip off the IVs and be done with it. “Dante, I assume. Pleasure to make your acquaintance.”

A slap on the nape. “Are you stupid?”

Beatrice gulped. “So it's — Real.”

“No reason for me to lie,” V replied, just a bit rude, just a bit dazed. “I told you, he — Must have woken me up by mistake. I was on the floor. Right there. There's no other possibility. For him to be in this state, he must have — “

“Hit himself with his own Ability,” Dazai concluded, echoing words from the dumping die. “How entertaining.”

“Is that even possible?” Chuuya intervened, just as skeptical. “Physically, I suppose — But to the point of caging himself in his own limbo? How would he do it alone?”

V shook his head. “I don't know. My last clear memories are the days before — before my death. Souls don't remember the things they did in that state; they're not even allowed to talk about them. There must be something Dante made me forget.”

“No other explanation,” Beatrice took a step forward — then another; another, unshadowed by the terror on her friend’s face.

Pale hands reached out, freezing on their way to Dante’s face. Her wristwatch reflected the green of the heartlines on the monitor — slowly, she let her arms fall to her sides again, fists clenched. “He can’t give himself orders to become a Soul. He’s stuck.”

“And you’re the reason,” Chuuya intervened. “No way to activate Divine Comedy without your Ability. Which means you’ve been a Soul for —”

Throughout her recruitment to the Nine Rings, most probably, she didn’t say. Throughout her time with Kanechi — her short-lived history with Kouyou Ozaki — her rise to the power.

Her voice was merely a whisper: “A long time.”

“Hey!” Dazai called, hands and nose plastered to the window. “Hatrack, come take a look at this.”

Suspicious, Chuuya fit himself in the space next to him, searching through the darkness of the endless valley behind the house. “What am I looking at? Fuck ass, in the middle of fuckery?”

“Elegant. Look better.”

“I am,” he insisted. “I don’t —”

His voice trailed off. He pushed himself against the window — the breath that escaped from his mouth was cold enough to create a stain of condensation on the glass.

The darkness had a shape, if one searched hard enough. Under the heavy sky, with the rain it refused to let go and the lighting filling the distance, hundreds and hundreds of silhouettes stood in the empty field, clean rows and stiffened, wounded bodies — an unlikely army.

Waiting.

Gently, he tapped on the glass.

“He called them here,” V offered a frightened look to the body on the bed. “They’re — How did he recruit that many people?”

“He’s commanding them,” Beatrice echoed. The panic in her white knuckles didn’t reach the sharp line of her lips — abruptly, she reminded him of Kouyou. “In his sleep?”

“I still don’t get it,” Chuuya squinted. “It’s too — He used his Ability to save himself from yours. But why would he order you to use your Ability on him?”

“They must have fought,” V seemed even more terrified by the notion. “Knowing — Knowing Dante, he wouldn’t have wanted her to be with him because of the influence of an Ability. He must have freed her, and she must have attacked him. And now —”

“And now he’s here,” she concluded, eyes on the bundle of crosses on the desk. “And I’ve helped him every step of the way — and I know how.”

Belatedly, Dazai realized she wasn’t looking at the crosses — instead, she was focused on a narrow microchip, abandoned near the edge of the wood. “What’s this supposed to be?” Chuuya asked, as he made his way to pick it up between two fingers.

“A transmitter of sorts. The Nine Rings use them,” Beatrice said, voice thin. “They can be connected to one source and spread the same orders through more than one piece. I believe, perhaps —“

V’s gasp was the loudest thing in the room — she slapped her hand on Dante’s mouth and nose, all the hesitance to brush his skin gone, and she pressed.

It took some deadly quiet seconds — the low, metallic beep of the machines became more intense, a heartbeat growing quicker and quicker and quicker — right as V snapped: “That’s enough, Bea —“ Chuuya yelped, dropping the microchip.

“It electrified me,” he muttered? frowning. “How the fuck did it electrify me through leather?”

Dazai leaned forward. “Perhaps it came from the inside. You kids did ingest some — less than recommendable substances. V here jumped ten feet in the air.”

“You’re telling me he’s manipulating people with that old heartbeat trick of his?” V lamented.

“Heartbeat trick?” Dazai blinked.

“Electric shocks through the crosses, orders to the nervous system,” the woman summarized.

“Kingstain said he heard a voice, though. There must be some way for him to manipulate those, too,” Chuuya replied, nudging the chip with his foot. “His Ability is that powerful? It’s ridiculous.”

“Abilities are not human creations,” Dazai intervened. “As such, they can’t be anything but perfect. It’s a matter of balance. Dante’s Ability is overly mighty — which is why it comes with a heavy limit of time. The thirty three seconds requisite would make his Ability nearly impossible to use, if Beatrice didn’t exist.”

“So her existence is the shittiest coincidence on Earth,” he huffed. “Good job.”

The woman made a face. “It’s not like I asked to be born in Rengoku. There’s a reason I jumped the border as soon as I could.”

V scoffed. “Don’t pretend you would have left, if not for me.”

“Of course I would have,” Beatrice replied, after a few blinks of stunned silence, disbelieving. “We talked about it all the time. That place was hell on Earth, and you know it.”

“I do,” the man shrugged, uncomfortable — eyes still stuck to Dante’s emotionless face. “Dante knew. But we couldn’t leave. We had no means to. You, with no strings and your whole inheritance — If you had wanted to leave, you would have.”

“What the hell are you —“

Chuuya head tilted to the side, only once. His gaze followed the green heartlines as if hypnotized; his shoe laid upon the microchip, ready to crush. “No strings? What about your parents?”

Dazai yawned.

“Parents?” V echoed. The pull of his confusion almost tore his eyes from Dante. “What parents? We met at the Orphanage. She had nobody but us.”

Silence is a spider, one of his bedtime stories used to start with. Silence is a spider, and its webs are everywhere you forget to look. Outside, thunder roared. It lit the room up in white, painting their shadows in striking lines against the walls. Beatrice’s shoulders were all they could see. Pale hands dangled from the small of her back — delicately long, unconcernedly twinned.

Calmly, she said: “Dazai, you said you wanted to know about the Book. Correct?”

He leaned against the bookshelf, blinking. “Are you sure you didn’t get that backwards, Tenshi?”

“You,” Chuuya said — a single word widening his eyes, shimmering with an enraged epiphany. “Oh, I knew you —“

“I’m sure Beatrice will be glad to confirm all your suspicions. Mine too, obviously,” he replied. “If not her — Well. Perhaps she could enlighten us.”

V’s perplexed, careful gaze had found the sole uncovered window again. “Is that —“ he stuttered.

He didn’t bother studying anything but Beatrice’s stiffened, strangely calm figure — the intensity of the gaze she was dragging down Dante’s form. He knew what V was seeing — mafiosi attacking a foolishly undefeatable enemy; the mixture of thunder, cries of Ability, and the silence of dead men walking who couldn’t feel a thing.

“Mackerel,” Chuuya called. His hands were in his pockets — the sheer ire of it was dangerous. “Oi. Who is she?”

“That,” Dazai turned to look at him. “Chuuya. Try to die as painfully as possible. Alright?”

As evocatively as possible, he tapped two fingers under his chin.

Several things happened.

The boy's eyes widening was only the first of them — it seemed to last longer, though; unmatching eyes struck by lighting, realizing, shattering on impact.

No sound came from the door being slammed onto the floor — or perhaps he missed it, flung onto the bookshelves, falling into a maze of paper and medical machines, bumping his forehead, turning his vision into muddy waters all over again. Through the haze, he saw V land to the floor — saw Chuuya scream something — right before Golden Demon attempted to slice his head off.

“Ane-san!” he snapped, feet on the wall, settling disbelieving eyes on the pink silhouette at the door.

That brief distraction gave Golden Demon the window it needed to drag its katana down his chest — a rapid succession of crimson lines, immediately kicked away, so that he could roughly land on the floor, hands tight around wounds much deeper than any training had given him. “Kouyou, tell me you’re joking —“

“Quiet, little god,” Kouyou Ozaki replied, in a voice that wasn’t quite her own — tilting too flatly at the end; lacking the irreverence she carried like blood. She had only eyes for Beatrice. “Let us not make this harder than it needs to be.”

Upon Dazai’s petrified body, stuck under rubble and his pounding head, she was hardly more than a stain of lipstick and strangely empty eyes. She laid the tip of her umbrella on his chest — gentler than she had ever been with him.

Passing out was a decision. Nonetheless, as his eyes fell into the embrace of silence, he saw red lighting, and he heard Chuuya call his name.

---

...

---

[Continue reading]

Dante [...] Cause of death: lack of medical equipment, end of an induced coma.

His Ability [Divine Comedy; AB667] allowed him to entrap those who were exactly thirty three seconds from death into what Dazai O. has described as a “limbo”. The state kept his “Souls” [Check File] from death, threatening to kill them soon after being released from the grasp of Ability. It is important to specify that D.’s Ability allowed him to mold an illusionary “Heaven” or a “Hell” — completely personal to the subject’s psyche, memories, and mind. The Ability required the collaboration of B.’s own.

Two years after the accident that caused V.’s “death” in R., Dante fell into an induced coma, victim of the reflection of his own Ability, which occurred during [see next paragraph]. Since his Ability demanded the use of vocal orders to command his Souls [Check File: The Microchips], another solution was prepared to accommodate his orders [see paragraph 7.6].

It is unclear whether his part in his own plan can be faulted to his own decision. State of death: enemy of the Port Mafia.

[...]

[Continue reading]

---

...

---

— He’s in the car, and they’re going there, and Hirose Fumiko is playing. The glass of the window is merciless and icy against his forehead, bumping against him with every hole in the road. He knows it’s the cool windows, too — the ones that look black from the outside. Raindrops chase each other down the surface; the ones he’s cheering for lose almost immediately.

“Lisichka?” she calls. He should turn to look at her, but raindrop number four is —

---

...

---

— the world was soaked and bone-chilling, whipping him viciously in the middle of a gasp.

“For fuck’s sake, ” Chuuya snapped, through the haze. His voice seemed to come directly from inside his skull. “Why do you take so long to wake up?”

His attempt to scratch the daze out of his eyes immediately highlighted an issue — the TV cables that tied his wrists, tight enough to tear blood from his skin. Then came the rain, insistently stubborn — until the red silhouette behind him crawled forward, slamming his feet onto — something.

A strangely charged silence welcomed him — their heavy breaths echoed against tiled walls, framed by a tip tap so familiar, it awoke him. The world turned clearer — the bathtub, the moon outside the window.

“Did they seriously put us in the shower?” he croaked out, blinking flames away.

Chuuya huffed. His distaste was so heavy, he felt it reverberate through his spine, where they had been tied up against each other — black cables around their middles, wrists, and calves. The water Chuuya had turned on crowded under their pants; distractedly, Dazai wondered if he could die by electrocution.

“Yeah,” he said, knocking the back of his head against his own. “Loving the deja vu. Could have gone without the forced physical contact with a dead fish.”

“Are mackerels dead by definition?”

“No, but you will be,” Chuuya struggled against the restraints, probably just to make a point. “This isn’t even hard to get out of. Did they just put us here for fun? To highlight their stalker tendencies?”

“They know we won’t leave,” Dazai shrugged. “Not with this much at stake.”

Thunder echoed outside the windows, followed by the insistent melody of raindrops. The sound of fighting was quick to follow — weapons firing and people screaming; the swish! of Abilities.

“Did you manage to contact Koda?”

“The in-ear got fucked up,” he replied. “Considering the general ruckus, though, I would say they’ve arrived.”

He frowned. “How did they get you?”

“Thanks for the vow of faith,” the boy huffed. He contorted some more, exasperated — then dropped his head on Dazai’s shoulder, leaving a wet patch on his already soaked shirt. It felt strangely warm. “V was out. I tried to wake him up with some — violent shaking, so he could use his Ability on Kouyou. I stuck a piece of wood through her, then Beatrice got me in the head with — A hammer?” He blinked. “It’s kind of blurry.”

“You stabbed Ane-san?” Dazai blinked. “She’ll put you on calligraphy duty until your next life.”

A groan. “Don’t remind me.”

The warmth from the weight on his shoulder began to feel less dry; he licked a trail of blood under his nose, studying the crimson shade of the water at their feet, and dared: “Are you — like, going to bleed out?”

“You think I’d die that easily? Fuck off. They wouldn’t have even gotten me if I hadn’t been that angry. I —” He cleared his throat. “Let it distract me.”

“He admits it.”

“Die. You went down with one hit.”

“At least you understood what was going on with her,” he replied, ignoring him. “I thought I would need to spell it out for you.”

His offense was thick enough to be tasted. “As if she would ever betray the organization.” Just a fact, unchained by loyalty or deference — Kouyou Ozaki wasn’t made for betrayal. “I just don’t understand when Beatrice got her,” He let out a humorless laughter. “Poor Dante. We’ve been shitting on him for so long.”

“How do you know he’s still not to blame?”

“She’s been lying to us,” Chuuya spat out. “Not that fucking hard to imagine she’s been lying about everything. The man’s in a coma. ”

Dazai hummed. “Oh, I know. It’s a bit sad that you only understood it ten minutes ago, though, isn’t it?”

“First of all, it’s been at least one hour,” Chuuya replied, jolting him forward with a viciousness that cracked his bones. “Second, I already knew she was leading us on.”

“Sure you did.”

“I did, asshole!” he insisted. “I’ve had doubts. The flashes she told us she kept having from her time at the dungeons — I don’t remember anything from my night at the Headquarters. And now Dante — I don’t think he would have freed Beatrice, not when the risks were so high. And if she was really under his control, he could have stopped her before she said a word.”

He mimicked a winning bell. “Not a Soul. ”

Annoyed: “Not a damn Soul. ”

A sudden wave of impact rattled the window — lighting and Abilities, turning the room red. The melody of gunshots was too stable to be successful; Dazai could imagine the endless rows of Souls standing back up — walking and walking and walking, eternally.

“It’s not just that,” he started, eventually, over their shallow breaths. “I know what the Nine Rings’s seal is.”

Pressed against the side of his throat, Chuuya’s jaw clenched. “What? What does the seal have to —“

“And Kouyou,” he continued. “Her being a Soul is not news. I’m rather sure she was one even before mission Blue Flower was set in motion.”

“What the fuck are you talking about?”

Easily, Dazai said: “I can’t tell you.”

For several, heavy moments, only the tip tap of water drops and the muffled roar of weapons filled his pulsing ears. The scar down his hand seemed to electrify him; he recalled the sound his throat had made as he dislocated his thumb.

A glacial word broke through: “What?”

“I can’t tell you,” Dazai insisted.

“You’re joking.”

“I’m not.”

Thunder flared. “You’re playing the mastermind game right now?” Chuuya shook their joined bodies, landing his head against the wall. Dazai yelped. “Right now, you piece of fucking crap? With Ane-san under a religious brainwashing scam and our men fighting off shitty sinners zombies?”

The impact made him slip down the wet tub; in a graceless dance, they stumbled up and down the soaked floor, slamming several body parts against its edge and the walls, splashing crimson water around. “This isn’t about — stop it —!”

“You’re fucking pathetic — let go of me! — You want me to tell you you’re the smartest asshole around? Is that it?”

“I wouldn’t mind it,” he admitted. “Hey!”

The hit against the wound on his temple made him see stars. Bending him forward until his nose brushed the floor of the bathtub, Chuuya snapped: “Fuck you!”

“I can’t tell you,” he repeated.

“My ass! Promise number one! Why?”

Dazai leaned his forehead on the ceramic, squeezing his eyes shut. “Because I already did.”

A groan left his throat. “We’re not doing this again. With all the codes — you didn’t tell me shit. Again.”

“Chuuya.”

“What?”

“What did we talk about in the car?”

“What?” he echoed. “What does that —“

“Answer to me.”

“I don’t — V and Beatrice’s dramatics! Spelling Bee, my stupid birthday — the fuck does that have to do with —“

“With the windows,” Dazai specified. “The car windows. Shorthand twenty three. What did we talk about?”

“What are you talking about?” Chuuya insisted, exasperated. “We didn’t use that code.”

“And what code are we using right now?”

“What?” Tension quickened his heartbeat; Dazai could feel it against his wrists, right where his gloved fingers had been tracing lines ever since the first jet of water had hit him. “What do you —“

Abruptly, he fell quiet.

Too slow to be unaware, the stubborn drag of leather abandoned the skin of his arm.

Dazai could be patient. He waited for his heavy breaths to quieten down against his bones — for cold, inevitable acceptance to freeze his lungs and let them out, deflecting like a last exhale against his spine. The strength pushing him down disappeared; they settled upright again, back against back — quiet.

With a sigh that tasted of repulse, for the first time since December, Chuuya abandoned his body against Dazai’s own, head on his shoulder, eyes closed.

“Alright,” he said, like he hated him for it. Somehow, it sounded brutal — the ricochet of his exhaustion against the walls, more vicious than any of his screams had been. “When did you figure it out?”

“That you’re not Chuuya?” He fixed his head better in place, shrugging enough to rattle the boy’s own. “Later than I should have, all things considered.”

For a moment, Dazai was perched on the table of the meeting room — fiddling with the slices of some important document Mori had made the mistake of giving him. They were alone; Kouyou had already dragged a freshly-out of the Hospital Chuuya away. It was the first time either of them had been invited to join. It was days after Corruption.

Two instances of collaboration, Mori told him, walking a useless path up and down the room. Two outstanding successes. Want to give me an hypothesis on why that is?

Because I'm your best card, he answered. And he's the most powerful weapon you have.

[I have, he corrected himself, then — but only where Mori couldn't reach. That I have.]

Once he had noticed — once he'd admitted to himself that he knew just what space Chuuya's being left in the newly dug corner next to him — he hadn't been able not to.

"I told you, at the Hospital," he said, just a hint less superior than he would have if his feet hadn't been kicking scarlet water. "You've been weird since — Verlaine. It didn't add up; not if you had only been a Soul for a few days. And when you disappeared for a week after the meeting — no one heard from you," A pause. "Only Kouyou."

She had been the one to hastily tell him to leave the poor boy alone, for a while — once the bruises from their squabble had vanished, and boredom and the empty seat at the Arcade had settled in his bones. He could have stolen information on him; figured it out in less time than whining behind her skirts had taken.

Dazai hadn't.

He had jumped up and down the colorful reflections of the stained glass windows, one year younger and two times more dispassionate. He had come up with pranks. He had filled Chuuya's new office with crickets. He had wondered what it felt like — grieving.

"Beatrice must have gotten Kouyou first, and she must have brought you to her," he continued. "No other way to capture you. Some of the things Beatrice knew about you weren't in the archives — Only you could have told her. How low the possibility of you actually being thirty three seconds from death after the explosion in Rengoku was. All the times the Souls knew where we were going to look for them."

"But I think you understood, didn't you?" His shoulder blades dug caves into his. "When we fought at the Hospital, you told me you knew something was wrong. But you couldn't tell me what. Souls can't talk about their state. You couldn't tell me you're the spy we've been looking for. Tsuchiya Mi — you were the one to contact her sister about her. You alerted the Souls about a specific target. Ace's measures couldn't beat that focused strength."

"Our mistake," Dazai concluded, "Was assuming that most Souls were only ever under Dante's control when they were in that — vacant state. But it's not true, is it? You're always under his influence."

Chuuya made a sound. It could have been laughter, mocking and familiar — it could have been a defeated sigh; nonetheless, it was muffled by forcefully shut lips.

His fingers tapped against his skin as if it hurt to do so, nails scraping to keep contact through the gloves, fighting against themselves. He had never thought about describing touch as relieved.

The P-R-O-D-I-G-Y, he tapped, all his frustration focused on the effort it took to spell that out — an effort, he knew, meant to taunt him — made me wait a shit long time.

“And that’s why you were so mad after Rengoku,” Dazai concluded. “You actually noticed me trying to communicate, in the house, didn’t you?”

Still stupid.

“You realized it could be a communication method, one the Soul wouldn’t notice — so you made sure I would push for us to learn more ways to convey information,” He huffed a half laughter. “Every time you used those codes, you were saying stuff the Soul wouldn’t let you, right?”

Could not say it all, he traced. Gently — so gently it seemed uncharacteristic; followed by a pinch to the wrist, and Dazai felt strangely euphoric, felt strangely relieved, hello, hello, here you are — he bumped the side of his head against his own. The spy thing. Body fights back. Shit body.

Dazai snorted.

“Are you having fun?” Chuuya spoke up. “You know, I am me. I just can’t talk about —“ His voice cut off. He groaned, frustrated. “You know.”

“So be quiet, stupid. I’m trying to talk with your stupid hands. You heard what I said in the car, didn’t you? About Kouyou?”

She kept saying we should focus on the Nine Rings, Chuuya tapped, drawing a circle to signal the name of the organization. She wasn’t talking about R-E-V-E-N-G-E. She knew it was Beatrice who was behind it all. She just couldn’t tell us.

“Right,” he agreed. “She put a bomb in your taxi, you know? All in the name of getting you to focus on the Nine Rings. ”

“That was shitty,” Chuuya replied.

That was smart, he tapped.

“Damn,” Dazai commented. “That’s mildly entertaining. Must be a headache, though. If I had any pity left in my body for you, I’d feel all of it.”

“I still have a tongue to tell you to fuck off.”

“Now I get why all your insults have been more than disappointing, lately. Someone should tell Dante he’s got a distasteful sense of humor.”

I’ve been me, the fingers insisted, hesitantly, with fractured motions. I’ve just. Had headaches. Also been a spy. Boss is going to kill me. His next pause lasted a bit longer. I got people killed.

“What he doesn’t know won’t hurt him,” He brushed off. “Obviously, I could tell him, but I’ve got a better idea. I shall take care of your repentance. Maybe a torture session or two?” He lit up. “An apology dance?”

“I’m not doing the — I’ll bite your hands off if you try to touch me.”

“Where’s your guilt, partner?” Dazai insisted. The wound was right in front of him, bleeding and wide, ready for a second knife to sink in. “You could have destroyed the organization, you know? That’s why I never go anywhere Kouyou invites me to. Our best doctor died for your little secret.”

It thundered. Chuuya didn’t move.

Humorless laughter shook his body to the core; with the acceptance of someone who wouldn’t drown blame into blindness any time soon, Chuuya spat out: “Fuck you.”

“You trusted me to get you out of this.”

“I didn’t have a choice.”

“You always do,” Dazai shot, as merciless as he knew how to be. Chuuya had never told him what he had seen in his Limbo — he had never told him why he had said his name as N tortured him, either. “You don’t get to pretend I don’t make sure of it. You don’t get to pretend this wasn’t yours.”

Against his arms, he felt his fists clench.

Satisfaction burned through his bones. It left a bitter taste in his mouth. Some victories are better left unsavoured, Mori liked to say. And some wounds are useless if not prodded at.

Dazai made a face.

“You know what I thought when I realized Dante had —” Chuuya cleared his throat, again, as if he had choked on the letters. His fingers tapped, just as frustrated, managed to get me?

“I should have let the Sheep shoot me?”

“Fuck off,” he echoed. “I thought — finally.”

He paused. The curiosity of a scientist; the suicidal vein of a doctor. “Finally?”

“Finally,” Chuuya’s scoff lacked humor; it was somewhat amused, still — in a strangely poisoned way. “Somebody to be angry at.”

It was as much of a, you had a point, as he would ever get. Dazai wasn’t even sure if he deserved it. With a sigh, he dropped his head on his shoulder again, stuck on the pounding of Chuuya’s blood against his temple.

He knew how those documents in the Archive would end, as long as they carried their names. He knew the page would be scribbled and scribbled and scribbled on, until someone would grow stubborn enough to turn it. He knew overflowing was a second nature for the damned — he knew that there wasn’t enough paper in the world for them. At some point, he supposed — they’d have to move to skin.

What about the S-E-A-L?, Chuuya tapped, finally. You didn't say in the car.

“Oh,” he recalled. “No, I was just making fun of you,” A pinch on the wrist. “My theory on the seal is a recent development. Beatrice slipped up quite a few times inside the room.”

“Did I?”

They straightened.

Beatrice had renovated her clothes, if slightly — the hems of her gown had been tied up over her knees, and she had let her hair down, curling aimlessly around her scarred wrists. A remote of sorts was in her hands; something he had seen in the clinic room.

Electric shocks, she had said.

Kouyou was right beside her.

“Look at you,” Dazai whistled. They were a strange combination — rosebuds and decayed ground, pale where one was sunkissed, bodies pushing against each other and away from, as if undecided. He recalled the pictures from Kanechi’s album — Kouyou’s hand in the flowers held by her fingers, but her eyes settled mercilessly on the bow of Beatrice’s lips. “Old friends reunited. Shame Kanechi’s corpse couldn’t join.”

He was used to being the subject of Kouyou’s hostility — it was startling to realize that her poison in her eyes could have been ten times more deadly.

She took a step forward. Beatrice stopped her.

“Don’t mind him, Ozaki,” she tutted. “You know better than to allow a man to anger you.”

“I have a chance to skin him alive, at last, and you ask me to ignore it?” she replied, with that strange mechanical cadence.

“I need him, still,” Beatrice insisted. “You can have him when I’m done. Chuuya, come here.”

Lightning echoed outside; even if it hadn’t blinded him through the window, Dazai would have felt the snap of Chuuya’s attention — of the woman’s fingers on one of the buttons of the remote. The cables fell under his grip, torn into easy pieces. He stood up rapidly enough to trip Dazai; by the time he’d sat up again, Chuuya had moved to stand next to the Executive.

“That’s rather unfair,” he noted, shrugging the loose cables off. “Three against one? Ane-san, you’ve always been a bother. He’s my dog, I told you.”

“You can have him back soon,” Beatrice reassured him. “I just need him to annihilate those Port Mafia men. Bringing them here to fight the unfightable — You boys must be pretty new to this leading thing.”

“Rejuvenation has been widely recognized as a necessary factor for the wellbeing of organizations,” Dazai pointed out. “You’d know everything about that, correct?”

There was no smile on her face — all the quiet, stone-made politeness froze all the same. She walked to his tub, her makeshift guards staring at the floor — she offered him a begrudgingly impressed nod. “When did you figure it out?”

“The Border,” Dazai shrugged. “You said you, couldn’t wait to jump the border.”

A smile appeared, dragging only one side of her mouth up. “Here’s the Prodigy.”

“People truly misunderstand the nature of that name,” He leaned his chin on the edge of the tub, looking up at her through dripping eyelashes. “It’s not an ode to my intelligence. Demons aren’t smart.”

“But you are,” Beatrice insisted. “Which is why I’ve been waiting for you.”

“Did you perhaps reconsider my double suicide proposal?”

She offered him a hand. “Stand up. We need to talk about the Book.”

“Oh,” Every muscle webbing his face caught fire, straining agonizingly against the instinct to smile. “Oh, I feared you would say that.”

Signs of the battle had irrevocably stained the clinic room, but the path to that destination hadn’t been spared either. The windows had been undressed of their glass; bullets rested on the floor, stained in blood and wooden splinters. When Dazai dared to sneak a look out; all he saw was the fire of rifles and the walking legs of the wounded.

Dante’s bed was the only untouched corner of the room — every shelf, every paper, and every inch of the place bore the handprints of Chuuya’s resistance. Golden Demon’s slashes on the walls and the furniture were impossible to misunderstand.

Right at the feet of the cot rested V — a bleeding gash on his forehead, painting his vacant eyes crimson. He didn’t even turn to look at him.

“For the sake of clarification,” Dazai offered, meekly allowing Beatrice to settle him on a stool next to Dante’s bed. “You went looking for Dante, yes?”

“Not immediately,” she clarified. There was something akin to contempt in the eyes she settled on the comatose man; not an ounce of the conflictual nostalgia from before. “V’s supposed death was a real hit. I didn’t think Dante would be that incompetent with his own Ability. I had to wait until I gained influence in the Nine Rings — without revealing myself as the puppeteer of their organization.”

“You’re the one who ordered for the village to be destroyed.”

“Obviously,” Beatrice searched through the mess that had once been a desk. “Both times. Initially, I thought about letting the place go. I did grow up there, you know? Not with Dante and Virgil, but, still. Then — Well. I needed someone to test Dante's power on. They were close enough."

Dazai hummed. "Makes sense."

"It does, doesn't it?"

"And your," He blinked. "Parents?"

"The town's bakers," An amused expression. "They were always nice. Offered to adopt me, before they decided I was too sickly. They taught me how to make bread. Right, 'Zaki?' Remember when I'd bake us loafs for our trips?"

Kouyou didn't answer, too distracted by whatever her eyes were drowning her in. He didn't munch on what the Limbo could be showing her — she had bleed for years to prepare for that moment.

At her silence, Beatrice made a face.

She grabbed her remote again, fiddling with some of the buttons. Under Dazai's eyes, one of the monitors connected to Dante's body sped up — the tracing of his heartbeat jolted three different times, before dropping to an average rhythm again. Almost instantly, Kouyou blinked.

"Oh —" Slowly, a smile bloomed on her face. "Oh , yes, I do recall. Kanechi always complained about the lack of salt."

"True Northern Italian bread has no salt. I've told you both a thousand times ," She shook her head. With a conspiratorial look to Dazai, she explained: "My father was an immigrant. God knows how he landed in Rengoku, exactly, but the war — the true war, mind you; not whatever fickle, petty thing the Government and the Ability Users attempted to call such — was a terrible time."

Dazai curled an eyebrow. Mori would dislike that description of The Great War viciously. "My speech in the Forest must have hit a nerve."

"Pardon?"

"I blamed V — Dante — for holding you captive and living off your forced feelings," he echoed, studying Kouyou's uncaring, brilliant grin. "Are you scared that Judgement Day will be lonely?"

Beatrice didn't appear bothered. "Kouyou and I reunited at the Nine Rings ' cemetery months ago. She was just as eager to see me then as she is now."

"I'm sure she was. How long did it take her to ask Golden Demon to kill you?"

"I can get your little redhead to be the same, if that's what you want."

Dazai darted a glance to Chuuya — hands pathetically crossed behind his back, chin up, stupid hat in place. He had never looked quite so straight, not even under Kouyou's best ministrations. "Assuming you won't kill me?"

"It would be a foolish move on my part," Beatrice stood up, carrying a thick dossier. "You have the answers I need. And you're not a threat."

"I'm not?" He tilted his head. "The moment I touch Dante, all your Souls are done for."

"You're right," she considered. "Except that's not exactly how it works, is it? And even if it was, I doubt you would risk the life of the Port Mafia's most powerful Ability user and most successful Executive."

"You're widely overestimating how much I care about the Port Mafia," Dazai leaned back in his seat, dropping his nape against the edge — letting his head dangle upside down. "A common mistake, but a stupid one nonetheless. That's not how it works?"

Beatrice climbed over V's abandoned legs to sit at the edge of Dante's bed; she offered him the dossier. "No Longer Human works either by touching the User or the ones under its effects, correct?"

"Yes," He nodded, caressing the lines over lines of research under his hands. "Is every document in this room like this? You've certainly been looking for the Book for a long time. I'm surprised V didn't have any answers for me, when I found him, that night. Maybe you just didn't want him to tell me."

Ignoring him, she insisted: "You would need to somehow come into contact with both us and every single person who's been affected by our Abilities. It's not a hive mind; you can't kill us by killing the roots."

"That's fascinating," he offered. "And if I put a bullet in both your heads?"

"Your problem stays," Beatrice replied. "More than half the men fighting for me in that backyard are from the Port Mafia. You say you don't care about the organization — I doubt your Boss won't mind the consequences. I'm sure you fear those, at the very least. And, well —" She flickered a look to Chuuya, lips quivering. "Your friend is such a delight. You're really willing to let him die in front of you?"

He snorted. "You've really misunderstood me. Anyway, he is dead."

"Not yet," She motioned her chin towards the file. "I'm assuming you know what I need you to do."

"Obviously," Dazai snapped the file shut, throwing it on the ground. Next to it, V didn't even flinch. "To put at least a Soul in almost every major city of the world — how long did it take?"

"I had time," She shrugged. One of her hands tapped Dante's leg, lingering on the sheets. "Kanechi was something of a — delivery man, for the Nine Rings. We were always around, and overseas. Of course, we travelled less when Ozaki arrived. That was when I started leaving on my own.”

“All to make sure you would have someone in whatever place you would discover the Book was,” he concluded. “And now you want me to tell Dante where it is, so that he can command the nearest Soul to go take it.”

“It’s actually very easy,” the woman reassured him. She offered him her remote. “You see that tracing monitor? Chuuya let me know you know Morse Code. All you need to do is signal the location. Dante’s heartbeat will send shocks to the crosses, and they will act as messages.”

Dazai threw the remote in the air, catching it as it came down. “You truly put a lot of faith in me.”

“I’ve been searching for you for a long time. I know you, Dazai Osamu,” Beatrice said. “Or would you rather I —“

“Dazai is fine,” he assured her. “When did you start searching?”

“Long before Dante was born, of course. At the time, the plan was to use the Book to amplify my Ability. But Dante’s is much more interesting, isn’t it? Sounds like something straight out of a tale.”

Her eyes traced the pale lines left on his skin by his oxygen mask — the rise and fall of his chest. “It was some time after the war. Rengoku wasn’t particularly touched by it — if we don’t count the construction of that annoyingly sinister Border. But as you know, the wall was soon destroyed. All thanks to the Nine Rings’ seal — and to a little kid who got lost in the woods and found it.”

His eyes fell on the hand she had abandoned on the sheets. Her wrist wasn’t naked — had never been naked, not since he had met her, with that old wristwatch and its imperceptibly cracked crystal.

“You got it,” Beatrice complimented, following his line of sight. “Say, in the middle of all her disdainful speeches about the Nine Rings, did Ozaki ever tell you what they became notorious for?”

Kouyou didn’t perk up. Dazai shrugged: “I don’t know. Tattoos?”

“That, too,” she admitted. “But no. The Nine Rings have never had a man as their Boss. Progressive, right? I have always worn this badge with pride.”

“Of course you have,” he replied. “You were the one to create the syndicate.”

“Oh, better than that,” Beatrice tapped the glass of her watch. “I am the only Boss this organization has ever had. No need to pass an Ability-infused object down to someone else, when the object itself allows you to just — be , that someone else.”

Eerily, the perpetual melody of gunshots paused. Through the destroyed window, Dazai could still hear calls and curses — for an instant, though, it was as if the bullets had all run out.

“How many times?” he asked.

“This is the ninth,” She smiled. “Ninth name, ninth Boss, ninth lifetime —”

“That must have been hard.”

Complicity painted her features — a strange shadow; something that tickled him all the way to his bones. “Yes. You would understand.”

“And were they worth this final show?”

“Worth?”

“You’re not fully yourself anymore, are you?” He hummed. “All those times we thought you were under the effect of Dante’s Ability — that wasn’t you pretending for our benefit. Hereditary Abilities have been known to carry unpleasant side effects. You lose sight of yourself at times, don’t you?”

Beatrice’s lips fluttered. Vacancy made a home in her eyes, or just returned after some fresh air. It had always been there. Living nine lives, he thought — all to play God during the last one of them.

“I would have escaped your dungeons sooner if that weren’t the case,” she said, at last. He recalled her funeral clothing at the entrance of Rengoku. “George Kingstain — I choked him in his own blood. Just as you two told me to do.”

“I understand.”

“I know you do,” Her fingers patted his knuckles, almost affectionately. “Suffering should not be a price to obtain the good that life can offer. It is simply a consequence to those who deserve it.”

Dazai tilted his head from one side to the other. With no pity, he bowed his head, and swore: “I really am sorry.”

“Sorry?”

“That this ninth life of yours seemingly treated you so badly.”

“I know you are,” she said, easily. “You’re a demon. No one would know better than you. But, I must say, this was one of the most interesting ones.”

Her eyes fell on Kouyou.

Imperceptibly, they softened.

“She was truly a darling,” Beatrice sighed. “A presumptuous, stubborn little princess, who Kanechi was ready to sacrifice his life for. I wanted to snap her neck for it. It would have been beautiful. They were the dearest friends I had in all my lifetimes,” Her eyes traced her face. “It’s a shame misfortune follows her so earnestly — enough to meet me.”

Dazai listened to the beep of the machines. For some reason, he thought of the picture hidden under his makeshift bed — that stolen memory of Chuuya; a little thorn he ought to stick back into soft flesh.

Of every addiction he had ever allowed Mori to poison him with — the possibility of someone else’s normalcy seemed the most useless one.

“Aren’t you the one who wants to enslave the world?” Dazai pointed out. “It would be easy enough to simply — not.”

That remark got Beatrice to move her gaze away from the Executive. Stone molded her eyes once again; standing up, she twinned her fingers.

“God has given me a mission,” she said, with the tone of someone who wanted to insist — I know you won’t understand. “I vowed to punish them all for what they did. The War —” She gulped. “Not the Great War. Just a War — one of the many. It’s always a war. I was only a child when I ended up on the battlefield and found the Seal. I almost died, and you know what they did? They said it was a miracle,” Bitterly, she laughed. “They made up a ridiculous story, said the people of Rengoku were blessed — none of us were blessed. No one is. People are imperfect creatures. And they never pay for the cruelty they are laced with.”

“Until now,” he concluded.

“Until now,” she sighed. “Do not worry, Dazai. The Book offers endless possibilities — I’m sure I will be able to write something for you. You can’t be a Soul, considering your Ability. But repentance can come in many shapes. We shall find something together.”

“That is very kind of you.”

She smiled — and motioned Chuuya forward with gentle fingers. V didn’t resist when she leaned down to steal his revolver from his fingers; he didn’t even turn to watch her lay it in the boy’s hand. When the tip of the weapon touched his temple, Dazai smiled.

“Of course,” he noted, soaked in the familiar coldness emanating from Chuuya’s body at his back. “Not that I have a choice.”

Beatrice smiled. “I’m glad you understand.”

The remote had a simple enough mechanism; Dazai assumed she had had a long time to build the best solution to her problem. He brushed his fingers on the button, studying Dante’s sleeping face.

If he wasn’t a Soul, if he didn’t have a limbo — was he just dreaming?

A shame misfortune follows her so earnestly, he repeated, because sometimes people said things, and he didn’t understand them, and he did, and he couldn’t, and he wanted to. Enough to meet me.

He let the hand hidden from Beatrice's visual drop at his side — it dangled and dangled, right until it came into contact with Chuuya's leg. Obediently, he started fiddling with the button.

["Corruption," he proposed. The couches at the Headquarters were nicer on the eyes than they were on the back; nonetheless, they shared the one facing the door of the meeting room. If he had tried to count the number of bandages the two of them shared, they could have sat there long enough to watch their bones melt with the candles. "Get it? Because it corrupts you."]

"It's not me it corrupts," Chuuya replied. His eyes were settled somewhere else; as dramatic as always, as guilty as ever.

"You sure gained some side effects," Dazai replied, petulantly. His eyes roamed over his bandaged body, pointedly — the new set of scars he could peek at; spiral rosy lines he would pay to tear apart and see. Mori's voice reminded him that wounds were to be watched, not touched. Instead, he settled for poking the skin under his new amber eye. "And a new catchphrase, if my ears don't fool me!"

Chuuya slapped his hands away. "Shut the fuck up. Not my fault some stupid computer code wanted to be dramatic."

There was a question there — one Dazai wouldn't answer, because it wasn't worth his time and effort. Instead, he kicked the side of his shoe. "You were a black hole."

"If that's what you want to call it."

"It wasn't very nice, though — giving me hope that you would actually die."

"I will ram Hirotsu's rifle so far up your ass —"

"It was the coolest thing."

"It hurt like a motherfucker," Chuuya replied, unamused. Then, after a pause: "It was kind of cool."

Dazai got patronizing, because he could: "Small and inflammable as he is, though, Chuuya shouldn't use it when I'm not around."

Disbelief curled his mouth around a retch. "I don't need your shit concern —"

"Hey," he interrupted him. Something in his tone must have been wrong — must have been a slip up; something made for the privacy of a shipping container and an audience of trash and stars — because Chuuya turned a mildly surprised look on him.

In the silence of the hallway, on the most expensive and most uncomfortable couch of that castle, Dazai came to the conclusion that he would never be able to meet his eyes with ease again. Burned earth and the skyline chased his attention, fighting and blinding and crawling, demanding it with the stubbornness he was slowly learning to associate with the other boy.

Few things were worth the hustle that seeing was — if he looked for too long, if he looked too much, if he looked too honest — then maybe —

“Hey,” he repeated. Gods weren’t real; only ink and paper were. Dazai had seen it enough to know when a chapter was ending — when it was beginning. “Don’t use it when I’m not there.”

Chuuya looked right back at him.

Did you need a divine eye to, at last? he didn’t ask. Can you see me, now that it hurts?

“Alright,” he conceded, begrudgingly, quietly — quieter than he could ever remember him being. The weight of bandages, muffling it all. Look; we match. “I won’t.”]

“Quicker,” Beatrice told him. “No need to lose yourself in details. Just tell him.”

“Patience,” Dazai replied. The buttons of the remote were strangely sweaty; he tried to imagine her ancient bones panicking, and failed. “You don’t want me to sign it wrong, do you?”

At his shoulder, he felt Chuuya’s body stiffen.

The fabric of his pants was rough under his fingers; he vowed to burn his entire wardrobe again, and burn his apartment, and burn his hat, and watch him rise through the flames with his name on his lips. “I don’t know if you know,” he added, focusing on the sensation of gloved hands trembling, fighting against an invisible cage. “But I suck at Morse Code.”

The gun tickling his temple shuddered.

It tapped on his bones, right back at him.

Don’t pretend, he had told him, soaked to the bone, this wasn’t yours.

Dazai let the remote fall from his hands.

“Boy,” Beatrice stood. “What do you think —“

“How was it, again?” He scratched his chin, turning to study Chuuya’s void features. Like he had too many times before, he snatched his hat off his head, plopping it on his own. “Ah. Yes.”

“Dazai,” she insisted, more harshly.

“Oh Grantors of dark disgrace,” Bluntly, unmatching eyes snapped open, looking at him. A breach through the storm — a lock turning, through the rust and the creaks and the corpses of every guard that had dared to put it in place. A famished, mauled beast, sneaking its teeth between the bars. A stranger, still — but a rightful one. “You need not wake me again.”

---

...

---

Death had a tendency to soothe him.

Demons had no time to waste with mothers, but she cradled him all the same. Her absence touched him deeper than any blade, tighter than any rope he'd ever tied around his throat; he supposed he should have used that lonely time to breathe, — to live — but he always forgot. A time; a place. He never reached it.

Right at the border was a sight he'd never seen before. Until that moment, he had looked for beauty in other rotten places — places that were familiar, because he'd sought them out with his teeth and nails. He had dropped his body from the highest floor, knowing the concrete was painful and black and nothing else.

These days, beauty was red.

Sound was all he could feel: white noises and the rush in his ears, as his body landed on what he could only assume to be the ground. The rain had disappeared, evaporated by a wrenching heat. Laughter filled the air, or the reddish haze that had taken its place — Dazai couldn't remember ever hearing a more ancient sound. When the whipping wind tore his eyelids apart, the moon was a crimson halo.

The Purgatory had been blown up on impact; wood and destroyed furniture filled the valley, followed by the storm of raining papers. A crater sat in its place, and bodies were climbing their way out of it, rifles and vacant expressions still on.

Somewhere through the mist, Dazai saw Port Mafia black clothing and the unmistakable golden rain of bullets.

Souls raised their weapons again, uncaring of their missing limbs and bullet wounds, focused on the endless crowd of enemies running their way. The red dot in the sky dropped to the ground quicker than eyes could catch — when he landed in the middle of their rows, the earth shook with such violence Dazai watched the bridge they'd driven on an endless time ago collapse.

White fog arose; the wave of impact sent him another thousand feet behind, slamming even the trees surrounding the valley to the ground.

The eye of the storm, surrounded by the Souls' brutally eviscerated corpses, was — Chuuya.

His clothes had been torn to bloodied shreds — red paths covered his body head to toe, spiral lines and the cracks of an earthquake on the concrete, blooming almost luminescent on his throat and cheeks — showing off the blinding lava living underneath.

His savage, wrecked laughter kept his eyes shut — the blink of an instant that tore them apart showed off irises shrunk to minuscule dots, their white littered in shattered veins.

He didn't waste time to recover; slamming his naked hands together, the space surrounding him lit up — a bubble that formed blisters on every inch of his naked skin the moment it exploded, filling the valley with a heat so devastating Dazai thought he could see flames. Rocks and debris flew at a speed that would beat sound ten times over, their weight exaggerated to the point of easily sinking into the men's chests — their faces, their legs, every inch of them — and leaving from a crater in their backs.

With another fit of laughter, Chuuya flew up again, mindlessly distributing destruction through the rows of Souls.

Coughing, Dazai leaned on a corpse at his right, using it to stand up. A wet gasp corrected his assumption; under his hands, the woman — despite the gash starting from her throat and ending somewhere around her stomach, bubbling with blood — was still breathing.

“What —” she whispered, a viscid sound, painful to the mind. A reddish dimness illuminated her pale, sweaty skin through the darkness. “What is that?”

Dazai couldn't have torn his eyes away if they had been ripped out by his own nails. “An enemy of the bad guys.”

The earth shook, jolting her body to the side; viscera fell from the hole in her chest, landing with a wet squelch. He reached for the gun in the back of his pants and sank a bullet in her forehead.

He ran.

The crowd of men and women shouting and escaping from the living catastrophe bumped against him with no pity, eyes set on the crater left by the Purgatory. It was indistinguishable in the darkness, — merely sounds and sweaty skin, sticking and touching and tearing — ready to trample him to the ground. As soon as empty eyes took the place of terror, he started shooting them down, leaving them to be walked upon.

A hand grabbed his calf — he kicked it away, until the groan of pain coming from its mouth turned familiar enough to get him to lower his gaze.

V was covered in blood. One of his eyes was completely shut, bruised and bloodied; his skin was a field of heat rashes, melting off on his bones.

“—Alive, ” he gasped out, a whistling sound, a soaked cry. “They, a -alive, can't — can't die, can't —“

He understood. Right as another wave of feet crashed on his battered body, Dazai ripped himself off from his grip and ran towards the crater. In the sky, the black hole widened — another vicious landing from Chuuya sent every single body in the valley to the ground.

He laughed, and he laughed, and he laughed; pretending the thing down his throat was terror, Dazai tightened his fingers on the hat that had somehow remained in his hands.

Golden Demon was waiting for him.

She seemed to have grown bigger — a violently pink shadow filling the night, empty faces and blades set in front of her. Kouyou stood motionless in front of her, bleeding and unconcerned, the sole wall from Chuuya's rage and the two wounded bodies behind her: Dante, laying on a destroyed bed and covered in blood, and —

Something had pierced Beatrice's abdomen and stuck her to the ground; metallic and white as it was, he assumed it came from one of the machines that had surrounded the man. Half of her hair had been torn apart by the explosion — she breathed intermittently, blood splattering with each exhale.

"You look well," Kouyou told him, blankly.

"Your protégée's dog tendencies," Dazai grinned, patting the old wound on his temple. He knew the feeling of blood; he knew how to forget it. "If he's around, I'm usually found unscathed. You don't look half as convincing, Ane-san."

She stared, lifelessly unconcerned.

"I hardly suppose asking you to move would matter," he said.

Golden Demon flashed her katanas, whipping the wind into his face. Kouyou didn't even flinch.

"Alright, then," He cocked his gun; clicked his in-ear. "Noguchi? Start immediately."

Beatrice shuddered out a wet breath. Her hands convulsed uselessly, tiredly; half towards Dante, half towards Kouyou — who turned, immediately, eyes away from him. "Wait —"

He raised his gun and shot Dante in the chest.

Shaken awake, the world took a breath. Kouyou dropped to the ground like a doll — the entire field seemed to exhale. A new kind of laughter filled the air; high pitched and excited, too young to be a god's. In the sky, the flesh-made sun stood still, for infinite fractions of a second — and then it fell.

Dazai lowered his gaze to Beatrice's wristwatch, the crystal even more cracked than before, splattered in blood. "Thirty two," he sing-sang. "Thirty one. Thirty —"

He started running.

[“You follow our car,” he explained to Noguchi. “And when the rest of the team moves to fight the Souls — which I’m expecting will be surrounding the place — you and Tsuchiya stay behind and wait.”]

The idea of not joining the brawl certainly didn't excite him. Still, he asked: "Wait for what?"

"For whom," he specified. "They'll be in the car trunk. Don't ask too many questions."

"In the trunk? How are they going to fit in there?"

"Don't worry about it," Dazai replied. "I've already explained everything to them, but should they try to resist — you tell them this: collaborate, or the Souls won't be the only ones going to Hell," A pause. "Yes, Q?"].

Twenty eight.

If he had bothered to search through the shadows staining the ground in red, he would have seen a silhouette in an overgrown shirt slam themselves against as many bodies as possible — barely resisting, barely upright bodies, victims of Arahbaki's rage and their own failing organs, now that Dante couldn't hold them together.

Twenty six.

Their eyes turned white, their mouths fell open — whatever the newly found limbo of Dogra Magra was showing them, it kept them occupied. Most importantly — it kept them alive.

Twenty three.

Some running would do you good, Mori had liked to tell him, in the clinic. He would take a look at his dead-pale skin and suicide attempts, and then he'd spout out the most classic doctor response. Only once, Dazai had tried running around the neighborhood; he'd gotten distracted by the perfect bridge to jump from. The flames engulfing his legs bore Mori's smile.

Eighteen.

Tsuchiya was a neon green light in the darkness, kneeled next to every convulsing body Noguchi and Koda held still for her, sinking her syringe on every inch of available skin. Q laughed and laughed and laughed —

Sixteen.

Chuuya fell, and fell, and fell, a red dot in the sky — only blood, gushing out of every volcano crack on his skin.

Dazai and Q touched the crater right as the clock ticked fifteen; when Chuuya's body landed, it did so with enough strength to sink in the earth, shaking it enough to make them stumble. It didn't stop Q from giggling and throwing herself against him, hands open, before escaping again from under Dazai's legs.

Thirteen —

Chuuya's eyes snapped open again, fractured bones and ruined skin catching fire, fighting an enemy only he could see, black holes at his hands. The destroyed fist he smashed against the ground sent Dazai down, uselessly attempting to tear his nails off the naked calf he had managed to grab.

Legs climbed over his body — when he blinked, Tsuchiya had already sunk the syringe right in the middle of Chuuya's chest, held tight by Noguchi's tattooed arm.

They dropped him again; tearing him from his grip; he rolled to the center of the crater, a puppet with no strings. Twelve, eleven, ten — “Executive Kouyou is in the house,” he told Koda, grabbing his arm.

“But —“

“Go!”

Nine, eight, seven — the sound Chuuya made as Dazai gathered his body in his arms couldn't be called a cry — it was merely a piece of lungs; the ruffle of dying wings from the grasshoppers Elise liked to dance on. Behind him, light flared in purple shades, as stumbling corpses were pushed away from his mission.

A gentle, freezing blue appeared under his hands, dissipating the last of Arahabaki from him — the earthquake cracks became wounds, and his eyes became bloodied.

Familiarly light feet landed next to him, their presence strangely known. His shoulders, unwilling to him, curved a bit — an exhale.

“Do you want me to —“ Hirotsu questioned, reaching out with broad shoulders and open hands.

“It's Chuuya,” he assured, huffing, feeling the broken bones under his palms, the man's eyes stuck on him. A moan. “I know, I know. Being possessed is so aggravating. Don't whine,” Chuuya protested again, head lolling against his back, feet hanging lifelessly from where he'd crossed them at his waist. “You're fine, partner. I'm here.”

Not a protest left Chuuya's mouth, though the repulsion was very much heard. Dazai held his naked wrists to strengthen his grip; his hands were gloveless, torn apart, and sticky with blood.

“Make sure the ones who aren't ours are dead,” he ordered, nodding to Hirotsu. It was only half an excuse to get his curious, too-observant glance off the body on his back — luckily enough, the man didn't seem to be in a complaining mood.

It took him much longer than five seconds to carry the two of them to the crater left by the Purgatory — he knew, because silence came sooner than that. Q's laughter disappeared like a falling sun, as Noguchi restrained them — per Dazai's orders.

Their eerily shaped eyes found his own from the other side of the bloodied grass. They waved, to the best of their abilities, through the death grip of their new guardian.

“Dazai- niisan!” Q screeched — soaked in such never ending blood, their hair was monocolored, at last. “Did I do good? Did I do good?”

“Mori will decide that,” he replied, not sparing them more than a glance. “But good job on the hiding part. I almost thought the Port Mafia would find you, a few times.”

Q laughed again. Judging by the strange look in Noguchi’s eyes, it sounded just as unstable as the shake in his veins told him it was. They kicked and kicked, half-heartedly attempting to escape him — eventually, the giggles died down, turning in ear-deafening shrieks. Too dry to be sobs; too strong not to make them pass out.

Dazai hummed, fixing Chuuya’s heavy weight on his shoulders. His head lolled forward; blood seeped from his every cavity, landing on the fabric of his shoulders from his ears and eyes — sliding down all the way to his shoes. It sizzled against skin it wasn’t touching.

The dismembered bodies on the ground stayed on the ground. The ones in Port Mafia gear rose again.

The world existed, somewhere behind a curtain of ruby water. Dazai could feel every wound in his body. When he dropped the two of them inside the crater — his body begged, more than any man in the Dungeons ever had under his hands.

He gathered Chuuya’s head in his lap, pulling delicately, the way Mori did with stitches and plans and smiles — lest he broke the new toy into pieces; lest he woke him up. He breathed slow, one hand on the boy’s wrecked inhales, until his eyes could actually see.

A few feet from them, a pink silhouette had her hands tight around a pair of bloodied ones.

“I’m not sorry, I’m not sorry,” Beatrice was whispering, frantically, whistling with every wet breath. Dante laid on the other side of the crater; somehow, V had managed to drop next to him before wasting his last thirty three seconds. “I’m not, ‘Zaki, I’m not sorry —“

Dazai’s gaze cleared, slower than decay. For a moment, he feared Q might have forgotten one Soul — Kouyou’s face, when he managed to find it through the blood, was vacant.

“I cannot give you what you want,” she said, almost too low to hear. “I will not.”

“Forgive me,” the woman wheezed, through the craters in her chest. “Forgive me, or Ka — Kanechi won’t — He won’t talk to me —“

Grief added ten thousand pounds of dried blood to the Executive’s shoulders. When she raised the red hand in hers to her cheek, though, Dazai allowed a flower to bloom in the space between their battered bodies — privacy, perhaps. If Mori wouldn’t want to know.

She’s nineteen, he thought.

Chuuya shuddered.

When he lowered his eyes, the mess of his skin made the search for his fluttering eyes harder than it should have been: everywhere he looked was blood, was raw skin, were those weird scars.

“Hey,” he asked. His lips quivered; Chuuya twitched, as if he could smell his entertainment, and detested it. “How’s having an Empty Head Again? ”

A pause.

“Get it?” he insisted. Not his favorite — never quite — but if Chuuya despised it, he could respect it as a rightful place-holder. He could sweep something more off his devastating, effortless gallery, and hang it on his walls like a hubristic thief with a stubborn muse. “Like Hirose’s song.”

His lips shaped something, but only liquified red letters pooled down. Stubborn, shaking more than the end of the world, he raised two fingers and tapped the creases on his forehead. Fuck. You.

Then, a bit more uncertainly — Tell Tanaki we did it.

“They’re all guilty ,” Beatrice was insisting, gasping and crying, delirious. “They all are , they don’t — they don’t deserve , they, they’re just going to fight again, ‘Zaki , they, again, again, and again — Kouyou Ozaki, hell—“

Dazai didn’t watch; nonetheless, the glow of Demon Golden washed the ground in the colors of dawn, and those were shades he knew. Silence fell, anticipated by a clean slash of blades down fragile skin. On a crimson, abandoned wrist, the clock stopped ticking.

“Bea,” Kouyou said, quietly. There was blood on her hands, again. Again and again.
“Goodbye.”

---

...

---

[...]

Beatrice [...] Cause of death: Executive K..

Her Ability [So Gentle And Virtuous She Appears], allowed her to bring the death of whoever she greeted, after a pause of a full minute. Given the conditions of her Ability, D. asked her to join him and V. in their “Judgment Day” mission. The wristwatch she used to help him has since been identified as the allegedly legendary Nine Rings' Seal, and one of the three Ability tools existing in Yokohama [Check File CCC56] . Its powers remain unknown, as neither Dazai O., Nakahara C. nor Executive K. managed to gather the information from B.

Two years after causing V's death, B. returned to the village of K.. With the help of the Nine Rings, who she had joined, she destroyed the town. She then went looking for D., and used her Ability on him. To escape, D. fought with his own Ability, trapping himself in a coma-like state. B. took control of him, imprisoning him in an abandoned house a few miles from R., and manipulating his heartbeat to create messages that would allow her to control the Souls herself.

According to various sources, B. was looking for the Book. [For information, verify documents 01, 001, 0001, 0003, 0005, 0000, and 0; for further explanations, check "The Take Project"]. For reasons not yet entirely justified, she had come to the conclusion that Dazai O. could help her find it. To this day, its location stays unknown.

All and every step of what Dazai O. and Nakahara C. have referred to as "Operation Blue Flower" are to be faulted to Beatrice, latest and last leader of the Nine Rings. State of death: enemy of the Port Mafia.

All three bodies were disposed of according to the uses of the organization. Executive K. personally requested to be burdened with their disappearance. Details on the confrontation, and the involvement of Nakahara C. and Dazai O. are to be discussed in a successive report. The conflict between the Nine Rings and the Port Mafia is, nonetheless, to be considered solved.

May the blood rain feed the hungry streets of this city, and may it guide the Night Wardens to its protection.

Special Ability Department Agent.

Intelligence Archivist 061, Ango Sakaguchi.

---

...

---

Dear

Kouyou,

~~You stupid annoying~~

~~Detested~~

Ozaki,

Kanechi said I had to write you a letter, but I have no intention of offering you my apologies. Instead, I'm writing this on that photo album of his, so he'll have no choice but to give it to you personally. Kanechi, if you're reading this, piss off! I'm doing what you said.

I suppose I'll apologize for calling your Demon a bitch. I know you don't like that term; but I wasn't calling you a bitch. Not in that sense. You're not a bitch, and Demon Golden isn't either. You're just both very, very, very, very annoying. I won our last fight, by the way — I don't care if you just up and left. You need to learn to put offenses aside, princess, or everyone in that damn organization of yours is going to devour you alive. Who's going to help put out the fire from Kanechi's baking attempts, then?

You're very proud, so I know apologies won't matter much to you. Instead, I'll give you something I know you'll like more: a story.

Once there was a village. It was a small place, with so little people that everybody knew everybody's name. During the first war, a wall had been built at the border between the village and the real world. Instead of keeping the bad out, though, the border only brought it in.

Wounded soldiers kept stumbling into the village, asking for food and for solace. It didn't really matter what side they were on. When someone is bleeding out in front of you, it's hard to ask what flag is sewed on his uniform before you ask him his name.

A girl lived in the village. She had family and friends, but she was was a frail, little thing: most of the village thought she'd be dead by adolescence.

The girl, though, was stubborn (almost as much as you and your stupid Demon are. Kanechi, if you're reading, I'm kidding ) and so she survived, day after day. She joined the medical team and she helped every soldier who came; listened to every story and remembered every name. At night, once those walking corpses were asleep, she'd sit on the roof of the infirmary and look at the wall, and she'd wonder. Not about what was behind it — she knew it was bad. She wondered why it happened, and why no one did anything to stop it.

One day, the girl ventured too far in the woods. She knew it wasn't wise, and she knew she would get punished for it, but she didn't stop. Of course, she got lost. She was young and stupid and weak, and she was sure the wolves would get her. Instead, she found something: a clock.

(See, how I'm taking inspiration from real life? Maybe this will teach you to stop asking about my wristwatch. Next time your nosy little self thinks about asking me, remember this story. Take it for granted, if you want. I'm far too old to care about whether people believe my lies or not).

(I can see you rolling your eyes, 'Zaki. I know you think I'm dramatic. I'm not, though. I know we're the same age. Oftentimes, I feel like I've been fourteen too many times before. ~~Do you ever feel like that?~~)

Anyway, the girl found the wristwatch. It was an old thing, abandoned in the woods. In the grand scheme of things, she could have easily ignored it and kept screaming for the way home — it had been so long, they probably thought she was dead already. But she'd found it, and she couldn't help but think — what if it was fate? What if she had been meant to?

And so the girl picked up the clock. The next day, when she woke up, she was back in the village. With one big difference: when she raised her eyes, there wasn't a wall anymore.

Here's your homework for the day: what's the message behind the story? Before you even say it, no — the clock isn't a metaphor. That's so boring. Be more original. I expect a satisfying answer by five hours after Kanechi gives you the album; any later and I'll call your stupid Demon every bad name in this world. Chin up, Ozaki. I'll tap my fingers on your chin, if I have to.

I hope this story will be enough to satiate Kanechi's whines and your anger, and that we might move forward peacefully (no, I didn't copy this from Kanechi's books, shut up) and leave it all behind.

For what it's worth, here's my promise: should I ever die (which I doubt will ever happen, fear not) you can have my wristwatch. Hereby I declare it: Kouyou Ozaki will be the only one allowed to own my beloved trinket, other than me. Aren't you happy, 'Zaki? Something for the two of us. Kanechi can have everything else.

In hopes you'll stop being annoying soon,

Bea :)

---

...

---

The Under Port was overflowing in the bitterly sharp smell of ashes and sea saltiness.

“I can’t sleep,” Q whined, fingers clenched on the belt of his coat, doing their best to hide underneath it. Their weight against his thigh was strangely cold. “I cough all day. Can’t you tell them to stop?”

“If you had controlled yourself a bit more, they would have been done with this hours ago,” Dazai let them know, patting their head. “Really, Yu-Yu. We had discussed this, didn’t we? Go easy on our men.”

“I can’t control it,” they insisted, squinting up at him — finally, finally, showing some of the distaste he had seen in their eyes whenever he visited them in the little sewer hole where he had made them hide. A well hidden desire for revenge — something vicious enough to maul him, had No Longer Human not been a cursed shackle. “You hurt me, you get a vision. I can’t decide more than that.”

“Learn to,” Dazai ordered. The door of the main crematorium room was too crowded by men with their orange safety suits to see a thing; nonetheless, he thought he could hear the flames tickle his skin even from there, mocking the Spring sweat. “Do you have any numbers for me?”

Q stomped their feet. “I can’t count that high.”

He pinched their nose. “Wasn’t talking to you, silly,” Dazai offered a curled eyebrow to the closest of the Secret Force Squad men, unimpressed by the way his spine immediately snapped up. “Well?”

“Three hundred and forty seven from the Nine Rings’ side, sir,” the man stuttered out. Mori had pushed the crown off his youngest mafiosi’s head at the beginning of the week, mere hours after the Rengoku massacre — contrary to intentions, it seemed to have made most men more amenable to respect them.

A quick glance was directed to Q. “As for the ones Doctor Tsuchiya couldn’t reach fast enough — We estimate between fifty and seventy. Some bodies are still being recovered from the rubble.”

“And on a national scale?”

“We’re still gathering numbers from news of suspicious deaths,” he answered. “All the Souls the vet didn’t heal died the moment you shot Dante, sir. Not all of them had been called to Rengoku, obviously. The Special Division has been receiving questions on the Souls in international territories by their authorities.”

“That will be a bother,” Dazai sighed, shaking his head in front of Q’s wide, curious gaze. “We will be hearing the words Ability Business Permit very often for a while, Q. Pray for us.”

Their face fell, only a bit. They had refused to put their shoes on all the way in; their flower-patterned socks peeked on the heels. Mori had bought them a mock school uniform as reward; they had seemed uncertain whether to be happy or terrified by it.

“I can’t,” Q said, very quietly. “Not anymore.”

When they munched on their nails, Dazai saw that some blood was still stuck to the surface. He wondered who helped them bathe. If they locked the door; if they trusted them not to go under and never resurface. If Q understood God enough to do it.

Dazai shifted their doll, securing it tighter under the back of his belt. He reached for Q’s fingers, tapping their nails comfortingly. “Let’s go. We can’t be late to Mori’s celebration. He will whine for sure.”

Before he could drag them to the stairs, they set their feet on the ground.

“Well?”

“I won’t —” Q’s mismatched pupils ran back and forth, unsure if they wanted to linger on him or on their stolen doll. They didn’t look as hungry as before; they looked empty as ever. The devoid has a tendency to be filled, she used to say. “I won’t get punished. I did what you told me to do. I really did.”

It wasn’t quite a question. Dazai blinked.

“Punished,” he echoed. “You do know you did something wrong, then. I always wondered.”

“They hurt me first. They always do.”

“And the pious solution is revenge?”

“It’s me,” Q muttered, with the frustration of an eerie child, who lacked larger words for universe-wide concepts. “It’s just cursed.”

“The joy you feel as you do it certainly won’t help your case,” he made them notice.

“You told me to hide,” they accused, still. Their fingers were pulling at a bandage around their neck. Dazai felt the strange, uncomfortable pull of Mori’s gloves under his chin, tilting him up to study his pupils. Aren’t you clever enough to see the familiar in what you hate? “I did what you told me.”

“Yes, you did,” he confirmed. They had pulled their sleeves up to their elbows — their skin was paler than their now-clean strands of hair. Dazai had spent a good two hours brushing the sewer-dirt out of it. He wondered if he should ask for forgiveness — if it would make sense, in a less Port-Mafia-black place. “Let’s go.”

The Headquarters had been polished to the point of shimmering — long tables adorned with food; distrusting people in their best clothes; every weapon shoved where it couldn’t be rusted by blood — but it somewhat clashed with the complicated expression every man walking its carpets wore.

The idea of a celebration had been somewhat controversial — what with the funerals that kept knocking on the doors and the rows of lost manpower that wouldn’t work themselves out. Dazai assumed it was exactly why Mori had come up with it.

Make the best decision, the man liked to say, his fingers dipped in Elise's colors. Not the easy one. They will feel it — the discomfort. It will keep them upright. You don't challenge those who you don't understand.

Either way. Mori liked to brag about victories.

According to the Yokohama Government Cabinet archives, Mori Corporations was a prolific weapon trade company, and a good ally in the fight against the lowlife of Yokohama. When the man got on the marble pedestal and raised a glass, drooling words of success in front of a crowd of mafiosi and nervous men who knew-too-much, he was smiling.

"Ah, forgive me," he heard him say, as awkward as no one would swear he was. "Public speeches aren't exactly my thing."

For reasons Dazai couldn't quite understand, if they weren't fear or brain-dead tendencies — it made the crowd laugh.

He had long since given up on finding any mild interest in glasses rooms like those — mazes of pearls and petrified grins, as hands raised glasses to toast on a victory they had only offered their bodies too. Mori had ordered the television screens to be left in — the News had yet to keep quiet on the corpses appearing all around the city, and the miraculously decreased cases of gang violence.

"Is this truly a good idea?" a woman from the Black Widows hissed, her grip around her Champagne just right enough to crack it.

"It's the only one we have," a man from the group's oldest enemies, the Hounds, barked back. "Did you want the Port Mafia to wipe us all out in the name of distant collaboration with — them?"

Dazai liked whispers. Mori, he knew, would like the notion of the underground he had personally invited inside his walls — Hounds, Black Windows, the GSS, and more and more and more, all of them written down by Dazai's yawning mind — refusing to say the Nine Rings' name out loud even more.

"Wipe us out," she scoffed, clearly nervous. "As if the Five Moons wouldn't stop them."

"They are one of the Moons. If you want to test them and that —" A gulp. "That freak power they have on their side, then —"

Some tables away, perched in Tanaki's lap, Q was braiding Elise's hair. The girl's luminescence was strangely vivid that day; perhaps, a reflection of Mori's good mood. He thought it good the men didn't know his Ability — with their caskets being burned, they might have felt offended by the notion.

Q jumped all the way to Tanaki. The woman — eyes so distant they might as well have been blind — offered them a tight smile.

Dazai had taken to huddling under her desk, these past days of reconstruction. She never talked, unless somebody asked a question — she would, very occasionally, let him draw on her heels with his marker. Very absently, he sometimes wondered if she, instead, dared to open her mouth when —

Blinding light hit his eye, as the veil he had been spying behind was torn away. He hissed, backing away; when he managed to readjust his sight, Chuuya was filling every inch of it.

“Dude,” he asked, bent in a half. “Why are you under a table right now.”

His voice was a nightmare turned hum — just scratchy enough at the edges to make him wince; just shattered enough along his usual r s to appear ripped out of leaking lungs. Dazai hadn’t heard from him — not after he had delivered his body at the Hospital and watched Mori fix his operation gloves to enter it.

Voices floated, though. The local talk of the month was a clumping of bruises, spasming fingers, and distinctively steel-lined eyes — he could either be found right behind Executive Kouyou’s proud chin, or by the doors of the funerary buildings.

He directed reconstruction works excellently; he refused to speak clearly on Dante’s defeat; he, as the lowest whispers went, was — something.

[“...heard he just — unleashed it, or something,” the whispers over his table had said. “Hinata said he never saw anything like it. Just like that day all those months ago, in the forest...”]

“Can you imagine what an atomic bomb like that could do against an entire organization? Who in their right fucking mind would try against that — thing?”

“Our men got caught in the crossfire,” a voice had reminded them. Noguchi was anything but a ray of hope; the men trusted him, though. And Dazai needed it. “What could he do against our organization?”]

“I hate the fake bourgeoisie,” Dazai answered. Kouyou had — allegedly by accident — kicked him with her sandals more than once. Hirotsu hadn’t done more than offer him a glass of water, from time to time.

He grabbed Chuuya’s wrist and pulled, despite his yelp. Only when the table cloth hid them again, he lit up Hirotsu’s stolen lighter.

“Hi there,” he said. “Nice change of style.”

Chuuya grunted. His dirty glance wasn’t as effective as he probably wished — the sheer number of bandages around the temple Arahabaki had attempted to crush against the concrete had secluded his hat from his head, and the bruises surrounding his eyes made him more pitiful than threatening.

Elise had drawn a choker of colorful band-aids around his throat — its rightful accessory laying in a crater in Rengoku. His shoulders were a particularly defensive skyline; Dazai got the feeling he could have stopped a bullet passing by without even looking.

“I don’t know how you manage,” he muttered, scratching at his bandaged arms. The Hospital had covered him as soon as he had laid him on a stretcher; Dazai had counted the new craters of his skin as he bled on the grass, though. “It’s so scratchy. ”

“You get used to it,” he replied. “Did the fake bourgeoisie ask you about them too?”

“Stop calling them the fake bourgeoisie. ”

“What should I call them?”

“I don’t know,” He shrugged. His finger spasmed when he pressed it against Dazai’s forehead; Dazai caught it as it fell, pressing on the nail. He thought Chuuya would rip it away; surprisingly, he twinned their indexes — strangling his just enough to make it feel mean. “Assholes? I used to rob assholes like them as a hobby. ”

“That’s unoriginal.” No Longer Human was a hum; Chuuya seemed both unnerved by its sound and unnerved by its absence. The white of his eyes was still littered in broken veins.

Another round of applause filled the room. He wondered if Mori was still talking — if the camera flashes would be framed, and hung in the Hallway. If Mori would make them retake the picture, now that Q was back.

“So your ass always had the kid?”

Dazai blinked. “You truly didn’t suspect it?”

“No, I did,” Chuuya replied. “Seemed weird for you not to find them immediately — not when Boss kept whining about it. You hate Boss’s whines.”

“I do, yes.”

“Why even do this?”

“Perhaps I wanted the syndicate to grow a bit more suspicious of our most dangerous tool,” Dazai shrugged. “They tend to go easy on them — kid-like and all. Now, after suspecting they might have helped Dante and returned at the very last moment with their tail between their legs — They’ll keep their eyes open.”

Chuuya didn’t seem convinced. “That’s all?”

Dazai shrugged. “Mori wouldn’t have let me retrieve them from the Under Port, otherwise. They are strictly — last resort equipment. And I knew something was coming.”

Even under the barely-there light filtering through the table cloth, the boy’s contempt was blinding. “Your craftiness grows more disgusting by the blink.”

“And you’re alive because of me. You’re welcome. Hey,” he remembered. “Happy birthday.”

He made a face. “It’s been, like, a week.”

“Four days, thank you. I didn’t want to see you while you were all hospitalized and pathetic,” Dazai hadn’t trusted himself not to stare at his bleeding chasms with some wretched type of longing. He hadn’t been ready to explain why he had stopped him — in spite of, anyway. “But did you get the assassin I sent to your room?”

“That was you — “

“Don’t tell me you want me to sing the song,” he insisted. “I’m not singing you the song.”

“Don’t sing,” Chuuya agreed, nauseous, too quick.

He squinted. “Now I kind of want to.”

“You already made me do the apology dance in front of the Executives,” the boy spat, pulling at the spiral-shaped scar on his cheek. Dazai had strange ideas fly by about it — if it would bleed, if not cut in that same shape; if it would taste of coal under teeth; if it would disappear, like the urgency in his shoulders. “You weren’t even there. ”

Post-Corruption Chuuya, he concluded — as Mori’s most foolish accomplishment — was a haunted house that even ghosts had packed their bags to leave. Haunted in memory; cracked near the steps. “I got it from the security cameras.”

Chuuya prepared to strike.

The cloth was moved away. Over the clink! of glasses, Mori’s face appeared.

“Hello, boys,” He smiled. “Having fun?”

“Would be funnier if you babbled less, Boss,” Dazai admonished, as Chuuya choked on a breath. “We’ve talked about it — straight to the point. Mafiosi and otherwise criminally-adorned men don’t care for metaphors.”

The cloth settled again — this time, behind the former doctor’s back, as he did his best to cross his legs and sit between them under that makeshift cage. He blinked, timidly. “You believe I flunked my speech? To think I prepared it so carefully...”

“It was fine, Boss,” Chuuya lied, kicking his knee. “They’re too busy gossiping to pay attention, anyway.”

“Ah, yes,” The glint in Mori’s eyes was a tad too amused. “You two did good, boys. I knew I could entrust the job in your hands. Is it really surprising that the syndicate has been talking?”

“Only bad things, I assume,” Dazai replied.

“It depends on the definition,” he answered. Moving all his attention to the other boy, he added: “Corruption has certainly become a public topic — though they lack details. You’re a proper star, Chuuya. There might be ways to quieten the storm down, if you so wish —”

“No need.”

His unmatching eyes were all for Mori — his chin so high, he almost bumped his head against the underside of the table. Dazai laid his head on his hand, and studied the spot his gloved nails were sunk in — just above the knee.

He had bled on him. Dazai couldn't forget.

“It was bound to come up, eventually,” he insisted. Dazai thought he believed it. “It's something we can use. Whispers are hardly ever not useful,” A pause. “No matter how exaggerated they are.”

Demon Prodigy, Mori had echoed back at him, the first time someone had hissed it in their presence. A man about to bite the curb — the doctor had been so proud, he had let Dazai do it. A bit dramatic, don't you agree?

Satisfaction was a piece of clothing Mori wore rarely, especially if honest. It drags on the floor, he had explained. “How wise. Fitting, of course, for the people who saved the organization.”

Dazai tilted his head. “Now, don't be boring.”

“Couldn't have done it without the squad,” Chuuya intervened, not even blinking. Perhaps he truly wanted that Executive position. Perhaps it wasn't even that selfish of a reason, these days.

“Of course,” Mori conceded, nobly. “Once the festivities are done, obviously, we'll have to talk about damage compensation.”

A pause embraced them both. They exchanged a glance. “Damage compensation?”

The Boss' next blink was the fakest expression he had worn in a while. “Certainly. Starting from that trip of yours to the dungeons, we can account for — Ah, just a moment,” He extracted a pink notebook — something with Elise's sparkly name all over — from his pocket. “Destruction of property and of vehicles, missing reports, indirect demise of our best healing-Ability User, unauthorized break out of a dangerous Ability user, arrest, mass murder of up to seventy eight mafiosi, robbery, unwarranted access to hidden data, misplacing of Ability User, secretive investigation in a clear violation of authority orders —“

“Alright,” Chuuya interrupted him, gaping like a fish. “Alright, that's a gross misinterpretation of —“

“It was more about things happening around us, than us causing them,” Dazai agreed. “We didn't kill Tsuchiya Mi, seriously —“

“I was possessed — ”

“I only asked to talk with her —“

Mori shut the notebook. “Boys, actions have consequences.”

“But —”

“Let me see,” he continued, tapping his chin. “What privilege can we get rid of, this time? Maybe — talking privileges?”

“What?” they echoed.

“To each other. Specifically in my presence.”

Dazai deflated. Chuuya huffed: “That won’t be hard at all.”

“If that is what you say,” Mori smiled a secretive smile. He pushed the tablecloth aside. He didn’t pull them up — but he offered them an unmistakable, gentle look.

They climbed out of the table. The man cleaned invisible dust off their coats; when he laid one hand on each of their shoulders, Dazai thought — balance. Just another weight Mori was prepared to delude him into thinking he could share. Mori only touched him when he won.

Dazai, he realized, a bit stupidly, had to tilt his head back to meet his eyes. Instincts were fractions of thoughts — to look was to think. Demon Prodigy — just young enough that the top of his head barely brushed Mori Ougai’s shoulders.

Let me crawl out, he mouthed, like a lithany. His skin had less scars than Chuuya’s; perhaps it lacked a mouth, too. It never answered. Let me out.

“Perhaps,” Mori was saying, with something a bit colder between his teeth, “I should trust your judgement. Perhaps there’s a better punishment.”

No point in a wound, he insisted.

Dazai wondered where Q was.

“Since your plan had Tsuchiya Mi caught in the crossfire, we shall assume you don’t value our men’s well-being’s as much as you could,” He tapped his chin, too childish for the lack of amusement in his tone — for the lie that only stiffened Chuuya’s shoulders more. “As such, Hospital privileges are to be considered revoked indefinitely.”

Do you feel his bones, too?, he thought about tapping on Chuuya’s arm — trace it on his back; blink it through the stubborn light in his eyes. Don’t gods know when they’re being sacrificed?

Not so many rules in the Port Mafia, truly — he had learned the most important of them with a new coat on his shoulders, and a man’s blood splattered on stained glass windows.

It will shift, the line of Mori’s spine always said. Do not miss the shift.

“Yes, Boss,” Chuuya said, head bowed.

Dazai lowered his eyes. “Yes, Boss.”

The quartet of violins on the other side of the room played a death march. It turned into something more cheerful at a mere wave of Kouyou's hand; Dazai, strangely enough, could feel Tanaki's eyes on them.

Imperceptibly, the grasp of Mori's fingers softened. "We will talk about it later. Chuuya, I assume Kouyou had mentioned your incoming tasks?"

Dazai's ears reached forward — that was information he had been sneaking around to find for a while. All Chuuya did, though, was offer a nod.

The man mirrored him. "Good. And you two — have you been considering my proposition?"

The letter was still on his desk — unopened, because Dazai knew better than to waste time with the obvious. He had seen the boy's one when he had snuck into his office to nap; had made sure to cut up all the edges, even if it didn't really mean anything.

I was here, it would say. Understand, Mori had told him, catching him in the middle of raising his scissors, that they are looking for him.

They?

"We're considering it," Dazai said, eventually, despite the grimace pulling Chuuya's face. "You wouldn't want us to rush the house of cards, yes?"

Mori smiled. "Of course not. Come on, then," He spun them around with ease, fingers still on them — one of the photographers immediately turned. He leaned down, just enough to whisper: "Let's give the hungry wolves what they want, yes? Mori Corp is to be rewarded for their help in putting an end to this tragic gang violence."

It got a chuckle out of Chuuya.

The flash of the camera went off two times; he felt, more than he saw, Chuuya make a face. Dazai had been taken aback enough not to offer any taunting grin — something to ruin Mori's collection with once again.

"Taken in two more kids, mister Mori?" the photographer joked. He was evidently polite; he didn't utter a word on how weirdly unfit all three of them looked under the sunlight.

"Bandages is an oldie, actually. Redhead, though — Your good heart knows no break, does it?"

It got a chuckle out of Dazai, that time.

Mori didn't seem to care. "Are our boys not the future, for how grievous or judicious it might be?" he questioned, smiling in that way of his — a joke at his own expense. "Why shouldn't I show it off?"

His next breath got lost in his lungs.

Oh, he thought. How had he missed it?

“Sorry for the bother,” Mori said, through the rush in his ears, letting go of them, as soon as the photographer disappeared. “For what’s worth, you two are more than free to go. I know these events aren’t exactly — entertaining. ”

Chuuya offered — not a smile, not exactly, but something close enough to it. Dazai felt an unknown urge, as suffocating as it was atrocious, as childish as it was pointless — to grab him and his marred bones, if had Arahabaki reached those, too — any part of him that was still reachable, that Mori hadn’t touched yet, and pull — somewhere, anywhere, forward, away. “Alright, Boss. Thank you.”

What’s the point in a wound?, Mori insisted. Dazai’s hands were already bloodied.

They bowed their heads again as Mori vanished through the crowd, more instinct than need, more need than choice. Kouyou laughed in the face of a woman who looked just like Beatrice; Tanaki smiled; Noguchi frowned with every word out of his mouth.

Uncovered by the man’s bloodied scarf and sigil coat, every unsubtle eye in the room laid on them.

Chuuya curled an eyebrow.

“Come on,” he muttered. A paragon of careless confidence; he pretended pulling Dazai’s wrist was not selfish in nature — pretended there was nothing to fear from gazes who knew, and nothing to take from the one boy who understood. “Arcade.”

It was somewhere down the tenth flight of stairs — why not the elevator, again? — that he realized he wasn’t being pulled along — just following. He’d been doing it himself — had considered every single possibility, every outcome, but he’d forgotten —

It wasn’t snowing anymore.

Nothing could distract him from the black dots of silhouettes in the nearby Church; the shadows of scars on his skin; the fact that he still didn’t know what his Limbo was. No one could keep Mori’s hands from rolling his diamonds around — not now that he had proof. Not now that Dazai had given it to him.

A shame misfortune follows her so earnestly, a dead woman had told him. Dazai watched the boy’s fingers spasm around his cursed flesh; watched him breathe in like it was blessed. Enough to meet me.

“Yes,” he concluded, academically, logically, inevitably. When in doubt, he thought, go back to the start. “Yes, Arcade.”

There were thirteen metal panels on the roof of his shipping container. The hook for the hangman knot went in the seventh.

There was thought behind it, obviously. The book on suicide Dazai kept under his bed called most attempts clumsy, at best; lacking forethought. He wasn't like that. He never sought the end when he wanted it. He waited for his mind to be clear — for the numbers to be set in his mind, for his heartbeat to be neutral — and then he walked off the edge.

Most pressingly, he waited for the fog around him to take a vaguely interesting shape.

The world tended to be blurry, and Yokohama to drool liquid metal into his bones and wait until they solidified, but sometimes — sometimes, voices came around about a portion of the glass being wiped clean.

“There’s a rumor,” he explained to the nothingness around him, to the broken traffic lights; preparing a future speech, “Of this one house no one comes close to. Burglars, smugglers — even the Port Mafia. A zone calde. But what is everyone be so afraid of?”

No answer came.

“How interesting,” he insisted.

Fixing the stoll under the rope turned out to be the most complicated part. The wheels wouldn't stay still; in the end, he left the container to search for a solution in the mountains of trash surrounding him. Hirose Fumiko was playing from an old record player he'd stolen from Hirotsu's office; he left the door open, so that he could sing along.

[“Are you sure it's a good idea?”

The Arcade was closed, officially, and while Dazai owned Chuuya one seventeenth of his future inheritance, Chuuya would have to find a way to convince every female mafioso under Kouyou's command to at least consider a double suicide with him.

They kept a list. Since it would have been empty, otherwise, they had stuck it in the secret door in The Alley. Since it would have been useless, otherwise, the place had been dubbed a meeting spot.

Just like Beatrice's office.

“Why not?” Chuuya shrugged. Apart from weapons and blood, joystick levers were the most familiar thing his hands were willing to welcome. “You think her vengeful ghost is lingering around? I'll get that wine collection if it's the last thing I do.”

He had broken a nail, picking the lock to the shop. It had bled all the way to the edge of his bandages; Dazai longed for the usual neon lights — just to make it seem a little less boring. To have an excuse to stay longer. “Weren't you a proud fighter of underage drinking?”

Chuuya's character slammed her hammer onto Dazai's character's face. Dazai reached over to pull his game station's cable out, darkening his screen. Chuuya screamed.

He wasn't exactly surprised when the emergency lights of the Arcade turned on, and neither of them claimed that guilt for themselves, however different the reasons might be — by the time Officer Matsuda appeared, disgraceful searching dog in tow and an exasperated arch to his eyebrows, Dazai didn't even whine too much.

Given that the Police Station was plenty busy, the eyebags-carrying man sat them down in his office, and didn't even protest too much when they asked for a TV, and a limited edition 101 Dalmatians DVD.]

Victorious, he extracted his prize: an old box of factory tape. Under the notes of Hirose's oldest song to date, he fixed the stool to the ground. He tried jumping on the seat — miraculously, the tape resisted.

Next, he grabbed a half deteriorated broom — still humming, Dazai swiped the pieces of glass and metal off the corner of the shipping container, waving uselessly at the skeleton of what used to be a camera. He threw the trash out — if he had to go, he'd go inside a clean island in a land of junk.

His preparations came to an end with the current song; Dazai decided the start of the next one would be a good enough omen. The End seemed a nice piece of music to go out to.

Swiftly, he climbed to the stool.

He'd removed his shoes — at the very least, he knew his socks weren't dirty enough to leave stains on the leather. It squeaked a bit under his weight, but it held still. Satisfied, he put his head through the hoop.

[“So,” Dazai started, sitting down on the curb. “You destroyed the syringe, didn't you?”

Tsuchiya looked dimmer than usual; it took him a moment to realize it was because she'd dyed her hair again. Gone was the bright green; in its stead was a darker shade — one he vaguely remembered lining the hems of Tsuchiya Mi's doctor coat.

She dangled her hands behind her legs, scratching at the concrete. “I did.”

There was no regret in her tone; only acceptance.

“I assumed you would,” he reassured her. “Grief is always an interesting sight to witness. Those who don't cry and scream usually do worse.”

“I don't agree with her desires,” Tsuchiya specified. “I don't think he — the doctor loved us. He wanted her to keep his legacy alive. But she's dead, and I wasn't smart enough to save her. The least I could do was respect her last wishes.”

He hummed. “And now the organization has no prominent Ability Users with healing-oriented powers. You do understand how that could be a problem?”

"I do," she said, easily. "Toru, he — he begged me not to. He'd never admit it, but he fears you two. He's got a lot of respect for the Boss — he doesn't want to believe you are where you are because of —" She sighed. "He thinks of himself as a terrible being. I don't think he feels ready to face someone who's, presumably, worse."

"That's interesting," Dazai stood up. "A bit bothersome, but interesting. I appreciate your honesty. I'm sure your sister would be proud of you."

Tsuchiya tightened her lips. She nodded.

"Of course," he added, as a second thought. "You and your sister are both morons. Must run in the family or something."

With that, he reached for his gun, and shot her.]

Dazai fixed the hoop around his neck, making sure the bandages and his hair were out of the way. At the door, a malnourished cat had appeared, peaking in curiously. He offered a wave.

"Welcome back," he said, cheerful. "I promise to be more entertaining, this time around."

The cat meowed, slightly uncaring. He bent at the knees a few times, warming his muscles — with a deep breath, he kicked the stool away.

["Tell me you're kidding," Chuuya stared at the box in his hands. The lights in Matsuda's office were flickering; if he squinted, Dazai thought he could see pictures of Suribachi City on his board.

Dazai tapped his fingers on the heavy square of a TV the man had given them, attempting to scratch the cartoonish dogs. "I mean, it was your birthday."

"I don't want shit from you," he insisted, terrified. "What's in this? Did you put bees in here and then shake it? A poisonous snake? A set rat trap? Fucking look me in the eyes right now."

"It's just a gift. Stop being so dramatic."

"You did all the things I just said!"

"Which is why doing them again would be absolutely pathetic," He motioned the idea away. "Come on. I put so much thought into it!"

Skepticism raised his eyebrows. "Did you slip on dog shit and bump your head?"

"Classy," Dazai grunted. "No, but I got to thinking — I mean, I'm the whole reason you're in this organization, correct?"

"You're fucking not, though —"

"And Mori was the one to give you your disgusting hat as a welcoming pledge — as per tradition, the person who brought you to the Port Mafia should be the one to give it to you,"

He sighed. “I needed to fix my mistake. Now, open it.”

Chuuya’s face grew redder and redder. Right when he thought rage would make him punch a hole through their screens, alerting the entire Police Station — he took a deep breath. “I’ll kill you,” he muttered, as he tore the package apart. “I’ll kill you. Are there dogs on this wrapping paper —“

He fell quiet.

“Get it?” Dazai said, several seconds later, when he couldn’t control his excitement anymore. “It’s a dog collar. Because you’re my dog. Clearly. Your old one was destroyed, so now I get to make a joke out of it. Your tacky style needs a more serious intervention to be saved, but this is a good start. Isn’t it absolutely perfect?”

No answer appeared.

Devoid of any particular expression, Chuuya picked up the black buckle choker, studying it under the fragmented lights of the cartoon. His newly gloved fingers caressed the leather — a strangely simple, strangely delicate touch.

“Slug,” Dazai snapped his fingers, impatient. “Hatrack. Petit mafia. Hey. Why do you look so funny?”

Chuuya cleared his throat. He’d thought his face had been empty before. Only after he wiped it clean, he realized he had been uncharacteristically blind — had missed something, purely because unfamiliar. He blurted out: “For the last time, you idiot, chokers are not dog collars —“

“The shape says something different!”

“Are you stupid? Like, seriously? This —“]

He tried to, at least.

His ringtone echoed against the walls with indomitable insistence. Dazai only tried to ignore it for a few seconds — in a self-fulfilling prophecy, he had inserted the most obnoxious little tune for Mori. It was their shared brand of humor, he assumed: unfunny, and most probably incited towards each other.

With a sigh, he jumped down from the stool.

He didn’t bother answering the call; busying himself with removing the hangman knot from the ceiling, he let it ring endlessly, trying to ignore the pulse of his heartbeat in the hard skin under his eyes.

Silence had returned by the time he was done — when he stepped out of the shipping container, he made sure to turn the record player off.

Waiting for him was the cat. With tired hands, Dazai offered him a bow.

[“Your condolences will not be appreciated,” Kouyou made sure to tell him, after they had stood next to each other in silence for several eternities. The burnt strand of her hair was brushing her nape. “I would recommend not to offer them.”

“Why would I do that?” Dazai replied. “Your beloved has been dead for years.”

At their feet, the wind uselessly whipped the tombstone of one Kanechi Miki. The restricted area of the cemetery had once belonged to the Nine Rings — Dazai wouldn’t have bet on it, but he assumed Kouyou might have bought the land.

“Her body?” he asked.

“In the ocean, of course,” she answered, without missing a beat. “After being thoroughly ruined, as our law demands. I assume she’s resting.”

“With him?”

Her lips pressed against each other, turning the skin surrounding them white. Rolling her umbrella, unawaresly offering shade to Dazai too — or too aware; or too coward to be; or too marble-made to bother hiding the burnt strand under her ear — she concluded: “I shall hope she’s apologized, if that’s the case.”]

The cat didn’t even look at him.

[Dazai was a bad person.

It was a somewhat comforting thought, despite the circumstances — whenever he managed to tear his eyes away from the bleeding weight on his lap and lay them on the rear view mirror, it seemed graffitied on his forehead; right between the crinkles Chuuya’s hand was too still to erase.

“We’re going as fast as we can,” Hirotsu said, at some point, from the passenger seat. Dazai didn’t know the driver. Dazai’s fingers were numb — pressing onto a particularly wide gash in the boy’s sternum, pretending it wasn’t organs pressing against his palm, attempting to slide out of him at every turn of the vehicle.

Chuuya’s nose was bleeding into the crook of his elbow. His head kept bumping against the car door; his legs were crooked to fit in the backseats. Dazai was a bad person.

His free hand touched the bleeding spiral on his cheek, tracing the matted skin at its edges, unsurprised by the blood that lingered. The warmth was almost painful; his freckles vanished under crimson. He was soaked in it; it seemed to throb against his clothes, like the fluttering hum on Chuuya’s pulse point.

He verified it again. Dazai was a bad person — but Mori would get mad, otherwise.

The boy coughed.

It didn’t tear his eyes open, and it didn’t wake his deliriously mumbling conscience — but it rattled the gash on his sternum, and it rained blood down his chin, entire body spasming against his shattered ribs. Dazai tried to remember what he was supposed to do if a seizure started — tried to remember if holding him so tightly was incorrect.

“Hirotsu,” he called, when Chuuya’s eyes rolled back into his skull. “Hirotsu,” Again, even if he didn’t want his help, and didn’t want more human hands on him, because he was foaming at the mouth and Dazai was a bad person — the car had stopped; the man had walked off to reprimand the slow pace of the subordinates preceding them.

Dazai met the driver’s eyes in the rear view mirror. Chuuya let out a sound between a scream and an inhale, lungs whistling in their attempt to breathe. His viscera pressed against his palm. Dazai was —

You are, he could imagine Chuuya saying. He did often seem to slide through the crests of his brain, brutishly hanging on the sharper edges. Dazai was never scared. He was just — You are, but there’s no one else.

The man turned his gaze away from them.]

“Reason number one,” Dazai began, legs dangling from the side of one of Mori’s office seats. “The betrayal of Executive Kouyou Ozaki.”

The metal curtains had been called away; from the windows, he could see every light of the dormant city. The moon had been doubled; for good measure, he dedicated his attention to the one who wasn’t real — and then, on the sedated child laying on the desk.

Mori hadn’t bothered remaining on his throne, as he worked; he loomed over Q’s sleeping traits, fixing the bandages around the new additions to their arms. They had given him a name, from what Dazai heard — Yokohama’s Taishan Fujun.

How gruesome, he had blinked, when Dazai had entered his office — little blades in his hands, and a kicking, shrieking Q held by the wrist.

Q would understand eventually — Q would relinquish it. Perhaps that was the greatest sin.

“She tried to kill you. Correct?”

“Correct,” Mori agreed, plastic gloves on. “Can you give me a scenario?”

Dazai took his time to think — rashness wouldn’t get him anywhere. Not with a man who didn’t appreciate wrong answers.

“According to the database, Executive Kouyou has access to your residence,” he said. “That’s a lie. She does have access to the safe house you keep near the valley, though — I’m assuming you were spending the night there, when she came. You didn’t believe she had turned traitor.”

“Of course,” Mori echoed. The smile curving his mouth was lighter than silence, as threatening as a closed off door. Q didn’t move. “I must have told you this before — but there are two kinds of facts, in this world: the logical, and the illogical ones. I assume Beatrice misunderstood Kouyou’s real nature.”

Loyal, Dazai concluded; but then he scratched that thought off. Traitorousness wasn't thin enough to comfortably wriggle through the walls of the woman's blood vessels; she was all one piece, made in marble and jade, and smart enough to know where she belonged.

It wasn't that the idea of escaping had never crossed her mind, after Kanechi's death — that she'd never considered listening to the whispers; the hands offering her a crown they'd support her in stealing. But there was something weighing her shoulders down — a falling star anchored to her ankles: acceptance.

She could have been a traitor. She wasn't naive enough to be.

"I had to find out what was wrong with her," Mori continued, cutting off the last of the bandages. He brushed Q's hair back; took their temperature, heightened by hysteria. "Her apathy immediately took me down the road of an Ability user. When my best efforts failed, I decided to call for help from the person I trust most in the syndicate."

Dazai paused. "I don't remember that."

"You don't," the man echoed. Not a question.

The hand on the child slipped down, digging into the pocket of his coat — he extracted a familiar orange bottle, shaking it. His gaze followed the motion with as much boredom as Mori would never believe; two gloved fingers brushed his chin, tilting his head up.

I'll be taller, he vowed. Then he'd kill himself.

"You know how your whining gives me a headache," Dazai shrugged.

Seeing how he was clever — seeing how he was a coward — Mori knew better than to touch him without precautions. He would have never dared to whisper a word against his naked skin — would have never been stupid enough to stand where Dazai's eyes could reach him, unarmed and with his bones brushing the air.

Smile dropped, Mori studied the depth of his pupils. "Passcode of the Port Mafia's emergency armed vault?"

Graciously, he conceded: "7280285E."

"How many cameras are installed in the Hall of Building Three?"

"Thirty two."

"What's your name?"

"Dazai," he responded, almost honest. "Dazai Osamu."

"Not what I meant."

"Shame," There was a starting point in every stare off they shared — the game was understanding who was waiting for who at the finish line. Gelidly, he added: "It's what you get.”

Mori let go of his chin. “That night, I was lucky enough to turn the camera of your place on. You know — the one you destroyed.”

“I beg for your forgiveness.”

“I think it was one of those poisons you took from the cabinet in December. Sick as you were, it didn’t take much convincing to get you to give me a hand,” His expression turned sour. “I warned you that mixing too many substances wouldn’t help.”

“You’re the one who gave them to me,” he replied.

Polite confusion painted his features. “Did I?”

His mouth opened. Yes. Did he? No. Yes? It closed again. “It was in your clinic,” he said, and it sounded petulant. Good. “You should have kept your door closed.”

“Dazai,” Mori said. He knew Dazai wasn’t stupid enough to use actual drugs. That’s not a nice way to talk about addiction, you know?, he would have said, had Dazai pointed it out. “I made you a promise, didn’t I?”

Yes, he reminded himself, rationally. It was there, with all the other certainties, with the stars and the gun in the lightbulb drawer. Gloved hands and chemical mixes, both on his tongue, both tearing him apart, for radically different reasons. No, because he didn’t remember, and no footage or word could be trusted if it didn’t come from Dazai’s own lungs. Yes, because Mori always prepared for everything.

No, because Mori had said so. Yes, because Mori had said no.

The man sighed, every inch a worried doctor. “We’ll talk about it later. Facts are, your state certainly gave your torture methods a push. Just as you did in the dungeons, you managed to rip a name away from Kouyou — exactly the name I needed.”

“Beatrice,” he concluded.

“I knew of her,” the man removed his coat; Q disappeared almost completely under its cover, only their cheek pressing against the wood. “I had gathered information on Kouyou long before I made her Executive. Apart from those — less than gentlemanly methods, she had told me all about the girl who’d helped the previous Boss ruin her. I did my research, and the resurrection of the Nine Rings turned up.”

“You always knew what the seal was,” Dazai added. To his experience, amusement tasted like blood; he could only assume he was entertained. “And you knew that, if Beatrice had already established who’d receive it in the eventuality of her demise — it had to be Kouyou.”

Mori turned again. A shiny new object laid in the white of his gloves, still cracked and still old, but devoid of any blood.

Watching the wristwatch dangle between his fingers, he offered him an apologetic beam. “Oh, worry not. I have no intentions of stumbling down the path of immortality. Kouyou doesn’t either; she entrusted me with this pledge. But you know I have a weak spot for antiques.”

“Motivation number one,” Dazai concluded, once again. “The alleged betrayal of Executive Kouyou Ozaki, and what it could do for you.”

“Precisely. Any hypothesis for the second and the third one?”

Dazai leaned his chin on his hand — bored, entranced, longing for a rope, longing to know more about the house no one dared to attack. “Get Chuuya and I to work together.”

“You truly can’t even consider the possibility of your —“ He searched for the words, as if he had not invented them. “Late entanglement, let’s call it, being a spontaneous occurrence?”

“I could,” he replied. “Fate is as real as any of us. Not about you, though. You cause things.”

The doctor sighed, leaning on the edge of his desk. “Alright. Guilty as charged. Number three?”

He tapped his fingers on the armrest, squinting at the dirt on his shoes. He should have probably tried to wipe it away, as quietly as possible. Mori didn’t like messes.

“Chuuya,” he spelled out, slowly. It wasn’t any different from any other words; Dazai had been bled on by countless vowels. He wondered which files on the shelves knew all about him. Wondered if the curiosity would pass, like it all did — all but his resilience. “Nakahara Chuuya is, frankly, invaluable.”

Mori hummed, signaling his attention. Not agreement, not disagreement; reality, there on the floor, waiting for their hands to mold it.

“He’s gained appreciation through our more than hostile ranks, and he’s brought prosperity to the organization. That same organization is now fighting on the brink between terror and pride. He’s ours. He will kill us all,” he continued, just as neutrally. “His numbers are unprecedented.”

“Except for yours.”

He insisted: “You have been receiving offers, haven’t you? Especially now, what with the rumors of what went down in Rengoku. Twice is a pattern. The higher floors — they want him.”

“Naturally.”

“They can’t have him.”

“Because he’s,” Mori tilted his head to the side, “Invaluable?”

“You’re not stupid enough to let him go,” he confirmed, blankly. “No matter what they’re offering you. And I’m not that lucky as to have him gone so easily. I assume the secret mission you’ve planned for him is your ground test for the Executive seat.”

“A first step of sorts. The Flags vouched for him long before he proved his strength against Verlaine,” the doctor said. “Now that his true potential is being discussed, he will need to bear a heavy crown.”

He had potential before too, he thought about tutting. Reversed roles; sometimes, Mori could have stood a lesson or two. You’re just hungry. He’s just starved.

Dazai stared at the stains on his soles. “The face of the organization — Kouyou and Lippman’s worthy heir. Touch the Port Mafia, and Ability users will be the last of your problems.”

“Touch the Port Mafia,” Mori specified. “And gods will answer.”

“Your latest moulding material. You’re going to give him what he wants, and you’re going to get a disproportionate amount of power back. Correct?”

“Correct. Do you oppose?”

“But to get to this point, you had to realize something,” Dazai continued, pretending he hadn’t heard. Hilarity pulled his face, digging caves in smiling wrinkles at the sides of his eyes. Dangling something he didn’t have in front of him, as if — “Corruption was a wild card. It was tested solely during the fight against Verlaine. At the time, it was focused on one specific enemy — someone who bore the same extraordinary power. Eat, or be eaten. You needed to put him in a situation where he would have no choice but to lean into the help of Arahabaki.”

“Which meant, obviously, that you needed to be willing to save him,” Mori added. “And Chuuya needed to trust that you would do it. I had my good reasons to believe you would have both done so blindly — past history has proved so. Still, partnership assures a bond.”

“Temporary forced collaboration, ” he replied.

“If you refuse my proposition.”

“What makes you think we won’t?”

He smiled. “Call it a hunch. All the same, I believe Chuuya is now much more open to the use of Corruption, ” Dazai bit his cheek; didn’t speak. “He needed to separate the idea of that power from the memory of his brother; considering his victory, I should hope that step has been taken.”

Dazai remembered the sound of his laughter, on that bloodied field. The way he had gasped as he came down from the seizure — the punch he had shattered the car window with, as if he could have crawled back to Rengoku and knelt by every corpse of theirs he hadn’t meant to create.

Hands crossed, Mori declared: “Chuuya is your responsibility, Dazai.”

He huffed. “Chuuya is his own responsibility. And I don’t envy him one bit, given —“ “Dazai,” His tone took a strange note. Honest and true — he met his eyes with ease, because he had gazed at crueler things. Hardly ever more intense ones, though. “He is the strongest weapon this syndicate has ever owned, and will ever own. He might be amongst the most formidable creatures this world has created. He,” He spelled out, “Is your responsibility.”

He took the hit in silence.

He recalled, very privately — quiet enough Mori couldn’t find it in his eyes — how starvedly Chuuya had looked at his own bleeding gashes, as the stretcher led him down a corridor Dazai had been kept from.

His pills were still on the desk.

Fondness was as prickly as greed on the man’s tongue, “He’s as soft as the crust of the earth, our Chuuya,” he sighed, affectionate like a miner. “Is he not?”

“Do you know how similitudes work?”

“Indeed,” The doctor tapped his fingers on the wood; Dazai followed the tip tap as intently as he had the pills. “A very peculiar kind of powerful being.”

“Which is?”

A grin, private and sharp. “The kind that has no aim for that ferocity but the sake of others. He lacks selfishness — Just look at how much blood he let you paint his hands with, all for the sake of the syndicate.”

Tip tap. No dust stuck to the tips of his gloves when they separated from the mahogany. The HQs were always too clean. Mori never slipped.

“His selfishness is all but in matters of power, truly,” Mori continued, conversationally. “Only in his private affairs. Curiosity for his origins.”

He wondered where he kept the documents — if they were devastatingly well guarded, or abandoned under a cup of cold coffee. He wondered whom either option was meant to taunt — Chuuya, or him. He wondered where he had gone wrong, exactly, for it to warrant that conversation.

[Chuuya had a bruise under his right eye.

It was vaguely spiral-like, like his scars — but he knew Corruption only tore. The food Matsuda had brought them had already gotten cold, abandoned in half empty take out boxes, just outside the comforting blanket of the man’s desk. Dazai could hear his murmurs into the Station’s phone — low, but not particularly concerned about what they might hear. Whenever the animated dogs on screen got too senselessly boring, Dazai would stare at the line of his shoes, and wonder how it could lack blood.

“So,” he asked, once air had an anchor again. The bruise was bluer than his eye. They had sat as distantly as possible, but the press of Chuuya’s naked calf against his was corpse-cold, where his bandages ended. “How does Corruption feel?”

The unexplainable burst across the most controlled lines of the boy’s face, pulling on the pinkish skin of his newest scars. He didn’t look sick — not the way Dazai’s eyebags dug into his skull; his eyes watered. His skin was matted in sweat — his eyelashes fluttered too often. Curled on his laps, his gloved fingers kept clawing the empty air — reaching.

Addiction, Mori liked to sing-song, tapping his side pocket, fingers like police lights — as if Dazai had not been asking for a gentler poison since day one, is not allowed in the Mafia.

No, he considered. Chuuya’s calf plastered itself a bit more firmly against his. His hands, still clawing, turned — reached for his flesh, and pulled themselves away. No, it isn’t.

“Like nothing at all,” he offered, eyes to the screen.]

“Curiosity is human,” Dazai offered.

Without missing a beat: “You certainly seem to believe so.”

Look at that, she used to say, when Dazai was particularly foolish. He had put his fingers inside Chuuya’s wounded side and felt his blood flow. He has never managed to do that with his own carcass. Look at the blood on the floor. How can I forget it was there?

“I would expect him to appreciate you more for it,” Mori commented.

“And you would expect me to use that appreciation,” he guessed, unsurprised and untouched, dangling his legs. Tip tap, it went, tip tap.

He smiled. “I don’t expect you to do anything at all, Dazai. You’re not a study subject.”

“Only because you’re too scared to put me under tools.”

“Would you let me?”

“I’ve begged you to,” His voice escaped a hint too quickly from his teeth — Dazai felt it bleed down his lips. Think, he reminded himself, always think. “I have from the very first moment.”

Mori lowered his head, conceding. “But all that loyalty,” he insisted, out of mercy in less than a blink, the hunger on his tongue stickier than any dust and any skin and any promise. “It bleeds from him like a wound that refuses to close.”

You would know, Dazai thought.

“No point in a wound,” he concluded.

The curve of his lips grew painful. “No, none at all. Unless,” he agreed. “But that’s what I’m here for, yes?”

He thought of Chuuya's back — a green leather jacket from those who had fed him first; a tailored suit jacket from those who had made his lungs exhale. Mori's face, ten feet taller. His knees brushing the ground. A fake god's faith in a man who had taken it all from him, and promised him double — purely out of hope the mountain would be too high to remember what he had lost in the climb.

How, he considered, horribly boring.

[“How so very aggravating,” Dazai would sigh, and would whine, and would quietly wonder at his own inability to stop thinking about it, later — monologuing to a driver who only cared about not being killed for the sin of paying attention to him. Mori had made it worthy of capital punishment the first time he had put his hands on his shoulders in public. Dazai had never quite done anything, but they would swear he was to blame for the caution. “That a dog should be loyal to somebody other than their master.”]

“And our three motivations are done,” He dangled his legs; offered: “Need me to say the fourth one out loud?”

Mori tilted his head. “I never asked you.”

“Asked me what?”

“If you had found a favorite place.”

His face was split apart by a grin. Nothing might ever be quite as numbly insistent; as inevitable. Nothing might ever make him feel smaller. Nothing quite like his age — nothing quite as unconventional for a fifteen years old.

You know I won't, he did not say. If you're going to stutter it out, she had taught him, better to say nothing at all.

“No, you don't need to,” the doctor continued, once the silence he had wanted arrived. Dazai was still smiling. He was still mirroring him. If he thought about it too long, he knew, he would notice he could not recall how to breathe. “Still, I have always wanted to hear you talk about it.”

He filled his cheeks with air. He knew the thing braving a marathon in his blood; he knew how to get rid of it.

He blew the air out, studying the barely visible constellations in the sky. He longed for the floor; the roof of any desk, his growing body fighting to fit in a suffocating space with pointy limbs. Immature, the man might have said — or maybe not, if he was still a slave to resistance, or entertainment, or the distant look in Dazai's eyes. Indecorous. Is it the pills again, Dazai?

A curtain of clouds was preparing to enclose the city — right on time to wash away the blood, Yokohama rain was coming.

Through sleep, Q whined.

Dazai reached forward; pulled their nose.

I'll die, he promised, good-naturedly, waving at the crimson rain. He'd told the brother of a postulated god; he'd tell the rain, too. I'll die soon. I was wrong. There was nothing to be found here.

A suicidal maniac's promises weren't worth much, but neither were the sky's tears. None of them had anything left to mourn.

"Alright," Dazai said, covering Q's sleeping face too. "Let's talk about the Book, then."

end of act one, scene one.

---

Chapter End Notes

mori: so how's your search for q going dazai, locked them in a basement for almost four months: :((

AND SO IT ENDS!! the first part, at least. next up we have the interlude (which you'll see, is more of a timeless character study before we move to part 2 act 1) and after, we have my darling chuuya's pov. this first arc took everything from me — i actually think it might be the arc i've rewritten most of all. i was never really satisfied, specifically because it was the first arc, and i wanted it to be a convincing selling ticket.

i had tons of dante-beatrice-v lore i wanted to get too, but that will have to be saved for stories in the next arc.

now, for this chapter specifically: the words dazai says at the end regarding the "place no one visits" are a reference to The Day I Picked Up Dazai, and the way the narrator describes Odasaku's house. we are in fact entering that timeline. this will be fun.

should you not have understood, the finalized version of the plan to defeat/save the Souls hung on the idea that Q could keep them alive a bit longer via the use of their Ability state, and that would give Tsuchiya the time to heal who she needed to heal and leave who she didn't. moreso — ta da! mori knew much more than said all along. so did dazai. that won't be a reoccurring theme or anything ofc...

well!! this is all for now. i'll see you soon for the interlude, and then we get to chuuya. i hope you liked this first arc, and that you'll like the next one even more. if you've read until now and you want to keep reading (or don't) thank you so much. your support is much appreciated.

until next time, keep yourself warm <33

FACE

Chapter Summary

“He was strange, that postman.”

Chapter Notes

last dazai chapter in a while! see you at the end :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

interlude.

---

He was strange, that postman.

Not that he was a postman, of course. Or, rather — he was, but it hardly sat between the highest points of relevance of his enigma; like a mole or a scar too precise to be inconsequential. Dazai had grown out of puzzles by the first time he was made bleed — he had been somewhat sure to have grown out of peeling people apart, as well.

“I can’t get through him,” he found himself mumbling, so frustrated it bordered hysteria — despite the closeness of the four walls, suffocating and wider than most cages Dazai’s mind had offered. The postman didn’t even turn. Like autumn to leaves, he liked to pretend he wasn’t keeping an eye on him. “This guy — He’s a natural airhead.”

The first words he told him, though, were: “I’ll kill you.”

(Amongst the second ones was — Let me die like this. It seemed to rattle him. Dazai was widely unsurprised. He was only vaguely less so, when the man didn't stop looking at him for it).

It seemed strangely redundant — the, keep an eye on him, part. The postman had him tied up to his cranky, creaking bed — he had stitched his skin back together as if it hadn't been made for the tear. Dazai had lived with Mori — he knew that healing was a cage of its own.

He fed him incandescent food without blowing on the spoon — only staring at him, unblinking, as if any portion of it was dignified. He read him a stupid book, as if he was six and unbloodied, and he didn't even have the grace to be disappointed at the unfinished last chapters. He won at poker.

Dazai was absolutely delighted. His fingers, on the other hand, spasmed upon a trigger that wasn't there.

I'm sorry to inconvenience you, he might have told him, in different circumstances. Clearly, the man didn't want to deal with a corpse in his house — Dazai truly didn't wish to survive that journey, though. The counterfeit money he had been carrying was abandoned on the man's desk; the lighting-touch of bullets from the gang he had thrown himself in front of still lingered.

It didn't quite hurt anymore. He was almost — almost — reluctant to attempt to jump out of the window, when the armed police showed up. He could respect good work.

He wouldn't show it, obviously — he tried it all to tear that breathing illusion apart. He whined so loudly his vocal chords burned with it; kicked his feet so insistently the sheets irrevocably knotted themselves around his calves; threw bowls to the ground, and screamed, and lamented every inch of existence that man offered him.

When that failed, he moved to what the postman referred to as, strange requests — for if not exasperation, unsuccessfulness would get to him.

It didn't.

It was a strange sort of stubbornness, he reflected, wrapped so tightly in the blanket the man had picked him up with he could hardly breathe. All of it was strange, but the man's refusal to let him be the corpse he was meant to be was downright peculiar.

He didn't say it out loud — and it was puzzling, almost, given how freely the postman seemed to constantly speak, about him and them and the world and blood — but Dazai knew it, nonetheless, with the intuition that had led him to that trumpet-vines covered apartment in a street no organization dared to bother.

He didn't say it, but Dazai knew — he could have pushed his body in the street. Dazai waited for him to highlight it. Expect the weight of the things you are given. A corpse on a public road was somebody else's business; Dazai had seldom not been somebody else's business.

That he was not, as of now, was just strange enough to be irritating. Make up a new death without me in it, the postman had said. Dazai hadn't been sure what to say. He resolved to get the even stranger man to admit it — resolved to give him a chance to fix that mistake of his, since his poker moves were interesting enough.

He didn't admit it, either.

Dazai switched tactics.

"When my wounds are healed, I will leave," he informed the postman, as superior as someone kept from suicide only by chains on a bed could be. The four walls were suffocating; at night, he memorized their cracks anyway. There was no lock and no key; Dazai didn't want to die where the water could filter in, though. "That's all there is to our relationship, anyway."

The postman didn't even seem to care enough to agree. He didn't deny it, though; only sat at the feet of his — his, at that point; Dazai, Mori swore, only gets to keep the things he's bloodied, and not even for a long enough time for the smell to fade — bed, threw cards between their crossed legs, and blinked owlshly.

Dazai stared.

The postman was not much of a talker.

---

...

---

Until he was.

Dazai wasn't sure of what flipped the switch. Before the 48 group came to us, he would tell the air, in the days following that disappearance of his — when Mori would stick him in his container with no painkillers and piles of blank paper to write down his worst thoughts on, for the sake of a parental approach to mutiny.

If you had to torture, some of them would say. The ones that wanted him to be successful would start with — what is less merciful than death?

Before, certainly — nothing about the day the postman sat on his bed and began talking seemed different from the days they had burned through the same way; except a deeper creak of the metal. Dazai faulted the man's determination, and the new wagering weight he brought with him.

“What do you want to bet on?” he asked him, courteously. Perhaps determination was the wrong term — the postman didn’t particularly seem to care whether he agreed to it or not. Acceptance, then — a hand stretched through the grates, politely waiting to be bitten off. Thank you for letting me in, still.

Dazai sniffed. He hadn’t cried yet — he did think it might have gotten him some leverage. The tears didn’t come, though — there was a glass and an umbrella and a punishment. “I have no money.”

“Do you have secrets?”

He thought about it. “I do have those.”

He didn’t need to ask if the postman did, too — he breathed as if his lungs had been molded from the roots of the earth; he carried his skeleton as if the bones would have been worth a fortune on the Black Market. He didn’t smile, not quite — but the warmth in his eyes and his slightly tilted upper lip reminded him of rippled waters.

Touched, Dazai thought. There were many words to rain on that man. Touched. Sculpted. Stupid. Cursed. He looked at the world with the acceptance of someone who would never be a face in the crowd — who had mastered imitation, still.

The struggle of knowing didn’t seem to weigh him down. Dazai had never met somebody more at peace in their torment.

Dazai wanted to know.

He lost at cards.

They talked.

He wouldn’t have been able to say about what — there were flames in his throat that asked for nothing but to be bright, and Mori might even dare to touch him if he knew, and perhaps he was lucky, truly — that the strange postman was too busy being strange, and being a postman, and tearing Dazai apart with too clean nails; far too busy to destroy the Port Mafia. Dazai had never even dreamed of a more disorientating hypnosis — Dazai would have let the syndicate burn for the chance to offer the man some more ashes to discuss upon.

“But,” the postman said. And: “Well.” If he was lucky, he would say — “No, I don’t think so.”

He was a funny man. The first time he said, “Who’s that Mori you talked about, again?” Dazai laughed so hard his stitches tore. It didn’t really cause a change in the man’s expression; he got the feeling he started to hold back less thoughts, after it, though.

Fruitless effort. There were no such limitations, and he was as grateful to them as he was for the window near his bed, allowing the moonlight in — a mercy to irrepressibly starved eyes, stealing every word that didn’t slip from the man’s makeshift cot.

Dazai had quick fingers. Selfishly, Dazai knew what winter days were like.

There was no time to rest, as far as Dazai was concerned — there was too much to say, and there was not enough time; he had written the end to that ersatz paradise with his own hands, and his flesh despised him just as heavily as always — and so it healed, and it healed, and it grew, stitch after stitch, despite the disapproving glances he offered the wounds whenever the postman unraveled the bandages to check on them.

Reopen them, he wanted to beg, each time. He thought he had vocalized it, at least once, nails sinking between closing gaps and whines directed to the gun he knew the man owned — but his fever had gotten up again, and he was delicately cruel enough to pretend not to understand.

“You lose again,” he told him. He must have known Dazai detested it as much as he revealed in it; he seemed to know it all, like the darkness under his eyelids. Were you there when they made the stars temporary?, he wanted to ask, sometimes, and did you also think it mean? — but he refused to offend his humanity like this. “I’m listening.”

He was. He swore not to agree; swore not to understand — Dazai knew he did. Dazai was drunk on being heard, and it seemed more stupid than any rock in his pocket as he jumped over the edge; and he had never quite longed for the sun to rise behind the skyline so devastatingly.

Before, but maybe after, he would nod, to the thirteen panels, satisfied. Perhaps from the very first moment; perhaps I was too distrusting to listen. Perhaps there was too much blood.

Dazai knew better than to care for the ephemeral; knew better than to assume there was no connection between all that was ephemeral and all that had touched him.

Like all the postman’s solutions, it sounded easy enough to offend — Odasaku didn’t really touch him. It would have kept him from cheating at poker.

---

...

---

See, she told him, once, this is your hand.

It sounded less monumental than the shape of her lips begged it to be — it felt distinctly less guilty than the bite of her bitten nails on the softest part of his wrist demanded. Dazai knew when he was about to be blamed. He rarely knew what for.

At night, he laid on his side and cradled his palm, and he blamed it — and it was hard to choose which one, truly, because crimes need more than five fingers, and she simply didn’t have the time to berate both sides of his carcass.

You take and you take and you steal, she told him. She never touched him. No one ever would — she swore. Can you expect them not to take something back?

Dazai lacked the words; he knew better than to speak when he could feel the letters shatter on his tongue. She viciously disapproved of his lacks. He viciously disapproved of the rising sun behind his window, bathing the line of his palms in a golden shade that had done nothing bad at all.

Dazai lacked the words. Still, he thought — if I took, where did I put it?

---

...

---

The second time Dazai entered Bar Lupin, no one was waiting on the stools.

Terror was a strangely childish flame up and down his tightest veins — it didn't quite fit. He sat in his place, nonetheless, and he spun under the amused eyes of a distracted barkeep, asking for outrageous and more outrageous drinks, and he waited. The bottle of pills in his coat was rattled a bit louder with every turn. There was no space, so Dazai didn't fear.

No point in a wound, Mori insisted. And then — is it the headaches again?

Perhaps it's different, he considered. Mori had taught him logic; Dazai practiced it with the stumbling ease of someone pretending he hadn't showed up to class with pre-existing knowledge. He couldn't be caught — whatever the consequences would have been. He couldn't stop thinking.

So he thought.

The universe, for starters. The oceans. The price of milk these days. The hot metal he had poured down the open veins of a prisoner in the dungeons, watching him squirm and shout and sob, tears landing on his tongue and turning red. The way Madame Tanaki's hands shook. The Great War. The myth of creation. The precise shade of Chuuya's burned eye. The way his hands never flickered before reaching for him.

The four walls where Oda Sakunosuke lived — the sight Dazai must have made for him, bleeding out on his porch and healing in his bed and drinking on the stool next to his. The concept of breathing — the taste of oxygen in a room where the man had exhaled.

Odasaku made no sound as he walked down the stairs.

Dazai hadn't known that about him — he could only assume the hiss of wind making him sit up was instinctual. He could only assume it would have been impolite not to notice his first friend's arrival.

"Hello," He grinned.

Truly an uncharacteristic man — his coat was too non-descriptive, and he had forgotten to shave. He rattled his knuckles on the counter when he sat down, and Dazai memorized the melody, despite knowing it would change; he immediately started talking, like there was nothing Dazai was too clever to be told — nothing Dazai was too inhuman to understand; nothing he was too good to let him long for — and he memorized that too.

Sorry I doubted you, he almost said.

"Sorry I'm late," Odasaku said.

You're real, Dazai didn't say, well aware that it would be taken for what it was. Perhaps not out loud; perhaps it was in his loosened tongue, and the way he didn't leave until sunrise. "That's fine."

---

...

---

"Well?" Dazai asked — and it was, in itself, a sin of sorts. Mori would remember it, because Mori remembered every ounce of life he had managed to squeeze from his soaked limbs — dangled over his balcony, like a piece of furniture he didn't know how to throw away; never dried by the sun, like the bloodstains on the dungeons' floor.

It didn't seem too heavy of a price, right at that moment.

But Mori Ougai was, at the end of the day, a predictable being — where the sunlight blinded, and where the moonlight bled, he would perform as the stars had made him to be. So would Dazai, for there was no escaping stardom as a falling being — but he, he always remembered, had at least the grace not to call himself miraculous.

"Alright," Mori shrugged. The world breathed in. "If you think we need some more goons."

---

...

---

When he was breathing slow enough to reign his selfishness in, he regretted it.

---

...

---

Summer had just started, the first time Odasaku pulled him out of the water.

He didn't bring him to Bar Lupin, after, which was certainly a change — Dazai wasn't quite sure their heartline was allowed to beat over the edge of those wooden stairs. The experiment was just successful enough to make him hungrier — they began devouring Yokohama, afterwards.

Odasaku didn't ask about the wet sound his shoes made against the concrete; didn't say a word when Dazai plastered himself against his side, sure not to touch — least it soaked his coat, and it stained his soul, and it stuck. Dazai has a tendency to linger, Mori liked to say. Nothing was ever quite warm, but the man was a blown out fire, and the ashes smelled of shattered darkness.

He bought them canned crab. Dazai insisted on paying. Odasaku let him.

It was only weeks later, amidst a commission the man had to complete for the Mafia, and that a bored Dazai had invited himself along to, that he cleaned the blood on his shoes against the sidewalk and asked: “Why?”

“Why, what?” Dazai asked, nudging the corpse. “You know, you’re very lucky I was here — what with your no killing policy. Perhaps you should start bringing me along to all your jobs!”

“Wouldn’t that take too much time?” he replied — though it wasn’t exactly a refusal. Odasaku talked like that a lot — a constant possibility. Options they all needed to consider; the best choice for a man who could see the outcome however terrible of a decision it was.

Dazai was just vain enough to know the man enjoyed the double trail of their shoes on the ground — that Dazai didn't have to chase this, at the very least.

He shrugged. "I'll just leave my job."

Odasaku blinked. Nothing Dazai said ever took him by surprise; Dazai knew he was as starved to understand him as he was, though. Always knocking on his edges; never quite tearing the door open. Dazai had never been handled with more delicacy — had never been treated as a sharp thing, even shattered on the floor. "I don't think Boss would like that."

"Well," Dazai smiled, "One reason more."

He tried again, days later, as they crawled out of the neighborhood sewers, covered in so much mud Dazai could barely see the glint of curiosity in his eyes, as he asked: "What are you even meant to understand, if you're dead?"

It was somewhat exhilarating — that glint. It was the precise brand of cruelty he had overseen in the man's silhouette, that day with 48; a posed texture of bloodthirst he had been longing to see again. Odasaku was perfectly capable of being mean; Dazai was perfectly capable of admitting he longed to see a gun in his hands again.

That was mean, he considered. He couldn't say, that's not true. It wasn't; but it wasn't a lie enough.

"What have you understood," he questioned back, rubbing mud across his sleeves — his coat was at home; because, he would never tell Mori, not even if he touched, not even if he begged, not even if he died and knotted his scarf around Dazai's shoulders as he decayed, his coat is always at home when Odasaku is there. "Since you stopped killing?"

Odasaku thought about it.

He was never rash; he wondered if he knew Dazai had a tendency to carve his words where his hands couldn't rip them away, not even when they were at their emptiest — if he was trying to be a good influence, in that crooked way of his. As if not lighting up his cigarette in their blood-soaked room would have mattered.

I can't be influenced, he let him know, as he lit up his own cigarette. I'm a prodigy, you know, he added, and Odasaku looked at him as if he was trying to find the ventriloquist, or the murder weapon.

No, the man agreed. Dazai knew it was all about lungs and etiquette — every word out of Odasaku's mouth seemed like it should have weighted more than the world, though. But perhaps you can be saved.

Neither of them believed it — cancer or existence or even just a coat. Dazai was overjoyed by the man's lack of attempts to hide it.

"That it doesn't really matter," he said.

"What doesn't?"

“Where you are,” It seemed a thought that needed a bit more elaboration; Odasaku spoke like a writer staring down his empty page. “When they ask you about the light you offered, I don’t think they will care if you met it too late.”

Dazai wasn’t quite listening anymore. He wondered if he should have reprimand himself for it. “Look,” he said, eyes wide, pointing at the end of their stretch of sewers. “A snake.”

Later, when he was bandaging the bite the beast had crawled forward to snap on his calf, he laughed at something Dazai had said. He couldn’t really remember what it was — he held onto the sound, though, and wondered if it could be called bright.

---

...

---

“There’s a life to be lived,” Dazai told him, under the warm lights of the Bar. This is a quiet place, Odasaku had told him — a lie meant to guide the wounded animal in. A fortunate coincidence; there was no better place to speak. “I know there is.”

“What kind of life?” Odasaku asked.

Dazai thought about saying it clearly.

“It’s death,” he said, at least, uncertain of whether he did it or not. Understanding was the end of a well he only threw rocks in occasionally; after a while, even the deafest ear would get tired of the echo. Lupin was quiet; the ricochet of Dazai’s loneliness could have broken an eardrum. He remembered piercing a woman’s own, in the dungeons — remembered feeling it pulse on the tip of his index. “It’s the one thing we know, and the one thing we hate.”

“I don’t know. I think we know and hate much more than that.”

“Not as surely, ” he insisted. “Nothing is as inevitable, you see? Even the ever rising sun will burn out, some day. Even the most detestable creature on earth, the one you hate the most, will end up in a grave.”

Odasaku hummed. “I doubt we will be here to see it.”

“I won’t. I’ll be long gone.”

“We all will.”

“No,” a less disillusioned mouth would have begged. His Odasaku was a man of bloodied skies; the crinkles on his neck, right over the scars from an attempted beheading, showed it. Did you fear death when you were young?, he had asked — I didn’t care enough to fear many things, Odasaku had replied. Dazai knew that nobody but him could have grasped the disappointment that was the sunrise, through eyes that couldn’t see it for what it was. “I’m already gone.”

The man studied him.

All human beings are born with this, he had told him. The urge to fear and to scream, I don’t want to die. If that is the one thing we all share, how can any less valuable desire we feel ever be satisfied?

Is that why you want to die?

No, Dazai had shrugged. It is merely how it is. Some things you cannot say.

I do not fear it, he didn’t say. It felt too redundant. It felt too honest to understand, even for the first man to call him his friend. I wish for it. Am I not already gone?

“Well,” Odasaku concluded. “One more reason to drink another glass.”

---

...

---

He mostly thought about it under the sun.

His hands were plenty stained — the blood never stuck under his nails, though, because Mori had a thing about cleanness, and the bandages were already pushing it enough. But his hands were so deeply stained they seemed to drip on the floor with every step — he listened to the tip tap of the blood drops, and he thought about it.

When you lose him, the shadows on his roof let him know, thirteen and uncaring, but as helpful as everything Mori had given him, know that it was your skin that poisoned him.

Odasaku didn’t really touch him; it made it hard to cheat at poker — and to get him out of the dangerous situations he kept dragging them to, during commissions that should have been easier than that. It made it harder for Dazai to feel more like him — just a man in a bar, unwilling to curse the innocents for the sole crime of existing near him. Unwilling to cry under the sun, if he could have mustered up enough regret for something he had yet to do.

Odasaku didn’t really touch him.

It was Dazai who doomed them.

---

...

---

“For God’s sake, ” Sakaguchi Ango snapped — a shriek, if one preferred honesty to dignity; just high pitched enough to almost shake the books off his shelves. The notion that he smelled just as much as them didn’t seem to reach him immediately. “Do either of you know anything about vital space?”

His nose, at last, scrunched up. Under their blinking, matching gazes, he sniffed his own arms and snapped again.

It was a long lecture; Dazai stopped listening by the third minute, but not exactly out of a lack of entertainment. Round-Glasses-Guy — as the back of his mind had registered the mole-upon-lip and vaguely mouse-like face — had sold himself with the ink sticking to his palms; debris from letters of forgotten dead ones.

Noble, certainly. A waste of time, even more. Perhaps that was exactly what made it good — that he wasn’t doing it for any sensible reason. Dazai was a boy of chess pieces and whines; if not clever, it should at least be spiteful. Calling it moral may have been too much for anyone crossing those halls — he studied the upward chin of one Sakaguchi Ango, and thought even the Port Mafia had to accept one or two moles of goodness in.

Dazai was hardly the type to sneak into the Archives and befriend the most boring rows of mafiosi; something told him Odasaku wasn’t either. A joint quest, then — out of character. An effort for a man with curiously strange ideas — and after a glass of Lupin’s best, an almost offensively free tongue.

There was an ugly thing, and it lived behind the thinnest of Dazai’s eyelashes — it was hungrier with every season he spent ingesting air. It wasn’t terrified; there was no space for it. It was content — and like all that burns, it knew the wind would rise.

It wasn’t quite jealousy, no. It was the creak of a wooden stool, always at his right, always known and well kept and held quietly — like a piece of glass he couldn’t afford to replace, from the shattered window of a bitter, blind eye. It was Mori’s stool, spinning and spinning, until he was dragged away and tied to a bed and made to watch fireflies until they died.

(It wasn’t quite as ugly — that was why it manifested in pettiness, and not in strangely devoid eyes and the gun they just wouldn’t stop leaving in his hands unattended. It was easy, really, to get Ango riled up. The easiest way was standing in the middle of a crowded street in his presence and shout: "I work in organized crime!")

He expected the seat at his left to leave him starved — Sakaguchi Ango, with his loosened tie but unwrinkled jacket, didn't give it a chance.

The stairs creaked; it echoed. It was summer; Dazai hadn't seen a firefly yet.

"Hello," He grinned.

---

...

---

Not yours to have, she swore, mere days before he killed her. But all yours to touch.

---

...

---

Odasaku's thing, he gathered — as he failed not to let his inhumane need to know seep through the cracks of his favorite people's distraction — was dragging him around on commissions he insisted should have been less boring than all that Dazai's job entailed.

Ango's thing was car lifts, apparently.

"I cannot let you out of here on your own with a light heart," he insisted, the first time, dragging him by a belt loop — as if concern and touch and the notion of Dazai's presence as a choice and not a consequence weren't things of a less spectacular world. Neither him nor Odasaku ever touched his skin; but they hung off the more reachable parts of him like they feared him vanishing. He had attempted to be polite with him — by the third time Dazai had dragged them into an unplanned shooting, he had decided brat was his new favorite word. "You drank more than both of us — hic! — combined."

“That’s what you think,” Dazai slurred back, and he willingly stepped on the man’s feet, and pulled on his tie as he stumbled back. “I only digest the toxic and, or deadly!”

Dazai didn’t really get drunk — he had learned balance inside Mori’s empty clinic, sneaking in on a night the man was in Tokyo, and calculating the brink not to cross with the diligence of an academic.

He did get amused, though — especially by the distinctively old and particularly entertaining curses Ango spewed as he dragged him to his car, attempting not to let him face plant on the floor.

Eventually, he ended up carrying him on his shoulder. Odasaku was still there, leaning on the briks by the Bar Lupin entrance, washed by the neon signs like a mirage — so he dangled until all the blood reached his head, and he winked.

Odasaku curled an eyebrows.

Awkwardly, he attempted to wink back.

It took Ango almost six well-planned attempts for Dazai to drive them off a cliff, rattling off supposed directions to his living quarters — to realize maybe he wasn’t as drunk as he swore he was.

“No, no, I am, ” he assured, slurred and whiny, sliding down the passenger seat, kicking his legs all over. “See? I’m so drunk.”

“You’re a child, that's what you are. How does a child have a tolerance?” he rumbled, dragging the ankle he had pushed in his face, moving it just in time to escape a horning vehicle. “Sorry!”

“They’re the ones in the wrong lane,” he let him know. He was so drunk with the way the man’s wrist pulsed against his skin, he wasn’t even sure if he was lying.

“What, really?” Ango squinted. He pressed on the horn; leaned out of the window to snap: “You are very stupid!”

Dazai laughed.

It became somewhat of a tradition. He didn’t give it a name, in fear of it sticking, and stealing the little motions Ango’s frame went through each time they met — clicking his tongue; studying his pupils; exchanging a look with Odasaku; saying, Dazai, in that way of theirs, that didn’t seem to hurry out of their mouth in horror — as if he was taking a never-taken-before decision.

It wasn’t the underside of a table, and it wasn’t a middle stool in the quietest bar in the world, but Dazai learned to exhale on his passenger seat, too — in the back ones, also, when he wanted to be aggravating.

He seldom not wanted to. It made Ango very entertaining; it made Odasaku not even blink, which was a challenge of its own.

“Why always the cliffs,” Ango muttered, a night like any other, hands tight around his steering wheel as he drove them away. “How many cliffs can there even be in a city?”

“You don’t have to worry,” Dazai let him know. He was huddled up on his seat, playing with the buttons of the man’s abandoned arm. Close enough to touch, he thought, through the haze of alcohol. Ango had been trying to get him to order tomato juice. Doesn’t mean you should touch. “I’d let you out, before I drive off. I need someone to pick the flowers for my funeral. Odasaku knows nothing of forget-me-nots.”

Ango didn’t say a word.

He waited. Pulled his buttons.

“What?” His tone was blank; his left lens was dirty. He didn’t stop him, when Dazai removed his glasses to clean them with his tie — he did slow down on the pedal. “Were you expecting me to humor you? I’m not Odasaku.”

Dazai rolled back on his seat; kicked his feet on the dashboard; kicked them down again. “You think he would let me drive it off?”

“Not at all,” Ango scoffed. “I think he would let you drive him all the way to the edge, get you all excited and immature, and then wrap you in a blanket to drag you away on the concrete.”

He stared. “He told you about the blanket?”

The man stared back. “He what?”

A week later, as they were waiting for him, Odasaku told him: “The barkeep believes you’re working through a meticulously planned route to get rid of Ango.”

He said it tonelessly — dishonest or not, it didn’t seem to matter. Dazai leaned his chin on his hand and drank every drop of his fascinating ease; wondered what it was like to be touched by it all and be devoid of any handprints. If Ango and Odasaku had ever had to answer to perplexed gazes, wondering about the sixteen years old hanging off their appreciation, or if they all knew him by name — if he would grow taller than them, eventually.

My friend, he heard Ango say, once, to a tired eyed Archivist.

“What do you think?” Dazai wondered.

Odasaku merely looked back.

The stairs creaked.

“Hello,” they said.

---

You might want to be careful, Mori told Elise, the first time he introduced her to him. It was less of a handshake-and-bow and more of two rats sizing each other up from opposite ends of a maze; they would end up sharing chips on the clinic bed. She couldn't gulp them down; he couldn't call himself realer than her. Dazai tends to linger.

He never got what he meant, not really — he didn't ask for an explanation. As summer brushed on his doorstep, back when only Odasaku was around, Dazai ran through the motions like he always had — pretended not to notice the questioning looks the man sent his way.

"You seem tired," Kouyou told him, instead.

The absence of her pupil, all the way to Europe — one of those facts Dazai kept in the back of his skull, and didn't think about, and didn't wonder about; the sun might have been stuck in the sky, but there was still no need to crank his neck back to check — certainly hadn't brought her focus back to Dazai.

Perhaps, he considered, she can't keep quiet in the face of his less dutiful breathing.

"Did Chuuya tell you about his new training regiment?" he replied, instead. "In motion up until you sent him away. Like the guard dog he is, he's decided to attack me whenever I enter his apartment —"

"You mean, break into —"

"— to test my reflexes or keep me vigil or make sure I learn something about self defense if I have to drown you in acid for it, partner —"

"That's a lie," she insisted, and she fixed a loose end of his eye bandages behind his ear, never touching skin — and Dazai was so used to being touched like he was real, these days, that her nonbeliever fingers almost seemed cruel. She wasn't, he knew — she was just drowning in midnight rain. She had nails printed on her arms from an old lesson's corpse; a new grave's one. "Chuuya wouldn't call you partner."

"But he really does that!" Dazai whined. "See? See? Look at these bruises. He put me in a chokehold three times in a single day — he almost stuck a knife in my knee," He sighed. He sighed a lot when Chuuya was involved — filled up the room until there was no space for his never-still fingers and the way his eyes liked to call him a liar. "Hitting right at his height."

Kouyou wasn't amused.

She forgot, all the same — or had the grace to pretend to.

To Hirotsu, after stealing his lighter and setting his new car on fire, having made him search for him all over the city, he said: “I have taken up the art of tip tap. Do not worry about my absence.”

Tanaki was still quiet.

Nonetheless — perhaps because of — when he sat under her desk and played at stealing her heels, he told her tales of his new friends. She listened. Dazai watched her eyebags grow deeper and disappear — a new look everyday. He had told Odasaku about how much blood her dress shirt had been soaked with, that day; had allowed Ango to write one of those mechanical eulogies of his, even if it was for a baby with no black blood.

The voice spread, despite the hungry thing under Dazai’s eyelids — despite the way Mori’s hands crossed on his desk, fingers dangling and nails searching, eyes ranking down his bored features like he was still looking for the gold he was owed.

He’d found it already. He was just scared of it.

The first time he heard a couple of subordinates whisper — what’s an Executive candidate doing with them? — Mori smiled, from the other end of his desk, and said: “I’m glad you’re enjoying yourself, Dazai.”

Here, he didn’t say. Here with me. Here with us. Here with the black blood you swear won’t be enough.

There was nothing to find in the Port Mafia. Dazai knew. He told it to Odasaku, three days tied in the creaking bed of his room; told it to Ango, a night he was almost not entirely faking the drunkenness. There is nothing to find, and I will lose it all the same.

There is nothing to find, the flickering lights of Bar Lupin reassured him, and Dazai would die in between the black blood puddles of his flagless syndicate.

---

...

---

Time was running out even as it breathed torturously deep — so deep it was heavier than the summer heat, stretching his limb like a cat under the sun; warmed whether it came from blood or blankets.

Dazai didn’t quite know what was at the end; only that he couldn’t wait for it, and that it would have been nice if the chase to the finish line were to last.

He dragged Odasaku up and down every road he had learned, and did nothing but marvel when the man revealed new ones he hadn't even suspected existed. He listened to tales of his assassin days with eyes that should have been enough to grant him his redemption — he pulled onto Ango's sleeve when the man hesitated in front of a bloodbath, and pretended he did not have a tendency to damn the better men.

He linked the men's arms with his own, and dragged them down the wooden stairs of the quietest bar on earth, and he breathed.

He watched paper lanterns lit up the sky, on a festival whose name he did not recall — and when the wooden platform shook under their feet, rattled by waves filled in pollution of desires falling from the sky; when he reached out with his fingers to touch the ripples in the water, deaf to Ango's warnings and burned by Odasaku's hands pulling the back of his clothes, Dazai could have almost believed his flesh wasn't soaked in nothing — but only loneliness.

"What did you wish for?" he asked, cleaning the ink stains on his fingers on Ango's sleeves. "I saw you write something down. Don't lie."

"Curry," Odasaku offered, obediently.

"Eh?" Dazai blinked. "What a strange guy. Ango, you don't happen to have wished for wine? We could make it a picnic."

"A break from you," the man mumbled. "And your snotty fingers. Odasaku, do not laugh — yes, that is a laugh for you — You're encouraging him —"

They didn't ask Dazai what he'd wished for; he was just superstitious enough to be glad for it. Fate was a web of crystallized tears and whatever intention was left from a careless Creation — it did not despise him, incapable as it was, but it would not put out the fire once Dazai's entire world was devoured by the flames.

Aren't you hungry?, they would ask him. He was familiar with their heat; he knew they would not burn him. They only knew how to take that which would leave him the emptiest — they only knew how to wait for his hands not to reach, but to have grasped.

"Let's come back here, next year," he said.

Aren't you starving?

"Spin me too," he ordered, one night, watching Odasaku put down a particularly loud child — not one of his, though; never, if there was blood — their tears all gone and their mind still salvageable — a witness to their interrogation of a drunken traitor.

Ango was calling the cleaning squad, phone held between only two fingers, in that way of his — he did nothing but sigh when the other man obediently picked him up from behind, and gave his best attempt at spinning his fragile bones. The game was not particularly fun; Dazai felt the man's heart beat against his back and laughed so hard his stomach hurt.

“Tell me more,” he whined to Ango, one night, kicking his stool, almost climbing all over him to sneak a look at the high secrecy documents in his bag. “Tell me more, tell me more, Mori would want me to know, you guys’ jobs are so fun, tell me more —“

Dazai pulled; Dazai got pulled. Companionship was a crime by unavoidable context; he awaited every occasion to drag the word friend out of the two men’s lips, and he sat on the vowels like a swing, dancing along with the wind of their sincerity. My friend, my friend, my friend.

There’s a life, somewhere, he told Odasaku. He longed for something different; he always would. There was nothing to find in the Port Mafia; he was a fish in a bowl with dying fins, and the water would never be so merciful as to turn its back on him. Nonetheless — there was a life, and when the stairs creaked under his shoes and both men offered him a hello, Dazai was close enough to touch it.

Not yours to have, she would have said. But all yours to touch. You can only pick one.

Longing for humanity was a crime by commutative property. For a breath, Dazai had it.

---

...

---

He didn’t get to keep it.

Chapter End Notes

hello there! if you’re still reading — damn. i wanted to thank you all for the nice words last chapter, they really painted a big smile on my face! i’m glad you guys are enjoying because i’ve written. well. far more for this than i probably should have had but YOU KNOW.

as you probably will have noticed, some parts of this chapter are heavily referring to “the day i picked up dazai”. if you’re wondering about the time placement of the interlude, know that there will be one at the end of every pov (the intention is to make 3 dazai povs and 3 chuuya povs, one for each year; though they will become shorter by arc because yk. narrative metaphor) and you can sort of see them as character studies that fluctuate in time? vaguely? for example, this one took some stuff from the next arc time, the dragon head conflict — when dazai and oda met ango.

nothing much more to say! i gotta say, this was one of my favorite chapters to write. i really love the lupin trio, and i think they’re some of the most heartbreaking content asagiri has come up with, and i think their relationship with dazai is so very easily — not misunderstood, but more like both lessened and intensified at the same time? by the fandom.

i’ll stop ranting!! i’m very excited for the new chapter/next arc. i feel like writing chuuya is so much fun and so much pain, i can’t wait to show you guys.

thank you so so so much for reading, and for the nice words, and for everything! i hope you continue to enjoy this, and do comment however often you want, it really does make me glad.

see you!!

IS

Chapter Summary

In Charleville-Mézières, a small, irrelevant town in northeastern France, there was a house of earthy bricks and rusty railings — with ivy-intertwined windows and a secret weapon storage, hidden under the welcoming mat. It was registered under a single name: Arthur Rimbaud.

Chapter Notes

see you later ;))

See the end of the chapter for more notes

act two

[un grand sommeil noir tombe sur ma vie]

---

In Charleville-Mézières, a small, irrelevant town in northeastern France, there was a house of earthy bricks and rusty railings — with ivy-intertwined windows and a secret weapon storage, hidden under the welcoming mat. It was registered under a single name: Arthur Rimbaud.

“Or Paul Verlaine, I suppose,” the landlord had mused, fiddling with the keys. Her French was a warm caress to his ears; her accent had stiffened his shoulders. “That’s the name he wrote in the contract, at least. But he insisted I referred to him as Rimbaud. And then his friend, the one who was always around — Inconnu, those two. A cousin, you said?”

Nakahara Chuuya hadn't said a thing.

The question of what the squad the Port Mafia had stanced in that corner of Europe had told the woman to get him that house remained — all he had was Mori's grin and his promises that he'd enjoy his latest mission quite a bit.

There was honor, he supposed, in being assigned overseas at such a young age — there was even more honor in receiving an ex-Executive-turned-traitor's keys for his stay. Be grateful — Hirotsu had told him, dragging him to the airport. Chuuya didn't remember the rest.

“Frère, madam,” he'd corrected the woman, ignoring the creaking the front door. The sound of money still startled him, at times; no matter the suits in his closet and the yen in his pockets that didn't need to be all scrunched up from a quick escape any longer. “I'm his brother.”

He hadn't spent hours on a plane wondering about what his future residence would look like, but as he stepped through it, the realization that it was exactly what he'd expected it to be was too stubborn to ignore. The walls were a gentle green, the floor wooden; every piece of furniture looked like something out of a museum, or one of those American Christmas movies Doc used to like.

Fireplaces were a gift of God, the man would say, sometimes, with that vaguely dreamy expression that made it difficult to understand if he was kidding or not.

The tick of a grandfather clock reminded him that it didn't quite matter anymore.

Several hours later, when he was down several layers of clothes and sitting on the ceiling, another female voice broke the quietness. “You must feel better, then, now?”

“I don't feel worse,” was his mumble, dust sticking to his gloves from the flower-shaped chandelier. He turned; offered a bow, as serious as almost mockery could be. “Ane-san. At your orders.”

A chuckle came from the front door. All he could see was the white-and-pink hem of her Western dress brushing the floor — the occasional glimpse of sandals; the tip of her umbrella dragging behind her steps.

She came to an alt right where he'd hoped she wouldn't: the bundle of ripped apart curtains and wooden edges from his fury rampage. She surveyed the mess the apartment had been reduced to — the broken furniture, the destroyed plates, the holes in the walls.

A hum. “On your feet, young man.”

Begrudgingly, he stood. When her fan tilted his chin up, he kept his eyes on that one mole she had between her flawlessly plucked eyebrows. Kisses from Benzaiten, Yuan would have called it.

[The first time he met Kouyou Ozaki, she laid the tip of her katana to his neck, vane as a victor, stepped right on the chasm the gravity he called a slave and a friend and a limitation had cracked into the earth, and said — behave].

“So,” No signs of her chained state from less than two weeks ago showed on the Executive’s face. Recovery was just another kanzashi to her — another golden thing she would await admiration for. Only her hair tickled the small of her back, free from its usual decorations — subtly, almost too much to ignore, the long strands covered human nails shaped marks on her upper arms. “Did it make you feel better?”

He was hard pressed to answer. The top of his hat barely reached Kouyou’s shoulders. Out of one of the windows he’d slammed his fist into, the moon shone mockingly back at his silence.

There were pictures in that house. Countless pictures, mostly hidden inside dusty boxes in the one bedroom he’d found — with the two small beds pushed a bit too close, a wardrobe full of clothes he hadn’t been able to tear apart, notebooks on notebooks he couldn’t touch without a heart wrenching guilt locking his insides down.

Blonde hair, confused smiles and serious eyes. You know, she’d told him, you truly look alike.

“Not really,” he said, finally.

Kouyou lowered her fan. Something changed in her posture; an imperceptible shiver of her shoulders. Chuuya had learned this language among too many others — his eyes left her mole and landed on her own; a clear insubordination.

“You will fix this,” she said, a twinkle of hilarity — and it wasn’t a question, but it wasn’t an order either. “How can you not long for a bit of peace, I wonder, after everything?”

“Do you want me to implode?” he huffed, hiding the ounce of discomfort under his dirty nails; where the blood and the earth would cover it. They spasmed a single inch, as if offended by their body’s own truth. Chuuya tasted artificial lighting.

Her eyes softened. “Shall I assume I have gained your forgiveness?”

“There was never anything to forgive,” he brushed it off. Concern was a delicate thing, and his hands had never been good at staying still. He tried again: “It wasn’t your fault.”

“That is —” Her mouth curled down. “Debatable.”

“You told me not to blame myself for the information I allowed to get out,” he insisted. “I don’t see why you should be allowed to blame yourself for bringing me to her.”

Quicker than the wind, crisps appeared in the clear waters of her eyes; they were unreachable, but he brushed against them all the same. “Your wisdom is admirable. Where did you learn it?”

“Don’t push it,” he muttered.

[“How did you do it, anyway?” Chuuya had asked her; in a hospital bed he was already plotting ways to escape from. The question had seemed useless, but somehow necessary.

“Do it?” Kouyou had blinked.

“Capture me,” he’d clarified. “Do you remember? Did she tell you?”

She’d tightened her lips. “Poison.”

For some reason, it had taken him by surprise. “Poison?”

“To paralyze your muscles and make sure your Ability wouldn’t activate automatically, to defend you,” she’d specified. “Boss has an — inclination, for poisons. I’m sure he could tell you more about it.”]

Of all the ways he’d imagined he could be dealt with — the theories keeping the Sheep’s eyes open at night, the scenarios he’d hummed as he hid his hands in his pockets — poison seemed too quiet. A bit too gentle for a god of destruction. He had always assumed he’d die haunted and devastating — cursed by Arahabaki’s disgust at his lack of foresight.

Maybe that thing wouldn’t even let him die. Maybe he was bound to lose every last inch of himself — watch it float away with his blood; leave a pale puppet for Arahabaki to jump on trees and break the ground with.

Fight me for it, he dared.

Kouyou’s mirth brought him back. “Assuming you find time, seeing how busy you are.”

“You’re the one giving me missions,” Chuuya reminded her, the tiniest bit petulant.

“Now — Mori’s the one giving me missions to give you.” She fixed his jacket on his shoulders, eyeing the fabric. “You know, France is the perfect place to find a new style. Something more adept to — hypothetical upcoming promotions.”

His ears perched. “So I was right. This mission is —“

“This mission is no different from other missions you’ve received,” Kouyou interrupted him, tapping two fingers on his chin. “Be grateful to have been chosen. Establish new deals with companies the Nine Rings’ made us betray. Look for possibly interesting recruits. Guide the men that have been given to you wisely.”

Annoyingly enough, the last part of the speech made him flinch. Somewhere inside his duffel bag was his destroyed, overfilled cell phone — Koda was terrified by airplanes; Noguchi had yet to stop huffing about Tsuchiya’s absence — undeterred by Chuuya’s promises that none of them knew where she was, you need to shut the fuck up.

There was an entire sky to take in — the same as in Yokohama, but differently framed. If he had cared enough to, Chuuya could have studied his men’s eyes and written down just who was waiting for him to tear that new sky apart, as well.

Voices are more useful than most weapons, Lippman used to tell him, whenever a new movie had him change his hair. In bloodied matters or elsewhere.

Why are you telling me that, was usually his reply, a tad too blank.

Because there's a metaphor.

No, Iceman would huff. You just want us to compliment your new hair.

Mori was plotting something. He hadn't needed Kouyou's smiles to know; hadn't needed to be told why he was being sent away. He knew what they would talk about, back home.

Absence makes the heart grow fonder!, the most detested voice in Chuuya's auditory repertoire echoed — a perfect rendition of the one text he'd refused to answer to. As such, I propose you never return.

They eat slugs there, by the way. I'd be careful, if I were you.

Chuuya turned, leaning down to pick a fallen painting up. The colors were delicate and old — a portrayal of one of the endless near-Paris fields. The protection glass had been cracked by his pointless, still breathing rage; obediently, without wondering to whom, he dragged his finger down that earthquake line.

“Don't worry,” he assured, watching particles of dust stuck to his glove. “It'll go like all the other missions have.”

Kouyou enjoyed confidence, so she smiled. Chuuya didn't watch her twirl around the house, uncaringly floating over his messes and dragging her hands up and down fine furniture. On the glass of the painting, his reflection smiled at him.

His mouth stayed still.

Nonetheless, there was pressure on his lips — constant pressure, a wild heartbeat that didn't come from that thing he could only suppose he had, inside his chest. Ropes pulling the corner of his lips, stretching them out, dripping blood whose taste he could remember too well to pretend he'd dreamed it. In any case, Chuuya didn't dream.

The scars on his reflection blinked at him. Their shape interested him — spirals stabbed by spears; or maybe eyes, or maybe something he wasn't supposed to understand. They bled liquid fire down the glass of the painting, winked savagely at him. More, more, more.

More what?, he asked. Arahabaki didn't need words, and he didn't care for them in the least. His language was pulse and the sounds inside his hollow bones. More, more, what more could you ever want?

It was a complicated thing, realizing the hunger inside you wasn't yours. Explaining it to an eight years old who was always starving had been harder, though. Chuuya had wandered with a tattered military uniform, and he hadn't known what food was, but he'd wanted it. He'd been attacked and he'd killed them all, and he'd left less famished.

At that point, if the body and the mind and the hunger had to be shared, they could share the solution as well.

“Ane-san,” he called. He knew that his reflection would be normal, once he returned to it; uninterested, he threw the painting on the ground. “Ane-san, what did Mori do with Verlaine’s body?”

Kouyou paused.

Her profile was his to study, immobilized as she was over a beautifully decorated library. A current of wind ruffled her eyelashes, readjusted her eyes; when she met his gaze, Chuuya felt an uncomfortable need to kneel again.

“Chuuya,” she chirped, not with her Executive voice, not with her Ane-san voice. It was the whispers next to his hospital bed, as she tickled his palm and told him about his victories. “Do not ask me again.”

Some lifetimes later, she kissed his forehead and left. The tingle left by her lips was different from the tingle on every inch of his body — but threats couldn’t all look the same. And if some of them were warm — he would take them.

He fixed the mess he’d made. Not all of it — not without pausing to think about the things in his hands, throwing them again. Grabbed a pair of scissors, cut off spider webs from the corners of the ceiling. By the time he’d reached the bedroom, his hands had found the pictures again, and his reflection was still grinning in the oval shaped window.

Verlaine was smiling, too.

No teeth and no blood and no honesty; see, I told you we don’t look alike. Chuuya dragged his nails down the paper, uselessly. His cell phone was face down on the nightstand, bright with his men’s requests. Kouyou’s scent lingered in the air. The bed was unkempt. His friends were all dead.

No point in a copy that doesn’t look the same, Pianoman used to say, bent over a table, studying his counterfeit money like super-notes could stare back. Chuuya had watched him delay projects of weeks, all because he wasn’t satisfied. If it’s not real, then it should at least be useful.

Surrounded by a red glow, his fist drew a new hole in the ajar door of the closet. Arahabaki thought about bread — thought about Beatrice’s skin. Cursing all his graves out, he dragged a shirt down.

---

FIVE WEEKS LATER

---

---

chapter xi.

---

Case number: 10034566

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Nakahara C. returned from [...]*

Report 355B. — Nakahara C.

Location: Paris, France.

Object: Kajii Motojirō [Affiliations: Maruzen Building Bombing; two years prior Report. Victims: 28.].

[...] on the matter of Kajii ~~do you want me to fucking kill you~~ the recruitment of Kajii Motojirō — birth name: Moriyama Motojirō; son of chemical weapon manufactures, ~~yes asshole I do have to write all of this it's literally your evil back story give me the pen,~~ only nineteen when he caused the death of twenty eight people in the terroristic attack to the Maruzen Building ~~yes, god, get off, I do remember it, Yuan and I watched it on a~~

~~stolen TV — what do you mean “if she enjoyed it?” It’s lemon-shaped bombs, they’re pathetic.~~

~~Following the complicated conflict that led us to establishing contact with the man yes I do have to refer to you impersonally, shut up, we were able to gather some more information on his past two years of lay-low — after being identified and disowned by his parents, no I will not write that they were traitorous slugs eaters, I saw you eat slugs he escaped to Europe, where he set up a business of mercenary weapon fabrication.~~

~~He has accepted to join the ranks of the Port Mafia, promising us unwavering loyalty — granted he will receive absolute protection from the national authorities. You can ask them about the private laboratory yourself, go fuck yourself.~~

~~As for the damages and losses the man’s recruitment caused, my next report will go in more depth about it. If you don’t stop gloating I will defenestrate you a third time. A third time. Do you even understand how insane it is that I had to do it three times? As for now, let it be known up to ten members of the squad will return to Yokohama sooner than first predicted — they fell victims to unexpected bombs.~~

~~No I don’t care if we startled you — No I don’t care if you’re sorry? I had to chase you across the roofs of fucking half of Paris, got myself arrested, cracked a dome at the Louvre, — Give me back that fucking pen or I swear to God I’m leaving you here to the gendarme’s rage —~~

~~In any case, Kajii Motojirō was acquired successfully. Touching on man-power [...]~~

---

...

---

Yokohama was made for the night.

It’s easier to steal, and it makes adults stupid, Chuuya used to explain, wise and self-assured, to the wide eyes that never vanished from his frame — nine and tall for his age, and not quite adept to the concept of being surveilled, rather than enjoyed.

Anyway, Shirase would have muttered, had he voiced that particular discovery, eyes can do more than one thing.

Suribachi City had no roofs. It had plastic bags and safety sheets, and, if one was very lucky, a loose metal panel from The End — the almost affectionate, but always spat name the settlement had given to the creation of the crater.

Chuuya used to perch anyway — unable to stay still or on the ground for too long, not when there was a wider view to take in; not when there was a better perspective to watch out from. There were better things to spend his memory on — rations and stolen guns and the specific brand of car toys the kids liked; formulas no one had quite told him existed but the gravity around him had taught him; voices from years he did not remember, but could have .

There were better things — but it was the way his city looked at night that he had never forgotten.

“Are you insane?” Motojirō Kajii hissed, the moment they were reunited at the Gates of the Narita Airport again. The midnight crowd was just sluggish enough to swarm them less viciously, on its race to the blurred lights of the exit; Kajii was rattling him. “How many laws did that stunt break? How did you not get — I don’t know , sucked into the stratosphere? Pants flying off as you scream, aaaah! You know?”

“If you could stop shaking me like a present,” Chuuya muttered, through gritted teeth and a sore throat.

Despite the stiffness of his limb and the taste of cold air, the sitting on the plane wing trick never really got boring — it had stolen his breath when he was nine and stubbornly set on proving Yuan wrong about the texture of the stars; it stole it a bit more whenever he saw the fireflies-littered ground of Yokohama shatter the clouds, pulling at the roots of his lungs like a long forgotten anchor.

Nothing easier to miss than the ground, Albatross used to huff, glaring at the infinity over a helicopter window. Direct him a glance; laugh. Unless it’s you, I suppose.

“What’s the principle behind it, anyway?” the scientist insisted, working his long legs to catch up with Chuuya’s sudden urgency. He could see the city flicker behind the glass doors and the tired workers; couldn’t shake off the feeling that they looked nothing like the ones he had blinked at for weeks.

“Like, how do you make up for the heavy pressure of air on your squirt body?” His tone would have fit just fine in his so-called, Scientist Supernova — a basement littered in projects, chemicals and lemon trees. “How do you keep your feet anchored without pulling the plane down? Shouldn’t the increase of your gravitational mass be unbearable for the wing? Could your Ability pull the plane down? Or does being a squirt —“

His head pounded. “I’m not a squirt,” Chuuya stepped on his sandaled foot, accelerating at his yelp. “You bowl-looking freak.”

“Ouch!” Kajii screamed, on the other side of the Gates, ignoring the blinking glances of the crowd. You’re gonna need to shut the fuck up, Chuuya had told him, upon their offer to join. Learn subtlety. In case you missed what it is that we do. “You could have given me foot cancer, you imbecile!”

“That’s not a thing!” Chuuya called back, trying to remember that — for a six foot tall man that never took off his goggles and referred to death as the ultimate experiment — Kajii had a surprisingly acceptable personality, when he wasn’t leaning into his dramatics.

“Something died down there, dude! And it’s not a bone!”

His phone was vibrating in his pocket — his eyes were drinking in every kanji on the directions, every heavy-accented vowel out of the sleepy people he was pushing through. He stalked forward, inhaling.

The wall of Police Officers stopped him.

Their uniforms were matted in sweat, and their ears deaf to the curious crowd’s questioning; Chuuya squinted through the indistinguishable rows of calming arms, attempting to find the beacon of the officers’ concerned mutters — all he found, were a pair of familiarly frowning eyes.

“Here,” Chuuya said, cutting through the flow of Kajii’s incessable whines, throwing him his ringing phone. “Answer that. I’ll be back.”

“What?”

A silhouette of dark hair and a white dress vanished through the crowd, tearing her papers out of Officer Matsuda’s hands right as Chuuya stole the man’s report from his hands. “Hey, you —” His eyebags-lined gaze found him as he backed away, dossier in hand; he blinked. “Kid. You’re back.”

“What kind of disappearances are we even talking about?” he questioned, eyes on the typed report from the last month’s suspicious activity. The man followed; Chuuya didn’t stop until a pillar was against his back — because he knew how to deal with his type. “Murders? Ransoms?”

“The young girls and women kind,” the man replied, attempting to tear the report out of his grasp. “And this is private information.”

“My contacts have been teasing me about this weird stuff that’s been happening while I was gone,” he replied, raising his arm higher. “I’m just trying to get some more details before they can offer them.”

Matsuda made a face. “Your contacts.”

“Yes.”

“At the — What was it, jewelry store?”

“They love some current history. So?”

He managed to wrangle the report out of his grasp, clicking his tongue against the roof of his mouth. The officers were still surveying the crowd, diligently searching through bags and hat-wearing women — Matsuda’s breath smelled of coffee, the way it did when he could only afford to visit Suribachi on the weekends.

“Where have you been?” he asked, at last, running his eyes down his frame. “You look fancy. Haven’t seen you around in so long, I almost sent a search party to Mori Corp.”

“Unofficial vacation time,” Chuuya lied. He petted his waistcoat, allowing the man to pull ever-so lightly on the black ribbon under his collar. He couldn’t remember the last time he hadn’t worn a jacket of some type over his clothes — the heat had rolled his sleeves up, though, trying to find a match that wouldn’t bother his necessarily gloved hands. “Glad to know you like it.”

“As long as you didn’t steal it. It would certainly be a change.”

“I did take inspiration from a dead man’s closet,” he deadpanned.

An unamused stare. “I tried asking around for you, you know? After that mess — You could have let me know you were leaving the city.”

Chuuya made a face. “Don’t push it.”

“You know, that boy of yours got himself arrested a good seven times.”

For a single, absurd moment, spurred by habit and the Suribachi sunshade, he thought he was talking about Shirase. The flash of irritation through his veins corrected him. “He’s not my —“

“He stole your mugshot,” Matsuda said. “I think he made it his lockscreen.”

“That’s great,” he muttered, willing his teeth not to break as they gritted. “Well? What about the disappearances? I don’t have all night.”

The man studied him, teeth munching on a scar on the side of his mouth. He was pretty sure one of the Sheep had given it to him — strangely, he would have also bet it hadn’t been intentional. Despite Chuuya’s nastiest warnings, the youngest kids had a tendency to hang off the two policemen who brought sweets and Orphanage options.

Perhaps, Chuuya used to consider — but only when he was lucky enough to get an entire night to himself; perched where none of the kids could catch a look at whatever his face was doing — Perhaps, they would be better off if I let them.

Inconsequential thinking. In spite of it all — if Chuuya cried wolf, the Sheep would always hide.

“The Bishop’s Staff,” Matsuda huffed, once he got tired of Chuuya’s unblinking, waiting stare. His voice had an uncomfortable spot in the deepest roads of his skull — something always wet with the iron-tasting rain of Suribachi City, and lined by the irritating screech of Shirase’s jacket zipper. ““You heard of them?”

His eyebrows’ brushed his hairline. From his experience, and the numerous collaborative missions he had taken part to — members of the Five Moons knew better than to specifically target civilians. Under some point of views, they existed specifically for that purpose — keeping the blood, while inevitable, away from the sidewalks.

“It might be nothing,” the man admitted. “I don’t have anything concrete pointing towards them, really — We don’t have enough numbers to consider this an emergency yet. I simply

—“

“Want to be prepared, for once?”

He expected a dirty glance. All he found in the man’s eyes was a contained sort of tiredness.

“I’m glad you’re back, Chuuya,” The touch of his hand pushed his hat further down his head; through the silver of the dangling chain, the air was shattered by the heat, trembling painfully over Officer Matsuda’s most forced smile. “Yokohama doesn’t taste the same without you.”

Something twisted, between the bullet scars distraction had stained his sternum with. Clearing his throat scratched it to raw skin; he pulled his hat down, stepping away from his reach. “Yeah, yeah, don’t get too excited about —“

“Yo, Chuuya!” Kajii called, tripping over a pair of abandoned suitcases in his hurry to get to him. “Who’s Mimiko, and why is she demanding I cut your balls off for standing her up?”

Chuuya turned to face him so fast his head spun. “What?”

“Are you finally dating, Chuuya?” Matsuda said, his gasp lined in something too excited to fit with the dried blood stains on his sleeves. “I can hardly believe you — Dear God, kid, you would think Murase had taught you better than to stand sweet ladies up —“

“Also, a certain Okowa? She’s begging you for another chance,” Kajii insisted, as he leaned all his weight on his side, wildly clicking on random buttons of his destroyed phone. A voice — female and distinctively desperate — prayed instinctively through the intercom, ill-fitted over the dangling phone charms. “Broke my eardrums about it, too. Japanese ladies! How I’ve missed them. Seriously, though, what’s this double suicide business they keep mentioning —“

A jolt of electricity straightened his spine.

“Oh, yes, I almost forgot,” Matsuda spoke up, very slowly, as he squinted in Kajii’s direction — the expression of someone sure he was supposed to know who was in front of him. “Did you see the fliers yet?”

---

...

---

Despite the pungent smell of night, the air outside was unbearably, viscidly warm — slowing down every movement and making steps squeak with sweat, as Chuuya stalked to the nearest

Times And Planes panel, blinking brightly against the darkness of disappearing cars and aching known skyscrapers.

Through the wet pages of newspapers, only barely hanging to the panel, a distinctively newer flier caught their attention.

“No way!” Kajii roared in laughter. “That’s a funny coincidence. Oi, look how many of them — Did they fill up the airport or what?”

From a biological point of view, Doc had explained, once, through medical checks Chuuya had offhandedly mentioned never receiving, Anger is useful. It makes your brain shunt blood away from the guts and towards the muscles, preparing you for a possible physical exertion.

So I can fuck shit up when I want to?, he’d grunted, tired of the lecture that a lecture was not, not exactly — because the Flags didn’t work like that, but they didn’t exactly know how to work with him either.

I’m saying getting angry would do you good, Doc had replied, easily, because he had a tendency for the unexpected. You should try it, sometimes.

Endlessly calm, Chuuya reached forward, tearing the flier off the wall.

Kajii’s high-pitched shouts started at some indistinct point, between the first webs of cracks opening under his companion’s steps — spreading towards the rows of black vans on the other side of the parking lot — and the hole the crumpled up flier tore into the nearest wall, shining red as it landed in Chuuya’s hands again, raining debris on their shoes.

“Dude,” the man squealed, attempting to extract the edge of his sandal from a particularly wide crack, “Dude! This is public property!”

“You set off lemon bombs at the Louvre,” Chuuya hissed, merciless, tearing open the door of the nearest Port Mafia seal-marked car. “That,” he breathed, almost ripping the flier in his urgency to study it again, “Motherfucker.”

Kajii barely managed to land on his seat, before he shut his own door, shaking the whole vehicle. The driver didn’t say a word — cautious eyes followed him through the rear view mirror, though.

“To the Headquarters,” he snapped, voice low. “Thank you. Before I do something I regret.”

“You’re —“ the man started, hesitantly.

“What?”

“ — Rengoku, you’re —“

He stiffened.

Usefulness, Pianoman tutted — somewhere between his ribs; somewhere under the edges of his hair, right where he still didn’t know if he would let them regrow or keep away from mirrors. He had always grinned a tad too composesly, for a man with teeth sharper than promises. In all you hate.

“Want me to,” Chuuya muttered, tongue between his teeth, “Drive in your stead, or are you going to go?”

Even Kajii had fallen quiet — the line of his shoulders a tad less obnoxious, as he dropped the act just enough to remind the air of his penchant for details. Chuuya didn’t meet his gaze; he kept it in the rear view mirror, watching the driver consider his chances.

“Sir,” he said, eventually, very quiet.

The roundabout out of the Airport and into Yokohama only electrified his fingers again, pulling their rage by the nails. It seemed every flat surface had been plastered in copies of the flier in his hands — so unrealistically many of them, he wouldn’t have believed their realness, had Kajii not been gaping at every turn.

Yokohama was darker than ink — the cars slumped forward in a lazy urgency, framed by old flickering lights and new colorful neon signs, shimmering vainly under the first decorations for the summer festivals. It pulsed under his feet, no matter the metal under his soles; it hummed like a heartbeat, embracing him with no request.

Home, it promised. The most rest he had ever been allowed. You’re home.

It was beautiful enough to settle some missing part of Chuuya’s lungs — his ticking eye made it all blurrier than it should have been.

“I will crush his lungs,” he promised to the paper, his voice unrecognizable to his own ears. “I will pour liquid metal inside those dirty, disgusting bones of his — Stick a fucking magnet to the bottom of the bay, and laugh as he gets crushed in a million little pieces, like the mountain of horse shit he is —“

“Chuuya,” Kajii insisted, gulping. “It’s just a dog. You need to breathe, man.”

His car window exploded.

The driver flinched badly enough for the car to screech against the concrete. Chuuya didn’t even bother to shake off glass pieces from his lap.

“Just a dog?” he spelled out, slowly turning to look at him. “A dog called Chuuya? Who’s been,” He didn’t even bother lowering his eyes, “Missing for almost two months? Wears a black collar, you will probably recognize him by the unbearable smell of sheep excrement. If found, please do not contact me, and gently throw him from the nearest window. Worry not; he’ll grow wings —“

“I mean, it’s a bit eccentric —“

“It’s his fault!” Chuuya snapped, crumpling it up again. “Him and his stupid obsession with that lost Arcade game, which I didn’t even lose, by the way — A pathetic prank from a busybody who’s got nothing better to do —“

“Who are you even talking about —“

“That bastard!” Ignoring the man’s small scream when the shining paper landed on his lap, he leaned forward between the seats. “Can’t you go faster? ”

“I would, sir,” the driver assured, as flatly as he could. “Today’s traffic has been slowed down by the accident, though.”

He paused. “Accidents?”

Miraculously on cue, breaking through the soft jazz playing from the car radio, the low voice of a reporter sizzled through statics: “— believe electrical support should arrive in minutes. As all listeners will know, this will be today’s thirteenth intervention by the technicians, who have not yet found an explanation for the traffic lights frenzies Yokohama has been —“

“It has caused more than one accident,” the driver summed up, carefully threading through the outskirts of the city. “The streets have been clogged with ambulances since lunchtime.”

“That’s raw, ” Kajii whistled, plastering his nose on the car window. “How many victims?”

“Up to forty in the last six hours, sir.”

The man oh-oh- ed, excited.

Chuuya plastered his nose against the car window, studying the endless lines of traffic, climbing all the way to the center — dots of bright lights and tired arms, dangling from the windows. “Can the electricity system malfunction on such a wide scale?”

“Apparently. Let’s just hope — ”

He heard the rumble of the motorcycles before he saw them; throwing himself forward, he grabbed the steering wheel from the driver’s hands, vertiginously steering them out of their way. Kajii screeched — the car drew donuts on the road, its lights blinding some upcoming cars, landing them against the nearest bench over the scream of horns.

“What the fuck!” Kajii snapped, back on his car door, eyes wider than even his goggles.

“What the fuck, what the fuck — and I thought French people didn’t know how to — Left!”

The driver took the steering wheel back, landing them into the main street again, just in time to escape an upcoming ambulance. Chuuya’s head bumped so painfully against the headrest he bit his tongue to blood, cursing out.

Ambulances ran past them, their lights and sirens deafening over Kajii’s French soliloquy; the driver sprinted towards the closest traffic light — stuck blaring off all three of its colors.

“Ah,” the man said. “Well.”

Chuuya — whose license had been gifted by Albatross’ drunken hands, under the promise to one day teach him enough to make do — stared at the emergency lights over his head, and asked: “What do you do in this situation?”

“Pray,” he offered.

They slipped down a side road so fast, loose pieces of trash entered through the windows, all of it framed by Kajii’s nauseatingly loud begging — when a familiar flier plastered itself in the middle seat between them, dread filled Chuuya’s lungs.

Upside down vehicles and exasperatingly screaming pedestrians filled his visual field; with no forewarning, he threw himself forward again, reclaiming the steering wheel.

“Sir!” the driver stuttered.

“Traffic light,” he snapped. “I need a damn traffic light.”

Kajii laughed, hysterical. “There is certainly many —“

“Closer!”

His laser-focused intent blurred out most of the protests he received, as the driver obediently drove them close enough to sporadic traffic lights for Chuuya to hang out of his window, studying their flickering, seemingly random rhythm. Find certainty in proof, Kouyou always said — so he did not drop back into his seat until the seventh traffic light confirmed his theory.

“Give me that,” he ordered, as Kajii handed over the crumpled flier on the car floor. The habit of keeping a pen up his sleeve came from Doc — the ability not to dig holes in the paper as he wrote down, he hoped, from Lippman. “Fucking bitch. What does it say? B-R-I-D-G-E. Last to reach the —“

“Chuuya,” Kajii cut through, watching a woman kick the side of her upside down vehicle. “What the fuck is going on.”

“Green, green, red, yellow, blue — what? There are a shit ton of bridges in this city...”

A motorcycle accelerated in front of them. “Chuuya!”

“Bridge, bridge, bridge —” he mumbled, eyes running down the flier in his hands. “Smell, Nakahara Chuuya, window —“ He stopped.

Horns blared; the driver stepped on the sidewalk to miss a truck’s unannounced turn at the roundabout. “Is this — an enemy attack, sir?”

“Closest thing,” he snarled. “Wing. He’ll grow wings — the Tsurumi Tsubasa Bridge. ”

“What?” Kajii reached for the flier, the look in his eyes turning serious. “But that’s where —“

“Where you launched your first ever death experiment?” Chuuya crushed the paper in his hands. “Figures. Driver, get us there.”

The Tsurumi Tsubasa Bridge — or Wing Bridge, as most of the foreign settlement of Suribachi City referred to it — was a cable-stayed bridge in the western side of the Yokohama Bay. According to Albatross' sing-songs, during their bloodied escapes under the bridge, it brushed the length of eight hundred feet.

When their car finally climbed on its blindingly illuminated road, Chuuya set his eyes on the dark waters underneath, washed in emergency lights and the peculiar shade of a city's exasperation.

Yokohama knows we have a pin for destroying it, Iceman used to say. And it knows we'd die to protect it. Exasperation makes sense. Like a mother with her kids.

On top of the railing, surrounded by enough concerned, calming-arms-sporting passersby it seemed intentional, a coat-wearing silhouette had his arms spread, facing the void.

“Shit, shit, hey, stop,” Kajii jolted forward, “Is that guy gonna jump?”

Chuuya breathed out. “If I have any say in it.”

His door was thrown open long before the car had stopped, much to the driver's startled surprise — ignoring the protests from the endless rug of uninterested vehicles running forward, and the blaring horns directed to the parked car of some well-intentioned fools, he ran down the bridge at full speed, flier tight inside his fist.

“Don't you dare, jackass!” he screamed, as he pushed his way through the crowd.

The wind cut him into incandescent slices, trying to tear his hat off his head. According to the smile that slowly appeared in front of him, that was part of the plan.

He saw him for less than a blink — a vision of the whitest bandages and the widest smile, not possibly any less bothered by the screams being torn out of the passersby's throats; saw something different in his clothes, and thought, delirious, did he dress up for this shit?

Merely a blink. With an obnoxious wave of his fingers, Dazai Osamu bowed to the crowd, spine as straight as only Mori's presence made it — and he took a step in the emptiness.

---

...

---

Chuuya had never feared drowning.

Water and Upon The Tainted Sorrows were not quite the most compatible combinations; all he had learned about breaking the surface had never been lit in the sizzling crimson of his Ability. If he squinted, hands severing the storm of bubbles and burning with the impact of landing, he swore he could see the reassuring glint of Albatross' braid — the way the fur of his coat used to float, framing a smile that not even the polluted waters could saw.

If you're leaving with the easy way out, he would say, soaked shoe blocking his apartment door from being shut, forcing himself in Chuuya's space like a persistent firefly. Where will you bleed all the excitement out?

One couldn't see the sea from Suribachi. In Chuuya's memories — or the fragmented glints that passed for it, metal-tasting and rusted — there was a bubbles-less water, blacker than ink, and the cold certainty of not having to do a thing.

Then had come Dante.

[Suribachi had nothing to drown in but earth. He hadn't realized there was something to fear — not until he had met his reflection through the glass of a tank, and realized he, too, had been dying, once].

“Let go!” Dazai screeched, throat choked by the deadly grip Chuuya had on his tie collar, dragging him up the cobblestones of the riverbank. They were drenched enough to gain a thousand pounds; even the warm summer air was making his teeth chatter. “Let go, you selfish, tiny, opportunistic brute!”

“Selfish,” Chuuya echoed, heaving, by the time his shaking boot managed to land on the concrete. He dropped on all fours, spitting out the disgustingly flavored water of the river. “Selfish. I'm actually going to kill you.”

Star fishing under a flickering light pole, all the boy did was kick his legs out, whining.

In the text box labeled Mackerel in his phone there were exactly three conversations dating to the time Chuuya had spent in France. A three days belated wish of never-return, promptly answered with a picture of a middle finger; a four hours long, one-topic-focused conversation, sparkled to life by Dazai's, thoughts on Miso soup? text — and, lastly, a yet unanswered question: what did you see in Dante's limbo?

Chuuya blamed that disintoxication — easier than questioning the panting glance he darted in the boy's direction, dragging it down changes five weeks shouldn't have made that evident.

Under purplish eyebags, he sported a new collection of bruises, most of them shaped like the recoil of a gun — all the naked skin offered to the moonlight was a painful shade of sunburn red, particularly vivid over the bridge of his nose. His new arm cast was soaked, signed by handwritings he didn't recognize. His hair had grown too long; he was holding it back with an astonishing number of childish-shaped hair clips.

The gun he kept in the back of his pants had slithered to his side — the metal was stained in recently dried blood.

Have you lost weight?, he almost questioned — a clear sign of water in his brain. Shaking his head as roughly as possible, he snapped: “Is your nevrotic ass aware that you caused a city scale emergency to play charades? ”

“Technically,” Dazai heaved, slightly dazed eyes to the sky. His face was a known landscape; Chuuya’s skin sizzled where he had touched his naked own, electrified in the numbing silence it had almost learned to unlearn. He pretended not to see his side glance to his thumbs’ spasms. “We were playing Flashing Lights. ”

“Sure. Yes. Of course. And the fucking fliers?”

He beamed. “Did you like them? I wasn’t informed of your departure until you were already yipping around the Champs d’Élysées, so I had to act on your return instead — Took me and Odasaku all night to put them up! I hope you appreciated it.”

Something tickled his stiffened shoulders. A note too sweet on teeth too sharp; ill-fitted warm hands attached to a corpse’s wrists.

Odasaku?

“Well? ” Dazai insisted. “Did you? Did the French air splatter your last brain cell? ”

“Dude! ”

Kajii’s lab coat was the brightest thing the water sticking his eyelashes together allowed him to see; he watched him stumble down the hill — the expression widening every inch of his face borderline psychotic.

“What the fuck,” he chanted, the moment his sandals raised a cloud of dust over their bodies. “What the fuck. Were you trying to impress me? I already told you, I’ve jumped down my fair share of bridges — That’s what La Seine is for! You left the crowd speechless, though! Pretty sure a good number of them cried. The other half is calling an Ambulance, so you may want to —” His smile lit up, upside down and too wide. “Hey. Hey, ” His voice lowered in a stage whisper. “Since he’s, like — Suicidal and all. Can you ask your friend if he’d be willing to pose as an experiment for my research of scientific death?”

Dazai sat up quickly enough to scratch his hands. “Are you serious?” he gasped. “You want to kill me?”

“Sure!”

“Painlessly?”

“That —” Kajii cleared his throat. “May vary.”

He clearly didn’t need anything more — he stood up, dragging the scientist further down the riverbank by his scarf, motioning animatedly over the man’s excited skips. Chuuya dropped face first into the earth again, chest heaving, teeth gritted.

“...and it makes sense. right? Because if we assume your Ability allows you not to die because of those lemon shaped bombs of yours, then it means your bombs should kill on impact. I’m assuming we need to consider a window of survival — Ten, fifteen percent? It’s somewhat high, yes, but attempts are the blades of the dragonhearts. If we consider —”

“Do you believe death is inevitable?” Kajii asked, not sparing Chuuya a glance as he climbed to his feet.

Irked, Dazai pulled at the soaked band of his arm cast and huffed: “Obviously.”

“But why?”

“Because life is,” he replied, blinking. “And they’re the same.”

“How is life inevitable?”

“Because I’m here, right now,” He brushed the matter off. “Now. About my suicide —”

“Leave the newbie alone,” Chuuya cut through, pulling Dazai back from the belt of his coat, ignoring his yelp to squint at Kajii’s over excited frame. “Sorry about the detour, man. If the driver’s still there, just ask him to drop you off at Building Three — Boss got an office for you.”

“Newbie?” Kajii echoed, clearly insulted. “I was staging terrorist attacks when you were still in a cradle, you squirt.”

His temples pulsed. “You’re a foot fungus.”

“Excuse me?”

From where he was gleefully attempting to tear Chuuya’s shoelaces off, Dazai laughed, delighted. “Fungus? Is it because of his stupid hair?”

Chuuya gulped back a, I know, right?. Kajii spluttered. “I have been nothing but a blast —”

“The only blast you’ve caused,” he let him know, stepping close enough to study his own drenched reflection in his goggles, “Is the one that diverted ten of my men’s trains off the rails —”

“Well, that was before — Once you got me on board, we had fun —”

“You waking me up at the crack of dawn to talk about the way the industry is tainting the true nature of lemons is no entertainment, believe me on this —”

“And what did you give me back?” Kajii insisted, arms flagging around. “Fake stories! Lies over lies! I offered you my most sincere retelling, and you kept me up all night to discuss the pet crocodile you had to defeat to join the Mafia —”

“That was a true story,” Chuuya insisted, undeterred. “It’s part of the entrance exam.”

“That cannot be part of —“

“If they don’t lock you in with the deadly tiger cubs,” Dazai agreed. “I hear old man Hirotsu had to fight off a whole bear when he joined.”

Kajii stared. They held his gaze.

His hands fell to his sides. “I can’t win against a bear,” he murmured, nonsensically.

Climbing to his feet, Dazai patted the side of his arm, encouragingly. “If you give me some more statistics on those bombs of yours, I’ll try to tell Mori to let you off easily. A pack of feral dogs, maybe! You are certainly used to the more canine — Ouch!”

“The dogs might mistake his hair for a food bowl,” Chuuya pointed out, fixing his kicking leg back in place. “Unwise.”

“Very European,” Dazai agreed.

“Very Parisian.”

“Terribly terrorist.”

“Agonizingly lemon-like.”

“Alright,” Kajii snapped. “Have I killed you brats’ grandma or something? Chuuya’s, maybe, in some weirdly derivative way, but you —“ A strange look pinched his traits, crossing his arms in a very awkward line. “You’re Dazai, aren’t you?”

A mocking bow. “My fame has reached the West! You flatter me. I appreciate you, even if your lemons are slowly growing more and more boring. Either I kill you, or I jump into the river again,” He directed a tempted look to the riverbank.

“As in,” he dared, “Boss’ Dazai?”

His smile didn’t move an inch.

Chuuya stared at the ground.

He had felt it before, he considered — eight years old, and waiting for the Sheep to weigh the pros and the cons of keeping the bomb attached to the cables. When Pianoman had welcomed in with a smile and bloodied hands, and he had learned just how relevant being liked by those holding the knife was.

It was childish, he reminded himself. He’d never even had parents. He had no reason to whine about not being the poster child.

“That’s one way of putting it,” Dazai said, at last. A broken kaleidoscope; each shard weighted his face down — more than he’d understand if he spent his whole life asking for stories. Somewhere through the razor-sharp glass, resignation. It was gone quicker than Chuuya could wonder. “On a more important business — Chibi, where are my souvenirs?”

His eyes jumped out of their sockets. “You don’t fucking get souvenirs, you smelly Mackerel bastard—“

Inopportune as an epidemic, Kajii blinked. “Didn’t you buy those little —“

Dazai lit up.

Horns flared wildly. At the beginning of the downhill that led to the riverbank, the Mafia driver dragged his arms around, mouthing some call washed away by the sound of waves. He had a duffel bag in hand — Kajii’s yelp was pitched just high enough to spell out lemon bombs and do not shake.

“We can talk about that later!” he screamed, scrambling to the car so viciously, he ended up on his knees. “Put those down! Put those down! I can’t be arrested not even an hour into the city, it would be mortifying —“

No organ music tinged the air darker; the sight of Dazai’s upsetting grin in the corner of his vision did its job well enough.

“No,” Chuuya said, immediately.

“Chuu-uu-ya,” he drawled, slithering along to the beeline he made for the still-crowded bridge, hands pointedly stuck in his pockets. “Did my dog bring me a gift?”

“Kajii is delirious.”

Dazai squinted, clearly aggravated. “I don’t think he is.”

“Then you’re delusional.”

He hung off his belt loops, almost tripping him. “Give me my gift.”

“There is no,” he insisted. “gift.”

“Give me my gift.”

“There’s no gift.”

“There is!”

“There is not!”

“Help!” Dazai screamed, out of nowhere, loud enough to catch the attention of the people still crying out near the railings. “Help, he’s trying to push me! Instigation to suicide! Instigation —“

The kick Chuuya directed at him dug a crater into the nearest wall; the boy, on the other hand, managed to slip away from between his legs — filthy fingers stealing his hat in the process.

“France made you slower,” he judged — a certain, unplaceable hint of pettiness in it. He settled the hat on his own soaked air; then tapped two fingers on his forehead. Grinning in the face of a nearby traffic light — and the sound of screeching wheels that followed — he called: “Fetch!”

With makeshift-trumpet squeak, Dazai took off, bolting down the bridge.

“Dipshit!” Chuuta screamed. His spine screeched, louder than thunder — and then nothing but the unnatural scarlet of Tainted and the black-and-white dot running further and further away filling up his eyes.

He chased.

---

...

---

The new Mr. Arcade was an eighty years old man in an outdated Christmas sweater, whose approaching dementia made it easier to steal Arcade tickets from under his nose. To his merit, he had finally fixed the Punching God machine.

[“What kind of info can he even gather?” he had whispered, perplexed, as they watched him play bingo on a portable tablet. “He probably can’t even hear the gossip.”

“It’s just a precaution,” Dazai had insisted. “I have more efficient methods these days. Made friends with the Intelligence team!”

That certainly sounds less realistic, Chuuya hadn’t said.]

“I’m afraid we lack funds to reward such a devastating victory,” the man stuttered, pushing his wide glasses up a wrinkled nose. The ripped leather ball Chuuya had torn out with an overly prepared fist laid on the counter between them — the mess of Arcade tickets being printed shone under neon lights and playing stations.

“Not enough ink on the printer?” Chuuya guessed, pocketing the overflowing lines of tickets.

“Try not to gloat,” Dazai muttered — still stealing his own share. “Like you didn’t cheat.”

He hadn’t; the other boy had made sure of it, his hand plastered on his nape — clammy from the half an hour long chase around the city, feet scrambling to land on close enough roofs and fingers all scratched from the florist shop they had crashed against.

“I shall have to put this on your tab, kids,” Mr. Arcade sighed, eyes comically wide behind the glass. Chuuya silently prayed he didn’t think to check the Unwelcome List — they had yet to tear that season’s one to pieces. “We can hardly afford to deal with more reparations, these days. I just heard the restaurant a few blocks from here got stormed over! The kids to blame were banned for life — You don’t want it to happen to you, do you?”

Subtly, Chuuya removed a destroyed piece of bread from the hem of Dazai’s coat.

“Here, take these,” the man handed them the rest of the tickets. “I’m afraid, celebration or not celebration, that we’re out of Bonus Cards. You two will have to make do.”

“My next gift was supposed to be locking you up inside the claw machine,” Dazai whined, as he dragged him towards the rows of customers — rows over rows of brats and adults waiting for their turn, immediately parting to let them through.

Chuuya offered him his nastiest glance. The crumpled up flier was still in his pocket; it had survived even the uncomfortable drying of his clothes under the summer air. “What, exactly, are you calling a gift?”

Removing his belt from his grasp, the boy twirled, walking backwards to threateningly push his puffed chest against his. “I gave you a city wide emergency, petit mafia of mine. Be grateful.”

Retching, he pushed him away, watching the way the lights traveled across the dozens of hairpins pushing his bangs back — flower shaped, rainbow shaped, and one that vaguely resembled a toy crab. Elise, he guessed — or just an occasion to have his subordinates in dismay. “Chronic migraines — that’s all your revolting ass gives me. I’m jet-lagged as shit. Can I go home now?”

Dazai blinked, innocent. “Are you blaming your inability to beat me at War God: The Legend on headaches and jet-lag?”

He spluttered. “I beat you at that, what the fuck are you —“

The boy accelerated, sneaking through the crowd with traditional ability and skipping steps, screaming back: “Not if I delete your results!”

He slammed his palm on a nearby machine, hard enough to make the ten years old behind it yelp. “Fuck you!”

The low hum of music rumbled under their ruined shoes, following them from playing station to playing station. It was all disorientingly familiar — strangely new under some sharper corners, gathered in the way Dazai said boku and not watashi as he gloated about a win, and the five inches of height difference that now stood between them.

“I’m astonished you even managed to reach me at all,” Dazai said, seemingly unbothered by the stolen claw-machine toy he had slapped on his face. “It’s like there’s a void facing my eyes —“

Chuuya's fists clenched on his joystick, eyes stubbornly set on the screen. "Shut up."

"Could it perhaps be —"

"If you open your mouth —"

"Did you get shorter, Hatrack?"

"Shut up," He seethed, squinting up at the boy's self-assured grin, settled on top of his crossed arms. The machine between them shook with the kick Chuuya directed to it — the other boy bit his tongue to blood, yelping.

"No, you didn't, not at all," Dazai mocked, tongue held between two fingers, words muffled. "I'm just winning."

"This isn't a race, horse shit!"

He threw his head back to snicker — a tad of blood shone on the very edge of his lips, painted neon green by the lights. Chuuya caught the glint of something — he paused.

"What," Dazai was taunting, still, chin up, "Nothing to say about your, growth spurt that's sure to come? Should I take this as an admission of loss? Should we call for celebration? Should we go buy some milk?"

Chuuya didn't hear a word; delight arose across his system, lighting it up like fireworks. The music from the speakers turned sweeter. "Are those braces, Bandages?"

Silence flattened every muscle of his face.

Abruptly, Dazai slapped both hands on his mouth, dropping his body under the machine.

"They are!" His own glee surprised him; he roared out his meanest laugh, climbing over the machine to peek down at his blankest expression. "How hard did Boss even make you bite the curb to have to put you in braces? At your big ass age?"

"I don't —"

"Then take off your hands."

"Your smell might kill me."

"I don't smell, you smell —"

"You're wearing a waistcoat! You don't get to judge anyone!"

"And?" Chuuya scoffed, crossing his arms, "I look fucking great."

Disgust managed to even drop his hands from his face — just so the boy could direct him his most skeptical glance. "Who lied to you in your childhood and gave you that perfidiously good self-esteem of yours?"

With his visual free, the glint of metal was glaring — the laces were delicate, and the brackets unavoidable between scratched lips; all startlingly disorientating when framed by his bruises and the bump of his gun. So deeply teenagerish Chuuya nearly couldn't smell the blood.

“Poor dental care and such,” Dazai insisted, undeterred, swatting at his hands as he held his head still, observing the new piece. “Are among the global top causes of painful deaths, which would be all but in line with my suicide plans —“

“Yes, yes,” Chuuya hushed.

As a sole petty response — given that the last time they had dragged the guns out, they had been kicked out for three weeks — he got mercilessly defeated at Smash Smash!.

“Did you eat snails in France?”

He peeked over the edge of the disc battle table, making a face. “Bleah.”

The boy's fingers tapped the glass wall. Did you climb the Tour Eiffel with that L-E-M-O-N Guy?

No, idiot, he sighed, kicking the disc to the other side with enough might to land it on the floor. “But I did crack a window at the Louvre.”

“And they didn't kill you?” Dazai huffed. “What does a mafioso need to do to be ended?”

“Don't use me as an experiment,” Chuuya warned him. “I'll kill you. Has Ane-san found out about Ace's visits to the Pomegranate yet?”

“I do have a plan to casually let them bump against each other,” he replied.

“Q?”

The machine's ping! signaled his victory.

Dazai's face did nothing in particular — the crinkles by his eyes, carved a bit deeper with each mocking smile he offered nobody at all, seemed to frown. “Working.”

He rolled the disc between his fingers. Not complicated, he considered, with only a hint of selfishness. No need to make it such.

“I wanted to say goodbye before I left,” he offered, pathetically unnecessary. “I couldn't find them anywhere.”

At that, Dazai's shoulders stiffened.

France had been different. Even through its blood and gunpowder, smelling the same whether it was Japan or the other end of the globe — anything bright enough to be known had been easily swallowed by the silence of Rimbaud's villa. Day after day, his stay had taken the semblances of a candlelight vigil he felt no need to mourn for — like sleeping next to a grave whose flowers he'd poisoned himself.

Poison tended to spread. Only his bones were taken aback by Dazai's: "Was your murderous brother's bed comfortable, or did the guilt harden the mattress?"

The joystick creaked. He directed all of the venom pooling in his eyes to the blinding lights of the screen. Dazai never did anything without forethought.

More, Arahaki hummed.

"Who's Odasaku?" he asked.

Where he had expected storm, the polluted sky in Dazai's sole eye seemed to clear.

"My best friend," he said, in wonder, as if he had found a way to communicate the feeling of moonlight. Delicate enough to fracture his ribcage. Brighter than the most colorful hair pins pressing his bangs into place. "He's my best friend."

Chuuya curled an eyebrow before his brain could call it wise. "Did those attempts of yours start giving you hallucinations, at last?"

His glare was sharp. "Odasaku is real."

"And he's your best friend."

"He is."

"You made a friend. A superlative one."

"Do you need me to spell it out? I thought Kouyou was done with her lessons."

"You don't make friends."

"He's the best man in the syndicate," Dazai's voice was a screeching engine, tumbling down streets Chuuya didn't know how to navigate. It wasn't the sincerity in it that took him by surprise — it was the open-wound bleeding yearning intertwined with it. "And the deadliest. I don't want you near him."

Chuuya scoffed, eyes falling back to the screen. "Who the fuck wants to be around your hallucinations."

"He's not an hallucination!" he snapped. It startled him enough to land his character into the flaming floor underneath it; Chuuya stared. "He's real, and he's my best friend, and I don't want you around him — Pathetically stupid as you are, he might just reconsider his good opinion of me."

His tone — he knew that tone. The whiney childishness, the sharper letters, the rust at the very ends that was all but childlike.

Anger was a deaf wave inside his skull, eroding bone walls until it could scritch at his brain. Smash Smash! was still playing on their screens. Chuuya had just wanted his hat back. “What the fuck is your problem?” he snarled.

“The wonders of your voice set me off once again, it would seem,” Dazai replied. The curve of his mouth was dry enough to burn through the ice in his veins. “Is that a French accent I hear? How scandalous,” His eyes roamed down his body. “Really going for that Verlaine look, aren’t we?”

The embers hissed. “Shut up.”

“Or is it Rimbaud?”

“Dazai —“

“Between a rock and a hard place.”

Chuuya’s gloves screeched — his nails pulling against the leather. “You’re a piece of shit.”

“And you suck at Smash Smash!,” Dazai replied, honestly. Without lowering his gaze he sunk his index on the buttons — another game lost was added to his collection. “Were French video games easier? It wouldn’t surprise me.”

“Would you fucking stop,” he snapped, disbelieving, “Talking about France?”

Dazai hummed, widening his eyes. It was a strangely innocent expression, meant to look so — a stranger to the excitement he’d worn as Chuuya floated upside down in front of him, watching him struggle to jump from roof to roof. “And here I thought I was making you feel at home.”

“What are you talking about?” Chuuya insisted, exasperated. “Where the — hey! Where the fuck do you think you’re —“

“I’m bored of you,” the boy answered, easily enough. He sneaked through the crowd and the machines with a composure that got people to move for him, waving a dismissing hand in the air, refusing to even turn to look at him. “I’d forgotten how easily it happens. Bye!”

Speechless, Chuuya was left to stare at the glass door closing behind him.

Promptly, his phone vibrated in his pocket. He fished it out with mechanical motions, staring wordlessly at the new text on the display.

They’re repainting your walls, by the way. Find some other dog house to sleep in for a few days. Hope the kernel finds you and castrates you.

---

Hikari's fur was matted in blood.

"Hey there," Chuuya murmured, kneeling on the cobblestones before the wooden entrance bridge. Moonlight washed over the artificial rivers. Much like her dog's name, Kouyou liked beautiful things — and yet, she knew how to admit that most beauty didn't sleep with the Night Wardens and their gunpowder. "Where's your Mom, princess?"

The dog drooled on the ground, sharp fangs fighting bravely against the instinct to bite at his caressing hands. Arahabaki had corrupted all living creatures before it had corrupted Chuuya himself — much like Kouyou, her pet was too stubborn to get on with the agenda.

Just another thing I ripped off from where it is sunnier, he had once seen her write, on the closest thing to a diary a woman like her could have.

"I know, I know, I've been gone," Chuuya ruffled the fur behind her ears, carefully avoiding meeting her cobalt, slightly scarred eyes. She had been saved from a bad situation; Kouyou had been punished severely for bringing her in. "I'll bring you one of those squeaky toys, ah?"

Over the stone pavilion on the other side of the garden, a man screamed, choking on the blood bubbling inside his throat.

"There she is," he concluded.

Under the flowers-decored roof, a man in the Bishop Staff's traditional mantle was bleeding out on one of the carved seats from the Executives' breakfast spot — one of his eyeballs tickling his cheek, merely hanging from a nerve.

Kouyou dragged the edge of her blade up the mess of gashes on his clavicles; he sobbed, snot and tears mixing down his chin, landing on the hems of her sleeping gown. She had her hair down; the burned strand at the dead center of the curtain was far too short to belong to Kanechi only.

Chuuya bowed. "Ane-san."

"Shh," she warned — dazed, down the silver shadows of her cheekbones. "Look closely, now, little god."

The man retched, all liquid crimson, his cries unheard by the whispers Kouyou was sliding up his wretched skin, lips brushing his cheeks. She never as much tortured as she dragged on pain — the last sip of water left to die in the sun, its glass creaking a bit more with each maddening moment of abandonment.

“Say,” she asked, right as the climax of his suffering shone brighter than the festive lanterns of her garden. She had dragged him to the temple, in January — had made him kneel and wish for the good of the syndicate, certain that he would have had even if she hadn’t intertwined their kimono sleeves. “What are you people doing to those girls?”

Chuuya tasted blood.

[Nakahara Chuuya did not dream.

He thought he heard their voices sometimes, though, sharp around edges he didn’t have anymore — not a dream, not a memory; perhaps a phantom wound. Little god, they said, little miracle. Turn the percentage up. Careful, always, no matter if it was numbers and lines and not quite Ichor. That’s our little god you’re tearing apart.

Chuuya had been human up to the point of it being irrelevant — Chuuya had been destruction itself until he had begun to wonder what the non-relevant felt like. Chuuya had been seven, and he hadn’t quite wanted to starve. Chuuya was sixteen, and he knew better.]

Hikari nudged his calf. He blinked, right in time to watch her cuddle up at the decaying feet of the new corpse, fangs sinking in the putrid flesh of his calves.

Kouyou lowered her katana. “Shame.”

Then, lighting quick, she dragged the blade across the man’s throat, decapitating him.

“Got nothing out of him?” Chuuya asked, the moment the head stopped rolling down the marble of the pavilion, landing through the rushing waves of an artificial river. “Seems like you’ve been here for a while.”

“Some unimportant location,” she replied, flippantly, wiping her blade with a handkerchief — waving at some unmoving guards near the gates, beckoning them to the decapitated body. “A few details on the Bishop Staff’s latest deals. Mori will certainly be glad,” She scoffed, tucking an invisible strand of hair behind her ear. They burned it off of me, she had once explained. “Nothing on the matters that are truly bugging me.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow, studying the blood staining the marble, as two servants dragged the body out of the way. The eyes of one of them — a girl not much older, lips Pomegranate red — followed him intensely; when he met them, they lowered hastily.

“Executives,” she murmured, respectful.

He made a face. “Oh, I’m not —“

Katana sliding pointlessly across the floor, Kouyou called his attention. Pleasant, she tapped two fingers under her chin.

The servants left. Chuuya shut his mouth.

Her smile bloomed — belated, like the silver flowers intertwined with the sharp corners of her villa. Hikari snaked her muzzle under the palm of her free hand; mischievous, the Executive's tapping fingers settled under his own chin, raising it all by themselves.

"One word," she encouraged. The first hand she had offered him, fifteen and mistrusting — a game of mind-reading; an occasion to walk to the same conclusion without both growing irritated with the other's posture or posturing.

An old game. "Voices," he offered, raising one hand to spell out the kanji in the air.

"Wasted," she mirrored.

"Stupid."

"I prefer the term unwise."

"Obviously," he huffed. "Ane-san."

Warmth was a strange thing. His skin had always been cold with borderline starvation; the younger Sheep had used to groan about it, lamenting his inability to soften the harshest winter days. The tips of Kouyou's fingers, still stained in fresh enough blood for it to stick, weren't fire — merely embers, brushing tentatively around edges she only needed sharper.

[Here, she had told him, offering him a hand. The grass was soaked in blood. Dazai's coat was a black stain, and he was discussing percentages with Mori. Verlaine's body was nowhere to be found. He hadn't even known he was digging, looking for it, until her fingers had closed around his bleeding nails.

Here, little god. Her temple was bleeding. She had merely fought for the right to keep him where he wanted to be. Let's go home].

"Welcome home," she told him, grip sliding down to his shoulder. The summer sun had given her freckles. Chuuya dreamed of being tall enough to look her right in the eyes.

"I missed it," he offered. I missed every inch of your face.

She offered him her arm. "Come. I may just have a welcome back surprise for you."

Their steps were equally silent along the cobblestones that lead to the rows of black SUVs at her service, right behind the gates — Hikari barked her discontentment at their abandonment; but she stayed where she was, licking the blood from the floor of the Pavillion.

"Recruit 678?" Kouyou asked, a single nail tracing the naked skin of the fingers Chuuya had anchored around her arm — as if marveling at the new style of gloves. "Your letters seemed somewhat concerned."

"Kajii's a bother, but he will be loyal," he assured, flipantly, kicking the wooden heels of her sandals. "Leaving Japan had been a mere necessity; he feels no regret for his wrongdoings."

"That is certainly convenient," The lifeless eyes of the decapitated head stared at them from the river; Chuuya watched them change colors, sharpen — amber and blue, framed by reddish curls and spiral-shaped scars. He stared. “Any particular suggestions on how to assure us his most efficient collaboration?”

It took his lips a moment to separate. “Keep an eye on the Shadow Blade. They have a twenty thousand yen bounty on him; he would work just fine between their manufacturer rows. And keep an eye on Kajii’s big mouth,” He made a face. “You wrote the Special Division has been snooping?”

She sighed. “Somewhat. This whole ordeal of girls vanishing — it alerted them. As obsessive as Boss can be about the Ability Permit, he does have a point. One would finally allow us some breathing room,” A glance. “As of now, the last thing we need is big mouths.”

“Kajii trusts me,” Chuuya replied. “I’ll deal with him,” He blinked; relaxed his grip around her arm. “I mean — If that’s alright with you, Ane-san.”

“Ane-san that, Ane-san this, ” Amusement curled her lips upwards; she nudged his shoes back, raining an appreciative look down his new clothes. “Command suits you just fine. Perhaps you can be trusted with your own decision. How surprising — Your gift will fit just fine.”

He frowned. “About that, what do you —“

“Oh,” she interrupted him, undeterred, as her cheerful gaze settled on the driver hurrying to open the car door for them. “Here he is.”

Chuuya’s double-take almost nauseated him, as startled as it was. The man’s shirt was the first thing he noticed — yellow, startlingly gleeful amidst the rusty statues and bloodied footsteps at the entrance; reading, in a cartoonish font, Sea You Later, Alligator. Its owner’s curls had been turned into a military cut; a gauze covered an entire side of his face, hiding a scar — he knew — shaped like the underside of an escaping shoe.

He gasped, biting down a grin. “You fucker — You said you were bedridden!”

V smiled, timid. “Well, I was, until Hikari had no one to take her out on walks.”

“It has been a terribly busy week,” Kouyou sighed, sliding inside the car without a thought — winking at him. “Virgil here has been so useful.”

“Recovery is a process of many steps,” the ex- Soul insisted, as if he had read it somewhere — one of the brochures at the Mafia’s Hospital where Chuuya had left him, before France, maybe. “The zombie soldier — as you said — was getting bored of staying put, anyway.”

[The arguments against and for V’s life — once the man had been extracted from the rubble left behind by Corruption’s merciless rave, one eye almost torn out and grief-slack, unresisting hands — had been plenty and undecided. Some thought his Ability might be useful enough to threaten into joining, rather than executing — despite what the reports had already offered.]

Kouyou had vouched for his survival — which he doubted the man would forget. Chuuya, after an entire afternoon sitting at his bedside — watching him stumble between emptily insulting the memory of his only two friends, in the way of survivors, and admitting Dido, his Ability, wouldn't be able to keep Arahabaki in check — had decided to do the same.

“It was only a theory,” Chuuya had assured, in the face of his apologies. He had despised the man the entire time the Soul clutch had been there; now — watching him pretend not to mourn his loved ones in the face of Mori's offers — he could only let him breathe.

“I'm sorry,” the man had insisted, still. His genuine honesty hadn't exactly tasted like guilt — it had been interesting enough to make Chuuya linger.

“I'm not,” Dazai had replied, grinning].

“So,” Chuuya questioned. “Virgil?”

“Just a name,” He shrugged. “I'm attached to the letter. I picked it myself!”

He seemed strangely proud. Through the lowered car window, Kouyou batted her eyelashes, making the man blush. “About time, yes? Chuuya, get in. Virgil's gonna drive us to your surprise.”

“If that's alright with you,” the man hurried to add — a strangely tense wording for, If you can forgive me.

Idly, he wondered what the two of them might have bonded about. If they sat in Kouyou's infinite library and exchanged stories about the way Beatrice's lips curved when she lied. “It's all good,” Chuuya said, finally. “You'll be fine, here. Recover the time lost.”

“The time dead,” Virgil insisted, smiling, settling in the driver's seat — no mind for his half blinded face. “A tale for the enemies, yes? They'll threaten to kill me — I'll tell them, oh, not again. And then put the gun skills to good use. The ones I don't exactly remember acquiring.”

Chuuya snorted. “As long as they're still there, man.”

“Oh, yes,” he promised, too serious. Some of the fractured pieces of vases around the entrance seemed to shake with the memory.

Yokohama sprinted beside him once again, behind a dirtier glass, as Kouyou crossed her legs on her seat, — a childish, strangely non-composed show; her body tilted towards him, hands playing with the sides of his neck ribbon — questioning him on his months gone with more openness than possibly traceable letters had allowed.

“The men Mori gave you,” she said, once she considered herself satisfied with his stumbling descriptions of the Parisian gardens. “How did they behave?”

“They obeyed,” he offered, curtly.

But. Kouyou glanced in Virgil's direction — the man was singing along to the radio. It was a good song, even if not Hirose. "One word."

Chuuya watched a couple of kids chase each other around rusty swings in a park — their parents, a few steps away, were hugging, a bottle of Champagne between their chests. "Afraid."

The moon was reflected in her eyes; second irises, curling into silver shapes. There was a song, he thought, humming along to the radio. A song from before. Something about eating the moon whole and breathing it out. "Tell me."

Tell me.

How?, he wondered — the way Elise asked about the taste of candies he bought for her. He did not hate having eyes on him. He never had. What could there be, if not observation? Idly floating in the darkness — one more leaf in the endless lake, one more rock down the bay. One more child they had stopped hanging searching fliers for.

Chuuya had always supported efficiency.

He did not hate the way his gloves squelched against his skin when blood seeped in. He did not hate the look in the eyes of men who were older, who were stronger, who were taller — who would lose. Don't make the monster mad.

"Noguchi Toru is a rare exception," he said, instead. "It's not fear with him. My authority is not a concept he particularly approves of. Most of the others were there, that night," That night, he thought, what do you remember? Pain and white noises and hands and eyes and silence. "They've accepted a sixteen years old is ordering them around. But power is harder to trust."

Kouyou hummed. She tightened the knot around his neck — moved his dangling chain to the other side of his hat, like graduates in those old American movies Yuan had liked. "And how are you using this terror to your advantage?"

He studied Virgil's fingers, tapping on his steering wheel. "Still figuring that part out."

Another hum, a bit more pragmatic. Not approval, not disappointment. It was all different, those days; secrets weren't secrets anymore. The hisses, the cracks; he had let them keep him awake alone, night after night, until they had started lulling him to sleep instead — and Arahaki had been his, and he had been Arahaki's.

Closure isn't meant to be life-changing, Pianoman had told him, once. Chuuya couldn't even remember in what regards. The blindness of that statement had gripped his arteries tight, as he sat on the floor, holding a corpse that looked just like him, only — nice.

Wrong term, maybe. But he had looked so nice — normal. Heavy with things Chuuya didn't know; lighter than whatever Murase had babbled about as he choked on blood.

"What was that shit about the cat in the box?" he asked, suddenly.

Kouyou paused. “Cat in the box?”

“The philosophy stuff,” he insisted. He met Virgil’s perplexed eyes in the rear view mirror. “You gave me that book. Every possibility exists until we open the box,” Chuuya cleared his throat. “Whatever. I’ll get the situation under control. They can shit their pants around me all they want. Boss is gonna send them off to their old lords and ladies soon enough.”

She kept strangely quiet.

He stared. “Ane-san.”

“Don’t ask.”

“But —“

“Have you met with Boss yet?” she asked.

“No, of course. I came straight to you.”

That managed to soften her features; preen and pearls, sharpening her smile. She reached forward — pulled a growing strand of hair from what had been his ponytail, before he had cut it off in Albatross’ haunted, too quiet bathroom. Burned it too, for them. “My loyal subordinate. Dishonest too, apparently.”

Chuuya winced. “I did go home to leave my suitcase.”

“Liar. Again.”

“I’m painting my apartment. Technically, I’m staying at Albatross’ — Fumes. You know.”

Not a word.

“I did,” He choked on the bad taste of the words; scratched dirt from his shoe — an old habit. “I was coerced into seeing the bastard.”

“That is what I assumed,” Kouyou’s smile was a pained thing. Her favorite piece of jewelry, ruined by blood she had splattered herself. The bundle of don’t-know-what-to-do-with-you she felt for Dazai was the one unbalanced thing about her. “Considering the frenzy of the city.”

His ears burned for no reason. “You saw the traffic lights.”

“I did see the traffic lights,” she confirmed. “I did see the fliers. I did see the news about two short silhouettes destroying two markets, one small restaurant, and snapping five cables of the Tsurumi Tsubasa Bridge. Mysteriously.”

From the driver seat, Virgil hid a snort with a coughing fit. Chuuya’s hand spasmed. “On my honor and hat, Ane-san, it was that shitty —“

“I don’t doubt it. Still —“

“He stopped the city,” he begged. “He stopped the fucking city. People died. You know why? He wanted to play video games. No, worse than that. He wanted to commit suicide by lemon bomb. By lemon bomb.”

“Certainly characteristic. But —“

“And then — then, he made me chase him around the city, like I’m some damn babysitter — And then he just got up and left, and I had to pay for both our rounds at the Arcade, and he didn’t even bother telling me who I should call to know when my apartment will be —“

“I get it,” Kouyou interrupted him, only the tiniest hint exasperated. “No offense, Chuuya, but I’m not quite in the mood for one of your demon child rants.”

“Rants? I don’t rant —“

“His temper tantrum was to be expected, I suppose. He has been... moping.”

Chuuya stared, vaguely disgusted. “Dazai Osamu doesn’t mope.” He whined, at most — faker than the flowers in Rimbaud’s apartment. It lowered stupid people’s guards.

It was agonizingly thin — the line between the gleam in his eye when he won at Smash Smash! and the petulant cadence he took with mafiosi who wouldn’t immediately lower their guns. Chuuya was all for letting him roam aimlessly, acting like his age, for once — but he had never been stupid.

She shrugged. “Your guess is as good as mine. Well — Perhaps better.”

“I have no idea of whatever the fuck goes on in that fish head of his.”

“Of course you don’t,” Kouyou patted his head, patronizing. “He’s been weirder than usual. I thought it might have something to do with your absence —“

“If you mean happy as a clam —“

“He disappeared for a whole week, a few days after you left.”

Chuuya sunk a bit lower down his seat, eyes set on the flickering lights of some Casino of their property. They were nearing the area the Flags had preferred to hang around — thousands of strays and lost kids; good cigarettes. “Did he tell people they were going to play a nice round of hide and seek and then vanished to China?”

“I believe he only did that with you. When he reappeared, he was more bandaged up than usual, and blabbering something about —“

“A best friend?” he guessed.

The Executive’s face did something both very complex and sophisticated — a choreography Chuuya had learned in passing, watching her judge passerby behind blood-stained fingers.

“Oda Sakunosuke is — certainly an interesting choice.”

“What were you expecting? That he would be braiding hair with Elise until forty?”

“Don’t be silly,” she replied. “Nobody expects Dazai to make it to forty.”

Virgil snorted. Kouyou studied her nails.

The leather of the seatbelt pressed against his chin. Chuuya wondered why the woman hadn’t said anything about his posture yet. Chuuya thought about a crab-shaped hairpin — a thin, soaked body covered in gasoline, watching flames approach with something akin to wonder.

“Suppose,” he said, eventually. Words are a waste of time, Shirase would moan. Iceman, too, but for fairly different reasons. Chuuya didn’t know anything about etiquette. He never knew when staying quiet would mean something.

He didn’t speak again, until Virgil parked the SUVs in an illuminated alley near the center of the city.

Bricks appeared at the edge of his vision. The ground sizzled under his shoes, and it was more known than even clouds under his fingerless gloves; Chuuya stilled.

“They finished a week or two ago,” Kouyou was saying, somewhere behind him, leaning against the car. Her voice was muffled; a careful thing against the most cracked of surfaces. “I thought you might appreciate it more in person, rather than written.”

Two stores of red, un-rusted metal, lined in dark stone and neon signs. The windows had been freshly wiped — behind them, inside the bar, he could see a mumbling crowd, throwing their heads back to drink and laugh and breathe, either unaware or uncaring of dancing on a grave.

A finished work he had promised no one but himself. Stolen tombstones couldn’t answer.

“I hear you used to come around here with old friends,” Virgil spoke up, somewhere to his left. Chuuya wondered if Tainted was acting up; if he had created the circle of space around him all by himself. Touchy subject?, Albatross used to joke, whenever he shrugged his hands off of him. Get it? Because touchy? “They serve great whiskey.”

Chuuya couldn’t speak.

It won’t bring them back, Mori had told him, eons ago. Warned him, perhaps. I’m not an idiot, he could have barked. Why not? All he had needed was honesty; the idea had settled strangely on thieving hands.

It won’t — but you’re a good friend.

[Since the first time he had heard the words Port Mafia, Chuuya had thought about killing Mori Ougai four times. The first three had their roots. That had been the latest of them].

Hands on his shoulders, from behind; then elbows, the rush of fabric like waves inside his ears, touchy, he thought, touchy subject. Kouyou leaned her chin on her crossed arms; leaned her skull against his, as if rattling it would let him exhale. “Chuuya.”

Shadows danced behind the neon signs, their hands leaving traces on the glass. At the pool table, somebody did an unexpected feat. On newly built pavement, Verlaine's European leather shoes walked through blood puddles, and Chuuya stepped on what he knew had to be Doc's liver, and he stole Albatross' chain for himself.

He cleared his throat.

"Can we stay here a bit?" he asked, emptily.

She laid something on his shoulders; a coat. "They found this in the backroom," she said, very quietly. Chuuya couldn't lower his eyes from the twirling golden neon, curling into known words and mirroring a polluted skyline, and his fault, his, and he would have recognized the touch of Pianoman's coat anywhere. "Of course we can stay, Chuuya."

Quietly, uncaring of it all, the lights of the Old World buzzed.

---

...

---

Sacrilegious was the first word Chuuya had ever learned to read in a more sophisticated form of kanjis.

It had been a warning, carved into the old metal roof of some destroyed shop in Suribachi — perhaps the remnant of some tourist trap near the military base, selling warnings about one of the temples or capitalizing on faith. The surface had been reflective.

Arahabaki wasn't a god, despite the voices haunting the streets of the crater. He had mused on telling everyone, sometimes — ruining the ghost stories the Sheep told around the fire; ruining the lives of people attempting to make money off cameras-carrying visitors.

Chuuya wasn't holy. He didn't know if he needed it, to be a living heretic.

"And now Kajii thinks he's a foot fungus," he concluded, dangling his legs from the top of one of his stolen tombstones. Albatross would have asked for the tallest of the five; so, amongst the pieces of faded rock — names intelligible, but dates of death and birth still somewhat visible; the shade of a tree raining like a threat — Chuuya had claimed the smallest of them. "Not from France. But yeah. France was — something."

No answer. Chuuya had yet to pick up that particular brand of delusion.

Rimbaud's makeshift grave — unvisited since Lippman's body had rolled out of his partner's car, because Chuuya was mature, but not enough not to be petty — had been nothing more than a ruined piece of rock. For the Flags, he had selected something better — stone whiter than rice, masterfully crafted.

The Flags hadn't been traitors, obviously. The Flags had lived and died for the organization. The Flags would probably not approve of Chuuya going against the oldest Port Mafia tradition in their name.

Fuck your opinion, he had screamed, only once, Beatrice's best wine in hand, kicking the graves like they had personally reprimanded him. Fuck the Port Mafia, he could have added, had he been some months younger and had some less bruises on his knees. Chuuya wasn't fond of lying. Chuuya knew the dead never forgave.

Sacrilegious, he thought. He wondered if these tombstones had someone who cared for them, when Chuuya wasn't around — or if he had a penchant for finding the abandoned.

"Doc would have liked it," he mused. "You kept saying your United States have no culture. Paris was a treasure hunt. There was this one painting we had to steal — I think a doctor was in it."

They rebuilt the Old World, he tried to say.

"I'll do some rounds with the motorcycle by tomorrow," he added, kicking the grave again. "I assume it's not good, abandoning it like that for this long. I'll see what I can do. Sorry."

They rebuilt the Old World, he insisted.

A lazy bird cleaned its beak against Iceman's grave. Pianoman's coat was a new weight around his shoulders, sweaty in that weather — heavier than the leather jackets he had always worn. Uncertain. At the end of the Yokohama Cemetery, the sun would rise in an hour.

They rebuilt the Old World, he swore. What do I do with it? He jumped down from the tombstone. They rebuilt the Old World, and you aren't there.

Chuuya brushed dust off his clothes. As he passed, he patted each of the tombstones, the way Shirase did to him after a good job. "Be good, you bastards. See you in two days."

Nobody was there to marvel at his feet landing on electric wires on the way home. He hummed some French song that Kajii had stuck in his head; switched to Hirose Fumiko; recited the gravitational torque and potential energy due to non-uniform fields and mass moments equations law upside down.

Yokohama smelled different, he thought — different from anything the world had to offer. It stuck to his skin like a magnet. It called something Chuuya hadn't even known could leave his flesh, before a few months ago — asked the thing somebody else had forced in his veins to be angry.

Chuuya was a host and a guest and an owner — he ought to at least call his rage his own.

You should try it, sometimes.

The dark buildings of his apartment complex appeared like a mirage. On the glass doors of the entrance, blood flickered brighter than the upcoming sunset.

He stopped.

Crimson trails chased each other down the surface, landing on the concrete in a quiet, gentle tip tap. The smell soaked his nostrils; his shoes walked right to the edge of that scarlet puddle, hands stuck in his pockets, coat sliding down one of his shoulders.

Animal blood, he knew, immediately — not certain of how. A long way from drying; they hadn't thought he would be back so soon, or they had hoped he would. He dipped his finger in one of the letters scribbled on the glass; licked it clean.

Something crawling up and down his spine preened. Through the blood, his reflection smiled in Arahabaki's skin, scars widening around a grin he wasn't wearing.

Apart from my poor dreams, the shaky handwriting read, nothing interests me.

Belatedly, the taste of blood settled on his tongue. There was no sensible reason why he should have recognized which animal it belonged to. There was no world where he didn't.

Chuuya set his jaw.

He kicked the doors open.

Scrubbing the blood off with a stolen entrance rug was a dirty job, but he did it silently, until his eyes started blinking. By the time the glass was void of blood, and the rug hidden under the garbage cans outside the gates, all he could think of was the futon by Albatross' water mattress.

He knocked his hands on his own door on his way up, longing for the endless storage of headache pills in his cabinets — most of them stolen from Hirotsu's car one lift after the other.

Chuuya entered Albatross' apartment — and he didn't flinch, and he didn't call out to his friend either; and it cost him nothing, because that was how moving on was meant to go — drowning in darkness and the crystal sound of the mirrorball dangling. The ground didn't shake under his feet; it had been months since the last unrealistically-timed party to stain that wall paper in neon drinks.

Have one, Albatross used to drawl, — chains dangling like the sound of warmth itself; eyes glimmering like the roofs in Suribachi City in the summer — once his kicks to the roof gave up on their quest, and his feet dragged him to his door. Stay a bit. Don't be boring. Don't tell the housekeeper. Stay with me. Chuuya suspected that had always been the aim. Chuuya hadn't even screamed as he watched him die.

His next breath was too quick. Misstep.

He leaned his back against the door, letting it click shut. Closed his eyes. Sneaked his fingers under the choker, massaging his sore nape.

The coat fell, pooling at his feet.

His eyelids were yanked apart.

A fluid motion made his hand snatch one of his knives from his waistcoat — he threw it to the wall on the other side of the dining room, eyes sharpening against the darkness. On the window seal, Ōmu screeched his heart out — the knife never landed.

Fingers closed against his choker, squeezing the air out of his throat with a pull. “You —!”

Chuuya grabbed the attacker’s arm at the first, distracted opening, as they stumblingly danced to the kitchen — a misstep against the counter; the sharp bump of bones against Albatross’ marble — and twisted it behind the intruder’s back.

The sound his head made against the counter made him wince as well — Chuuya climbed over his struggling figure, sinking one knee in the thigh spot Kouyou had taught him hurt more — and when he stole the intruder’s gun, gritting his teeth against the ricochet of punches into his ribcage, he used it to knock his own stolen knife off his hand — and then pin its fingers to the marble, mouth laying on the side of his throat.

“Too slow,” he snapped, gulping down the racing heartbeat in the body trapped between his legs. His hat had flown off — possibly the whole point. “And you need to start fucking using your legs.”

He directed a gravity-lightened bullet to the light switch. The trapped attacker whined, struck mercilessly by the suddenness of the bright lights.

“I learned all my welcoming manners from you. Stop being annoyed,” Dazai huffed, blank-faced. His heels did something strange; Chuuya’s gloves slid down the sweat-covered marble — he landed on the floor with a yelp. “I even took my shoes off.”

Sure he had — they were scattered near the entrance, probably not the result of their squabble. His coat was abandoned over Ōmu’s cage. Chuuya felt every bone in his body readjust, sharply.

“Get out of my apartment.”

“Albatross’ apartment,” the boy replied, as he limped off the counter — something strangely different. From the floor, Chuuya glared until his head pulsed.

“Where the fuck is your arm cast?”

Dazai grabbed an abandoned fork from the counter, clinking it against the blade of his knife — now recovered from the wall where he had stuck it. The squares of light painted his face in shades of obnoxious Dadaism. “What arm cast?”

“I will incinerate you.”

“It was due for removal today,” Shrugging, he pocketed Chuuya’s knife.

“In the middle of the night?”

Dazai leaned over one of the neon couches on the other side of the room; proudly, he showed off his newfound crutch, settling it under his arm — dragging his new leg cast. “Chibi, please. We’ve got hard working doctors in the Port Mafia.”

“Our Hospital access has been revoked,” he insisted. “How did you break your leg?”

“I broke my leg?” he blinked.

Something inside him snapped. He climbed to his feet fast enough to startle Ōmu into a new song — grabbed ahold of the mountain of food-shaped pillows on the nearest couch, one after the other, uselessly throwing them, watching Tainted disappear at the first contact with their target. “Out — of — my — apartment —“

“Albatross’ —“

“Out!”

“France made you inconceivably rude, other than stupid,” Dazai pouted, unconcerned, surrounded by a growing pile of pillows. He dropped onto a stool. “You knew you’d find me here. Quit it.”

Chuuya threw all the pillows left. He flexed empty hands in the air. He watched Dazai drag his nails down the carving Doc had left on the counter with one of his scalpels, and saw red.

He breathed in.

“The smell of your nasty bandages fucking saddled the hallway,” he spat, eventually. The door of the fridge was almost torn out of its hinges by his white-knuckled grip; he slammed a beer on the counter, and hoped it would break. “And you put itching dust on my fucking doorknob.”

“Not my fault if sentimentalism is more than predictable,” the boy replied. One of his hair pins — silver, shaped like half a moon — had slid down his fringe in the fight; it was hit by the light with the same irritating precision as his braces.

““You done with pranks yet?”

“For now. Promise.”

He huffed. “Yeah. Which number?”

Dazai thought about it. “Six, I believe,” He gingerly reached over, wrapping lazy fingers around Chuuya’s beer without a care for his attempt to cut his thumb off for it. “Your windows are offensively easy to pick, did you know? Once, Albatross and I bumped against each other on our breaking-in way here —“

“What?”

“— And he insisted you refuse to change the locks. He stole one of my bobby pins. Or I let him. I can’t recall, really. Is your idiocy another genetic mutation, or —”

Chuuya felt something weight down the tips of his nails — the uncomfortable shape of his friends’ names in Dazai’s throat; the luminescent certainty that the people he loved had had a life outside of his visual field. Eyes on the ceiling, he offered: “It’s my reverse psychology technique to get you just bored enough to jump.”

“Tempting,” He half-bowed, mocking. Chuuya wondered where all that bleeding rage from the Arcade had gone. “But I’m here on official business. Mori wants to see us both tomorrow.”

He frowned. “Ane-san didn’t tell me.”

“A spontaneous thing,” Dazai replied, vague, shaking some pills from Chuuya’s muscle pain stash into his palm. “It’s our yearly evaluation in the syndicate — You could call it. Mori will talk big and boring words. Acquiring an Ability Permit is an unprecedented —”

“For the last time,” Chuuya cut through, stealing his beer back, “You don’t sound like him.”

“I assume he’ll want an answer.”

He pressed his chin against the cold neck of the bottle. “And we have one?”

Dazai slid down from his stool.

Mild curiosity was part of the reason why he let him remove the beer from his fingers, his own crutch forgotten against the counter. The other part was Chuuya’s cursed distaste for his bandages — the way all the bone-deep scrutiny of his rapacious void seemed to be concentrated into a single focus — an eye he had no excuse not to meet.

Partners, he’d said.

Kouyou’s penchant to drag him to weekend ballet shows allowed his mind to recognize the pose it was being forced into — Chuuya’s hand flew to the sweat-matted fabric on Dazai’s hip, and, in the face of his fingers clutching his hand, he did nothing more than curl an eyebrow.

“I don’t know,” he said. His naked skin pressed against the fingerless side of his gloves; the silence crawling all over his skull seemed louder than a gunshot. “Do we?”

Ōmu screeched, sleepy. It wasn’t quite the right music; despite being in position, they didn’t dance. Partners, he’d said. Chuuya felt it tight in his veins — the weight of a cloudy sky. Are you holding it, or am I? “I asked first,” he scoffed.

“I’m younger,” Dazai replied, amidst a senseless hum — not a song of Hirose’s; not some devil-may-care nursery rhyme on suicide; only a melody. “Be a good senpai.”

“I wish you were dead.”

“Same here.”

“When the hell’s your birthday, anyway?”

“Who knows,” Despite not leading, Dazai dragged them into a simple twirl, the tip of his shoe scratching against the parquet. Maybe, Chuuya considered, somebody should just stop the sky from falling. He kept his eyes on the fingers holding his hand, the disorientating rush of stillness. It had been utterly lonely — touching him for the first time. A devastating relief. The horrifying rage of being robbed — being told oxygen was as toxic as his need for it.

If you could choose quietness, nobody would ever ask him, would you?

He watched one of his nails — sharp and unmerciful and bitten off only on one side; ‘cause Mori cared about those things — trace the edge of a spiral scar from the window of the glove. He let go. “You haven’t answered.”

He studied the pale skin of his Corruption scars, and wondered which question he was even referring to.

The metal structure of the closest neon couch shrieked under Dazai’s weight. Partners, he’d said, and Chuuya worked alone, because no one else had the tools or the gal or the need — not when he was there. He threw himself after him, spine unlocking, bone by bone. He had yet to exhale. He willed his shoulders to breathe in some more.

“This is your fault,” he informed him, eyes on the myriad of Lippman posters on the ceiling.

“This is Mori’s fault,” Dazai corrected him, face against the couch seat. “As most things in the world. Even the most simpleton of all the simpletons in the Mafia knows that. France made you forgetful.”

He closed his eyes.

Would Albatross be mad they were there? He could have asked at the cemetery, he supposed — one more question to go unanswered; but that would matter less, because said out loud.

It felt unfair. Staining his tacky floor and his stupid statues with their faults. Chuuya was not good with percentages that didn’t involve jewelry; the blame on their shoulders was equal and different. That apartment wouldn’t be empty if they didn’t exist. Chuuya would still be —

It was tiring, the realization — there were things he would never stop faulting the body next to him. There was a green leather jacket in his closet. There were debts, pushing and pulling and tending the thread barely keeping them chained, and neither of them would ever attempt to repay them. You took everything from me. I wouldn’t get it back, if I could. I miss it and I don’t want it anymore. Am I allowed?

Chuuya slid down the couch. Abruptly, he grabbed Dazai’s casted leg, pulling it to his lap.

“That’s rude,” Dazai commented, face still pressed against the pillows. He studied the scribbled kanjis at the base of the cast — a perfect reflection of the ones from his arm cast. Get better; it read; like a question mark was supposed to be there.

He picked up a marker from the boy’s pants pocket, where he knew he’d find it. Dazai let him write in silence; eventually, he asked: “Is it Mackerel?”

“I don’t do things twice. Did you break in to search for your alleged souvenir?”

“I knew you’d taken it with you,” the boy accused, kicking towards his shoulder. “Is it Hirose’s Partners in Crime?”

Chuuya closed the marker. He laid back against the armrest; traced the fireflies surrounding Lippman’s frame in an action movie posted. “The first day they basically locked me home. There was this landlord — Anna — and she begged me to help her clean up the house. It smelled like shit and ghosts in there. I only received orders at night, so getting used to the rhythm wasn’t difficult. The car that brought me to Paris every time had this weird — shit on the dashboard, like, a chick dancing, but it had a fucking jingle, right? It was so annoying.”

Dazai didn’t say a word.

“We had to clean up the situation with Le Directeur, and threatening them into payment was unfortunately against Ane-san’s orders — So I spent an entire week locked inside this studio — and it was shrunkier than Madame Tanaki’s poststation, by the way — with five European assholes, discussing payments while they asked me if I actually knew how to fucking write.”

Muffled by pillows: “Did you kill at least one of them?”

“No,” he huffed. “But I did call him an old fart. Searched up the French equivalent. And — There were these blueish trees outside the window, and these robins kept chirping all day long, and I noticed it was stressing them out — so I started imitating them behind their back. And then, when we went to lunch — there was this fancy place that offered these illegal cookies, they were that good — one of the jackasses pulled a gun on Koda, sure he was to blame.”

Did you punch him?, he was expecting. Instead: “What kind of cookies?”

When he opened his eyes, liquid gold was streaming inside the room, shattering every shiny shard of the chandelier. The Switzern clock on the wall cuckoo-ed at ten o’clock. Ōmu was ruffling his feathers, humming nonsensically under his breath.

His mouth felt drier than August days in Suribachi City; he stumbled to sit upright, pushing the cast on his legs off.

Dazai wasn’t sleeping — shoulders tense with consciousness, but curled inward with the slight surprise of having slept. Still, he stayed with his face in the pillow, huddled under the silence of the first morning.

For good measure, Chuuya pressed his thumb against the creases between his eyebrows.

He stood with a grunt, back on fire, and spat out some hair, making his way to the bathroom. Familiar motions rained down his body with ease and relief; he studied the unavoidable spasms of his fingers as he submerged under the water of the bathtub — the motions slower, maybe even kinder, under that glass-like pressure.

Bubbles twirled in front of his eyes. His lungs had grown tired of their stolen air. Chuuya had survived harsher winter days. He curled up, knees to his chest, and felt nothing but the grieving silence of that floating nothingness.

His head broke the surface. He reached over and threw up into the toilet.

Great, he thought, nonsensically.

The mixture of sticky crimson and pasty yellow dragged a grunt out of his mouth; he flushed the residuals of poisons with one annoyed hand, struggling to his feet. He stuck his head under the faucet until his hair was soaked, and did nothing more than breathe in, staring at Albatross' animal-shaped soap collection.

“God,” he concluded, so fond it nauseated him. “You had issues.”

And you don't?, the man would have spat.

No, Chuuya wouldn't have said. No, I'm not that ungrateful.

The elephant soap simply stared back.

Silence still filled the apartment when he stepped out, leaving wet footsteps on his wake. Dazai was nowhere to be found; neither was his crutch, or Albatross' chocolate stash. Scrubbing the water out of his hair with a towel, Chuuya leaned against the kitchen sink — and then he stared, petrified, at the black stains left on the towel.

Quicker than a breath, he snapped his head to the nearest mirror.

“Dazai, you son of a —!”

Chapter End Notes

kouyou, talking to the french housekeeper: he's just going through a teenage phase chuuya: [slowly munching through all of rimlaine's furniture as a coping mechanism] and here's chuuya!! the next ten chapters (nine? i guess?) are gonna be fun. i'm very excited for them! a bit nervous, too, given that it's a pov switch and it's the first time you guys read how i write chuuya — but i do hope it didn't sound too OOC in anyway.

talking about that! i want to thank you guys for all the support in the past week in particular, you guys have been so incredibly and sweetly nice seriously. i've been re reading the comments obsessively lmao, they really gave me the strenght to write more (and i've officially only three chapters left to write of this! ye!)

about the chapter, some stuff to highlight:

the quote at the start of the act (un grand sommeil noir tombe sur ma vie) comes from the first two verses of Paul Verlaine's poem, "un grand sommeil noir" which, by the way, i really relate to verlaine's equivalent to corruption, so do check it out! this part in particular can be translated (and forgive my rusty french, i don't speak it often) as "a grand, dark slumber/falls on my life"

then, the "boku-watashi" passage from dazai that you see chuuya comment on at the arcade is actually something odasaku himself notices at the end of "the day i picked up dazai". it's an observation on a choice of maturity that dazai seems to go through during that novel, and that of course is partly to blame on what meeting oda did to dazai

"Apart from my poor dreams, the shaky handwriting read, nothing interests me": another quote, this time directly from nakahara chuuya himself!

and two things i wanted to highlight: number one, chuuya is gonna go through some "learn to be resistant to poison" trials this arc. i do want to highlight it, just in case someone might be squeamish about it. and then, because i don't think i've ever talked about this in the first part — the "burning hair" tradition i've given in the pm, for one someone loved dies or is lost. i can't wait to do more on that :)) anyway — as always, thank you so much for reading. really, i can't thank you enough for the nice words and just how much you've been appreciating this story. i saw some of you binged ten chapters in one day, which is absolutely dedicated!! i hope you'll like the next ones even more stay warm and see you soon!!

TOO

Chapter Summary

“Then,” Hirotsu crossed his hands at the small of his back, curling an eyebrow at the two silhouettes kneeling in front of him. “Who wants to start explaining the crater on the twelfth floor?”

Chapter Notes

see you at the end :))

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xii.

---

Case number: 77975564

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. were summoned by the Executives, in the name of [...]*

---

“Then,” Hirotsu crossed his hands at the small of his back. Curling an eyebrow at the two boys kneeling in front of him, he questioned: “Who wants to start explaining the crater on the twelfth floor?”

A beat.

Chuuya’s mouth tore itself apart right as Dazai’s own did, between sharp teeth and knuckles white on the carpets; though, the unrelented stream of words coming out of them — intertwining nonsensically; jumping all over each other in a mess of syllables — bore no further meaning than its brain-scratching sound.

“— if he hadn’t —“

“— absolutely no need to cover it in it —“

“— broken the tubatures again —“

“— dye my fucking hair —“

“— could I know filling his office with fish would stain the entire floor —“

“— taped his furniture to the ceiling —“

“— simpleton little fool —“

“— fucking bastard stupid —“

“— broke seventeen windows with his stupid baby fingers —“

Hirotsu raised a hand.

“Alright,” he concluded. “Let’s say blame is irrelevant. Just tell me where you put the missing bombs, and we can be done with this.”

Leaning against the doorframe of the man’s office — a square of distinctively well organized space, with pale walls covered from head to foot in maps and reports, and wide windows painting the souvenir statues on his desk golden — Kajii crossed his arms, peeved. “My missing bombs, thank you very much.”

“I’m merely concerned with who might be tasked to take Dazai’s furniture off the ceiling —“

“Fucker will probably leave it like that,” he interrupted. “Some stupid rant about how it’ll make hanging myself easier. ”

Gaping like a fish, Dazai covered his mouth with his hands, obnoxious. Slight trails of smoke rose from his shoulders — the result of the small hand grenade Chuuya had situated near his favorite secret entrance. He had remnants of ceiling, fish parts and water from the broken emergency sprinkles in his hair, amongst the hair clips — a strange mirror to how he had looked all those months ago, muttering the word partnership for the first time. “How did you know that.”

Chuuya huffed, crossing his legs. Tainted raised him a few inches off the floor, allowing him to glare up at the Commander. “You two need to stop acting like these are your first questions.”

Hirotsu blinked — very pointedly ignoring the tufts of black hair rendering Chuuya’s head an unlikely dirty broom. “Perhaps you decided you wanted a change of style.”

“You look ugly as shit,” Kajii offered, thumbs up. “But I support whatever crazy teenage fit you’re going through.”

The snort out of Dazai’s mouth echoed.

Over the lines of his fingerless gloves, the tips of his fingers grew hysterically red — then paled. “You think,” Chuuya hissed, “That I purposefully dyed my hair the color of the shit that’s in Madame Tanaki’s chimney?”

“The word you’re looking for is coal,” the Commander let him know, helpfully.

Hirotsu Ryuro was a question mark.

He had despised him for the single fault of bringing a tolerable Ability in his settlement — then, he had despised him for bringing Dazai along; the most aggravating omen from a blank-faced messenger. Then, he had despised him for putting his hands on their shoulders — for offering input, for stopping him from ripping the boy’s face apart, and for having the gall to attempt to reach them during Run from the handler.

The word handler always left a rotten taste in his mouth. Mori’s caution made sense; it didn’t mean he had to like it. It didn’t mean — he had reminded himself, as the man dragged him off Dazai’s ceiling — he had to like him.

But trustable, his good sense whispered. It had Pianoman’s cadence. From a distance.

“I truly believe it kind of fits you —“

“Sure it does.”

“It’s certainly a change,” he insisted.

“It’s fine,” Chuuya directed a glare to the other boy’s shaking shoulders. Kajii was biting his lips to raw skin. “It’ll match the black eye I’ll give him just fine.”

Sun filtered through the windows, without an inch of breeze filtering in to save them from the scorching heat. If it had been a few months ago, he would have been following Lippman around, hiding in the nearest alley when a fan appeared to ask for an autograph.

“Remember when I joined, and this clown,” The name sliced his tongue, “Passed out weekly Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletters?”

A sigh. “Still my greatest project.”

“I heard about that!” Kajii intervened, too excited. “I subscribed to it just this morning.”

Hirotsu’s pause was heavy. He glanced in Dazai’s unconcerned direction. “You — are aware that those newsletters never stopped, yes?”

“This week’s one had your dog flier!”

“I couldn’t just let it go to waste,” Dazai noted.

Chuuya’s gloves creaked. “I know.”

“Last week’s number included several pictures of you trying to climb out of the river.”

“Grandpa.”

“Did you enjoy France, then?”

“Remember when he spread the voice that I had fucking Athlete’s Foot and people started changing hallways when they bumped against me?”

Hirotsu dragged his hands down his face. “Vaguely. I shall hope Le Directeur accepted our conditions with little complaints?”

“Remember,” he insisted, “When he left a message written in blood on the walls of my office — telling me to buy him lunch?”

“Not really,” the man admitted. “But I do recall you chasing him down the hallway while he sported several packets of noodles in his hair. And ruining my new suit.”

“The noodles were a miscalculation,” Dazai offered, brushing the matter away.

“Facts are,” Chuuya snapped. “He aims to get me to lose my fucking mind. He’d thoroughly enjoy me chasing him around with a military rifle. He’s fucked in the head. You don’t get revenge on Dazai by losing your focus. You plan. I have up to two hundred and fifty recent methods —“

“Try not to strain your only brain cell.”

“No offense, dude,” Kajii intervened, “But your plans usually suck.”

“Excuse me —“

“And you boys’ plan,” Hirotsu echoed, foot tapping the ground, “Was to sow terror all over the Headquarters? We’ve got dead fish in the vents. Floor twelfth will have to be closed — and you two are banned from it. The fire sprinkles are broken, half of the desks are on fire — you are aware the damages funds are —”

“Not my problem,” Chuuya shrugged. “I also put a minor bomb in his office.”

“Chuuya.”

“A minor bomb.”

Dazai reached up, studying his nails, and grabbed his glowing wrist. He tumbled to the floor with a yelp.

Before he could climb to his feet and sink his nails in his already bruised skin, the boy had already made a run for it, ripping his hat off in the meantime — almost pushing Kajii to the ground in his effort to drag his crutches into the hallway, throwing his whole body inside the elevator.

“Chuuya!” he screamed, loud enough to call the attention of every nearby mafioso, as the doors closed. “Did you seriously dye your hair to copy me? That’s so lame!”

Goggles knotted with the red thread on Hirotsu’s walls, Kajii let out a panicked screech, as if dangling on the verge of the destroyed twelfth floor. Hirotsu’s defeat was already seeping through his teeth — still, he tried: “Chuuya, don’t —“

Stepping on Kajii’s abdomen in his rush out, Chuuya dashed so hard into the hallway that his shoulder crashed against the wall, leaving a small crater in the shape of his side.

“Hey!” Kajii called, “Gravity, dude!”

His feet halted by the upcoming elevator, taunted by Dazai’s cheeks and mocking tongue, plastered on the glass walls of his own. Chuuya pretended not to feel the way his spine stiffened at the mere thought of getting inside — he sprinted for the stairs. It’s just walls, he spat, though his lips stayed pressed close enough to pale. Yokohama had a smell no one else could taste. It called the things in his blood like magnets. Dante and his Limbo had been dead for months, anyway. It’s just —

“Last to get to the meeting room has to tell Tanaki he broke her favorite vase!” the boy called, when the elevator passed one of the open panels.

“You broke her favorite vase?”

“That’s to be seen!”

Chuuya ran faster than he ever had. The hallways were haunted by sunlight; cleaned up in the way of a distant night — the stench of blood only a suggestion. The mafiosi he bumped against kept their eyes on the floor.

Discomfort is a gift, Mori had told him, once, as they strolled down the gardens. Nobody wanted to be in the same hallway as Dazai when he recharged his gun; nobody wanted to walk in front of Chuuya when Tainted glowed. Mori's scarf had been dragging across the grass, drawing rivers of blood under his steps. Isn't it hard, talking with people who insist on meeting your eyes?

The meeting room was mere floors under the highest one. By the time his shoes landed with a crack! at the edge of the hallway, even his well trained lungs were straining against his ribcage. He had no time to slow down — the elevator doors' ding! broke through the silence, slamming Dazai's body against his own.

"Give my hat back!" Chuuya ordered.

"It makes you look stupid!" he screeched. A butterfly-shaped pin was hanging from his bangs. "I can't be seen around a wannabe detective!"

Clutters of crutches and too hard skulls echoed off the walls, hands kicking and slapping and reaching for the misplaced hat. Midday rays rained through the windows, startlingly bright against Dazai's sunburned skin — a distraughtly childish enough sight to almost halt him to a stop, when his bony knees kicked him in the forehead.

A sharp cough interrupted then.

"Well," The Colonel's hands were crossed at the small of his back — eyeing the mess of their bodies with flat distaste. Utterly toneless, he offered. "At the very least, our most promising recruits do not lack understanding of punctuality."

Despite his months of revenge crusade, he still donned a faded military uniform, shredded to borderline non-wearability. His bridled hair hadn't grown an inch — or maybe he had found time to cut it between one kill and the other. Minimally unfairly, Chuuya hated him on sight.

Stories about him didn't lack in number — unavoidable procedure to become an Executive. He collected medals the way some mafiosi did with blood. He'd killed men by liquefying their bones until only their vocal chords were left on the ground to scream. He vividly disliked children.

Chuuya owned a single worthy memory of him — a flash of him turning the ground under Verlaine's feet to emerald quicksands. The only words he had ever said directly to his face were a boredly observant — too much power is never an advantage.

"I'm always punctual," Dazai made sure to say, greve.

The Colonel curled an eyebrow. He had a piece of dried fish on his shoulder. Chuuya wasn't sure if he wanted to let him know. "Certainly," he commented, skeptical.

They climbed to their feet, moving into a compact resistance, a good distance from the Colonel's unmalleable shoulders. Hirotsu's disapproving glance — the man now perched at the edge of the stairs — assured him it didn't quite look like a defensive stance. More like the opposite.

"I'm always punctual," Dazai insisted. A bluish stain was rapidly forming around his eye; the mackerel-shaped bruises down his own jaw pulsed. "It's Boss who lives according to Elise's playtime."

A hazardous declaration to spit in front of an Executive. Chuuya watched the man squint.

Elise was an open secret. Kouyou's pointed glances and time had settled that truth between his hands — the wiped-clean expressions most mafiosi wore when they stumbled on Mori's path. No questions, was procedure. A matter of Abilities.

Other options came to mind. Chuuya had watched Mori twirl Elise's curls between fingers and concluded — unlikely.

Not because he considered Mori Ougai particularly right in the head — only because he wouldn't gain anything from it. He had never looked hungry for something that wasn't a wasn't already in his palm — warm and bloody and resinous, ready to feed any mouth but his own. The Sheep had never been as kind to him as they were when he refused his monthly rations.

That's how you rule, he'd told him, under the tainted windows. You don't wish for more than what's yours to take.

"Boss is already inside," the Colonel said, at last. He was an irkingly tall man; even Dazai had to tilt his head to meet his stone eyes. "We were waiting for you. The Headquarters have certainly had an exciting morning," He blinked at them with the texture of someone who knew exactly who to blame. "We have much to discuss."

"Great," he made a face. Dazai passed him his hat, sighing; offhandedly, he remembered the snapped cables from the bridge. "Not ominous or anything. After you."

---

...

---

It took Dazai kicking him in the back of the knees, to notice he was scratching his forearms to blood.

“Ane-san said you’re not to crack the tiles,” he reminded him, low, pretending not to feel the weight of the Executives’ stares. Perhaps it wasn’t pretense — perhaps he was too used to walking to the back of Mori’s throne, glanced at like every trouble of the world had arisen from a flutter of his eyelashes. “I assume staining them in blood is the same.”

“That’s not even nearly similar,” Chuuya replied, staring forward.

Dazai glared at him. Slowly, he lowered his sole eye to the naked tips of his fingerless gloves. “Not quite you to be nervous.”

“I’m not.”

“You aren’t,” he confirmed. “Then what? Theorizing the removal of your forearms to add onto your height?”

He halted the motion of his fingers — sunk the pads in the whitish lines up his skin, turning a vicious pink under the crimson neon lights of the meeting room. He looked at them; pulled at the scars until the spirals looked like smiles.

The walk to the table seemed never ending. Low murmurs filled the room; Ace’s irritated, louder tone. Projected in the air between the seats, the Bishop’s Staff symbol shone a merciless purple. He offered: “Remember when Tanaki brought that stuffed chicken from her ex-husband’s birthday party, and we waited so long to eat it that it just exploded all over Ace’s office?”

Dazai’s expression was almost concerned.

“Don’t look at me like that,” Chuuya snapped. “I’m trying to build a metaphor.”

“Yes, yes. Go on. You’re a stuffed chicken.”

He seethed. “Well, I’m not going on now.”

“Don’t be childish —“

“Fuck you.”

“I’m telling you, what about the stuffed chicken —“

“I’ll stuffed chicken your ass.”

Dazai’s fingers flexed around nothing, like choking hands. “That’s not even — that doesn’t make any sense. Are you —“

“Boys,” Mori spoke up, endlessly pleasant. It sizzled weirdly against Chuuya’s eyes, too used to his lines of ink and messages through the encrypted line — pungent with the reminder that Yokohama had its own devil. “There you are.”

It was night in the meeting room.

The floor to ceiling windows had been caged behind metal walls, squeezing the warmth out until the last drop of sunlight. The sole piece of furniture was the endless wooden table at the center of the room, surrounded by five gold-lined throne-like seats — only one of them empty. A frameless candelabra ruled the table, ghostly.

Neon tubes sneaked across the roof, smearing light of a burning kind of red that set the thing under Chuuya's skin off. Suffocating would have been a good way to describe the room — he assumed that had been the point.

“Come on,” Mori encouraged. “With me.”

When they passed by the empty seat at his left, he pretended not to see Dazai's eyes flare.

You will stay, if you wish to know, Mori had never told him. The view had done it for him — the pile of papers on a table carved with more money than Chuuya had ever held in his hands. Is that not familiar?

“ — with Le Directeur was fundamental, but the losses the boys' accident in Rengoku caused are not to be ignored,” Ace was saying, fiddling with some emeralds. With the way he was ignoring their presence behind the Boss' seat, they might as well have been invisible. “We're already suffering a shortage of men. Are we ready to risk another — unfortunate mistake?”

“The unpredictability of his power is exactly why we're suggesting its study,” Kouyou replied, ever so composed. Hirotsu had situated himself behind her seat — another allowance from Mori, in an effort to quieten whispers about her alleged betrayal. “Shall I remind you — we don't even know the full scope of his Ability, per Boss' own orders.”

I am deeply thankful to him, she'd written, in one of her letters. It takes cleverness, to forgive and trust from the highest seat. You and I, we were meant to be dead traitors walking. You should understand this.

Be grateful, Chuuya.

“We did lose a great number of men, but the boys' plan guaranteed we wouldn't lose all of them,” She kept her eyes on the Boss. “Involving Q and Doctor Tsuchiya was an undoubtedly convoluted move, but it saved more than half of my subordinates.”

“And yourself,” the Colonel pointed out, polishing one of his medals.

Kouyou raised her chin, idly sweeping her fan. “Indeed. I would be a priceless asset to lose.”

The Colonel and Ace exchanged a glance — something wordless but unmistakable, like the dirtiest whispers of the lowerest ranks. The woman's smile didn't waver — but it grew tighter.

“More of an asset than either of you lazy —” Chuuya muttered.

“Be quiet, Chuuya,” Kouyou said.

“But —”

Her glance was icy. He fumed, eyes on the ceiling.

A smile was carved into Mori's face.

It was the first time he saw him up close, since returning. He hadn't changed much — he never seemed to. Statuary in all that was needed to be recognized; chameleonic in all he didn't need others to understand. Chuuya had received a single letter from him, in his time away.

Corruption, he had asked, files and pictures from Rengoku stuffed inside the envelope. What did it feel like, this time around?

At a Boss-shoulders' distance from him, Dazai pinched his thigh, aggravated. Chuuya's nails tore themselves off his own arm.

"Indeed," the doctor agreed. "Priceless."

Dazai snorted, fiddling with his exaggerated number of hairpins. Boredom was clearly sinking its teeth in his bandaged calves, given the rhythmic stepping on Chuuya's own shoes. He recalled their first official meeting together — the Ninety-nine Hangman's Knot rendition he'd erupted in when Ace had opened his mouth.

"Dazai's plans have undoubtedly come to positive fruition," the Colonel continued. There was something distinctively mean in the glint of his eyes; but frozen over, like the circle-sculpted Hell from Lippman's library. Left to grow where it was coldest. "And the Nine Rings couldn't have been defeated without Nakahara, from what I've been told. Nonetheless, we cannot only rejoice in the spilled blood."

"Certainly an interesting reprimand for the Port Mafia," Kouyou considered. "Spilled blood is meant to be a positive result."

"Giving more responsibility and power to such wild cards —"

"Wild cards?" Chuuya echoed.

"Nobody has ever referred to me as wild," Dazai mused. "I have been called a savage, though. Is that same thing?"

"These wild cards saved the —"

"Boys," Mori called, still smiling placidly.

"They have dealt with thirty three missions during the conflict," Kouyou insisted. "Not one of them brought dissatisfactory results."

Ace raised his eyebrows. "Such competent bloodthirst at such a young age is — concerning, I would say."

"Or promising," the former doctor replied. He turned just enough to wink in his direction; Chuuya had the feeling he was missing half of the joke. "I always confuse the two."

“Our Executive agrees with me,” the woman concluded, nodding towards the empty seat. Chuuya’s ears reached, stilling. “He has already informed me and the Boss of his approval for the strengthening of Chuuya’s position.”

“What?” he questioned, pretending not to notice the itching burn of his forearms. The feeling of being watched wasn’t quite new — the feeling of being tested either, be it black waters or monthly rations or locked up baby pictures. The feeling of being given something — its weight ten lifetimes heavier than a slice of bread or a place at a pool table — was. “What do you mean?”

Jewels tight between his fingers, Ace waved the matter away. “Nothing that concerns you.”

Chuuya stared. “It obviously seems to —“

“Chuuya,” Kouyou insisted. It scratched his skin harder than his nails could have; from his side, he swore Dazai’s eye surveyed the spams of his fingers. “Please.”

“But why would the secret Executive —“

“Did he say anything about Dazai?” the Colonel teased, slicing through his words with the ease of someone who hadn’t been listening.

“Oh,” Dazai intervened, blinking. “Thank you for your concern on my behalf.”

“I’m merely wondering. You two do seem to make a pair, these days.”

“Not all beggars can be choosers.”

His eyebrow curled. Chuuya couldn’t find the taunt between the carefulness; couldn’t find the respect between the mistrust. “And what are you begging for, Demon Prodigy?”

A strangely childish smile stretched Dazai’s cheeks. His shoe pressed harder down Chuuya’s own — the only sincerity raining from him. He opened his mouth to speak; Mori raised a hand.

“Dazai,” he called.

“I’m simply answering a question. You called us here, Mori, you know?”

“Seems like this could have been an email,” Chuuya heard himself mutter, distantly.

“And Chuuya hates emails,” Dazai noted.

“If all you wanted was an excuse to discuss whether we’re too bloodthirsty to keep around or not —“

“You are,” the Colonel answered, easily. “It remains to be seen whether we’ll decide not to care.”

“It does, doesn’t it,” Dazai agreed, pensively.

Kouyou cleared her throat, pointedly laying her hands on the table — unarmed; wrists to the air. Don't give them a reason to fear, she had told him, walking next to him between the men's lowered gazes. Let them believe they're fearing for no reason at all. “Do any of us presume to challenge Boss' desires regarding them?”

“It's still a competition,” the man insisted, fingers clenched around his medals. Chuuya dragged his tongue down his teeth; attempted to promise himself he couldn't taste iron. “The most capable option should be picked. Knowledge can come in many shapes, but we do have requisites — knowledge in battle strategy; knowledge of victory outside of what an easily violent power can bring —”

Every bone in Chuuya's spine seemed to grow sharper — their bite excruciating, over the need to keep his shoulders taller than the back of the Boss' seat. “You want to say that to my face?”

The Colonel didn't even turn. “Knowledge in fighting techniques; knowledge in the handling of men —“

“Oi,” Even the waves of Dazai's amusement couldn't deafen the rush inside his ears. Chuuya thought of what it felt like to be nullified; of how easily Shirase had put a knife between his ribs. He thought of how Rengoku had felt, past the broken bones — where it was warm enough to burn; where it burned enough to restart a heart he didn't dare to hope for. “I'm talking to you, asshole —“

“Knowledge in the shiny machinations of ruling,” the Colonel insisted, undeterred. “Most importantly, knowledge in the Port Mafia's ways.”

Kouyou's smile turned sour at the edges. “I rather believe Chuuya's affinity in that matter has already been vouched for.”

The man scoffed. “The men love and trust those who would die for them. It doesn't mean martyrs would make good leaders.”

“The Flags,” she offered, and it fell on the table like a last breath — and suddenly, Chuuya couldn't hear a thing outside the whisper of his blood, climbing to his head, higher and higher, and higher and higher; tighter than a last word he couldn't make true. “Among the first of them. The most vocal, too — are you willing to sit at this table and call them martyrs, Colonel? What should you say they died for?”

“You picked the wrong example.”

“Did I?”

“Rather,” the man said, blanker than the sky. He shaped letters around what Chuuya's world had been until it hadn't — because us kids get it unfair, Shirase had sworn, and, you will get us all killed, “Considering just who is to blame for bringing the cause for their own demise inside our borders —“

“That's enough,” Hirotsu intervened.

“ — and just who might end up being the cause of more of our men’s demise,” he insisted, over a voice that couldn’t be whispered — a more, and more; and what more could it not want, given all it had lost, “Considered everyone at this table seems to have decided some lives are expandable in the name of fueling a power none of you understands — “

Something popped in his ears.

Chuuya registered it all in parts, coming down from the high, edges and corners blurred. The crater under his feet, stopping right where Mori’s seat began. The trails of warmth chasing each other down his wrists, wetting the edges of his gloves until they were soaked. The bloodless tips of his fingers, held in a merciless grip by Dazai’s own hand — ripped off the scratches he had torn open in his arms; shutting off the last traces of Tainted.

Whatever’s more logical, he told himself.

Drops of blood landed on his shoes. When he unclenched his jaw, teeth creaking in the effort, he tasted it on his tongue. He reminded himself his glee was his own — until it became hunger.

The room was staring.

Dazai squeezed the life out of his fingers — once; twice. He pried his own away.

“Possibilities,” Ace bit into the silence, as if a point had been proven, “For many, countless reasons — are meant to start at a fair point.”

Chuuya felt lightheaded with something too bitter to be anger. He dropped his hands to his sides. He stepped away from the crater.

“I ask you to keep the Flags out of this,” he told no one at all, eyes forward. In his peripheral vision, the Colonel set his jaw.

Mori tapped his fingers on the desk, assorted — running nails down dusty skulls, trying to pick the one that would talk the least in his palm.

“I doubt the boys’ accomplishments need to be discussed any further,” he said, finally. It seemed to unlock something in the room — all the shoulders fell. Hirotsu and Kouyou’s eyes stayed on him. Dazai stayed staring at the ceiling. “Boring reports and futile matters. Chuuya’s trip to Europe has been extremely beneficial. We covered our traces in the Black Market; gained fallen channels and a sought after recruit. And Dazai’s work on our channel has sped up our recovery of roughly three, four years.”

The curve of his mouth grew an inch more benevolent. “Naturally, we shouldn’t forget the other recruit Dazai brought to us. What was his name again, Dazai?”

Ace snorted, hiding it under a jeweled hand — Kouyou was quicker to put her fan in front of her mouth. Dazai didn’t squirm, tilting his head from one side to the other. “You’re so hard of hearing, sometimes, Boss. It’s Oda,” A pause. Chuuya darted a look at his face, at last — all he saw was glass, hiding a marble wall. “For you.”

“Ah, yes,” Mori’s smile was too heavy for the lightness it offered. “I recall. I admire your will to make friends, Dazai,” The neon red lights painted his gloves; blood, but not quite. “You have a duty towards the ones you bring in the shadows. Your fault and your merit. Yes?”

“Yes, Boss,” Dazai said, almost without petulance.

Satisfied, Mori turned to his Executives again. “I understand not everyone in this room will agree with my proposal. Nonetheless, if you won’t despise me for it — I’d like to hear their answer.”

Chuuya’s fingers curled into nothing, naked tips tracing velvet motifs on the back of his chair. Through the glacial silence, he settled his nails on Dazai’s hip, grazing his dress shirt.

If he hadn’t felt him stiffen, he wouldn’t have known; his face stayed impassive — mildly aggravated, despite the unwavering glances raining on them, behind Mori’s most pleasant smile. As subtle as possible, he traced: I knew A-C-E didn’t want us there.

No, Dazai tapped, on the naked square of his gloves. Chuuya’s blood had stained the wrists of his dress shirt. One of his hairpins had scratched his ear. He needed to cut his hair; Chuuya needed to wipe his arms somewhere. Jewel rivalry. Your fault.

But the C-O-L-O-N-E-L?

Has a recruit he wants in the seat, was his answer. Preparing him for months now.

Who?

Your N-O-G-U-C-H-I.

Chuuya’s head snapped to him.

“We still have a long list of troubles in need of being solved, after the Nine Rings’ mess,” Mori continued, unconcerned by the quiet. “Recruitment, regrouping — the other organizations need to understand a new attack wouldn’t be a wise idea. Our boys’ instances of collaborations have been nothing short of divine fuels, right?” He directed his vacant grin to the table. Kouyou was still staring at him. “They might as well use it to restore the organization. By the end of it, I will appoint one of them as Executive.”

“And this collaboration,” Kouyou echoed, with the tone of someone swallowing bitterness in pieces. “What would it entail, precisely?”

Mori hummed. “That remains to be seen. I’m certain, given their history — and property damage reports — that the competition will work out just splendidly. That is — if they’ll accept my offer.” Even the lights appeared dimmer; uselessly, he attempted to convince himself that the red blossoming on the table wasn’t gore. “Otherwise — well. I do wonder how long it might take them to be considered for the Executive seat.”

Dazai’s amusement was sharper than the edges of the candelabra. He unclipped a moon-shaped hair clip — laid his hand on the back of Mori’s seat.

“I must add,” Mori dared, “Dazai will maintain command over the Secret Force. Which means — Chuuya will need some side hustle,” He directed him an apologetic grin. “His ruling over the jewelry market was revoked during the conflict. I have received some proposals. Our Hirotsu, for starters, offered to welcome him as one of the three ancient commanders of the Black Lizards. ”

Dazai’s foot-tapping paused. Stunned, Chuuya met the man’s unwavering gaze, behind the crown of Kouyou’s hair.

“Then there’s the Colonel.”

Chuuya’s attention was stolen. The once-soldier, though, didn’t waste any time looking at him. “He also proposed to let him join his squad,” Kouyou let out a sound — something vaguely offended; vaguely perplexed. Chuuya couldn’t stop staring; couldn’t stop hearing his voice curl around his words — the cause of their demise. “The Colonel’s Ability is somewhat similar to his own. He believes he could help him learn some...” Mori searched. “I believe he called it control. ”

Pointedly, the Colonel glanced down at the shattered tiles under his feet. His eyes made their unhesitant way to his arms; Dazai’s sudden, long suffering sigh called his attention away: “Is this a dog auction, or what? All over a little gravity?”

Annoyance pulsed under his skin. Thicker, slithering through tighter veins, a mouthwatering suggestion. “My Ability is perfectly —“

“And then, obviously,” Mori interrupted, “Kouyou has been very clear with her desire to keep you as her subordinate, Chuuya.”

There was nothing to think about. “I’ll do it.”

Kouyou’s grin appeared slowly; but it was hardly hidden by her fan. “It would be interesting, though,” Mori considered, idly, with a hint of tease. “To see you working with them.”

“Weren’t we discussing him working with me?” Dazai jumped in, clearing his throat. His shoe was stubbornly stuck over his own. Chuuya kicked; he didn’t even wince. “This is starting to actually sound like a dog auction, Mori.”

“I’ll be happy to work alongside them on a few occasions,” Chuuya offered, over the bad taste it left. “If it would satisfy you. Boss.”

“It would,” the man admitted. “But we’ll discuss it later. This is my offer.”

A beat.

The Colonel was the first to speak up. “Does that mean the fifth Executive seat has been ruled out permanently?”

The Boss’ surprise was evident. “No, not at all. It is a battle between the two of them, isn’t it? Conflicts rarely end with no devastation on both sides. Should someone appear in the meantime, and should they prove themselves worthy of the title — well. I suppose the boys will have to wait until at least one of us falls by the hands of serpents and poison, yes?”

Silence was quick to linger, at that.

“Alright,” Dazai spoke up. “We’ll do it.”

His last nerve snapped, right along to a corvine strand tikling his nose. “You don’t speak for me, you —“

“You were taking so long, though. Slug.”

“You don’t even know if I —“

“Boys,” Mori called, delicately. “Remember your other revoked privilege?”

Their mouths closed.

“That’s better,” the man sighed. He offered a friendly smile to Chuuya — a, I know how it is, trust me, that ran across his bones like nails on chalk. He was spinning them across his palm — frustrating, but breathtaking to watch. “I assume Dazai was right, though? You agree?”

No, he said, honestly, in the privacy of his mind. He’d wanted the Executive position for the sake of documents — he’d wanted it because there had to be a point. No, I don’t want his hand-me-downs any longer.

“We’ll do it,” Chuuya concluded, curtly.

A breath went through the room; he failed to understand who’d let it out. Mori’s smile was borderline sincere, this time, and ten times more dangerous for it. “Wonderful news. We should get to planning, then, shouldn’t we?”

“Something interesting,” Dazai sighed.

“Boss,” Kouyou bowed her head.

“Boss,” said Ace and the Colonel.

The sky slept on Chuuya’s nape, gentler than those caging walls. It bled down his arms; at last, he wiped them on the abandoned sleeve of Dazai’s coat, and watched him stare at him as he did it — victorious, somehow. He remembered, distantly, flying for the first time. “Boss.”

You ought to be angry, Adam had written, on the one month anniversary of the end. I cannot understand it. But you ought to, if it lets you breathe.

Mori relaxed against his seat, once again awkward. “By the way, Chuuya. Forgive me the curiosity,” Next to him, Dazai’s lit up. “How come you went with a hair change?”

---

...

---

The underground parking lot rested at the very edge of Yokohama, under a rural area any and all gangs of the city had utilized at least once — be it to train, be it to hide, be it to fight.

Nowadays, its empty center was haunted by a ten feet tall mountain of Souls’ corpses.

“Dear,” Tanaki whispered, like an exhale. It wasn’t quite horror; something more like wonder, lined by the knowledge of having to find it sicker than her brain demanded. Her scar glimmered the same silver of her hair, under the flickering lights. “The smell is certainly something.”

Chuuya grunted his agreement. It was just overwhelmingly pungent enough to become a background. Nauseating at the edges — bitter like vomit and feces near the center, plagued by the ghost of dried viscera and decaying skin.

Or so they told him.

“Suribachi was worse in the summer,” he offered, hands deep in his pockets. Empty eyes were settled all over; some of them removed from their sockets, dangling by nerves. The Souls had kept on walking even mutilated; the hill of death could have been one of those Inferno frescoes Kouyou had wanted to decorate her living room with. “They never really got rid of the skeletons from The End.”

“And this?” she questioned, unable to look away.

Chuuya kicked the ground. “A warning,” Near one of the entrances, a small group bearing the Hounds’ jackets stared speechlessly at the exhibition. It had been stuck there for almost two months. “Dazai’s idea.”

“Of course,” Tanaki stuttered. She held her fingers tighter; remembered, at some point, that she had been there for almost forty years. Seen worse, perhaps. Seen too much of it. “Of course,” she repeated, straightening.

He crouched down. Watched a femur that wasn’t connected to anything at all. Watched the reddened skin around the scars on his arms — and tried to remember what that bloodied, suffocating air in Rengoku had felt like. The temptation of a burning flame, he thought — as monumental as the inconsequential need to verify if it stung. Being told divinity existed, being promised it could kill, and being stuck where it could only bleed him out. Arahabaki was no enemy — but something closer.

He bit down a smile of scorn.

“Darling,” Tanaki called.

“Ma’am.”

Her glance was reproachful.

Chuuya let his eyes run down the death-grip her hand had on the vacant space of her overgrown shirt. She hadn’t thrown away her pregnancy clothes yet; the night before he had left, he had overheard her stutter her way through a panic attack at Kouyou’s suggestion to do so.

Alright, she had reassured her, eventually. Held her hands. Chuuya hadn’t touched her in months. Alright. We shall keep them close.

There was a corner of his skull, he had explained, to the empty rooms of his apartment in France, that had been carved from the same rock Rimbaud’s tombstone rested upon.

It had been there long before he’d met the man — but every carefully molded item he’d forced inside it had been washed in a different light, recently. Every thought about what Shirase might be doing in London; every instinctual turn to find one of the Flags in the seat next to him; every shuddering fit his fingers went through when he got too close to a light socket — when thunder gathered in sky.

Tanaki fit in there to a fault.

“Do you think the city will be safe, these next few months?”

The question made him blink. “As safe as it always is, I assume. Why do you ask?”

“I’m thinking of —” Tanaki cleared her throat; tore her eyes away from the mountain of corpses, as if not wanting to be rude. “Well. I was thinking about inviting my children to the city for the summer. It might be a good time to — talk.”

Chuuya stared. “Shit, Tanaki.”

“Language.”

“Didn’t you say you haven’t talked with them in more than —”

“Ten years, yes,” She studied the tattooed lines up her arms, intertwining with well-disguised scars. Chuuya wondered if that had been the point. “I thought, given the situation — I mean. I shouldn’t miss more than I have, yes? They haven’t answered yet, but —” She deflated. “Who knows if they will.”

From the top of the mountain, an almost severed head was finally released from the bones holding it to the neck. It rolled down floors of open chests and broken legs — landed on the floor with a squelch and a flicker of the lights.

“I’m sorry,” he said, sincerely, hands deep in his pockets. He tried to remind himself that honesty needed no anger.

Her smile was tight. Chuuya's skin remembered the feeling of her viscera through his fingers only vaguely — how sticky they'd been; how easy. "It's not your fault."

He kept his eyes on the decapitated head — the dried puddle of blood reaching the columns they had leaned on. It wasn't quite alive enough to offer a reflection. Chuuya knew how pathetically desperate he had looked, through the reflection on the eyes of a corpse that looked like him.

I don't remember it, he mused about telling her. A few months ago, perhaps, he might have — might have used it as a way to shrug responsibility off his shoulders, and land it on her bloodied skin. I don't remember any of it. I can't forget it's mine.

"It isn't your fault," he echoed, because at least one of them had to be weighed down by sincerity. "If they answer, they do. If they don't, that's on them."

"Maybe," she agreed. Her hands wrapped around her belly with an absence that told him she had forgotten — again. Quiet, where he wouldn't disturb, he tasted vomit. "They deserve better than a woman who abandoned them for an inch of power at the ends of the ethical plane. But a mother loves, Chuuya. She can't help it. I would be kinder if I could — but I can't."

A revolting kind of jealousy crawled in the deepest pits of his guts.

Shut up, he thought, needing it not to be his own — in that slightly headache-inducing way that made his voice echo across his skull; as if thoughts could reach what might be poison in his blood, or a bundle of power between his ribs. Shut up, look at what you've done.

No answer came. Despite his bones' oldest beliefs, Chuuya was still the only one to share his spine.

Prove it to me, he heard himself drawl. The arena was empty. He was being taunted by the thorns on the doors. It's just a few words. It's just a string of codes in your veins.

"That's alright," he offered, staring at the ground. He didn't move when she made her way to the corpses — didn't question her refusal to cover her mouth and nose, despite the retching. He didn't flinch when she picked up a gun and started shooting at the long dead — again and again, expression as placid as when talking of summer trips. "There's no need to be kind."

---

...

---

Greyish stone walls and dirty windows filled his eyes at the first street turn, rusty gates leading to the entrance acting like the cherry on top of that lower-city cake.

Wild Geese Orphanage, the sign read.

The genuinely cheerful voices coming from the house never lacked to surprise him — though, as for any facade owned by the Port Mafia, the current of tension underlining every sound under the sun wasn't easy to miss. Things that belong to us, Albatross liked to say, tend to belong to the night.

A small hand attempted to reach for his back pocket.

"Sayuri," he reprimanded, his warning grip around her wrist enough to make her drop the wallet, "Old newsflash: you could just ask."

The girl looked younger than she was — she lacked three front teeth, and wore pastel hair ties in two brown buns bigger than her face. "Can I haf your wallet, Hat Sir?"

"It's Chuuya," he huffed, in a tone he had studied — sculpted until it was the exact opposite of the one people had spat at him when he was her age. It was a lost battle — in all the months he had visited the Orphanage, she had never called him anything but that. "And no."

Her face fell.

"Take these, though," He extracted more bills than he would probably make for another three weeks, and handed them to the gaping child.

"What do I even do with this?" she almost whispered, panicking.

"Hell, brat, I don't know," Chuuya whispered back. "Pay your taxes."

"And you keep telling me you're not one of the Seven Lucky Gods?" she insulted, deadly serious. "My big sister told me all about them," Then, with the tone of someone who had heard something that sounded cool to say, but who hadn't exactly understood it: "I'm onto you."

Hilarity burned his throat. It didn't feel all that good. "Wrong god, I keep telling you."

"Liar."

"Am not."

"Are too."

"I'm taller than you."

Sayuri blinked, perplexed. "And?"

He made a face. "Listen, where's Koda?"

She grabbed his hands, after stuffing the countless bills down the second-hand red dress she was wearing. “I’ll take you to him, Hat Sir!” Her seriousness was no joke; if a child could be professional, she fit the description. Chuuya had yet to figure out if she was pulling his nose about the whole becoming a seal trainer thing. “And then you can give luck to Momo as well.”

The deafening embrace of dozens of children laughing and living pushed his lungs against his ribs, as the door was torn open. The Port Mafia, Mori had always said, smile resinous, did not deal in child trafficking.

[Which, Chuuya knew, didn’t mean no one in the Poet Mafia dealt with it. People were the one goods the syndicate refused to openly trade — but that definition hardly covered closing an eye on convenient money introits. Still — he had watched Mori order Sama to crash a man’s skull against the edge of his desk, after humming at reports that spoke of human trafficking cases. Still — he had watched him keep the reports.]

There are no good people in this world, Kouyou had explained, once. You just stand with those who look like they sleep at night. /

The smell of dust and homemade meals clogged his nostrils, pulling at the tips of his fingers. He imagined he would have ended up somewhere just like that place, had those police chases in Suribachi City gained any results. It was a metaphor of sorts, he supposed — for Detective Murase to have been reduced to nothing more than a man bleeding out on the ground.

The last door they reached, past the stairs, was slightly ajar. Sayuri was quick to push two sticky fingers to his lips, signaling to keep quiet. She disappeared down the stairs faster than he could protest against, pushing him towards the door as a last goodbye.

“Great,” Noguchi Toru said, quiet enough to be polite — unenthusiastically so. “The shorter half of the psychos is back.”

A kid was sleeping on one of the bunk beds scattered around the room, round face caressed by the sunlight streaming from crooked windows. His blond curls and freckles were a perfect mirror of the man sitting at the edge of his bed, tracing paths on his forehead. Koda didn’t raise his head — but he directed a pointed finger to the two silhouettes dangling their feet from the facing bunk bed.

Noguchi grunted; Tsuchiya slapped his arm.

“What,” the man muttered. It had been a while since he had looked at him with that kind of disdain — it pulled the fishbone tattoo on his cheek. “It’s true.”

Chuuya prepared to snap. A second look at Tsuchiya froze him in place.

Her green hair had been shaved on one side; surgical scars climbed all the way up her forehead, pinkish webs that all collided into one dead end — her missing right eye, and the broken eyelids sewed upon the cave, surrounded by a ring of bruises.

Bullet wound.

Tsuchiya offered a smile. Nothing about it was friendly; if anything, it was more respectful than she had ever dared. “Sir. Was Europe fun?”

The door closed. On the bed, Koda gulped. “What happened to you?”

Noguchi’s drawl could have been a laugh, if it hadn’t smelled so thickly of rage. He blamed himself for the surprise it caused him; almost two months of collaboration had attuned him to — not the man’s respect, but at least a semblance of it. “As if you don’t know?”

He squinted. “I don’t, jackass, or I wouldn’t have asked.”

“Toru,” Tsuchiya insisted, smile tight. “I don’t need your antagonism. Grow the fuck up.”

“Grow up?”

“Guys,” Koda stuttered. “Please. Uchiyama is sleeping.”

“No, I want to hear it,” Chuuya replied, taking a step forward. “I told you I didn’t know why she wasn’t allowed to come with us. If you have shit to say, spit it out.”

“Chuuya —“

“Your partner,” Noguchi spat out, jumping down from the bunk bed. “Thought it a good idea to put a fucking bullet in her head. She almost died. And you want me to believe he didn’t tell you? You’re the only one he deems worthy of his half assed explanations!”

“Toru,” Tsuchiya blurted out. “Toru, come on, you know why he did it —“

He laughed, disbelieving. “As if we’re not filled to the brim with Ability users? You were keeping a promise. Isn’t our code centered around honor — the importance of deals?”

Chuuya put the pieces together, one by one — felt them thump heavily against his head. “You told Dazai you destroyed your sister’s tools.”

She didn’t answer, eyes on the floor.

“You destroyed your sister’s tools?” he insisted. Mori’s funerary declaration in the meeting room made sense, suddenly — the urgency. “Are you mental, Tsuchiya? You just took and deprived the organization of —“

“She had made a goddamn —“ Noguchi growled.

“You aren’t listening,” Chuuya snapped. Koda sighed. “Do you understand just how many of our men will die because of this? You want me to believe Doctor Tsuchiya would have wanted this?”

“You didn’t know my sister,” the woman murmured, weakly.

“This isn’t about your sister, Tsuchiya,” he swore, stunned. “This is about my men, and your companions, and — Rengoku would have ended to shit if not for those tools.”

“That’s why I waited,” she said. “It was already going against my sister’s wishes, but I — I didn’t want all that blood in my hands.”

“And what — it just doesn’t matter, from now on? Don’t you dare act naive when —“

“We have doctors,” Noguchi intervened, halfway to him, taller than Chuuya’s neck could comfortably bear. “We have fucking Ability Users of all kinds. The Mafia code —“

“The Mafia code talks about survival, in every and all conditions possible,” he interrupted him. He traced the scars on Tsuchiya’s face — imagined, almost too easily, the bored expression Dazai would have been wearing as he punished her. “You want me to blame the bastard? These sorts of decisions affect the syndicate. We don’t get to make them. You don’t get to make them. You’re lucky he didn’t put that bullet in your —“

His back was slammed against the wall.

Chuuya only met the ire in Noguchi’s eyes for a moment — his fists burned crimson between their bodies, and the knuckles that hit the side of his face sunk so deep he thought he brushed bone.

On Koda’s bed, a child whined.

“Put your hands on me again,” Chuuya warned, somberly. The hit was ricocheting all over his skeleton — the sizzling blood on his knuckles hissed like the wind, twirling around him with the glee of laughter. “You’ll regret using those tools to save me.”

The room was a snapshot — Koda, curved over his waking brother’s body; Tsuchiya, hands raised in an intervention she wouldn’t act upon. Eyes on Noguchi — crushed against a destroyed bunk bed, breathing half as harshly as Chuuya was.

“I’ll kill you,” he swore, climbing to his feet. His eyes were stuck to the glow of his hands — like the complicated, blurry gaze he had worn in Rengoku, as Dazai dragged Chuuya away from his own destruction site. “I’ll slaughter both of you. Albatross was fucking wrong about you.”

Mercilessly, the creaking door was slammed behind him.

The sound stuck in Chuuya’s throat didn’t quite feel like his own. It stung — easy and direct; nothing more than a fact; nothing more than the tape keeping a wall of pictures in a chaotic dinner room intact. He stared at the ground, and he attempted to remember not to break his own teeth.

Alright, he told himself. It came a bit late; bad reception and the smell of blood. Alright.

The silence burned the room, reflecting embers on Koda’s pained face and Tsuchiya’s lowered head. “He has his reasons to protect me,” she said, quietly. “And I had my reasons to do it.”

Abruptly, Chuuya felt more tired than he had any right to. “People always do.”

“I accepted the consequences — I was ready to be executed,” She frowned at the ground. “I’m not sure why Dazai decided not to do it.”

Chuuya knew, though. He didn’t know if it was because he understood — or because he’d been twisted enough to approve; or because he’d been dissecting and rebuilding every reachable inch of Dazai’s psyche ever since they’d met. He wasn’t sure he wanted to know.

You got rid of our best solution. You’ll be the first to test out the consequences.

He tightened his lips, staring at the ceiling. “I get that you feel guilty about your sister’s death, Tsuchiya. I understand. In other circumstances, I would admire your stubbornness.”

Her scorn was evident. “No, you wouldn’t.”

Chuuya thought of the shape Rimbaud’s corpse had left in the concrete. He did it for a friend, he had reprimanded Dazai. He did it for — “I would.”

She hesitated; jaw setting. He took a breath. “You shouldn’t have done it.”

A bow. “I apologize for the trouble my choices will bring,” she spelled out, easily. “I won’t tell you I regret them, though. I never will.”

“I was here to offer all of you something,” Chuuya huffed. “Doubt Noguchi will agree, now.”

“I’ll talk to him,” Tsuchiya promised. “He doesn’t need to bear my faults. I can’t promise he’ll accept to work with Dazai, though.”

“And you?” he asked. “You would?”

A flash lit her only eye up — if he hadn’t grown up around it, perhaps, he wouldn’t have recognized it as briskly as he did. But fear was everywhere in every place he’d ever called home; whether he’d put it there or he’d pushed it down his organs until it wasn’t visible anymore.

Still, she stood straight. “If necessary, sir.”

The click of the door behind her was gentler. Judging by the tense lines of Koda’s back, hushing his brother from fully waking up, it didn’t quite feel as such.

“Sorry,” he muttered, tersely. “Hope he didn’t wake up.”

“Ah, it takes m-more than that, to get Uchi to abandon his dreamland,” Koda reassured him, offering him an awkward smile.

“He missed you much?”

“Refused to even speak to me, when I came back,” he sighed. Only affection moved his hands through his golden locks. “Little pest.”

Uchiyama was several years younger than his older brother. To Chuuya's knowledge, he'd been living at the Orphanage since Koda had enlisted, seven years ago. He didn't know what had happened to their parents; all he knew was that Koda had left for the quickest way to make money.

I had always been good with a rifle, he'd told him. Joining the Port Mafia had either been bad luck or great one — that, Koda had never told him.

"I'm s-s— I apologize," he added, nodding towards the destroyed bunk bed. "But you'll have to pay for that."

"Yeah — Yeah, of course, man."

"And you'll have to settle to talk to dear old me."

Chuuya huffed, stalking his way to the nightstand, leaning against its sharp edge. "How unfortunate. I'm still gonna need you to spill your guts on Noguchi, though."

Koda made a face. "Always him. You used to want to talk with me. These days, I have to read that Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter, if I hope to hear from you."

He massaged his nose. "Are you aware Noguchi is the Colonel's pet project for Executive position?"

His wince was full body, and the red that bloomed on his cheeks managed to hide even the freckles. They were darker and more insistent than Chuuya's own, but they cursed him with a softness that refused to appear on Chuuya. On him, they just looked like more scars.

"I like the hair, by the way," Koda said, at last.

"No, you don't."

"I didn't know if you knew," He scratched his Port Mafia tattoo, right under his throat. "And I know you want the position, so I thought... I m-mea —" He made a face.

Chuuya waited, patiently, keeping his eyes where Koda wouldn't feel them like a weight. He'd learned in time — as tentatively as someone who was used to stomping on cracked ground could — that the man didn't need to be told what he already knew. He'd talk. He just needed a bit of time to.

"We needed to work together, in France," Koda said, some muttering later. "You were under Boss' orders. I was just trying to —"

"To keep the hostility contained," he concluded, curling one eyebrow. "Bet Noguchi knows, though, doesn't he?"

His blush deepened. "Sorry, sir."

"Don't sir me, right now. Give me answers instead."

“What do you want to know?”

He crossed his legs, studying the reddened tip of Uchiyama’s nose. “I thought he’d worked under Albatross.”

“Albatross started out under the Colonel, too,” the man reminded him. “I think he considered him a teacher of sorts. He must have sent Noguchi to train under him for a while. The Colonel must have seen — something in him.”

“You’re with the Colonel too,” Chuuya considered. “And you’re ten times better with a rifle than he’ll ever be.”

Koda snapped his tongue, the way he did to prepare for a long speech. “I don’t think the Colonel likes soldiers much. There’s m — a lot of them, in the syndicate. Dishonorably discharged. It’s rare for them to end under his command.”

“And you?”

“Like you said,” He shrugged. “I’m good with a rifle. But Noguchi — you know how he is. The men like him. I’m not saying he’d be a better fit, but the C-Colonel believes he can make him one.”

It wasn’t unusual. While Kouyou had never necessarily tried to groom him into an Executive, it had only been because Chuuya himself was set on that goal. Dazai’s was both Mori’s pet project and the person he wanted least on that throne — they had found their balance on their own.

Wanting the fifth Executive to be unavoidably tied to themselves was a good strategy; one that would assure them at least one ally at the table. Still, sculpting and fretting over entire classrooms of mafiosi, trying to find who’d fit the seat better — it was dangerous. In the Sheep, it would have been the A formula for a civil war.

“I think,” Chuuya concluded, “That I will work with the Colonel.”

Koda blinked. “He offered?”

“Perhaps he’s looking for another champion. I have no intention of becoming the shithead’s puppet, but if I can keep his attention off Noguchi — Boss wants me to try, anyway.”

“But then —” The man frowned. Chuuya recalled the first time he had laid his eyes on him — a large-scale infiltration, under the fireworks-rained sky of a nearby festival. A silhouette, crunched under a bench with his hands clenched over his ears, murmuring something. “What did you want to offer us?”

Later, he had found out that something had been military commands for mines emergency. In a blink, under the edge of his clawed-at shirt, he had seen the faded mark of the prior Boss’ tattoo — a tear falling from heathers. He had been alive during the Crimson Rain season — Chuuya had kept him alive, still, and he had been his friend, to the best of his traitorous abilities and past mistakes.

The problem with touch, he considered, was that it bore no understanding of past examples.

“Six people,” he said. “Executive Kouyou wants me to gather a squad of my own. A better challenge than mere subordinates, she said.”

“Me,” Koda guessed. “Tsuchiya. Noguchi. If you still want them.”

“Noguchi was a good card in France,” he huffed. “But for him to come around, he needs to relax his fucking grip on Tsuchiya.”

“He’s a bit — intense about her.”

“Are they together or what?”

“Oh, no,” Koda was quick to shake his head. “Not at all. I don’t know much about Noguchi’s past, but he had a big family. Yukio is like his little sister. T-Te — bad things happened to him, and now he’s a bit — overprotective. She was the one to bring him into the organization, you know?”

Chuuya leaned his head on the wall, counting spider webs on the ceiling. The wood dug into his scalp — if he tried hard enough, he could pretend to be back in this or that abandoned house in Suribachi, waiting for Yuan to steal stuff she wanted from dusty, makeshift households.

“Tsuchiya shouldn’t have destroyed the tools,” he offered.

Koda tightened his lips. “We swore our loyalty to the organization. I understand her g-grief. Her sister was all she had, and she wanted her last wish to be fulfilled. But she deprived the syndicate of a weapon. I — truly did believe Dazai would execute her.”

“Punishments have no reason to exist, if they can’t teach a lesson,” Chuuya replied. “The bastard knows this. Killing her would have been another story for the men to chit chat about for a few days, and then it would have been forgotten. Now she’s a reminder. For both herself and everyone else. She will be targeted.”

“And you want her in your squad, still?”

“Her Ability might be useful. Maybe she can redeem herself, or something.”

It didn’t look like Koda believed his words. Tsuchiya had made a selfish choice. She’d lost an eye for it. For some reason, Chuuya didn’t want her to lose more.

“And the other three?” Koda asked, finally.

“One of them already agreed,” he said. “Or he will, anyway. I’m sure. I think you’ll like him. As for the other two —” He snapped the hem of his glove against his skin. “No one comes to mind. But I’ll find them.”

Koda grinned. “O-Of course you will. You know, most people are dying to work with the man behind The Rengoku Massacre.”

“And the others are pissing their pants about the possibility,” he grunted. “Works great for an ego.”

The man opened his mouth to retort; before he could, a voice echoed from behind the door, screeching out a deafening: Koda!

With stunning strength, the door of the room was almost torn off the hinges — successfully managing to tear Uchiyama’s eyelids apart, at last. Sayuri was standing with her feet wide and hands on her hips. “The thif got in the kitchen again!”

“Thif?” Uchiyama echoed, sleepy.

Koda sighed, standing up. “I’ll come down to check in a minute, darling. Make sure the doors are locked, yes?”

“A thief?” Chuuya asked, once she vanished down the stairs. “One of the kids is stealing food?”

“Not one of ours,” Koda replied, picking Uchiyama up. Head on his shoulder and eyelids heavy, the kid waved at him. A bit awkwardly, he nodded back. “Someone keeps sneaking in. We’ve only seen a bit — it’s a girl, I think. Small, f-f — quick, good at what she does. The patrons would prefer not to involve the police, seeing how she’s clearly taking to eat, and — you’ve heard about the disappearances. It feels like the wrong moment to refuse a young girl some help.”

“Make sure not to be around, if they do call the cops,” he reminded him.

The man rolled his eyes. “Some subtlety.”

“We’re in our territory,” he huffed. “And I, thank you very much, am an honest employee in a jewelry store downtown.”

“And Chuuya — please, ” Koda added, hand on the doorframe, lowering his voice. “If you could refrain from encouraging Sayuri’s stealing tendencies.”

He blew air out. Uchiyama giggled, staring at him with eyes wider than the moon. “I don’t know what you mean.”

“Chuuya.”

“If anything, I’ve been telling her to ask — “

“I’ll talk to Noguchi and Tsuchiya,” Koda called, ignoring him, as he went down the stairs. “Try to find two less p-problematic people for the empty seats, would you?”

Chuuya only felt them following him after thirty three seconds had passed. Consequently, amused — he let them.

The road was quiet. Strays crossed the street with more insistence than cats, carefully eyeing the homeless men piled up next to closed shops, as if hunger might make them do something they wouldn't dare under the sunlight.

Hands in his pockets, he traced shadows with the tips of his boot, dragging his hands down the shattered curve of his phone screen. The charms got caught between his fingers — Kouyou's reprimands echoed in his ear; the tone she wore when he squinted at pricey shampoos. If I didn't need to reach you, I would encourage you to not even own one. You treat that phone disgracefully.

He hummed.

The hands appeared in a blink — around his wrist, around his middle, over his choker line.

Four men, he counted, quickly, allowing them to manhandle him into the nearest alley. All older than him — in typical Port Mafia attire. No guns.

“—tight,” one of them grunted, pulling his hair to snap his head back. The cold edge of a blade tickled his Adam's apple. “The fucker lives longer than cats, they say.”

“Are you sure he's the right one?” The one doing his best to dislocate his shoulder scoffed. “First he lies about those prissy Sheep, now about his talent. Not that much of a damn god is —“ Chuuya snorted.

As one, that eight-hands machine petrified.

Tainted came alive with a sibyllic whisper. It spread from every inch of his skin, wrapping around the blade on his neck and the hands touching his skin like a snake intent on strangling.

“Get a—“

Curses exploded from the men's mouths as they dropped to the ground, shattering the bones of their knees and hands against the breaches their newly gained weight opened on the sidewalk. He cracked his neck; spat blood near the head of the man whose gasping cries were growing louder.

Crouching down, he laid his hand on his buzzed hair. “Wasn’t the Nine Rings Conflict enough entertainment, dipshits? You guys needed some Port Mafia on Port Mafia violence?”

First he lies about the Sheep, then —

He frowned.

The man’s lips parted, drooling a mixture of blood and spit on the ground. Deciding to forget it, Chuuya pushed his head down with crimson fingers, leaving him to his fractured nose and the pool of blood spreading under him.

“I’m assuming this is about Rengoku,” he said, unimpressed, as he climbed to his feet. Crawling limbs and pathetic whines; nails sinking in the concrete, as if it might push them up. For good measure, he stepped on one of their forearms, snapping the bone. “Some, he’s too dangerous to keep around ideal, I’m guessing?” he continued. “Tough shit. You’re not the first miserable nobodies I hear this from.”

Leaning the heel of his shoe against the head of the man who had choked him, he mused: “If you’re so scared of the big bad god you say I am, what makes you think four of you shit born worms would manage to bring me down?”

Through the whimpers, he heard them apologize profusely. The broken clock of his phone turned to midnight. Chuuya kicked their skulls in.

Kajii was exactly where he knew he would find him — the excitement sparkling through his eyes when Chuuya had mentioned the Old World had been impossible to miss. Stepping on the tiles somehow didn’t crack the earth open in two; not even the sight of the playing gangs in the pool area managed to to curse his spine, snapping it via some karmic ricochet.

The Old World looked the same — lights and drinks and sounds and everything but the blood, slippery and new and too late. The bell on the door ringed the same; when Chuuya walked in, no chorus of voices screamed his name.

Alright, he told himself. There was only so much someone could bleed. Alright.

Be grateful, Kouyou reminded him.

“I’ll let you know, I’m fucking Mafia!” a voice screeched. “Have been for two whole days!”

The sound of glass breaking rattled the entire room. Over the first row of tables, it seemed, Kajii was getting his ass handed back to him.

Chuuya stared at the ceiling. Making his way to the circle of the makeshift fighting right, he sighed: “Alright, that’s enough.”

It wasn’t the first time something of that nature occurred — Kajii’s idea of a celebration involved a bar fight, and Kajii’s idea of commiseration involved a bar fight, and Kajii’s idea of an evening involved a bar fight.

He grasped the leather jackets of the duo attempting to kick his face in, washing them in a red glow that made most bystanders turn back to their business. When he dropped them on the other side of the ground, he made sure not to let their intensified weight ruin the new tiles.

“I was handling them,” Kajii slurred. Blood flooded down his nose and from a split lip — he used it, very rationally, to draw stilyzed lemons on the floor. “All over some money?”

“You’re so stupid it’s alarming,” Chuuya decided. He glanced over to the duo. “Forgive the mess. He’s not the sharpest blade around.”

“He broke a wine bottle on my brother’s head!” the woman snapped, fruitlessly struggling against the invisible weight pushing her down.

“Fucker,” said brother mumbled, drenched to the bone. “I even bought him a drink.”

They were clearly twins, but if asked, he wouldn’t have been able to pinpoint what made them so similar — apart from the same shock of silver hair, a shade darker than Shirase’s was; longer on the man’s than on his sister’s military cut. Where he was thin and tall, she was bulky under black clothes — but something in their gazes was utterly matching.

“You two remind me of someone,” he crunched down, ignoring Kajii’s protests and, man, you won’t even help me? “When did you join?”

“Give me back my money and maybe I’ll tell you,” the woman grunted. “And get this — this thing off of me!”

“It’s an Ability, idiot,” her brother said.

“I’ll murder you next, ” she warned, glaring at Kajii’s moaning figure between Chuuya’s legs. His eyes were too busy to care — he leaned down, picking up the man’s weapon from under the back of his jacket.

“An Howa Type 20,” He spun it around his fingers. “Nice rifles. The GSS used these, up until some weeks before the Nine Rings conflict. You must have changed sides pretty recently.”

The twins exchanged a gaze. “What’s to you?”

“Nothing much,” Chuuya shrugged. “But you were with them when they formed an alliance with the Sheep, weren’t you?”

Lighting up with understanding, both their faces were quick to fall — recognition pulling their jaws to the wine-splattered ground.

He flipped the rifle, snapping his tongue. “Yes. I remember you. You were with the other helmeted bastards enjoying the show, when I got stabbed.”

“The fallen King of the Sheep,” the woman concluded, carefully. He brushed his Tainted off, scratching the tip of his shoe against the floor. “I suppose that’s a worn out title, though. The Gravity Manipulator has other nicknames, these days.”

“Do I?” he wondered. He threw the gun on the floor, after stealing the bullets and slipping them in his pockets. “Some examples?” He paused. “Possibly not from the Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter.”

Another look. The joke, it seemed, hadn’t landed. “Do I seriously have to buy you guys alcohol? Talk about Pirate Honor; ah, GSSes?”

“Better GSSes than the Bishop’s Staff,” the brother said, nonsensically.

“Chuuya,” Kajii groaned. “I think my ass is broken.”

With vertiginous ease, the murder attempt ended up with the four of them at the counter — chugging drinks and dripping blood down their clothes. Chuuya could get behind it. At least, they went straight to facts.

“I didn’t mean to break it on you,” Kajii swore, holding onto Kure Kenta’s hand, tearful. If he remembered his broken knuckles had been caused by the man’s sharp jaw, he didn’t show it. “Really! All that alcohol, wasted — if it had been wine —”

“Take that back,” Chuuya hissed, behind the edge of his glass. “You put lemonade in vodka. That’s fucking shit.”

“Don’t judge it until you try.”

“I’ll judge you. ”

“You think Max Thank or whatever his name is, is a valiant role model —“

Chuuya spluttered. “It’s Max Planck — and he discovered Planck’s constant, literally? It laid the foundation for the quantum theory —“

“Physics nerd.”

“Fucking chemistry nerd?”

Rin, the sister, cleared her throat. She was sipping her scotch, studying Chuuya a bit too cautiously to be drunk. Her brother’s head, on the other hand, was against the table. “We joined some months ago. Neither one of us has any taste for traitorousness.”

“Didn’t you betray the GSS to join?” Chuuya commented.

“No,” her brother muttered. “We were kicked out. Like pathetic little worms.”

“Talk for yourself,” Rin slapped the back of his head. “Personally, I think they’re the worms.”

“What did they do to you?”

“Started paying us less than what we were owed,” she spat out. “Have been doing this to most of the men, for months. No booze, no drugs, no money, no anything. People won’t work for nothing. Their funds went to shit after the unlucky bet they made on the Sheep. Executive Kouyou took us in.”

Chuuya blinked. “You’re her subordinates? How come I never saw you around?”

“Must have run in different circles.”

“We were avoiding you,” Kenta offered.

“Nice,” he muttered.

“Well, can you blame us?” the man slurred, meeting Kajii’s eyes with drunken vigor. The Ability User was more than happy to support him, nodding energetically. “Imagine you — hic! — imagine you ruined the life of this guy, who’s super powerful — and then you find out he’s got masses annihilation powers, too?”

The leather of his gloves screeched around the neck of his glass.

“Yeah!” Kajii turned a half-lidded, betrayed look on Chuuya. “Man, why didn’t you tell me you were a whole natural catastrophe? You could have — you could have incinerated me.”

Chuuya downed his glass in one gulp. When he slammed it down, Rin was the only one not startled. “I still could, fucker.”

Kajii and Kento had seemingly decided that murmuring about the pros and cons of lemonade would be a good enough pastime. Maybe the silence was just in his mind; in the tight space between one rib and the other. An empty injection on his veins, with bubbles of oxygen forming under his skin and preparing to put him down.

“You do know they’ve been talking, right?”

He snorted. “As obsessed with gossip as the Mafia might be, they’re not good at whispering.”

“It’s good, you know?” Rin offered, behind the rim of her beer. “For them to fear you. You led the Sheep. You must know.”

“The Sheep weren’t —“

“What happened to them, anyway?”

“Greedy brats,” her brother added, eyes going off in opposite directions. “I’d be surprised if they’re still kicking it.”

Chuuya stared down his empty glass.

A familiar buzz drowned the alcohol haze; a question he’d heard many times, but only in corners of his skull, bumping and bouncing — never sticking around. Now that it was there, a withering creature to blink at, he wondered what Arahabaki would think of tearing it apart.

Shirase, he thought. Shirase was supposed to be closure, wasn't he?

He was safe in London, off to reclaim a crown Chuuya had never asked for; and he didn't hate him, and maybe he blamed him — but that was another matter, wasn't it? That was closure. A green jacket to the flames.

“Katsuki is probably a soldier,” he said finally. He wasn't quite drunk. He'd never allowed himself to try, not with the Sheep; the first time had been with the Flags. They'd refused to tell him the forgotten outcome; Iceman swore Chuuya had picked a fight about, you dislike me, don't you? “He'd — gotten himself some fake documents, just in case. He's always been tall. Tall fucker.”

“How old is he?” Rin asked, frowning.

Chuuya scratched his ear. He used to know this stuff. “Thirteen this year, I think?”

Ino was nine, and smaller than even Chuuya had been at her age. She had whispered to the GSS shooter next to her to aim for his forehead. She was good with a knife. She had a pretty face. He wondered which one of the two options would win; if she would end up like old Mina, one of the girls who'd welcomed Chuuya, taken by those white vans he had been too young to chase.

And then — Mitsuo, with his sign language that he'd mostly made up himself. Kyuo, who never quite understood how to use a gun, because he didn't need to. Fumiko and Aimi, the twins, who had liked his Ability the most. Momo, Arata, Michiko, and Saburo, and Kohaku, and Yoshito.

The silk veils in some wooden boxes in the lower levels of the crater, the lack of experience, of age, of everything. Chuuya had needed to remind some of them to eat.

And Yuan — Yuan, he mused, like an afterthought. Yuan had been good at running.

“So, dead, I assume,” he concluded, a bit angry, but not exactly sure of the target. Dazai, maybe, for his machinations. Or Mori, for offering something he wanted. Rimbaud, for not dying when Verlaine had killed him. “Most of them. I know they didn't regroup, so — I hope they are, at least.”

“You hope?” Kajii murmured, cheek against the sticky wood of the table.

“Not the worst thing that could happen to a child with no resources. Especially if they GSS want revenge for the failed alliance,” Chuuya stared at the glass in front of him — a bit blurry. He couldn't recall how many times it had been refilled. “I'll put a bullet in their heads myself, if it keeps them from —”

He trailed off.

“You cared about them,” Rin commented. “They didn't fear you.”

Chuuya shrugged.

“Wasn’t that the problem?”

The Sheep had never been scared of him. They’d had no reason to. He hadn’t wanted them to. Fear had arisen only at the very last moment — with a bloodied knife, and the knowledge that going back was no longer an option.

Will he kill us, he’d seen them think, seen them panic, seen them wonder. Will he kill us, now that we don’t have the right to cry in his bed?

But Chuuya was one of them. He’d been picked up from a bed of pitch and cockroaches, had been fed and clothed by them — had sworn, at eight years old, that nothing he might ever desire would ever be more important than keeping that house of cards still. Chuuya has wanted their asphyxiating embrace and their sucking claws — and he’d wanted them to leave him dry and boneless, if it would keep them alive.

Lippman had called it — get over the tiny assholes, can you? Doc had said — a part of you feels like you were the one doing the betrayal, does it not?

Chuuya had gathered their ripped limbs all on his own, before the cleaning squad had arrived at the Old World.

“Nah, ” he concluded, watching one of the barkeep refill his glass. “The problem was me.”

Chuuya didn’t want to be feared. He didn’t want to be Verlaine, striding through the world with empty eyes and a hunger for something that he couldn’t have. He didn’t want to be Dazai. He had nothing to prove — no one to beat. The body he’d held in his arms, whose eyes he had shared, was gone.

“And shitty Dazai, too,” he added, some moments later. “It’s always shitty Dazai’s fault.”

“Boss’ freak?” Kento blurted out.

He frowned at his glass. Indistinguishable, through the reddish haze, was the unknown land of the boy’s face, the caves and the bruises — even harder to climb over and struggle through and see than usual. As in, Boss’ Dazai?

Treacherous hypocrite until the very end, he concluded: “Fuck off.”

The rest of the night was a blur.

He thought, the Flags would have loved this.

In typical Old World fashion, two more fights started before the end of the evening. They refrained from doing more than look during the first one; by the time the second group jumped on each other, Chuuya’s guts were warm enough with wine to make him climb onto Kajii’s shoulder, as Rin and Kento mirrored them, barking along. He thought, the Flags would have loved this.

The Flags would have loved this. Sometimes after Chuuya and Rin tied their arm wrestling competition, Kento ended up challenging him to a drinking duel. Enthusiastic enough about that first night, even the barkeeps crowded near the counter, chanting a litany of Chug! Chug! Chug! that spun faster than a washing machine through his ears. He thought, the Flags —

This, he thought — the bar, the music, the games, breathing and drinking and existing —

It was only when a small group of mafiosi had to drag Chuuya inside from the sidewalk — where he had begun viciously smashing street lights — that one of the barkeeps grabbed the back of his choker, pulling him over the counter.

“That’s quite enough,” Dazai Osamu said, behind an offensively fake pair of mustaches. “I’ve been feeding you water for half an hour. It was very entertaining! Chug chug, et cetera. You do recall we share a damages costs account, yes?”

Chuuya stared, dumbfounded.

Dazai, his brain attempted to connect. Mustache. It wasn’t even brown. Dazai in a fake mustache, standing over the passed-out body of a barkeeper. He reached for Rin’s glass of wine; he watched the boy move it away. Dazai. The mustache was blond. Dazai in a flag-shaped hairpin. The Flags would have loved watching him live to sixteen. The sound of pool games. He liked pool. He did not like Dazai. He reached for Rin’s glass of wine.

The boy slapped it away. “Are you stupid?”

“No way,” Kajii whispered, hidden under his stoll. His wide eyes were settled on the newcomer, fogging up his goggles with horror. “No way, Chuuya, Chuuya — we’re being attacked by the Port Mafia.”

Frustration veiled in his throat, stinging his eyes with unexplained tears. He slapped Dazai away, uselessly; gesticulated to the entirety of the bar. “You idiot,” he almost shouted, “You are Port Mafia, je ne peux pas continuer à t'expliquer —“

The man’s hands searched under his coat, desperately intent. “I’ve got my bombs right here, Boss, n'ayez pas peur, I’ve got them right here —“

Dazai jumped over the counter. He pulled him towards the exit, uncaring of choking him by the grip on his choker. He sighed: “I’m afraid suicide by explosion has recently been ruled out. Onto the next!”

I don’t wanna leave, he thought about screaming — it got stuck somewhere in his throat. Albatross was usually louder when he dragged him out — all dangling chains and singing songs. He would be disappointed. He wouldn’t give a shit. He was dead, and the Sheep better have been too, and it was all him, all him, be grateful, all him. I don’t wanna leave. I don’t wanna stay.

Sprawled on the floor, out of their minds, only half watching as Kajii fiddled with a lemon bomb, the twins raised their hands in a goodbye — mere seconds before Rin threw up in her brother’s lap.

“I’m sorry about the foot fungus thing, Kajii. You’re not a foot fungus!” Chuuya screamed back, helpless, as the door closed behind him. Albatross had never found out he’d stolen his favorite pair of sunglasses, and so, “— I’m really sorry I got you killed.”

Half dragging him, half attempting to get his arms to stop flagging around, so that he could pick him up on his back — Dazai stilled.

He stumbled out of his hands, snorting, again and again, until his nose burned and his throat choked on his need not to scream. The sound of a small-scale firework shook the ground, deaf to Dazai’s soundless moving lips — landing him face first into the nearest hedge.

---

...

---

Despite the shattered car window, Hirotsu’s unimpressed gaze didn’t lay on them until he had actually pulled the backseat car door open.

“Did you know,” Dazai was insisting, reaching over to correct the lines of nonsensical kanjis Chuuya was sluggishly exercising writing on the man’s stolen notebook, “That you can’t commit suicide by holding your breath?”

“I could,” Chuuya garbled, immediately, eyes watering from the effort of remembering that recently-learned art. Discomfort was knocking on every corner, dutifully ignored — the tight fit of their bodies lying on the backseats, heads pushed against the car door; with Dazai’s freakishly long legs stubbornly pushing for space. His dirty footprint was tattooed on Chuuya’s best pants. Pieces of glass tickled his knees. His neck was curved unnaturally. “I really should,” he concluded.

“No, no,” he insisted. “Your muscles would stop you. And watch that stroke — what are you, a chicken leg? Look. Like this.”

“Fuck my muscles.”

“I’m infinitely smarter than you. Trust me on this. I was on the roof, the other day —“

He squinted at him. Dazai’s pupils were blown out of proportion — Chuuya tried to recall if he’d seen him ingest alcohol or headache pills, at some point between dragging him by the calves and almost getting thrown in the river. “Why were you holding your breath on the roof?”

He shrugged. In the tight space, and given their position, all it did was almost send himself rolling down under the seats. “Jumping sounded unoriginal.”

“You jumped yesterday.”

“That’s why it’s unoriginal, now.”

“Boys,” Hirotsu interrupted.

They looked up.

“Oh!” Chuuya exclaimed, before returning to his notebook. Dazai had scribbled a little dog on the corner of the page and, after kicking him between the legs — he had added a little hat on it. “Gramps. Drunk driving is a crime. Give us a ride.”

For good measure, Dazai reached over the backseats to pick up a lost coin, and threw it right into the man’s monocular.

The emergency light in the front seats was offensively bright. Chuuya had a vague memory of Murase and Matsuda screaming at him whenever he turned it on, on days they managed to lock him inside the police car. Something something waste, he thought, and, something something battery.

“I think electricity shouldn’t be taxed,” he declared.

Dazai perked up. “While we’re on it, I think penalizing suicide is frankly —“

“Alright,” Hirotsu sighed, pushing the door closed. “Let’s just go,” He slid into the driver’s seat, only slightly rattling them with the immediate acceleration. His knuckles were white around the steering wheel; he glanced through the rearview mirror, frowning at the unmistakable fresh bruises on both their faces. “You know, you could have just called, instead of breaking in.”

They stared, blankly.

He sighed again. “Where to?”

It was all strangely blurry. In the time it took Chuuya to squint, suspicious, Dazai stole the notebook from his hands. Undeterred, he reached for the edge of his black coat — and held it over their bodies like a makeshift separé.

“Do we trust Gramps?” Chuuya whispered.

Dazai turned so fast his neck creaked with it. Chuuya went strabismic in the effort to meet his eyes at that vicinity; he focused on his braces, instead, and had to bite down a senselessly victorious grin. “We don’t trust Gramps.”

“He’s old,” he hissed. “He has an agenda.”

“You’re ugly. I don’t trust you either. Why are you a furnace, anyway —“

Chuuya stole the notebook back. Dazai kicked his knee.

“Bet he wants to become Executive,” the boy insisted.

He gasped.

“Boys,” another voice intervened, “I truly have no aim to —“

“Well, what do we tell him?” Chuuya squinted.

“Well —“

“Boys,” Hirotsu interrupted, somehow, despite the coat-curtain. “I can hear you,” They gasped. “Oh, for God’s — I can drop you off at the HQs, if you prefer.”

They exchanged a look.

“Go here,” Dazai rattled off, eventually, with a deep sigh. “If I free a drunk Hatrack into the city, Mori might just sit me through another Sanitary Habits presentation. I can’t afford that,” The car took a sharp turn. Chuuya’s head bumped harder against the car door. He cursed.

Colors blurred and focused, the lights from the buildings pulsing against his retinas, framed by the glass-less window and the edge of the pages they sluggishly passed back and forth. Beautiful, beautiful Yokohama. Chuuya could have muttered a few words and razed it to the ground.

Would you?, someone asked. Pianoman had a tendency to sound reasonable; Iceman, daring. Chuuya had always preferred butting heads — it was why they never sent the older man to talk to him.

He wondered what their eyes would have looked like at the mention of Rengoku.

The kanjis grew less casual, after a while; he got the feeling Dazai had baited him into writing down some poem only he knew. Every and each one, no distinction among them, it read. All taught to die was best.

“You’re sure you don’t want me to help?” Hirotsu questioned, a good half an hour later. He was leaning against the destroyed window of his car, cigarette in hand, directing skeptical looks to the assortment of abandoned apartments in front of him. “I can carry him upstairs.”

“It’s Chuuya,” Dazai replied, muffled, attempting to drag him onto his back and not stumble.

“I am Chuuya,” he confirmed, head hanging crookedly from his shoulder.

Hirotsu sigh. “Drink some water.”

The boy started walking too soon — they crashed against the entrance doors. “You’re not the boss of me!” Chuuya called.

Safe-houses had been an unspoken idea, bloomed in the week of the aftermath of Beatrice's death. Her office under the Arcade had been the first of the bunch — whenever Chuuya had entered it, a new piece of mismatched furniture or emergency kit had been left on the ground.

Eventually, seemingly arbitrary doors all around Yokohama had started catching their eyes. Dazai had left dog-shaped stickers on the binds of an underground store, filling the doorknob in itching dust; Chuuya had hung a mummy-puppet dangling from its neck on the door of an abandoned apartment.

Precaution, he recalled justifying it, to no one in particular. Chuuya didn't remember much of the journey back from Rengoku, except the taste of blood. Chuuya had never really bled, before Corruption — and he had no intention of starting in the open street.

The gaming systems had been a whim.

“Technically, it's Mori's bucks,” Dazai said — blue controller held between his chin and his shoulder; so that he could keep his eyes on the TV and gingerly gulp take-out noodles. “What else is the mission budget for?”

“Weapons,” Chuuya guessed, mercilessly attacking his own red controller. Cooling water brushed his chin, breaking right at the edge of his bent knees; he wasted a blink, as he always did, wondering what patron had decided to place a bathtub in the living room. “Men. Car lifts. Stuff to help the mission.”

The boy thought about it. Shrugged. “It's easier when I make the plan and you kill them.”

He retched. Dazai shivered.

The apartment would have been considered a scam by most of the working class — weirdly placed rooms, strangely shaped windows, and destroyed kitchen aside, it gave the impression of being about to fall. It had no furniture, apart from the one they had dragged in; electricity was a guess, and water usually came in a single, powerful rush, before shutting down for the rest of the night.

Chuuya's biggest concern was the family of spiders Dazai refused to kill — then again, he had only woken up with one of them walking over his face once. The Sheep, he knew, would have treated that place like a goldmine.

You don't owe poverty to anyone, you know?, Kouyou had retorted, the first time she had visited his apartment. None of the richness you refuse to take advantage of is ending up in their pockets.

Chuuya hadn't answered.

He studied the edge of his boxers, floating under the only slightly strangely colored water. His box of food was a makeshift ship over the surface; the torn piece of wet shirt he had tied around his forehead wasn't quite helping with the hangover.

He said: “About Tsuchiya Yukio.”

From the other end of the bathtub, soaked bandages in place, Dazai's face freed the way for amusement. "Are you going to tell me I went too far?" he asked, like he already knew the answer.

The edges of it all were still a bit blurred — a crueler sort of daze, not merciful enough to make him unaware. "Ask stupid questions again," he said, studying the whitish line of the scythe scar on his forearm, "And I'll kill you."

Forgotten, his car crashed somewhere on the side of the screen. A crown appeared over Dazai's own character — his untouched noodles stared back at him.

"I just think it's interesting."

"What is?"

Dazai scratched his ear against the edge of the tub. He was paler than moonlight, apart from the sunburned spots. Chuuya could count his ribs, if he squinted. Weren't the bandages a pain? They had to be. Were they? "Your concept of authority."

"I'm too drunk for this."

"You respect Mori," he insisted. "But I'm just like him, and you don't normally approve of my methods."

What a weird thing to say. Not because it wasn't true — not because it was. Similarities laid in crossed hands under chins and people rolling in their palms; useful or not. Differences relied on the assumption that someone would care enough to search for them.

"You're not like him," Chuuya said, slowly. It was supposed to be taunting, he believed.

Dazai's soaked bangs stuck to his skin, somehow always feverish. He was all sharp lines, despite the lingering childhood; Chuuya could imagine what he would look like in a few years. All sharper lines. Women would keep sending bombs and breaking Chuuya's phone with calls.

He was making a face. His braces were catching the light. His hairpins were all over the floor. "What a weird thing to say."

Chuuya recoiled, kicking water. Feeling like there was something more to be said — feeling like he might just never say a thing again, and Dazai might not either, and it might just be fine — he grunted: "I don't care who you punish. But my affiliation with you creates problems. I need Tsuchiya and Noguchi to collaborate."

"Ah, yes," Dazai commented, uninterested, dangling his head over the edge of the bathtub. His bandaged throat was washed in the START AGAIN? lights. "Your Amazing Six."

It was a lost fight from the beginning. He stared at the hint of wrongness he couldn't quite place on his naked hands, hidden under the veil of water. "At least don't antagonize them."

"But they're boring, aren't they?"

“It’s not for long. Just ‘till,” He hiccuped; wondered where his gloves were, and if his shoulders should have been tenser about it. “‘Till I get my Executive seat.”

The snort that abandoned him was real, at the very least. “You have such big dreams for a tiny slug. Unrealistic, too.”

“No way you’re beating me,” he scoffed. “Making us fight together will just highlight how unrealistically pathetic you can be.”

“You need me,” Dazai snapped his tongue. “The same can’t be said for the opposite.”

“You’d be dead ten times over if I weren’t around,” he drawled. “Need to remind you whose collaboration you asked for, when nobody would believe you about the crosses?”

A hint of pettiness pulled the boy’s face — which meant a win, but not one he would acknowledge. “I’m still becoming an Executive before you.”

“No, you’re not.”

“Yes, I am.”

“You can’t even fight right —“

“When I become Executive —“

“Which is not going to happen —“

“Let’s bet, then,” Dazai challenged, because he was dirty, and he was a child, and Chuuya never saw him quite as lively as he was when the prospect of putting him in the mud appeared.

“Fine,” he snapped, sitting up straighter; pushing water out of the bathtub and onto the ruined tiles. He stumbled to the side, only a bit; he picked up his chopsticks, stuffing the boy’s mouth with shower-wet noodles. “I bet that I’m going to become an Executive before you.”

“And I bet,” the boy rebutted, through his forced munching, “That I’m going to be the youngest Executive in the Port Mafia’s history.”

“When I win, you’re going to receive the most horrid, bone chilling price of your life —“

“And when I win,” Dazai taunted, pushing himself forward on the water, until the slimy skin of his knees pressed against his, “You’ll regret not getting tortured to death by Professor N.”

He offered his hand. In the darkness of the safe-house, a frown overtook the boy’s traits. “Why?”

Chuuya blinked. “To seal the bet, moron.”

“That’s not how you do it.”

“What, you wanna link fucking pinkies?”

The sudden grip over his palm startled him; astonished as he was, he let Dazai play around with his hand, until every finger but the little one was bent. His pale finger, wet and bony, was confident and quick to wrap around his gloved one.

“Now, it’s a bet,” In a motion he didn’t recognize, he made their knuckles knock, clicking his thumb with his own. “Got it? Look at us. I could vomit.”

“It’ll be over when I kill you.”

Dazai’s pity was tactile. “Torturous latency is to be expected from you, but still.”

“It’s just a word,” Chuuya spat out, curtly. He ripped his hand away from the other’s grip. “Mori can fantasize all he wants. You can call me partner all you fucking like. I didn’t sign any damn blood pact.”

Cruel to the bone, and intoxicated, and familiar, Dazai’s grin broke his face in two.

The determination with which he stood rained a new wave of water all over him, soaking the floor even further. Chuuya cursed him out, as he watched him jump out into the warm air to kick the controllers away from the puddle — bumping against walls in his effort to gather his clothes, stalking to the kitchen.

Chuuya looked at the bright shadows the small television had painted on the floor. He pushed a noodle out of the bathtub; hanging onto the edges of the ceramic, he sank underwater.

The silence was utterly incommensurable.

It pressed against his ears, muffling any hiss that wasn’t the twirling blood inside his veins. He watched strands of hair float in front of his aching, unblinking eyes — didn’t realize he had curled up on the floor of the tub, until an echo of sleepiness slithered between the fingers he was cutting through those ersatz waves.

He recalled — blurred, at the edges — the torn apart belly of a stray cat, abandoned at the doors of one of the Sheep warehouses. Whatever sadie had done that to her had not known she was pregnant. Chuuya recalled watching a small, pinkish shadow — barely a kitten; barely a breath at all — crawling through the blood; attempting to fit inside the open gash of its mother’s womb.

Won’t you let me go home?

Neon green flickered behind his eyes. Lines of numbers — lines and lines and lines, and cold and dark and quiet. A hand on a glass tank.

He kicked his head out, stumbling out of the tub, gaping for hair.

“What are you doing,” he demanded, as blankly as he could possibly muster up, dripping water onto the kitchen tiles.

“Isn’t it obvious?” Dazai’s head was stuck under the counter, gathering vase after vase. He slammed them on the marble. Chuuya wasted no time wondering why that specific safe house had been filled with strawberry jam.

He lifted a knife to open them. Chuuya spluttered: “That’s mine, you ass —“

“Hey — take off your gloves.”

Defensiveness spread through his body like fire on gasoline. A bit too pathetically for it to work, he hid his already-naked hands behind his back. “Why?”

“I want to draw dicks on your knuckles.”

“Fuckin’ entertainer you are.”

“I know, you have your whole dauntless philosophy going on,” the boy huffed, wildly bumping his fist against the base of a particularly stubborn jar. “If I take my hands off my pockets it means I will fight to live, and blah, blah, blah. I assume the gloves work similarly? All the same, no need to be dramatic. Take them off, yes?”

Chuuya spluttered. “I don’t — I don’t talk like that, you bandaged giraffe —“

“Giraffe? Because I’m tall?”

“Because you look stupid!”

“What have giraffes ever done to —“

The jar opened, at last, splattering jam all over the counter. Dazai stared at the mess. For the first time that night, Chuuya took notice of his lack of leg-cast and crutches. “Look what you did.”

“What I did? ”

Openly ignoring him, Dazai slid both his hands on the counter, palms up. “Don’t be annoying.”

“You —“

“For however arduous it might be for you.”

He slapped his nape.

“Do it or you’re a coward.”

“I hate you. ”

Only a candle on top of the refrigerator illuminated the room. Next came Dazai’s intent gaze, serious in its chilling amusement — as if taking responsibility for his own tricks.

Feeling foolish to take the bait, Chuuya gingerly laid his naked palms on the pale ones on the counter.

The rush of No Longer Human was as detested as ever — familiar in its shape and in the useless resistance his body put up against it. Tiny needles prickling every pore of his skin, seeping inside, grasping, pulling, turning off something that didn't even know how to recharge.

"See," Dazai said, "That was easy. Now."

Distracted as he'd been, it took him a moment to understand what the sudden, slimy cold against his palms was.

"Are you fucking kidding me?" he screeched, trying to pull his hands away, stopped by the death grip of pale fingers around his wrists. Jam went flying everywhere. "That's disgusting —"

"Now you're just being dramatic," Dazai huffed, peacefully continuing to spread jam on both their hands with one of Chuuya's knives. "To think I was trying to compromise for you."

He gritted his teeth. "Compromise?"

"Surely you didn't want me to actually cut your palm?" He blinked, raising his knife. Jam dripped from the edge of the blade. "Rituals have unusual requisites. I had considered putting up the candles and all, but I'm allergic to candle wax."

"Of course you are."

"I don't get why people have to cut their palms, anyway," Daza continued, idly. "Such a messy work. And painful, too, which — no, thanks. An elbow would do. Anyway, mixing our blood seems a bit — extreme. Who knows what canine germs you might pass me. I'm not ready to jungle the weight of human-animal experimentation —"

Chuuya hit the nearest jar with his elbow, splashing the boy's face with a satisfying amount of jam. Plain exasperation painted his traits.

He snorted, unabashed. The knife pressed harder against his finger — cutting. "Hey!"

"Now, because of you, it's jam and blood," Dazai muttered, jam pooling down his nose.

"Man, that's gonna get infected —"

"With what? Strawberries?"

"Seriously, what did the pollution in the river even do to you —"

"I, hereby," Dazai interrupted him, dropping his tone — and when Chuuya raised his voice, he repeated it, again and again, until their screams were an indistinguishable storm of adolescent voice-cracks and pettiness, hands pulling and jam dirtying the counter, the knife flying somewhere on the floor — "I, hereby," he screeched, high enough to plug his ears, keeping his hands still with his whole forearm as they rolled around the kitchen, kicks and punches and assured bruises, “In the name of the blood that was spilled and the will whose honesty we will never contest —”

“Is that the recruitment ritual —”

“— I shall here permanently bind Nakahara Chuuya’s canine existence to the desires and orders of —”

“Do you want me to kill you — ”

“ ...Nakahara Chuuya’s canine existence to Dazai Osamu’s, in the name of a much detested partnership, promising to not stick each other’s furniture to the ceiling and cover the doorknob in celery dust, especially when said dog knows that it gives me asthmatic attacks —”

“ — and what the hell do you — ”

“ — and only minimal insults about your hats — ”

“ — don’t believe that for a second — ”

“And all those nice, revolting things partners are supposed to do, unless I get bored, in which case I will ask our men to shoot you straight and clean in the forehead —”

Perhaps the wine-haze ran deeper than he had initially thought. Chuuya couldn’t quite remember what the rest of the ritual had demanded — by the time his pounding head allowed him to open his eyes again, he was starfishing on the floor, trying to find the moon through graffitied kanjis on the broken ceiling.

One of the older Sheep had attempted to teach him the bases of reading, he recalled; and then he stopped recalling, because it was draining — trying to contextualize the Sheep’s kindness.

The Flags, he considered, had been easier.

Good-hearted to the bone, over the first three layers of blood on their hands. The Flags hadn’t needed him, he added, ungrateful, and it had felt good — and he got the peculiar feeling that if he continued on that line of thought, he would end up emptying his guts in the broken toilet.

“What does Corruption feel like?” he asked.

Busy painting skylines on the wall with jam and the blood trailing down his nose, the line of Dazai’s shoulders — under the soaked dress shirt that never fit him right — didn’t change.

He thought about it. “Like it shouldn’t exist,” he offered, eventually.

It sounded unmistakably sincere — his words were melting acrylics, and Chuuya had learned to cup his hands in the right place to stop a mess.

Disgust gathered under his nails. Chuuya traced the spiral scars on his arms — didn't notice that it had turned into scratching them until Dazai accidentally dropped his knife, startling him.

Gloves, he thought, but didn't move. His hands were covered in jam. The bad taste was still stuck in his mouth — Tanaki grabbing a gun; the pool tables at the Old World, with no rust and no handprints he knew; the way the light had filtered in through what the diaries said was Verlaine's favorite window. He wondered if Arahabaki could feel disappointment, if not the rest of it — if he knew both his and Dazai's skins were off limits. If it was just Chuuya who was starving.

"Come on," he said. His arms were itching. The wine had made him jittery; France had made him tight, hugging himself in a space that was wider than what reality wanted him to believe. On the reflection of the bathtub, his smile was more crooked than the crust of the earth. "The Colonel wants me to learn control, yeah?"

Dazai studied him.

He didn't speak as Chuuya stumbled out of the safe-house — he followed with hands lifeless and waiting, as they left jam-footprints on the concrete and dragged their soaked limbs to the parking lot of Soul's corpses. Tainted appeared in snapshots, devastating the ground and making him as light as a feather.

The sky, he thought. He wasn't sure if he was floating over it all or not; the stars were closer than any feasible answer. Chuuya had crawled out of his own devastation and seen them, first thing.

A hand wrapped around his wrist.

Dazai was too close. He hadn't picked up his hairpins from the floor; his hair was a mess. The quiet was goosebumps-inducing — only then, over the echoing nothing of his skull, Chuuya tasted the words perched on the roof of his own mouth.

"I think I'm suicidal enough for the both of us," Dazai informed him.

Analytical. Curious, at the edges.

Chuuya couldn't say if the curve of his lips was his own. But Arahabaki was nothing that he wasn't, and there had to be a point, he thought — a moral of the story. Get something out of everything, Mori had ordered, perched on his Hospital bed, tracing the spiral scar on his knuckles. What else was it for, otherwise?

"What," He dragged the letters out. Be grateful, he reminded himself. "Actin' like you don't wanna see it?"

Dazai's fingers grew weaker around his wrist. His pupil was still blown out. Pretty like death, Chuuya had heard someone whisper about him, once. He couldn't figure out if he would have appreciated it or not. He couldn't figure out why he hadn't killed him, for the crime of laying a single foot inside the Old World.

“You know,” Dazai offered, like it didn’t matter at all, “I truly dislike it when you speak French.”

Something snapped.

The sound of skin tearing apart was familiar in the way of memories he didn’t have, and that still tingled — wet and warm and deaf under the sudden white noise, high-pitched and never ending; the abandoned microphone on a cursed stage. His fingers clawed at his mouth; only when they came away bloodied — he realized he was the one speaking.

Quit it, now, one of the Sheep had said, shaking him awake. The sky was starry and alive. He wasn’t drowning. He wasn’t dreaming. There’s no enemy. You’re the only one screaming.

More, Arahabaki crooned, sweeter than wine and gentler than his brother’s walls — and he knew there was use in that, too. There was use in all that kept him alive. Chuuya just needed to remember he was.

[You are not to blame, the poem they had scribbled in Hirotsu’s backseat had read. Chuuya tried to recall if his ink strokes had been something Kouyou would have been proud of. I, of course, am not to blame. Everything is the doing of loneliness].

---

...

---

The day before he left for France, Mori met his eyes from the other side of his mahogany desk, and asked: “Mind walking some steps with me?”

Refusal was a snap of the tongue, easy and familiar. Balance was a thing of bones and flesh, though: Arahabaki had no men to fear. Arahabaki, still, was nothing but a prisoner. Since the first time he had heard his name, Chuuya had thought about killing Mori exactly four times.

“No,” he said. “I don’t mind.”

Stained-glass windows lead their way down the Hall, shattering in a thousand crystal squares. Chuuya stepped on them in a silent game, skipping the yellows and landing on the blues; then crossed his hands behind his back and straightened up.

“Are you mad at me?” Mori started.

It was an unusual starter. “What for, sir?”

“For the proposal I made you and Dazai.”

A vein started pulsing on his temple, tired and irritated. He scowled his features into something more peaceful. “It’s just work, sir. Differences will be,” He swallowed, “Put aside.”

“How mature,” Mori commented, not necessarily because he believed it. “Your collaboration is bound to raise some eyebrows. Or — I heard you two have been referring to it as a partnership?”

Chuuya made a face. “I do have better terms in mind. He refuses to listen to them, though.”

“Most are unable to understand why someone as promising as you would work with him.”

Something in that wording made him pause. “Is Dazai,” he dared, “Not promising?”

Small steps, heavy soles. A hum that might have been the beginning of a laugh. “Dazai is unstable. As such, being promising is a roll of the dice, in his regards. His interest follows the wider puddle of blood on the ground, only to despise it a moment later.”

“That’s not unstableness,” he pointed out, after a beat. “That’s just him being bored.”

“A mafioso bored by life does not signal unstableness, in your opinion?”

He had nothing to say, so he didn’t.

“As I hope you will forgive me for —” the doctor continued. “This is one of the reasons why I have insisted so deeply on the matter of your collaborations”

“With all due respect, Boss,” Chuuya kept his eyes forward. “I can’t stop him from leaping off the nearest roof.”

“I would never expect you to. And it is not quite my concern.”

“Do you want him dead?”

He regretted it the moment he said it.

Mori only blinked at him, though — a bit timid, a bit clueless; the way he interacted with Elise when she was most annoyed with him. “Chuuya, I’d be terribly disappointed if that happened.”

Makes sense, he considered, uneasy. And then — was disappointment a shade of grief?

“All the same,” Chuuya concluded. “I won’t have to worry about it any longer, once I’m Executive.”

Mori laughed. “Even an inch of your confidence would benefit many men in the organization. Your Flags taught you well. Although, I can’t recall a time when you weren’t like this.” He wondered, offhandedly, if unstable had been among the words the Boss had used to convince

Pianoman to keep an eye on him. “Their efforts to help you are proof of their worth,” he continued. “Going against me, even, just to make sure you might gather some information about your past...”

“They weren’t trying to challenge your authority, Boss,” he was quick to assure. “The information on my past was a — a leash of sorts. They understood. They waited until they were sure that having gained what I wanted wouldn’t drive me away from the organization. This is my place. I wouldn’t leave it.”

“That is...” Mori’s scarf brushed against the glass stains on the floor. “That is certainly a relief. You fit to a fault with us, Chuuya. It is inevitable that you will thrive here — in whatever way you choose to. It is a shame, though,” he continued. “That your Flags’ efforts were so valiantly nullified by the machinations of Professor N.”

Chuuya paused. “I’m not sure I follow.”

The doctor smiled, somewhat privately, chin brushing his coat — laughing at some joke he hadn’t been invited to the punchline of. “Well, most of their information stemmed from the picture they found. The one of you and Professor N, yes? Unfortunately, the photo was taken when you had already been detained by the military facility.”

He blinked, slowly.

The picture, he recalled, distantly. Chuuya hadn’t looked at it once. The black curtains of what had been before were a place, not a lack — water and numbers and men in lab coats. Chuuya didn’t care, behind that. Chuuya couldn’t.

He had to have had a family, he thought. He had to have had a mother, a father — people who had given him a name they must have cried for. “It’s a shame,” he offered, unsure of whether it was a lie or not. “But you promised me you’d look into my origins, didn’t you?”

“If you still wish for me to,” the man replied. “Get to the Executive position, and I promise to give it to you.”

And then what?, he wondered.

“Sir,” he asked, pointlessly. “What happened to Verlaine’s body?”

Mori’s curled eyebrow wasn’t enraged, so he assumed that question was allowed. “You wish to pay your respects to a man who hurt you so deeply?”

“No,” Chuuya made a face. “No, it’s not — it’s not that.”

“Spitting on his grave would be considered just as reprimandable, I believe.”

“It’s not about the grave, or revenge, or anything else,” he insisted. “Really. I just — I’d like to know.”

The doctor sighed. His gloved hands twirled under the painted lights, purples and blues reflecting on the white fabric — breaking in a thousand shards against the sharp lines of his face. “Why?”

I don't know, he didn't beg, frustrated. He'd punched it into a wall and framed it next to the unreal pictures in Rimbaud's home. I don't know, he promised. He wanted to see Verlaine's body all disfigured, bones tickling the air, neck snapped, legs gone like Doc's had, cut too short like his friends' lives — covered in such endless rivers of blood their hair would finally match.

He wanted to see him pristine and resting — wanted to apologize for killing the man he loved, even if he'd killed him first. He wanted to kill him himself, again, and again, and again, until Lippman's body stopped rolling out of that damn car. He wanted to ask — do you long for it too?

“There was no body anything could happen to, Chuuya. Your brother's Singularity destroyed him. All we found was your hat,” Mori bowed his head. “I do apologize for the disappointment.”

Light and silence. His scars itched.

His mouth: “Better for everyone.”

“But is there anything else I can give you?” the man asked, after some silent steps. “A good luck gift of sorts, for your journey.”

Chuuya thought about it.

“Say, Boss,” he dared, hesitantly.

The man's letter — he didn't yet know — would read as such: what did Corruption feel like, this time around?

Like I shouldn't have done it, Chuuya, at the edge of Rimbaud's roof, would write back — and burn it, never to be sent. Like I won't know how to stop.

“What do you know about poisons?”

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: i am doing just fine anyway in his near vicinity: and btw the flags — chuuya: [youreexperincingpsychosis.png]

hi there! i want to start from thanking you guys again for the sweet, sweet words for last chapter! starting out with chuuya scared me a bit, but i'm glad it seems to have been well received <3 i do hope you'll continue to enjoy his pov.

onto the chapter — the one thing i want to point out, as an easter egg of sorts, is that the whole “smashing streetlights/light poles” is actually a canon fun fact from irl Nakahara Chuuya himself! apparently, one time when he was drunk, he not only tried to pick a fight with a much taller Ango Sakaguchi, but also started crying by the end of it and smashed several light poles. an ancient icon.

as for the plot — this chapter was certainly more of a filler for what's about to come. chuuya has some stuff to juggle, what with the colonel's “unexplained” rancor (or is he) and noguchi's “unexplained” annoying ass (or is he) and dazai in general. dazai in general might be the worst one. what did you think about the jam ritual? it's actually one of the first things i ever thought for this fic lmao. and the corruption at the end... wonder why that just happened out of nowhere. surely it won't be plot relevant or anything.

anyway! i'm sure i had more to say, but i'll guess i'll just say it next chapter. i hope you all have a lovely day, and i hope you'll keep reading! comments and kudos are always appreciated. keep warm!

see you <3

PALE

Chapter Summary

Two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end :)!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xiii.

---

Case number: 99985672

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. disappeared after [...]*

---

Two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes.

He assumes. Their bright emerald glow burns his retinas, blinking on the black computer screen on the other side of the glass. Maybe they are carved on the glass itself, and the black is nothing more than a quirk; a consequence to the darkness pressing him down. In that metallic womb, he knows — all is shadows and cold and the monster that shares his pillowless bed.

What a curious thought, he thinks. But what — [the sky is close enough to touch. There is no reason not to do so, when it's right there; he does. His hand feels weird and looks wrong; it should be darker than it is, like a glove. Only freckles and blood, craters tearing him into pieces, dancing cracks, crimson rivers separating his skin in two, ripping it apart, and where is the sky, again? It —]

— even is a pillow?

More than their color, what unnerves him is the codes' flow. Imperceptible, almost, with how fast it goes; from left to right, right to left, up and down, down and up, a spiral hypnotizing his careless eyes, not smart enough to look away — but smart enough to understand that two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes are definitely long enough to follow him wherever he might try to hide.

Behind the lines, there's him.

His eyes confuse him the most. Their blue is a light in the radioactive ink he's floating in, colder than winter in color, but warmer than anything he might have experienced long enough to write a comparison. They settle on him. They stare. They look. They know him. They accuse him.

They're right.

Look at you, a voice says, somewhere. Maybe everywhere; maybe from the lips behind the glass. He's got his hands plastered on the tub, and he's been knocking — but he must have stopped, at some point, because the voice is free to break the silence.

Look at — [someone is calling his name. Sirens, he thinks, sirens and footsteps and the sound of a castle crumbling. His body feels on fire; every ounce of blood is poison, is water, is liquid sun, and he is nothing more than a body, and he's on fire. You don't understand, the voice screams, and it seems uncharacteristic, and the sirens are meant to be seen, not heard — you don't understand, he's under there, you need to let me get him, you — Someone is laughing. Is that him? Can't he see he's dying? Can't you —]

— you. It's all you need to do —

---

...

---

— causing me troubles,” the voice said, too far and too close.

Scratchy vowels and muffled consonants; it came to his ears behind a waterfall. There was nothing to think, nothing to feel; he was, and that was all. The voice moved closer — a warm flame in the darkness; a heartbeat that had nothing different from all the others.

He reached forward, mindless and hungry, ready to sink — found the weight of the sky on every inch of him, pressing until his ribs could carve themselves a place in his lungs. Arms sneaked around his shoulders, dragging him from the back, constricting, stubborn, nails sinking in, refusing to let go until he stopped moving.

Silence.

Pain.

Behind the waterfall, he found, somewhat disappointingly, there was only the moon. He opened his mouth to express his distaste; all that came out was a choked whimper, or a scream, or something else entirely, as his knees hit the concrete, as agony invaded lands he’d forgot he owned, set fire to the grass and stepped on in polluted waters, and so he waited, gritting his teeth, because silence would come again, it always did, and the wounds would close, they always did, and the silence —

---

...

---

The green lines are beeping.

He knows this, because no heart-lines of his could produce that sound. The boy behind the glass knows it, too — knows it wouldn’t be the same, if he were allowed to leave the tub, to show off the thing in his chest, petty like a child, because he is a child, and so is —

So am I, he explains, lips against the glass, and it's cold, like he always is, and it makes sense — like mother like child. So am I — [there are beating hearts on every withering flower, and his mind embraces the world, and there are so many lights, so many heartbeats, so much blood. There is so much blood. There is so much blood. There will never be enough blood, and he knows, he knows, there might be silence if there were enough blood, and if there wasn't, he would bring it himself —]

— so am I.

The boy in the tub does not believe him. That is fine. The men in the white coats will convince him instead. There will be sparks in that pressing darkness, and maybe they'll be bright enough to drown out the green of two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes. Maybe they'll be bright enough to kill the boy in the tub, and then there'll be no one to show off something he doesn't have.

You're being mean, the boy in the tub explains.

Guilt devours him. Forehead against forehead, divided by a glass, by two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes, he says sorry. Sorry, sorry, sorry. I want you dead. I want you free. I am the best you will ever be. Sorry if I don't know how to be it.

Fuck you, he thinks, then, and it's not very childlike, but he's not either — [there is liquified concrete under his nails; or maybe it's skin, hardened by trials, bones softened by disuse. He laughs. He laughs. He laughs. There is so much blood in him, is there not? It might make him happy. Might make him quieter. Might clean the dirt under his nails. Isn't he blood, isn't he hungry, isn't he laughing? Isn't he happy, for once —]

— fuck you, fuck you and your glass, fuck you and your heart, and I am you, can't you see? He is floating — banging hands that will never be soft and unscarred against a glass, watching two thousand, three hundred eighty-three lines of codes build him up, reassemble him, shape him into something he's not, but he'll be. He will —

---

...

---

— leather stuck to his raw skin, brushing a layer that should have embraced his bones in solitude. It squelched wetly and nauseatingly when he moved, dragging part of him away with itself — forming a warm pool under his back.

“Don’t do that,” the voice chirped. Car honks appeared, distantly. He moaned — the motion caused him a coughing fit, wetting his lips and chin in liquid heat. “Now, now. Don’t be like that.”

Naked fingers sunk in his chest, through the banks of his bleeding rivers, and he cursed them out, loud enough to set his throat on fire, kicking and kicking and kicking, blinking painfully at the emergency light almost over his head, and were they in a car? Hands gripped his skull, and it was good, almost, because it was quiet, and it was warm against his decaying skin, and he wanted them gone — hands covered his mouth, forcing him to be quiet. Naked fingers sunk in his chest.

“I’ve never stitched someone else up,” the voice insisted, somewhat conversational, a hint — perhaps made-up — panicked. “What a boring death you might have.”

It lulled him, somehow — the unfailable rhythm of it. Something pulling his skin together, hands pushing the overflowing blood to the side; brushing hair off his soaked forehead; pressing harder on his mouth when he started to scream — not even complaining when he bit down. The hazard lights of the car had been turned on; slowly, his heartbeat fell in symbiosis to their melody.

Every inch of him was on fire. He tried to speak against the palm cutting his air off, either on purpose or not, but his vision blurred, fog climbing his scratched throat to reach his eyes, the eyelashes he couldn’t bat, blood sticking them together. He tried to push himself up; gentler than he would have expected, the hands laid him down again.

Unreasonably angry, he breathed in, and forgot to breathe out.

“I’ve got you,” the voice assured, and it sounded mocking, sincere, cruel and dishonest, scheming and apologetic, and young, he thought, so agonizingly young, too young to have a corpse in the backseats of a car, too young to do stitches under emergency lights, and he had nothing else, and if he would just touch him again, then maybe — “Stop fretting over your uselessness.”

Bleeding out, he considered — bleeding out in the backseats of a car, with Dazai Osamu patching his stolen corpse back into shape, right in time for a second funeral, a second funeral, how pathetic was that —

---

...

---

Lippman is staring at him.

It is, he considers, quite rude. His tendency to blink every three seconds — I do need to make sure the make up stays in place, Chuuya — is nowhere to be seen. He lays, crooked and wide eyed, one leg hooked to the hood of his brother's car, one hand brushing the road. He stares. Does he want something? He must. No other reason to look at him.

You should help the guy, Shirase says, bored, dangling his legs, seated on a wooden box — some abandoned prize by some stupid trader; as if the first rule of Suribachi City wasn't, never leave your stuff where children can reach it.

At least help him, yeah?

Unfair, he considers. Unfair, unfair, unfair, but he can't quite remember why, and if he's right. Unfair, still. Not that he tells Shirase; not that he ever will. Unfair, but it doesn't quite matter.

Sorry, he says, kneeling next to Lippman. But his bloodied body is gone, and that man's face is staring back at him — untouched and pale, human and yet not, blond braid soaked in blood, and he's angry, so angry, how dare he? Sorry, brother, still. He will apologize until he has a tongue, but only in his mind.

There's a child bleeding on the ground. The sticky rubies reach his shoes — no, his feet are naked, and he's smaller, is he not? The child is not even a child. He's a bundle of blood and possibilities, and so why should it be his fault, when he can blame —

"A child who was given a gift he doesn't deserve," Dante considers, hands on his shoulders. "Who thinks it gives him a right to do whatever he wants."

Rimbaud is sitting on his grave. He offers him a smile, because bloodied lips have no excuses not to be put to use. Dear, he says, you could have at least fixed the bed, before leaving.

---

...

---

There were roughly thirteen metal panels on the roof, and a hangman knot over the seventh.

He took his time to count them — catalog them through the cages of his eyelashes; to feel the rough texture of the mattress of his creaking bed, no sheets or pillow. To get attuned to the overwhelming warmth and the flames licking his throat, the absolute numbness of most of his body, and the pain — the pain —

A stool, he noticed, cheek on the pillow. A stool and a desk, covered in dossiers, and a fridge, small and rusty, emitting a low hum that he didn't know if he should have been able to hear. And —

He recoiled so fast his body bumped against the wall the bed was leaned on, rattling the whole place. It tore a curse out of his sticky lips, and he breathed harshly, eyes on the thing hissing quietly at the feet of the bed —

“Don't be rude,” Dazai called, somewhere — was he sitting under his desk? — knocking on the haze of his eyes. “Kazuko was just saying hi. Or, perhaps, she mistook you for a very small snack.”

That's a boa constrictor, he wanted to say. They were in a shipping container, and he had torn so many stitches apart with that startled move his head was starting to spin — and his bandages were covered in blood, and Dazai was reaching out to pet a boa constrictor named Kazuko.

Quicker than he would have thought possible, the boy was on him, pushing him down onto the bed — and he was covered in blood, too, every inch of his dress shirt and every blooming stain on his face, eyebags purple and metal glinting on his wrist — handcuffs?

Inside his hollow bones, Arahabaki licked his lips, loud, everywhere, the way he was whenever he was allowed to tip-toe out of his cage — whenever a tip-toe became a footprint, whenever a footprint became a crater in his ribcage.

“You need to stay still, stupid,” Dazai told him, over the hisses and the statics. One of his fingers escaped, and the pad brushed his clavicle and silence, he thought, silence, some silence —

---

...

---

The boy in the tub is dying.

He shakes him, cradles his cheeks until he makes a funny face, and he insults him, and he knocks on a glass that's not there any longer. Forehead against forehead, he begs for his life, for reasons that are selfish and are necessary. Because he needs proof, and because he doesn't want to know, and because what else do you do, when someone puts a secret in your hands? What else do you do, when the one you might have stolen everything from dies in your arms?

Sorry, he'd like to say. He'll apologize until his tongue can move, but only in his mind. Sorry, he should say, but he does not. It would be admitting defeat; admitting who the mean one is between them — who could read the green lines from the outside of the tub and who deserved to. He does not say sorry. Chuuya's human. The boy in the tub is dying. Chuuya will say sorry when he dies, too.

If he dreamed, he would dream of him.

Murderer, the boy's lips are shaping. He can see clouds in his eyes. Murderer, he says. Chuuya can see the clouds from up too close — can never touch them, despite having flown so high he couldn't breathe. Murderer. Murderer. Thief. Murderer.

Write that down, the man in the white coat says. No reason to waste data.

[That's very sensible, someone says. Chuuya is supposed to break out of it. Chuuya isn't meant for betrayal. For a Limbo.]

---

...

---

The unmistakable fragrance of maple trees and recently sharpened iron of Kouyou's villa was the first thing he tasted.

Blinding moonlight rays pressed against his eyelids' best efforts to separate. The low murmur of a News channel buzzed to life, somewhere on the left of the impossibly soft bed he was laying on. "...The mostly abandoned area surrounding the valley is still under orders of evacuation," a woman informed, over the sound of sirens. "Experts fear the earthquake might be followed by a similar —"

A coat-wearing back was perched over a low wooden table, staring at untouched tea. Guarding the door; playing with his wristwatch.

"Old man," Chuuya croaked.

His voice tore his ears. The scratchiness was borderline tactile; high-pitched hisses appearing with every cracked whisper out of his mouth. His throat had been scraped to blood — the wave of liquid fire that climbed it when he spoke made his head spin.

Hirotsu turned so fast his scarf fell from his shoulder. "Chuuya," he said, blank to the point of imperscrutableness. "Can you hear me?"

The question came off strangely. Trying to focus on the complicated expression on the man's face made his head pound. Instead, he traced the murals on the rose walls; the mess of drawings, of souvenirs, clothing and weapons abandoned all the way to the outrageously endless vanity table on the other side.

“What —” He stared at the wooden ceiling, sinking a bit deeper into the mattress with each second it took his brain to connect, “— am I doing here?”

It was pointless — wordlessly, Hirotsu had run out of the room the moment his fingers had started twitching on the bed. He attempted to sit up, hissing at the paralyzing web holding his body together. The light of the small TV was brighter than he could take; the woman kept talking and talking, disaster and survivors and unexplainable, and Chuuya tasted nothing but blood.

“You should lay down.”

Kouyou wore a distinctively familiar look, over the layers of untied hair and home-staying yakuta. Her hands were red with dried blood; wet, as if she had been in the middle of scratching them to raw skin. Carelessness, he catalogued her kindness as — just like after Verlaine. Masterfully built; all to allow him to lay into a play-pretend where she didn't think he might explode in her hands.

“What am I doing here?” he insisted.

“Your assumptions are as good as mine, I'm afraid,” the Executive replied. She closed the door. Suddenly, — with a nauseating certainty he had learned even with no adults around to scream — he knew she was angry. “The demon child left you inside one of the artificial rivers.”

Memories crashed on him, ripping the air out of his lungs. He bolted upright, immediately regretting his choice when his whole body tensed up and — screeched. Rusty bones and numb stitches, holding him together by pure will — when he looked down, the eye-shaped scars from Arahaki's taunting were bright and pink.

“Shit,” he breathed out. “Shit.”

Out of nowhere, Kouyou's hands were on his shoulders. “Don't move.”

Chuuya couldn't listen. “Shit,” he insisted, kicking his legs out of the cover, gritting his teeth against the urge to scream. He resisted when she tried to haul the pants abandoned on the floor out of his shaking grasp; escaped when she tried to touch him, and cursed under his breath when his shoulder hit the wall. The sensation was familiar; Dazai had to have popped it back in.

“Stop that,” the woman said, hands raised. She wasn't close enough to touch anymore; the calming texture of his voice set his nerves on fire. “You're going to hurt yourself.”

“I'm fine.”

“Chuuya.”

“Shit, I don’t even feel it anymore —“

“Chuuya —“

“I’ve done it before,” The encircled stream of consciousness didn’t seem like it would ever stop — not at the walls of sense, not at the need to move on. “I’ll do it again. It’s fine —“

“You had your goddamned,” His fingers creaked with stupor at the curve of her lips around the curse. Something that was almost terror, or the sirens at the edge of Suribachi coming closer, or something entirely unknown. “Viscera out of your skin, Chuuya, could you stop —“

His jaw unlocked — not a word came out. He tried to convince himself to step away from the corner — reminded himself of the distaste of being treated like a cornered animal.

Under his eyes, the roads of recently removed stitches seemed never ending. Echoing like water ripples, was the awful sound of skin getting ripped off like velcro from a car seat — the cat-piss smell of old bandages on opening and reopening wounds; pale hands cleaning vomit off his chin.

“ — of such a wide scale, unless we refer back to the catastrophe of last year. Eyewitnesses speak of ‘a red light of sorts, lighting up the sky, and a thunder-like smell in the air’. It is unclear, as of... ”

Chuuya blinked.

Attributing the stickiness of the words leaving his mouth to the embers down his throat seemed reasonable — but hypocritical. “I didn’t kill anyone.”

Eyes carefully vacant, Kouyou lowered her hands. He wondered if he should have felt more embarrassed about standing in his boxers in front of her. He wondered why she was about to lie.

“Is that a question?”

“No,” His tongue was stuck. I’m not wrong, he told himself. I can’t be wrong. “The bastard would have stopped me before that. Why am I on the News?”

She didn’t speak.

“Kouyou,” Chuuya moved away from the wall, tensed all the way to his skeleton. His clothes were all over the floor. He didn’t recall anything that wasn’t red. “Why am I on the News?”

The burned strand of her hair brushed a knife she hid in her yakuta’s belt. Her words came out clipped: “You said you could control it.”

It came crashing down awfully quietly.

“I can,” His mouth was moving; feeling it was a distant thing. The woman on the television was still rattling on. He needed to get to his clothes; needed to get to the door. They’d dragged him to the center of the crater, the last time he had made a mistake. They hadn’t cared if he wasn’t even screaming. “I can. I was — angry.”

“Angry,” At last, an unstable note took over Kouyou’s composed voice. She didn’t step closer; she didn’t move an inch — but she was merciless in the gaze she directed to him. “What were you two thinking?”

Chuuya couldn’t speak.

“No information to the Headquarters. No help. You aren’t even allowed near the Hospital, for God’s sake,” The Executive’s hand had a spasm, as if she wanted to cut the air in two. “You could have alerted Hirotsu. You could have alerted me. This is not the moment to attract the public eye — you, in particular, Chuuya, not when —“

She cut herself off so viciously sharply even his frozen limbs couldn’t stay still. “When?”

The motions of her chest were harsh. A rise and fall he could have gotten lost in; the gathering ire down the tips of his fingers, new gloves on, not even fingerless, and still not tired — the knowledge she wasn’t a target. She was unskated by permanent marks; nothing like his skin, naked for offering. She was too ephemeral for blades to linger.

“The Special Division is on our tails.”

His head snapped up.

“The Verlaine accident was ruled out as his own, solitarily self-implosion,” she continued, her knuckles white around the air. “Verlaine is dead. They know there must be someone else. It’s the Government, Chuuya. Professor N and his men’s death covered your traces, but — they know what they were robbed of.”

His head was disconnected from his body. There was no Tainted glow on the top of his nails; he felt light as existence itself. “The Government knows I’m here.”

Her nod was solitary. Curt.

He clenched his fists. “Fuck that.”

“Chuuya.”

“They want to try and get me? Fuck that, I —“ Getting dragged down the crater; too big hands around his destroyed clothes. The fire. The eyes. The corpse on the ground. He had never learned how to apologize; he had resolved to screwing up his own troubles. “I’ve escaped once, I’ll take care of them —“

“This isn’t about what comes next,” she interrupted him, colder than marble, stealing the voice from his throat. “This is about what you have already done.”

“I didn’t mean to, ” Chuuya said, gulping down the urge to snap at her. The woman on the TV insisted — the southern valley had almost been reshaped. The wounded had cars, and thought they hadn’t died, they almost had. There was no one to blame but nature. “I was angry.”

Her laughter was disbelieving; humorless. His ears ringed with it; he bit his tongue until he tasted blood — tasted the electricity spasming his fingers. “Angry at what?”

“I don’t — “

“You think you know rage, Chuuya?” Her hiss was sharper than a knife; she moved so quickly he had to plant his feet on the ground, not to take a step back. She was nose to nose with him; she was a burning fire, and Chuuya wanted to punch her, and Chuuya knew no words to apologize to corpses, or he would have already. “You think you truly, truly know what it means?”

“I —“

“You’re blind, ” she snapped, “Blind and defenseless to the aggression the world has shoved down your throat. Blind and defenseless to your grief — “

He flinched. “This isn’t —“

”And this won’t be how you deal with it. All this does not make you furious. It makes you lost. And it does not give you the right to open the ground with that lack, and drag us all down with you. It only makes you someone who will cause his own demise — and I will not let you. Not for your rage, not for your grief — most certainly, not in the name of ashes in the bay,” Her breath was harsh. “Do you understand?”

He clenched his jaw so tight his spine shook with it. He thought about her litanies of literature, as he copied her ink strokes on a desk. He stared at the floor — at the scars running up his feet, intertwining around his calves like ivy. He wondered if the view had been Hell from the cars he had destroyed.

She spelled out: “Do you understand me?”

Blood bubbled between his lips, bitter and warm; it seeped through his teeth. “I understand.”

Some commercial started playing on the TV, right as the crickets standing outside the open window sang their displeasure. There was no wind for his ear to catch, over the rush of his own blood; the air was charged and silent. In a blink that lasted twenty years, Kouyou took a step back.

In an inhale that made his ribs scratch his lungs to new blood, her hands cupped his cheek, framing his face with relentless violence.

“You’re mine,” she articulated, slow. The fire in her eyes was as overwhelming as before — but utterly defensive. Wide enough to forget cruelty in the name of being all-encompassing. The bottom of the crater was blurred. “You will stay here.”

Something got stuck in his throat. Chuuya wanted to believe it angry; he couldn't look away from a single strand cutting her eye in two.

Sorry, he thought about saying. It wouldn't get out. "I'll fix this," he croaked. Thank you, he wanted to beg. Be grateful, Chuuya. "I swear."

Kouyou's fingers carved themselves on his face. They unclenched their grip along with his next exhale; settled on his shoulders. When they gripped the scar on his clavicle — the spear that had run through him; feeding him lighting with every word out of a man's mouth — he pretended not to watch her marble traits grow merciless.

She nodded.

---

...

---

"You two have been gone for five days," Kouyou offered, conversationally enough, in the middle of Virgil's anxious fiddling with Chuuya's temporary wheelchair.

Utterly slow, he raised his eyes from the tray of cookies she had forced on his lap. "What."

Virgil let out a nervous giggle.

He fit to a fault with the unsullied shelves and the never ending tomes of Kouyou's library — Chuuya vaguely suspected he had picked an all-blue kimono only to match the marine murals on the walls. Underneath the open fabric, his azure t-shirt of the day read: Love You To The Moo-on And Back — framed by cartoonish, smiling cows.

On the throne-like chair on the other side of the room, Kouyou's fingers were massaging her temples. Her hair was soaked — Chuuya knew she always washed them at the end of the day; she said it helped get rid of the smell of blood.

"We knew nothing, after the meeting," she explained, somberly. He closed his teeth around a cookie. The taste — blood; several mixtures of several poisons; and the face the younger Sheep used to make when some older kids forgot to ration their stolen food — was as revolting as ever. "But the Headquarters immediately received news about the alleged earthquake. The descriptions were unmistakable. The Colonel and Ace almost blew their veins up in horror."

Chuuya winced. Perched on the table behind him, Virgil seemed unsure whether to pat his shoulders or not — but he accepted the cookie Chuuya offered him.

“Mori asked Hirotsu to find you. You two were already gone, though, when he arrived. Boss called Dazai to verify your location, but he —” She cleared her throat. “The demon child spent the last few days answering and hanging up to his face.”

“Of course.”

“We only received Dazai’s report a few hours ago,” Kouyou tapped her nails on a pile of papers on the desk. “Apparently, your...” She glanced over at Virgil. “Your state was even more unpredictable than usual. He described you as more focused on self-destruction, rather than outer damage — you crashed the parking lot onto your own head.”

Some spot just over his nape pulsed in late compassion. He massaged it, frowning. “But how did Dazai reach me, then?”

“That’s the issue,” the Executive shut the file with clear distaste; she leaned back onto her seat. “The cops arrived on the scene right as he was trying to make his way to you. Dazai wasn’t sure if he had touched you or one of the Souls’ corpses —” Chuuya stiffened, crashing what was left of his cookie between two fingers, “So when he was taken to the Police Station, he had to escape to come check. Luckily, you were nullified — on the verge of death, yes. But normal.”

Normal, Chuuya mouthed. “The syndicate has been in a bit of a frenzy,” Kouyou continued. “Losing sight of you two specifically, and in these circumstances — well. Mori was the only one who was absolutely unconcerned.”

“According to Lady Kouyou’s servants, you and your partner eloped,” Virgil offered, usefully, pulling onto the green bandage covering half of his face. “Or something.”

Chuuya’s head snapped to him, horrified. “Tell me you’re joking.”

The Executive cleared her voice. “According to Boss, Dazai must have brought you to the one place where you wouldn’t be disturbed. A wise choice,” she admitted, begrudgingly. “Surprising, considering who we’re dealing with — but wise. You’re not in the position to be seen in such a fragile state. Luckily, nobody dares to step foot around Dazai’s — residence.”

“No,” Chuuya grunted. Thirteen metal panels, he recalled. A single lightbulb, dangling in solitude, watching him bleed out on an unsheeted bed. “Fucker brought me to the closest shipping container his mummified ass could find.”

Suddenly very busy with the papers in her hands, Kouyou said nothing.

Chuuya stared. “No.”

Virgil stared at the ceiling. She kept quiet.

“A shipping container?” he repeated. “You’re telling me lives in that thing?”

His mind was running — the infernal squeak of the makeshift door; the glimpses of trash from the cracks; the blinking moon from a hole in the ceiling. Dazai’s silhouette — seated on the sole stool, legs crossed, coat brushing the ground; chin on one hand, staring at nothing.

“According to Mori,” Kouyou said, at last, toneless. “Yes, that’s his choice of residence.”

“His choice?”

The warning look she sent him cooled the room. “I do hope you’re not assuming Boss would put him in such an — absurd situation.”

Silence was tight around his throat — as awkward as a thousand eyes set on him. “Of course not,” he concluded, kicking the something between his ribs away. “I’m merely stunned by the bastard’s idiocy.”

Kouyou relaxed, sipping at her tea. “Dazai has always been — particular. All the same, you will offer him your gratitude. He took care of your wounds for five days. It was much worse than the — other times. And with no Hospital...”

He made a face. “I’m not letting one or two wounds kill me. I would have crawled my way to the nearest stitching set.”

“Chuuya,” she tutted — the most amused she had sounded throughout that entire evening. “You will thank him.”

“You don’t even like him —“

“Respect has nothing to do with dislike,” she replied, putting her cup down. “And who ever said I didn’t, anyway?”

He stared her down. She held it.

Eventually, something more difficult to find settled into her voice. “Chuuya,” she asked. The tone made his dried clothes scratch unpleasantly against his skin. “How do you feel?”

He felt hungry, he thought — for anything but food. Heavy, like the liquid cement sagging his bones, solidifying a bit more with each breath he took. Grounded, more than he had since Rengoku. He felt like Momo — whose body the Sheep had found under the bridge where they hid the alcohol and the occasional drugs.

I felt a bit better each time I did it, she had explained to him. He was nine, and cleaning vomit off her body, and he’d just seen her tear her wrists apart. I thought it was the absence, that wanted me dead.

“I feel fine,” Chuuya offered.

Virgil darted a look his way — skeptical. He kept his eyes on Kouyou, though — the uncured hair on her shoulders.

You are blind.

Bleeding to tear the words off the roof of his mouth, he stared at the ground and muttered: “I didn’t mean to do this, Ane-san.”

The smile he spied on her face was meant to be beautiful. He took it as such — accepted her quiet request to ignore any graveyards under the blossoms. “No one got seriously hurt — apart from those corpses in the parking lot. I know something about demons occupying the space in your veins, lad,” Kouyou said, eventually. “All I ask of you — is to tell me when you intend to free them.”

“For Yokohama’s sake?”

“If anyone asks, that will be my answer.”

On the wall in front of them, a scripture had been carved in an elegant, golden calligraphy — 竜頭蛇尾. Head of a dragon, tail of a snake.

It tickled his mind — Albatross’ grin; his arm around his shoulder and his beer-stained breath, as he decanted old proverbs wrong for the sake of annoying Lippman. Head of an Albatross, tail of your mother.

A marvelous beginning, he had explained, hanging off of him, once the actor’s protests had brought him to correcting his words. But a rather disappointing end. That’s what it means. Let us hope you won’t end up like this, shall we?

Think about yourself, asshole, Chuuya had snorted. And about your disappointing end.

Kouyou said something before leaving — an emergency meeting; subordinates to reassure. She tapped two fingers on his chin; left with fingers still crooked. He didn’t quite listen; didn’t do much more than watch Virgil timidly twirl through shelves — a pair of headphones around his throat, and the kindness not to say a word between his teeth.

“Oh, oh,” he heard him sing, low. “I knew she was lying about the world’s newfound distaste for literature.”

Texting Dazai brought no results and no answers — all he found was an even more cracked screen and several viruses installed on the device; plus a programmed system that intermittently showed him a cheerful jingle, framed by the words — Where Is My Souvenir, You French Wannabe?

“Ever heard of Hirose Fumiko?” Chuuya spoke up, eventually.

Virgil was startled enough to bump his hip against a shelf. “You — you mean the singer from the eighties? The one old housewives listen to?”

“I see you’re feeling better,” Chuuya said, too loud, climbing to his feet, attempting not to stumble. “And you’re still locked inside the nearest dusty place. Not very enterprising of you.”

“Maybe you shouldn’t —” At a nasty glare, Virgil removed his eyes from the wheeling chair. “For your information, I’m organizing reports for Lady Kouyou. It’s terribly useful, and —”

“Do you think it’s possible that I was back into Dante’s Limbo?”

Silence came a bit too belatedly.

It didn't quite manage to hide his intake of air.

His face fell. "He's dead, Chuuya," For his sake, he ignored the note of pain stuck between the syllables. Attempting to convince himself, perhaps. Attempting to learn to say it out loud. "No."

His absence is something I rejoy in, he had written, in the only letter he had sent him, while he was in France. Chuuya had not asked — had done everything he could not to ask. But I do wonder — is that enough?

"Yeah. Of course. Don't worry about it. Hey," Chuuya crossed his arms, stealing the tiniest bits of Tainted to keep himself upright — stalk his way to Virgil's surprised frame. "While we're here, doing shit. I have a proposal for you."

The offer toppled the man's jaw on the frescoed tiles of the library. By the time Chuuya was done talking, it took him several moments to remember it was his time to fill the silence.

"Me?" Virgil said, finally, like something ripped out from the depths of his chest. His wide eyes felt out of place with the greyish curls mixing with wooden ones — something childish shone in them; as if he'd suddenly remembered he'd died younger than sixteen. "But — you could choose so many people."

"You managed to shoot shitty Dazai, and he hadn't even planned for you to," Chuuya pointed out. "In that fucking Forest, or whatever. That's more than most men in this syndicate could do."

"He was tied up."

"Bastard once played me like a fiddle while getting himself dragged through the snow and whining about how little he wanted to be there," he muttered. "It's only six people, and at least two of the ones I've chosen have good reasons to want me dead. I have to balance it out, somehow. I need people I trust."

Virgil blinked. "You — trust me?"

"You've had many chances to kill me. Soul or not," He shrugged, awkwardly. "You could have lied and told me your Ability could control my own. You could have done shit. And you didn't. Accept the offer or don't, I don't really —"

"Chuuya," he interrupted him, right before he could accelerate. His grin was brighter than the moon. "Chuuya. I'd be honored to."

"Oh," He straightened. "Of course."

"I know he —" Virgil sunk his teeth into his lower lip, digging a new way for the words to leave his mouth. "Dante. He took so much time from me. That doesn't mean my life is over, right? I have more blood on my hands than I will ever be able to deal with. Since I cannot wash it away, I might as well make sure whatever else of it I spill has a reason. I trust you can give me a good one.”

You think you know rage?, she insisted.

“Sure,” He cleared his throat. “Sure, I’ll — better prepare yourself for some very long weeks, then. You don’t get to play lazy.”

His smile grew teasing. “Unlike what you might think, I don’t enjoy spending all my time in a library. I’m rather excited to watch the greatest duel in the Port Mafia’s history go down.”

Chuuya blinked. “You know about the race for the Executive position?”

“The entire organization does,” Virgil informed him, easily. “Everyone is watching. The vultures want you to prove yourselves unworthy of the title of prodigies.”

He scoffed. “That’s the Mackerel’s thing. Not mine.”

“You think a particularly ordinary person could keep up with a prodigy? A demonic one, at that?” The man smiled, gently. “A great number of men believes you two foolish kids who the Boss needs to keep entertained. Another great number thinks that Dazai’s connection to the Boss means his seat is sold. Another great number thinks him an idiot for believing he could beat you.”

“Let’s focus on that last group,” Chuuya said. “And let’s hope most of the six of you will be part of it. I have no hopes for Noguchi, but —”

His enthusiasm faded, slower than dread. “You said six people, ah?”

“They’re good,” he assured him. “Koda will probably decide you’re his new best friend. The twins seem like nice enough people, but don’t get Kenta drunk. Tsuchiya doesn’t care enough about anything to hate you. And Noguchi —” He grimaced. “He hates me, but he has no reason to be pissed off at you. If you want to sink your shoe in his mouth, though, I’ll do anything but stop you.”

“Noguchi,” Virgil squinted. “Noguchi Toru, you mean? With the Colonel?”

Chuuya perked up. “Yeah. Why?”

“He’s in a group currently preparing for an infiltration,” the man explained. “The Colonel sent Lady Kouyou the information, since they’re going to exterminate one of the trader groups she personally dealt with. Seems like a serious enough matter that the Colonel himself will join.”

His brain screeched to a halt. Suddenly, the lingering pain on his limbs seemed as distant as a memory. “When you say currently —”

“The mission should start an hour from now, roughly. If everything goes according to — where are you going?”

“Talk to you later,” Chuuya called, without turning back, as he made his way to the nearest window. “This has been an enlightening convo.”

“Chuuya, wait — wait — you aren’t in any condition to —“ “Warm up your shooting skills while I’m gone,” he screamed back, climbing down the ivy on the walls. When he let go, Virgil let out a rather high-pitched yelp. “If you fall behind, I’ll kick your ass all the way to Rengoku!”

---

...

---

“Don’t shoot unless I order you to,” the Colonel said, almost an hour after Chuuya had sneaked inside his men’s SUVs. “Don’t speak unless asked. We have datas to recover, if we want to fix the mess Executive Ace’s men caused. You will not risk the operation by blowing our cover. Clear?”

“Yes, Colonel,” the rows of men barked out. The top of Chuuya’s hat barely brushed the shoulders of most of the mafiosi in front of him — he wasn’t quite sure if he should be grateful or offended.

“As for our special guest,” the man continued, not even turning around. Their march seemed endless, but they kept walking heavy strides in the wake of the Executive’s footprints, roaming down the empty street that led to the abandoned warehouses area. “He will be asked to keep his Ability in check and, if necessary, to only use it in the least noticeable way possible. Should he be recognized by the enemy, he will be abandoned to his own resources. Clear?”

Murmurs arose.

He was the eye of the hurricane, and their words came muffled and running, suffocated by the wind of his own irritation. Rengoku was a frequent one, and so was god. He knew them all, at this point — dangerous and unstable and what if and the steps back they took, putting space between them.

“Yes, Colonel,” Chuuya offered.

I believe he does think your Abilities are similar, Kouyou had explained to him, in the shadows of the hallway, outside the meeting room. And I believe, in his mind, you use your own in all the wrong ways. It frustrates him deeply, that Boss still holds such high hopes for you — considering the distrust he initially held for the Colonel’s own Ability.

He distrusted it?

Mori is always hesitant to welcome soldiers. They can bring... unwanted ideals, with them. In the Colonel's best hopes, you'll fall into such an obvious mistake that Boss will finally let go of you.

You, of course, she'd concluded, shall not make mistakes.

"Noguchi," the Colonel called. "Nakahara. With me. I have a separate decoy for you."

He stiffened. A few steps in front of him, shoulders held comically straight in an effort to hide Chuuya from view, Koda let out a half whine.

"Chuuya's fine," he said, only, teeth clenched.

No stars decorated their crepuscular roof, and the impending darkness felt heavier than ever, embraced by the summer heat. He'd made sure to push every visible bandage under his clothing, but the trick did nothing for the sweat gathering down his ice-cold skin. Mosquitoes filled the night, overcompensating for the lack of people and vehicles, hissing louder and louder the further they went down the tight streets.

Noguchi's glare was stuck on his nape. He made his way to the Colonel's marching silhouette; didn't notice anything wrong until the whispers led his eyes down — to the cracked, footprint-shaped ground left from Tainted.

Lost on when he'd done that, Chuuya frowned.

"They're smart," the Executive started, the moment they reached him behind a road of trucks. A fresh corpse slept between his shoes. "The displaced organs have been spread all over. They must have had a system to locate them, but the guard here," He spat on the body. "Was mostly useless. And their leader has already been dealt with by Lady Kouyou."

The uniform the corpse wore was the same green from Koda's hissed explanations; he was melting like a candle against the concrete. Chuuya had never considered what the Colonel's Ability might do to a living body — nudging some liquified skin dripping from his temple off his shoe, he felt a surge of interest appear.

A second look at the man's face erased it.

"Are there any police traps?" Chuuya asked.

Both heads turned to stare at him. Noguchi's hostility was a familiar pulse under his skin — a mixture of burning hatred and the somewhat begrudging tease he had worn in France. The Colonel, though, was inscrutable.

"With all due respect," he huffed. "You called me here. Permission to say a damn word on the matter?"

"Maybe actually show some respect?" Noguchi said, pointedly.

“You have some fucking audacity to talk about respecting your superiors —“

The coughing fit appeared with no warning. The glimpse of astonishment that ran over the two men’s faces was tactile.

Chuuya turned, hiding his mouth in his elbow, and tried to focus on something that wasn’t the needles on his skin, climbing up every scarred inch of skin they could find. Flames scratched his throat — inexplicably, through the blur, he realized it was the beginning of a laugh.

A hand was slammed on his back. It did manage to drag air back in his lungs — but the palm sank on what had to have been a slashed piece of skin between his scapulas, startling a wet warmth from a wound.

“Oi,” Noguchi said, hesitant, allowing him to take a step back. “Is —“

“Fine,” he snapped, breathless, praying the bandages would soak up the blood. “It’s fine. I choked on your bullshit.”

On the ground, the dry squelch of skin melting protested the sudden silence.

“No police traps,” the Colonel said, at last, eyes still searching. Chuuya met them with his chin high, strung up like an overheated wire. “They made deals with small vendors around the city. Still, we have to intercept the goods. They’re more than fifteen percent of our predicted introits for the fall.”

He paused, raising two fingers to his in-ear. His order was short and decisive — some breaths later, Chuuya heard the echo of bullets against the night sky.

“How do we figure out the system?” Noguchi asked, running his eyes across the rows of trucks. “They’d have to be suitable locations. I can think of several areas around the port —“

“Suribachi City,” the man interrupted him, nodding to the corpse. “They’re all in Suribachi City, according to him.”

Pieces fell together with disgusting efficiency. The edge of the crater was merely a walk from the edge of their side of the port — Noguchi was the bulkier of the squad, and Chuuya was the only member who had actually dealt with similar jobs in the settlement.

The realization that the Colonel had expected him to join the mission was as startling as it was deafeningly irritating. Chuuya bit down what might have been respect, had the coagulation of sweat and sick fever under his fringe not painted everything red.

“The two of you will deal with it,” the Executive said. “Half of the stolen goods have been hidden in the crater. The area is a good site to escape from the eyes of the police, but it’s littered with Black Market pirates. If they were to find such a treasure in their hands —”

“How long do we have?” Chuuya asked.

The Colonel was efficient in explaining, even as he threw his unwilling informant over the railing, down the waters — nonchalant in leading them back to the warehouse, where his men were already dealing with the slowly rising mountain of corpses. Chuuya met Koda's eyes — a fraction of an instant before the heel of his shoe sank in a head biting the curb.

"Nakahara," the Colonel called, right as he turned to follow a clearly peeved Noguchi to the SUVs.

He had walked some steps further from his men, landing where the moonlight was muffled by the industrial chimneys; where the long look he sent Chuuya's way — mistrust and irrepressible curiosity; as if he had hopes, and wished to see them crushed — would go unnoticed.

For some reason, it reminded him of Iceman.

Being subjected to that Flag's gaze had been the most stubborn test of his time in the Mafia — a fluttering deja vu between what the smoke from his cigarette had looked like between the roofs of Suribachi, and what it felt like when the man wordlessly offered it to him. Iceman never got drunk — when Chuuya did, though, he accepted to bicker on the logistics of their old battles with an exasperating childishness.

[Once, with the two of them perched on the roof of the Old World, he had asked — do I look different now to you?

Iceman's drag of smoke had lasted longer than the irrelevance of that question. Why would I tell you, Chuuya?].

"Colonel," Chuuya offered, vacantly. "I told you. Chuuya's fine.

His glance was uninterested. I don't care for your dislike. "You have an Ability," The shreds of his military uniform should have tickled some rusty part of Chuuya's brain; they never did. "Use it."

He was taken aback. "You said —"

"I said to use it in the least noticeable way possible," the man interrupted. "Not to not take any advantage of it. Don't be dense."

"I thought I needed to win in ways that had nothing to do with my power," he spat. "Sir."

"There's a difference between knowing how the unluckier ones fight, and wasting a gift," the Colonel concluded, devastatingly easy. "It's yours. You should learn to use it correctly, yes — less earthquakes and less spectacularity, which will get you nowhere in an illegal organization —"

Chuuya flared. "It's not like I —"

"But your Ability is, and it will always be an advantage. Think of it as being given an additional flock of soldiers," he added. "Hide it in the bushes, keep it for the rainy days; but don't ignore it. Learn to control the things in your veins — learn to make them obey, not the other way around; no matter how tempting or enraging or there they feel — or they'll control you instead."

He stared.

There was no time to offer any questions — no time to wonder why the man had turned into wisdom what he had decorated in blame, in the meeting room. Noguchi was grunting for him to keep up — and the Colonel had already turned, hands outstretched towards his men.

---

...

---

“This place smells like a horse shit festival,” Noguchi muttered, the deeper they sank down the levels of the crater. “How the fuck do your nostrils still work?”

Chuuya had never thought about describing Suribachi City in flattering terms.

Even when he lived there, his attachment might have made him defensive, but never a liar — there weren’t many ways to make a kid say that a shithole was a castle. He’d loved and protected their territory for what it gave — for its maze-like streets, keeping intruders out and offering escape roads to stumbling kids, and for every disadvantage he’d learned to shape into a personal weapon. Not, he considered, for any actual, existing pros.

Still.

“Your presence helps me keep in shape,” he spat. “Keep up, or I’ll leave you behind.”

It was an unfair request. The foreign settlement was more roofs and secret tunnels than it was streets; jumping around in idle circles was a mindless habit to him and a challenge to someone as big and unused as Noguchi. Chuuya had no time to care. The sight of his gloves against the dirty wood of this or that box felt as strange as the one of them shaking Shirase’s hand.

The plan was easy enough — it relied on Chuuya’s memory of several possible hiding places for such an unusual cargo. The Sheep had never truly dipped their hands in the trade market, stealing what they needed and making Chuuya deal with eventual protests — nonetheless, he’d spent sleepless nights making sure no whisper in Suribachi would escape his ears.

Black market storages were everywhere, protected for less money than what would have been right by desperate inhabitants of the settlement; specifically, they sagged the epicentre of the crater, deep enough that most hypothetical cops would surely be shoot in the head, robbed, or chased away before they could even reach it.

“Come on,” Chuuya called, eyes sticking to a wall. If he squinted, the pink of Yuan’s hair was just behind the corner. “I know where to start.”

He breathed in, deep and nice. The familiar panorama under his eyelashes was smudged red at the edges; when he blinked, all of it was showered with a crimson tinge.

It was an assortment of things, muffled and sickly sweaty under the sound of Noguchi’s complaints — the blood in his mouth, invisible and impossible to ignore; the slight tremors of his fingers, damp on the no-longer fingerless gloves.

“Are you sure you know where you’re going?” Noguchi called, struggling to be delicate in his grip around the edge of a window.

From the roof, Chuuya wiped his sweat off, offering him his most unimpressed glance. “No offence, fish-face, but I was sneaking into these magazines when you were still eating high cuisine with your mommy’s toy boys.”

The man’s face burned red.

Guilt lasted less than lighting, but the smell of burned lingered. His background had been offered on a drunken afternoon in France, after a mission gone too well. Koda and the two of them had mostly stuck together — while Noguchi was still skittish, whatever Chuuya had done must have managed to gain his — something. His acknowledgment, maybe.

He was mad, he thought. He was mad. He wanted Noguchi to apologize, and he couldn’t have cared less about it. He wanted to never hear the name Albatross out of his mouth again. “Move,” he said. Chuuya would have bled for a new story on any of the Flags. “We’re almost there.”

Their first two stops, embraced by silence, brought no results. Chuuya scrubbed the locations off his mental list, trying to remember which caves had been the most popular for similar trades.

The topography of the crater had mostly stayed unchanged — but it had been more than a year. What the residents had no way of changing, street-fights would destroy; what felt no need to modernize itself, would be struck by storms that always seemed more disruptive down there.

If he had tried to look for the assortment of makeshift buildings where the Sheep had lived, Chuuya had the feeling he might have gotten lost.

Cry with an open heart, an old, wrinkled woman had told him, once, when he was nine and pretending innocence to devour territory. You’re young. Cry, if you so wish.

His revenge came with the third location he brought them to — a secret basement in the third-to-last level of the settlement, its door hidden by rubble and some strategically placed wooden tiles. He was quick to sweep them away, pretending he hadn’t noticed the exaggerated violence of the motion, Tainted a tad too involuntary on the tips of his fingers.

When he lowered a glowing arm inside the opening, rows and rows of industrial cold-storage boxes ripped a whistle out of Noguchi's lips.

"Great," he snapped, directing floored gazes to the buildings. "Let's get out of here."

The mouth of a rifle appeared next to Chuuya's arm.

Faster than eyes could follow, Noguchi extracted his guns — swifter than that, Chuuya's fingers grasped the neck of the rifle, bending it backwards.

The bullets it shot ended up somewhere in the walls surrounding the alley; the glow of his Ability spread all the way to the stunned face of the guard — and when his weapon was ripped away from his grasp, he squeaked.

Chuuya felt calm. He reached out; laid his fingers on the man's face, hovering, not touching, relishing in their light, and then — clenched.

The man dropped, liquified brains pooling down the square door of the basement.

"We could have gotten intel about the other locations from him," Noguchi pointed out, scoffing, after the echo had vanished. He'd taken a step back; a single one, that Chuuya couldn't quite focus on.

Red, he thought. When he climbed to his feet, he stumbled. "Come on," he said. It was all red. "This is the most secure of the locations. Let's bring everything we find here. The extraction team can worry about it."

Mercifully, Noguchi let it go.

They settled into mechanical motions. Chuuya led them through the roofs and down in the tunnels, skipping over fragile structures and dead end alleys. The rhythm became familiar — trying to control the electricity in his veins to explode this or that entrance; taking into account the presence of the organs boxes; getting rid of whatever guard the traders had put on site; dragging the congelators to the basement, in a mixture of his Ability and Noguchi's muscles.

"This is where you lived," Noguchi said, offhandedly, at one point — as he watched him lower himself down the tear of an old storage.

It sounded strangely tense.

"Not here, specifically," Chuuya answered, eventually. The circular lights of the containers emitted a gentle hum; when he put his hands on them, the vibrations shook his bones. "We had claimed an area of abandoned houses in the higher levels. But this was our territory."

"All of it?"

He shrugged. "All of what we needed."

"King of the Sheep," he said.

As it usually went, the title didn't arise any particular reaction. Too much shit in this body to worry about one more substance, Doc had told him, once, dragging his IV pole.

Chuuya had detested that name, back when it was somewhat true — had gritted his teeth whenever mafiosi brought it up, unsure if he felt shame, protectiveness, or just lingering bitterness. These days, it didn't taste like anything at all — if not, sometimes, like Shirase's never-sent London postcards.

“Does it mean you were the most cowardly of them, or the only one who wasn't?”

He kicked the next door down, hands in his pockets, and watched the chain of his hat dangle in the corner of his vision. “It meant I was the only one with an Ability. And if you don't want me to crush you with it — you'll learn better than to call me a coward.”

Subconsciously, Noguchi rose a hand to the knuckles-shaped scar he was still sporting.

A complicated expression dawned on the man's face; begrudgingly, he crossed his arms to his chest, eyes following his skips and tricks up and down the building. Chuuya knew what he was truly looking at — the ravaged streets and deteriorating habitations; the occasional pair of hungry eyes behind shredded curtains; the women in the alleys and their ruined fabrics. The children.

This is my home, he thought about spitting, nonsensically. Sunrise had always looked priceless from the top of the crater. The sky had been full of stars. The first thing Chuuya had ever seen — he had been birthed by the earth, and made cry by the firmament. You don't know shit about it.

It irked him sooner than he'd hoped for. “Cat got your tongue, rich boy?”

“I wasn't rich,” Noguchi muttered, scratching his fish-bone tattoo. “My mother was.”

Chuuya retched. “That is such a rich boy thing to say. Make sure no one in the syndicate ever hears you say that shit.”

“It's just,” he frowned. If Chuuya hadn't gotten accustomed to the specific brand of ire on his face, he might have picked the embers of the fight and started a fire. Few things made Noguchi angrier than injustices. “The twins, the Kure —“

“You know them?”

“We met during a job, while you were —” He paused. “While you weren't around, the last few days.”

Chuuya stored that information. “Good.”

“They said none of the Sheep was older than sixteen.”

“So they have eyes.”

“And you took care of them?”

He shrugged, uncomfortable. Too gentle of a term. “Someone had to.”

“Yeah,” he pressed, seemingly perplexed. “Yeah, that. Why did no one intervene?”

He blinked, hiding his motions behind the stocked refrigerators in his arms. “You’ve been in the Port Mafia for months, now. You said you joined because your family died, and you feared you’d be accused of their murder, yes?”

Noguchi nodded, jaw tense.

“Here’s a pop quiz, rich boy,” He leaned forward. “Why didn’t you go to the police?”

No answer came.

Peacefully enough, perhaps because of the silence, they collaborated. He wasn’t surprised — France had taught him that the two of them shared working ethics: killing quickly, without lingering. He could see why someone like the Colonel would have chosen Noguchi. He was a package of good bets — well-liked, efficient, and new enough not to have yet offered his loyalty to anyone. Most of all, he dragged a soul wrenching wish to prove himself by the neck.

“Fuckin’ nice,” Noguchi mumbled, eyes lingering on the bleeding eye socket of the dead guard in front of them. “Learned that from your bandaged toy boy?”

“Not my type,” Chuuya replied, searching for the nearest street to float the refrigerators through.

“What’s your type?”

“What’s yours?” he asked, smiling emptily to the air. “Tsuchiya?”

The somewhat revolted face he made didn’t exactly come as a surprise. “Don’t insult her like that,” Noguchi grunted, dropping his boxes down the basement. “She deserves way better than any half-assed mafioso will ever be able to give her.”

“You’re a half-assed mafioso, too.”

“I don’t see her like that,” the man snapped. “And you’d do better to keep her name out of your mouth.”

Chuuya scoffed. “She’s at least reasonable enough to take responsibility for her actions. Why can’t you let her?”

His turn was sharp enough to hiss along to the wind — through the reddish, sweaty haze of his gaze, he looked every inch the furious recruit Albatross had once told him about. “Her actions didn’t deserve that response. That — that bastard risked causing her permanent damage, and she still didn’t survive unscathed. She’s spent the last month trying to figure out how to function with a missing eye, and —“

“And you weren’t there with her?”

The fish tattoo winked along to his skin as he frowned. Under the lingering glow of their packages, the ink seemed to disappear, highlighting the vertical scar cutting his eye in two.

Chuuya sighed, crouching down on the edge of the door. “Noguchi,” he said. “I’m going to be honest. I don’t care if you hate me.”

“You —“

“I don’t care,” he insisted, “If Shitty Dazai makes you piss your pants, and you’ve decided fucking me up is your only plan B. But it’s clear you care about Tsuchiya. If that’s the case — you should probably stop making her damn life about you. ”

The crooked canopies of Suribachi City laughed their loudest shrieks at him. Hypocrisy wasn’t a familiar kind of venom, but he could still recognize it in his reflection — especially on the surface of the place where he’d learned to lie.

He wondered if mothers acted like that, too.

Chuuya searched through the darkened streets, gathering sweat on his upper lip and licking it off, mentally tracing the fastest journey to the wooden boxes the Sheep had used as living quarters. He remembered his makeshift futon on the floor — the one he never found vacant, when the younger kids braved their first winter.

Hey, he called, to the howling wind. To the debris of his childhood; to the things he didn’t want back. Hey, do you remember me?

“I’ve told you this, once before,” Chuuya said, meeting his reluctant gaze, again. “This is the Port Mafia. Your personal judgment on what she did, the reasons you have to believe she was in the right — they don’t matter. People are going to die because of what she did. The syndicate can’t survive on forgiveness,” He kicked a pebble down the road; thought about Shirase’s sharpest teeth. “Nothing can.”

Noguchi worked his jaw. “Would you say the same, if she was someone you care about?”

“I don’t know,” he admitted. “But I would say the same about myself. And I believe Tsuchiya would too — if you let her.”

The line of his shoulders was harsh. “With those beliefs,” he muttered, hands shoving pieces of boxes down with too much urgency, “You have some fucking face swearing you could keep us safe — as if destruction isn’t what you —“

“But Albatross could have,” Chuuya said. It sounded devoid to his own ears; it sharpened the mountains of Noguchi’s shoulders until even the clouds had to fear. “Couldn’t he?”

I didn’t need to be told, he wanted to add. I never needed to be told. The world had been the bell over a bar door, had been the splatter in front of his eyes — had been Albatross, holding onto his jacket with crimson hands, saying, but I saved Doc. The world had been looking at his best friend, and putting the dog to sleep with a lie.

“I’m not him,” he let him know. “If you want to hate me, hate me. ”

Noguchi's breathing pattern grew harsher and harsher; the bullet-holsters X-crossed on his chest trembled with every conflicted inhale. Chuuya knew he understood. He knew he cared. He knew the two were difficult to balance, most days.

"My baby sister," Noguchi said, eventually, unsure even as he opened his mouth. "She —"

The haze embracing him was both a blur and a shot of heightened senses — Tainted activated before he was even fully aware of his body turning around, and before he could meet the masked face of the silhouette shooting an endless tunnel of bullets into Noguchi's back.

The man slammed the door of the basement shut, rolling away, wide eyes settling on the scarlet bullets immobilized a few inches from Chuuya's chest. "Shit!"

He kicked his leg in the air, leaping over the next bundle of projectiles, and thrust the ones littering his body back to the source. "Of fucking course," he cursed, eyes running up the four snipers, hiding behind destroyed windows. "Go!" Chuuya snapped. "Follow me!"

They climbed up and down the roads they had spent the whole night stumbling through; he made sure to sink his fist into the nearest wall, dropping the front of the building onto the basement door, hiding it. At least one of Noguchi's bullets had hit the target, given the body dangling from one of the windows — but when he raised his head, Chuuya saw three masked bodies run over their heads.

"The traders?" Noguchi screamed at him, as they slipped down the broken roof of the next house, pulling shredded curtains down with them. Chuuya slammed his hand on his back, lowering the man's gravitational mass, and watched him let out an embarrassingly high yelp when his next jump almost sent him several buildings away.

He squinted at the trio. They were trying to cage them in; the tallest of the group was carelessly offering his back to them, trusting his partners at the sides would block them before he turned.

"The lower levels!" he called.

"What?"

"Stay on the lower levels!"

The fight, in Chuuya's experience, was not the most entertaining part of a job.

It was the second one.

The chase — the chase was easy.

Feet on every inch of existence, because the definition of ground wobbled and changed in his palms. The grin overtaking his face. The smell of blood — even Noguchi's struggling breaths, stumbling to guess his next step; to understand what Chuuya's eyes saw in the place of buildings and roads.

He sunk his fingers on the wooden railing of some abandoned storage. Channeling the uncontrolled bundle of something still prickling his nape, he stomped on the roof, digging a hole through the beams. He dropped inside the building, hearing the echo of Noguchi's call of his name.

One of the pursuers appeared in the tear of sky upon his head, through the curtain of dust and rubbles. He raised the railing like a bat, and stabbed it up, lightening its weight and increasing it again when it was met with the resistance of flesh. A soul wrenching scream choked the silence — blood rained down on him, joining the crimson veil of his vision.

“Fucker,” he mumbled, looking up.

Lifelessly, the impaled corpse swayed along with the wind.

He climbed out of the hole again, meeting Noguchi's startled expression — he'd already pulled the deceased pursuer by the legs, dropping him down into the empty streets.

“King of the Sheep!” one of the two voices left called. “Stupid enough to come back home?”

Chuuya stiffened.

Sharply, he turned around, looking for their silhouettes. They were from Suribachi; no outsider would have known how to take advantage of their surroundings the way they were doing. No one else, he considered, would have dared call him King of the Sheep again. The real world knew better; the real world had heard worse tales about him.

Noguchi growled, cocking his guns. “They're here for you.”

He glared. “How perceptive.”

Pointedly, the man elbowed him with the neck of one of his weapons. “Don't just drop like that, you brat — I thought they'd hit your ass!”

He squatted down behind what was left of the railing connecting the canopies. His hat had almost flown off during the fight; in his haste, he tried to his belt instead of putting it on. “I told you, asshole. And you were supposed to take care of the other one, in the meantime!”

“No, you didn't tell me —“

“Yes, I tapped your hand —“ Horror crowded down his spine. “Oh, no fucking way I just said that.”

Bullets drew pores on their coverage; Chuuya's hand shot out, grabbing them and hiding them in his palms. Amidst his rolling away, Noguchi sent him a weirded out look. “What the hell are you talking about —“ “Come out, King!” the voices called. A gasp — horribly obnoxious — followed. “Unless the voices were right. Was it Queen of the Sheep?”

Chuuya frowned.

“What are they talking about?”

“Not sure. Get the car keys ready,” he replied, throwing the bullets in the air, and tightening his fist around them again. “Give me a minute to take care of the jerks.”

“Nakahara —“

One of the masked men leapt from the window of the nearby storage, rifle pointed to his face, firing uselessly at his feet. Chuuya let the bullets dig the air all the way to the tip of his nose — when he sent them back, this time, he did so in a compact bundle.

The clump sank like a spear in the flying man’s chest, tearing a hole through his front — wide enough to snap the edges of his ribcage, struggling to keep the upper and lower sides of his body together. The two flesh halves destroyed the roof of the house they sank into, startling a scream from some vendor inside the walls.

On the ground, mockingly gentle, floated a familiar piece of plastic: a blue bracelet stained with dried blood.

The rush in his ears stopped.

This is our pride, Shirase had explained, once, with the seriousness of someone older — of someone who still felt no jealousy. Chuuya had been eight, and starved for more than something he could give back. Chuuya had — But when others have it, it’s their spoils of war.

Learn to control the things in your veins, he recalled, distantly. Or they’ll control you instead.

His next words sounded distorted even to his ears; a mixture of his voice and something else — higher and lower; hungrier and quieter. “Make it thirty seconds.”

His memories ended around that moment — the floating bracelet, the reddish tinge of the world; the lungs-drying sweat and the flames down his throat. Chuuya had never been sick before. The eye-shaped scars down his body reopened, and confirmed that one truth.

Not Corruption — not quite Corruption. But his stitches still ripped — the scream that left his throat was still a caged animal’s cry — and gravity still pulled everything down, uncaring and enraged and red and out of his control.

When he looked down — when he sank his fist, or tore apart, or ripped, or skinned, or killed, somehow, anyway, never ending — a fourth body still fell, and Chuuya followed, jaws open.

[Imagine a gate, a voice had said, wearing a lab coat and typing his days away on a computer. Imagine leaving the door ajar.

I can’t leave the door ajar, he had replied; or maybe he’d just wished to. Or maybe none of it had ever happened at all. Mama says bugs will get in.

Oh, yes, the man had agreed — only, he had made it sound like hunger. Imagine how many bugs could get in].

---

...

---

— through the waves.

Insistent and cold, brushing against his calves, wetting the edges of his yukata. He hadn't wanted to wear it, anyway. The village loved its festivities, though, and Chuuya knew the other boys would say mean things again, if he went against the tradition.

"Dear," the man called. Their hands were connected, sturdy fingers around too-small ones. His yukata was untouched by the waves. He kept saying he would bring him back to the townsquare soon — very soon, very soon, or his parents would get worried. But the man had needed directions to find the sea, and so he had followed, and —

"Dear," he repeated. His face was invisible, blinded by the sun, and a syringe was locked in his fingers. "Smile for the picture, yes?"

And —

---

...

---

Everything was a gentle rose shade, and a boa constrictor with a pink bow on its head had laid its head on Chuuya's thigh.

"That's a boa constrictor," Chuuya said.

A dip of the mattress. A head of knotted hair and bandages appeared over him, one wide eye blinking. "The boa constrictor line is bound to get boring soon."

Deja vu tickled his senses. The bed under his bones was softer than a cloud — but damp, like the velvet sweat-matted sheets from the nightmares Lippman had had almost every night.

Little butterflies were sewn on the blankets; the wallpaper had the same motif — though the ceiling had been decorated in ivy branches.

A new face joined Dazai's one, a cascade of blonde curls almost hitting the constrictor in the face. Elise, just like her room, was as delicate as ever — as plastic, too. "Her name is Kazuko, and she's ugly."

"Kazuko is beautiful, thank you," the boy replied, undeterred. One of his hands sneaked to tap on Chuuya's forehead, taking advantage of his mostly unresponsive muscles. And well behaved, he tapped, viciously. She's only bit me F-I-V-E times, and it wasn't even venomous!

"She's ugly," Elise insisted. When she fixed the bow on top of the creature, all the boa did was twirl her tongue, crawling on Chuuya's lap. "She looks like — like Rintarou's poop."

"Lise, I don't wanna know that —"

"You said you were going to throw it in —"

Chuuya laid back on his elbows, attempting to sit up. Immediately, a freezing sort of flame ran down his spine — landing him back onto the fluffy pillows and mess of stuffed toys.

Kazuko hissed. It sounded like a laugh.

"Fuck you," he wheezed.

She was ugly. Her brownish skin was interrupted by darker shapes, blooming down its endless body in circles and lines, until it reached two unsettlingly stupid eyes. They didn't evoke malice — but that only made them creepier. When it settled its attention on him, hissing a thin tongue in a greeting, Chuuya saw the lower half of her sole limb tighten around the boy's shoulders.

That thing is gonna kill you, he signed back, fingers curling in the air, despite Elise's whines.

Dazai's grin was brighter than the lights framing the bright pink vanity desk. "I hope so!" he squealed, leaning down to pat the creature's head, affectionately. "Did you know that, contrary to popular belief, this nonvenomous beauty kills her victims by choking off the blood flow to the heart and the brain? It's not suffocation. Imagine how peaceful my final breath will be! She's living-anesthesia!"

"I don't think that's how — where did you find this thing? And where's your leg cast —"

"Odasaku and I met her in the sewers," the boy answered, easily; pointedly ignoring questions about his disappeared crutch. "After she tried to kill me, he suggested we get rid of her — but I just couldn't let that happen. I convinced Odasaku to let me keep her. Now, all I need to do is wait."

Chuuya felt as if every organ inside his body had been passed through a microwave. "You named the boa constrictor whose murderous tendencies you're anticipating."

“Kazuko the II, ” he confirmed, gravely. Elise put her hand to her mouth, mimicking a trumpet. “After my first grasshopper. Elise danced on her.”

“I did!”

“May she rest in peace. I didn’t even have time to see if her bite was —“

“You domesticated the thing that’s supposed to kill you.”

The constrictor slid down from Chuuya, gathering into a donut in Dazai’s lap. His hair clips for that day were reptile shaped. His sleeves were stained in blood — when he slipped his chin on his palm and stared, Chuuya knew he was looking at his burned eye. “And?”

“Fucking fine,” When he pushed himself up, that time, he managed to sit up, head spinning. The number of toys all over the room was just short of nauseating; everything carried a strange smell of untouched — like the doll house Yuan had spent three months trying to steal. “Cheering her on. What happened to me?”

Falling back onto the bed, Elise and Dazai blinked. It wasn’t quite coordinated — it didn’t matter, still. Chuuya had always thought they looked a bit like each other — something in the dip of their cheeks; in the roundness of their eyes. A bad copy; something just wrong enough to pass all suspicions.

“Ah, well,” Dazai stared at the ceiling. “You kind of —“ “Exploded,” Elise offered, dropping in the middle of their bodies. When she attempted to dig a snow angel, her hands slapped them.

“Medical terminology,” Dazai agreed.

His coat was spread underneath him like a void on pink sheets. Curling over Kazuko’s head, his nails were always bitten to raw skin. No, not the nails — it was the skin surrounding them, red and ripped, as if his teeth had moved to the nearest substitute after having been smacked away from his nails one too many times.

The influx of memories gathered iron on the top of Chuuya’s tongue. Hesitantly, he laid down on his back — raising his arms to study the lines of bandages running over them.

“It wasn’t —“ he started to say.

“No,” Dazai said. “But similar. Noguchi dragged you to the Headquarters, screaming like a chicken,” A grunt. “Ruined all my work.”

His mouth dried up. “Did everybody —“

“See? No. Apart from you being hardly perceptible even behind a microscope, they are renovating around, after the hole we made on the twelfth floor —“

Chuuya stiffened. “Shut the fuck up. There’s no way you predicted that would happen —“

“Who knows,” he replied, vaguely. Head on his clavicles, Kazuko hissed — he murmured back something, fixing her little bow.

“Did you —“

“Fix you up? Sort of. You regenerated on your own, kind of. It was very weird to look at, by the way. And bandaging you up was sticky and smelly and annoying. You owe me so many Arcade tickets. And your corpse, maybe.”

“But the other night —“

“Same thing. Except —“

“Would you stop interrupting me?” Chuuya snapped, grabbing the closest pillow — the one under Elise’s head — and throwing it in his face. A shrill rang; Kazuko hissed louder.

Dazai threw the pillow back, furious. “You were asking. ”

“You weren’t letting me ask. ”

“I have a boa constrictor on me.”

“An amazingly well behaved one.”

“You two are insufferable,” Elise offered — the same tone she had used when they had received their first pay, and been lost enough about the value of money to spend all of it in two nights at the Arcade. “I want Q. Q is fun. Why do you never bring them around?”

“That is an awfully sweet question, my Elise.”

Chuuya had never seen Mori with his lab coat on — whenever the man had locked him in the backroom of his office for a check up, he had been back in his scarf by the time his eyes had opened again. The whiteness of it was awkward against his paleness — the stethoscope dangling around his throat was a shock of hot pink.

He had blood on his sleeves. Chuuya knew, without a doubt, that it was his.

“Our little Yumeno has been terribly busy with experimental missions,” he explained, shutting the door behind himself. The hallway of the highest floor of Building One was empty, lit in approaching sunrise; Mori’s hands tapped the end of the flower-shaped bed, smiling. “I’m sure they can’t wait to play with you again.”

Elise humpf- ed. The air folded into itself — when Chuuya blinked, she was gone. Kazuko, now curled on the edge of the bed, was unsightly staring Mori down.

“This is worse than when you fed all the bees into the clinic,” the former doctor sighed, tilting his head to study the beast. “Your allergic reaction was the least complicated part of that whole ordeal.”

Pettily, Dazai kicked Kazuko’s bow off.

At last, Mori laid his eyes on him.

“Well,” he started, a bit more strained. “You certainly had an eventful week, Chuuya, yes?”

Something climbed up his burning throat — something different from the shame Kouyou’s glare had burned through him, eyes low and fists tight. Chuuya thought about the few wounded men from the parking lot; the names he had memorized from those ricocheting TV News. He thought about the man’s hands on his shoulders; his knees on the ground. The scars under his bandages — otherwise, what was the point of it all?

“Yes, sir,” he said, obediently enough.

“Dazai here fixed you up all by himself,” he informed him — something, in the curve of his mouth, more taunting than proud. “I kept watch, though, don’t worry. He’s good, but he still bears some lacks. You needed a transfusion, and if he had actually given you his blood — well,” A scientifically curious expression took over. “I have always wanted to see what would happen.”

Chuuya barely had time to ponder fruitless poetry about the deadliness of Dazai’s own blood — a pillow hit him right in the face.

“What the fuck —“

“Are we even sure the eventfulness of the week is over?” Dazai questioned, leaning both elbows on the pillow, effectively attempting to suffocate him. His fingers sneaked underneath his kicking legs and fists — settled on his nape, right under the choker. “No bloodthirst and such?”

Merciless, nails tearing his skin apart again, he traced, like an order: don’t take your gloves off.

Chuuya paused.

The pillow was removed; Dazai didn’t even meet his eyes, flopping back next to Kazuko, leaving a sea between their bodies. “Define bloodthirst,” he heard himself say.

“How should I define bloodthirst?”

“If it’s that glazed, pathetic look you get whenever someone puts a gun in your hand,” he drawled, annoyed. “Then, no.”

Easier than most things should be, Dazai shrugged. Chuuya tried to recall the feeling of his palm on his forehead, swiping matted strands of hair away — clenching his mouth shut on a scream, under car lights and a smell of rust. “Pretending not to find something in death when you’re good at it makes you a hypocrite, not a good person.”

He grunted. “Who the fuck wants to be one?”

The world shook.

Chuuya yelped, hanging onto the edge of the bed not to fall over, spine on fire — Dazai's whines seemed to have more to do with whatever Kazuko's peeved reaction had been. As soon as his mouth ran out of curses, Mori sighed, contentedly, spreading in the space between them, hands crossed on his stomach — counting clouds between the ivy branches painted on the roof.

"Now, now," he tutted. "Now is not the time to philosophize. Chuuya, mind telling us how you feel?"

He stared at the ceiling.

Impatient hands are fallible hands, Pianoman had liked to say, rubbing banknotes under his nails. Fallible hands are a death sentence. A death sentence would have aggravated whatever Arahabaki was made of to the point of never ending screeches and scratches and words that words were not. Chuuya would live, for sure; he'd hate it.

"He feels like stuffed chicken," Dazai said, helpfully. Chuuya reached over to slap him. He watched him kick Mori's calf. He carried not an inch of the seriousness he had traced words on him with. "Elise will maul you for stepping on her bed."

"Let this old man rest his bones, yes?" the doctor groaned. "It's been report after report, you know? This Special Division business is hell. Who knew a permit could get someone so far."

"You're not old," they chorused. One of Mori's age-crises was the least optimal result.

He sighed. "If only you two had seen me in my prime."

"Was the Ice Age as cold as they say?" Dazai questioned.

Elise's chandelier was a rainstorm of little crystal pieces, reflecting the moonlight into gently candid lines. Chuuya moved a bit to the left, and winced against the feeling of being blinded — he sunk his head deeper into the pillow.

"— truly no point in being so difficult," Mori was insisting, attempting to pat Kazuko's head. "Your tarantulas appreciated me."

Dazai angled his body to hide her. "She's clearly smarter than them. Time is a learning curve in companionship. Like that dream I had, about the phantom crab —"

"It's like now he knows he can be let out," Chuuya forced himself to spit out, once the darkness of his eyelids began to bloom with stars. "Like he's decided he was never meant to be kept in in the first place."

One of Dazai's hair clips — star shaped; a bit ruined at the tips — dangled weakly from a curl, landing on the sheets. It seemed louder than death.

"If that's how it is," Mori said, surgically devoid of anything at all. A blinking dot on a computer he was typing his research on; the latest dossier on what Verlaine might have called the sin of Chuuya's stubborn breathing. "Report."

His lips parted through a tight jaw; quirkier than shrugged shoulders, Dazai said: “It was my fault.”

He stiffened. “The fuck it was, what are —“

“I had noticed early signs of instability, ever since Chuuya came from France,” he continued, undeterred by the morgue-like silence of the room. “Even before that, truly — but we cannot be sure of how much of that should be blamed on Dante. I should have taken them more seriously.”

“That’s just not —“

“What signs?” Mori demanded.

“Sweating,” Dazai listed off. “Scratching the Corruption marks. Distant gazes; wide pupils. Involuntary activation of Tainted. Murmuring. Convulsions; tremors. A steadfast refusal to meet reflective surfaces. A —“

“You don’t know what the fuck you’re talking about,” Chuuya snapped.

“Why did you let him use Corruption?”

The medical detachment of Mori’s tone set his nerves on fire. “He needed to prove something to himself,” Dazai’s shrug didn’t rattle the bed; barely a real thing. “I let him. It was my mistake.”

“It was my — Boss, seriously,” Chuuya insisted, tone bordering the dangerous. “I lost focus. Nobody but me has shit to do with it. I’m going to — deal with it.”

“Certainly,” Mori replied, pensive. “People got wounded because of you. I would suggest encouraging the idea of people getting hurt for you, rather. The choice is what makes the difference,” His smile was nowhere to be seen; he tried to understand where the amusement was drooling from. “You deprived them of one. I am sure you understand why the Special Division might be after a power that can do something of that gravity.”

He didn’t dare exhale.

The man hummed. “Ha. Gravity.”

“What do you suggest?” Chuuya asked.

“You have a goldmine at your feet,” Mori’s tone sounded elementary. “Who cares if it knows how to bleed? So do all men. Hone it. Eventually, from my experience — it won’t even smell much.”

A beat.

Dazai was carefully uninterested when he questioned: “You want him to train Corruption?”

“You,” he corrected. “Not him. Plural. Your collaboration is necessary, yes? Mostly, at least. I can’t say this week’s results have been some of your best, Dazai. Truly,” For the first time, a corner of his mouth curled up. It was distinctively unfriendly. “In the future, do try to move a bit quicker than the parking lot crashing on our syndicate’s strongest Ability User, yes? Imagine the mess. Imagine the gore. Three stores, four hundred square feet of decades-old stone, landing quicker than an exhale — heavier than whatever ball you must have had locked around your feet not to keep his skeleton from splattering,” A sigh. “Who needs bones. A loss is a loss.”

Chuuya traced the ivy on the ceiling. There was a mirror, in the furthest corner of the roof — a strange spot. He imagined Elise laying on the ground, cheeks rosier than a plastic rose, pulling her hair to see if the reflection would answer.

His lungs ached with memories he didn’t have. He tried — squinted until his head pounded; forced the corners of his skull until it was all shaded in frustrated shades — to recall what it had felt like — being buried.

“Yes, Boss,” Dazai offered — like he might have said more, if Chuuya hadn’t been there. Like they both would have.

“All you have to do is touch him. Call for backup, if necessary. Fairly easy, don’t you think?”

“Like you wouldn’t imagine.”

“Listen,” Chuuya attempted.

“As for you, Chuuya” Mori continued, jovial, “I won’t lie to you — I’m at a loss as to what the optimal solution for this Arahabaki issue could be. We have never dealt with anything similar — I wouldn’t dare give you orders on a matter I cannot back up. Given the sheer number of men I already have busy burying this matter — we don’t want to risk enlarging it further, do we?”

A pang of guilt. The man’s coat was a shock of white; he was right, and Chuuya didn’t even remember the blood on his hands. “No, Boss.”

“Nonetheless, nothing is ever quite as prolific as experimentation. I believe the necessity would match up nicely with you boys’ little competition,” He joined his hands. “Corruption exists with its cons — Extrema ratio, the Latin would call it. A last resort. Only the most hopeless situations should allow its use,” His cheek laid on the pillow; Chuuya couldn’t even consider laying his eyes anywhere that wasn’t on the man’s own. “I’m sure there won’t be particular difficulties finding circumstances with no hope to offer.”

“You’re asking me to set him free,” he said.

“I am.”

“To understand what, sir?”

Mori seemed to think about it.

“Where hunger becomes greed,” he landed on, eventually. “Where greed becomes foolish — cracking teeth on emptiness. I have theorized an endless state of Corruption would kill you, Chuuya. But death is a last step — the last step of a road filled with things to devour. I think it would benefit us all,” he concluded, unblinking gaze meeting his own, wrists to the air and shoulders flat. Exhaling. Never afraid. “To know when a god stops being hungry.”

Even the helplessness you feel, Verlaine had thundered, is by someone else’s design.

“I’ll do it,” Chuuya said.

A gentler smile. “I know you will. Dazai?”

The boy’s eye was stuck to the ceiling — bored, Chuuya thought, but not quite. “Don’t act like I have a choice.”

“Oh, none of us does,” Huffing, Mori sat up, climbing out of the bed by its feet. The motions shook his roughly-reconstructing ribs; Chuuya bit the inside of his cheek, unable to look away from the Boss’ hands, cleaning his coat. “We swore that petty right away the moment the Port Mafia buried us.”

Kazuko hissed. Perhaps she had been smart enough to keep quiet while Mori got his orders out of the way. When she curled over Dazai’s legs, she seemed uncertain of where to settle her starving eyes.

“The rules remain, obviously,” Mori said, fixing his sleeves. Chuuya’s blood was still on them, inevitable like their last punishment — no doctor. He wondered if Mori counted.

“Corruption is a matter of absolute secrecy. You will have to deal with the consequences alone. Ah, and Chuuya — do keep that hat on, yes?”

Discomfort settled between his clavicles, as both of them sat up. An uncertain complaint — something sharper than, you said it was a competition; something less dubious than, is it minimizing the damages, or widening them until they can be seen from the highest floor?

“Boss,” Chuuya bowed his head.

Dazai stared, head tilted to the side. “Boss,” he said, like a question.

Two white gloves of long fingers, thin like bones, ruffled both of their hair. “I trust you boys will find the best way to turn this mishap into a weapon,” Mori said, kind. Then, meeting Chuuya’s eyes, “Atonement comes in bloodied shapes, sometimes. It doesn’t make it less worthy. It only makes it unfair.”

“Isn’t unfairness unfair?” Dazai jumped in, with the tone of someone who did not care for the answers he already had.

“No,” Mori replied. “It just is.”

Chuuya felt himself nod, jaw clenched. He was still locked in that bite when Mori closed the door behind himself.

“He’s so predictable, sometimes,” Dazai muttered, chin in hand. Nonetheless, something in his tone was shaken.

Distracted, Chuuya made to kick his legs out of the bed. “We need to start planning,” he said, under his breath, hands reaching for reports he knew had to be lined up on his desk by now. “We need to take recovery times into account — hours and locations and fucking civilians. Corruption might —“

The moonlight disappeared.

His first instinct was to kick, Tainted in his palms — the sting from Kazuko’s fangs came right before Dazai’s breathless wheeze, hands sunk in the spot Chuuya had instinctively hit between his legs. The blanket he had put over their bodies draped across their curled up shapes like a funeral sheet.

“Are you stupid?” Chuuya spluttered, cheek smacked against one of the pillows. “Tanaki already told you, you can’t wrap people up like fucking rugs —“

“It needs to be a forest,” Dazai said. “And just so you know, I’m not doing the dance.”

This isn’t yours to apologize for, he almost replied. The crimson glow of Tainted painted caves of light on the boy’s unconcerned face, turning his bandages bloodied. Kazuko had slithered off. Dazai secured the blanket tighter over their bodies, and signed: it’s E-L-I-S-E’s room. It has to have cameras.

Chuuya thought about a doable answer to that — something that wouldn’t land him in the dungeons, Dazai’s finger stuck in his ear while Kouyou tore his viscera out of his ribs.

“Why a forest?” he asked, at last.

“Or a valley. Or — well. Not a parking lot.”

“Why a valley?”

“Can’t risk you becoming stupid enough to crash your head against a building, again,” the boy answered, easily. “You fell like a rag doll, last time. If you lose more brain cells than what you have left, your hat won’t even fit you anymore.”

He punched his chest. “Did you seriously get yourself arrested trying to get me out?”

His sole eye settled somewhere over his shoulder, deep purple underlining sharp eyelashes. His breath smelled like salsedine — he wondered if he had jumped from a bridge again. “Matsuda sure had the time of his life trying to figure out where you’d run off.”

Something tickled his conscience — maybe Mori’s words; maybe a glimpse of Arahaki’s cold madness. “You shot me.”

Very patient, very blank, Dazai reached out — and laid his palm flat in the middle of Chuuya's collar bones, eye holding his stare. Gingerly, he studied the teeth marks he had left on his hand during his Corruption recovery.

Chuuya felt the sudden need to see that bullet scar for himself — to study it in its every curve; memorize it as a mark that did not belong to the intruder in his nervous system. Dazai was known for his good aim. Dazai was known for his undeterredness.

“Did you fucking have to?” he snarled, in the absence of something better.

This is on you, he snapped at himself. What are you mad about?

The boy's eye didn't move from his own knuckles. He wondered what he had looked like — if he had run through the debris, lips white, stepping on pieces of severed limbs with no care. If he had been excited at the prospect of making him bleed. If he had been silent; had raised his gun with the Port-Mafia-black severity expected from Mori's proudest diamond.

He thought Mori ought to look at him with more kindness, had that been the case.

“I shouldn't have had to,” Dazai offered.

Chuuya couldn't speak — he feared breaking his own teeth. He feared being mean, and revealing it was all for the sake of ricocheting. Something like rage, he mused — something like masochism, maybe. The sane, Verlaine's diaries had read, do not wish for blood.

“How did you know you'd nullified me?”

His pause was shorter than a blink. Chuuya wasn't quick enough to hear it; he saw it in the red tear Tainted rained between his eyelids. “I didn't.”

I did, Chuuya almost said.

It sat uncomfortably on old certainties.

There was something there, he thought. He searched and searched; found nothing but the downward curve of Dazai's mouth, lips bitten to blood — more curious than disappointed. When Dazai raised his hands, Chuuya only had time to notice the rings of bruises around his wrists — then he took off Chuuya's gloves, and it was darkness. It was the curved lines between Dazai's fingers; the blisters shaped like a gun; the scar near his thumb, a match to his own. It was quiet.

Chuuya grabbed the hems of the blanket between his toes — he straightened his leg, raising it just enough to let Kazuko peek in along to a ray of moonlight.

His hands were dying.

“That can't be good,” he concluded.

The ash-black color started at the tips of his fingers, climbing all the way to the middle of his forearms, fading into onyx veins. A burned out piece of wood — a decaying corpse from a house fire. When Dazai pressed his thumb to the middle of that decomposing skin, it didn't even pale.

A hum. "What if your limbs fall off?"

"They're not going to fall off," Chuuya snapped, horrified, pinching the wrinkles between his eyebrows. "Fucking die. Why not tell Mori?"

"He has your life in his palm," Dazai replied, distracted. The hold of his fingers around his own was strangely warm; the taste of No Longer Human less nauseating than usual. "Your death should be yours."

It landed weirdly between their arms.

Chuuya frowned.

He was missing something — he knew. It was stuck between the falling skin of Dazai's lips and the strangely obsessive way he was running his hands down Chuuya's own; clinging to his wrist to scratch them, like a displeased cat. It was stuck under his destroyed nails — the nails of someone who had dug — fingers littered in Elise's band aids. The smell of strawberry jam hadn't even lingered — nothing they touched ever did.

He thought about it all for five seconds.

He stopped.

"So it's rotting me from the inside," he said. He had the suspicion he should have cared more — that the vowels should have tasted more bitter. "Great. What do we do with it?"

"We can't extirpate it," Dazai shrugged. It rattled the bed; on the ceiling, the mirror offered Chuuya its widest smile — teeth drooling blood and stone debris. "Mori might just lecture us again. I guess we'll have to let it grow, then, yes?"

---

...

---

Between the twirling static lines of the tape, on the ancient laptop — Chuuya was an irrelevant dot, amongst cars parked on the paved roof of the parking lot.

His silhouette wasn't steady on his feet — a strange sight. The cracks widening under his steps were uncontrolled and relentless, spreading like a spiderweb working shift-night overtime. The red of Tainted was washed out by the quality of the television — to an eye that didn't know, it would have been nothing more than TV statics.

Abilities, Mori had written, once, don't deal well with secrets.

The world came down soundlessly — a cloud of crimson dust and scorching thunder. The ground shook, as the mezzanine of the parking lot came falling down mercilessly, undeterred by Chuuya's head thrown back in laughter, and the energy with which he was attempting to slam his own body onto the catastrophe.

The screen wavered. When it settled again, ruins devoured the scene — shaking under lines of red electricity, as Arahabaki did his very best to climb out. Pieces of devastated cars appeared through the cracks; bloodied flesh from the Souls' corpses hung from the metal.

Dazai came running.

It might have looked somewhat ridiculous, had the utter silence not raised goosebumps. The blackened lines of his coat climbed up and down the destruction, mouth relentlessly calling a single word, fingers dragging up and down every inch of naked skin he came into contact with.

Blue and red lights appeared shortly after, surrounding the scenes in a panicked attack; a frame that might have been Matsuda reached the top of that shaking mountain, pulling Dazai down by the arm.

He resisted. Matsuda didn't let go. Dazai's free hand reached and reached and reached, his mouth still open, blurred face contorted in —

A hand slammed the laptop closed.

“Considering we do have a front door,” Officer Matsuda questioned, leaning wrinkled hands on the other side of his desk. “Did you have to break my window to welcome yourself in?”

The first morning light coming from the hallway illuminated his messy office — the piles of unfinished reports and closed-but-only-technically cases; mocked by the storm of pictures hanging on his walls — connected by a red thread that was so on the nose, he used to believe the officer would only put it up when Chuuya broke in to erase Sheep traces from his database.

That entire place, he didn't stop to consider, reeked of Sheep. Chuuya had done his very best to keep them out of that room — it had worked sporadically. If he squinted, he could see Shirase's shoes on the guest seat; the way Yuan would stare right at Murase's face while she stole colored clips from under his nose.

Chuuya will get us out of here.

Don't linger, Chuuya reminded himself. It had been written all over Rimbaud's diaries. There is nothing to find in the abandoned.

Sunrays rained on the officer's lingering eye bags, too — and, all around them, the ring of fresh bruises, shaped like the rusted bars from the cells in the corridor.

“You're not a fighter,” Chuuya frowned.

“Not outside of what the Academia had me learn,” Matsuda confirmed, massaging his nape as he dropped onto the guest chair. A stain of coffee had turned the edge of his collar brown; his eyes were studying him a bit too attentively. “Your boy wasn't particularly glad about being detained.”

He stared. “That Mackerel did not do that.”

The Officer massaged his neck — right over the bruises were leather scratches; the result of a jacket being strangled around his neck. “He swears you taught him that specific move, actually.”

Something uncomfortable settled in the space of the piece he knew he had been missing. Chuuya didn't understand. Chuuya didn't want to know why Dazai had bruised his knuckles for him.

“Can't believe you got yourself beaten by a pathetic beanpole with noodle arms,” he spat.

“Mafia kids can't be called pathetic.”

“Can't they?” he echoed, toneless.

A glare. “Was it actually you?”

Chuuya tapped his fingers on the laptop. It held several files on the wounded victims of the catastrophe — a good number of cellphone numbers, and reparations costs, and tears-stained testimonies. Damning evidence, Ace would have hissed. Abilities don't deal well with secrets.

“I put money in you guys' funds,” he said. “I don't trust the police to actually use them on civilians. I do hope you'll do it, though. The Port Mafia will deal with the rest. Yokohama shouldn't be burdened with others' mistakes.”

Matsuda's lips trembled. Speechless.

Chuuya cleared his throat, spinning the chair around to stand. “Anyway,” he offered, “I'm not here for that. I need some of your voices.”

“Chuuya,” he said, very gentle.

“Queen of the Sheep,” Relentless, he leaned his own palms on the papers on the desk. The new fingerless gloves hadn't been stretched out enough yet; they reprimanded every twitch of his fingers. “Am I meant to just interpret it as an insult, or have I missed something?”

Matsuda looked at him.

It took Chuuya's unblinking stare to drop his shoulders — not as much acceptance as it was defeat. He reached forward, extracting one of the dossiers from the piles.

"I have heard that around," he admitted, eyes roaming through pictures of Suribachi City. "I assumed it might be a mishap — you and the kids haven't been around in a year. I thought perhaps the old myth had begun getting blurred at the edges — that people had forgotten."

He curled an eyebrow, unimpressed, nodding down at himself. "I'm not particularly forgettable."

"Maybe you look like a girl."

"Maybe you look like a shiny bowling ball. You said I thought. What do you think now?"

Matsuda hesitated. "I think someone is willingly spreading the story differently. Trying to make up a rumor, maybe. I don't know what the gain is supposed to be, though."

Chuuya ran his tongue along his teeth. He squinted at the pictures on the wall — studied the vacant, bloodshot eyes of Dazai's mugshot. It would be taken down soon, he knew — removed from memory. Everything they touched was.

"Alright," he concluded. "Let me know if you hear something more about that."

He circled the desk, hands in his pockets; stole a pack of cigarettes from the pile of boxes near the doors, and pretended not to pause when Matsuda said: "It's not your fault."

His hummed. "Don't be stupid now."

The man opened his mouth. Whatever he wanted to say was nowhere to be found; when he shut his lips again, his gaze moved to the framed picture on the furthest corner of the desk — him and Murase, hands around each other's shoulders, grinning widely at the camera.

"I have a feeling he would know what to say," Matsuda commented.

It rolled onto the floor, harmless and heavy with consequences. Chuuya had been squeezed out of any feasible reaction to that sentence. His arms were itching. His hands were red. His duties were clear.

"I have a feeling he would be here, if he had known how to shut up," he replied.

The man didn't deny it.

"Come on," he said, instead, cleaning dust off his pants as he stood. "I'll give you a ride."

It was in the midst of Matsuda's rant on the positive effects of group counseling, right when Chuuya's forehead had begun to pound with the constant bumps against the window — that he saw the trail of blood in the sand by the crosswalk.

"Stop," he called. He thought he had, at least — the man's yelp only registered after Chuuya had already thrown his car door open, shoes sinking in the sand.

Grieving, he considered, with every missing pant out of his trained lungs, sand sticking to his shoes, seemed like an unbearably heavy concept, at times.

“Chuuya?” Matsuda called, attempting to follow his gaze. “Chuuya, are you —“

“My business,” he replied. “Not you guys’.”

At that — the man fell quiet.

He resigned to making his way down the shoreline, juggling the sand with his feet to cover the red river guiding him. Who says this is your business?, some reasonable voice offered. Who says blood ever is anyone else’s?

All thoughts vanished with the sea wind; something was waiting for him at the end of the blood road.

The corpse was putrid. A sharp, bitter smell clogged his nostrils the closer he circled around it, intense enough that he ended up removing his hat to protect his every oxygen door. A hunting knife had slit the animal’s throat; the blade was sunk in its side, an unlikely flag. Blood pooled down its dirty white mane, blending with the sand, rendering it a sticky mush under his shoes.

Chuuya met its lifeless eyes, frozen in the last emotion it had ever felt: irrational, feral terror.

Apart from my poor dreams, he recalled — on the glass of his entrance doors, on the inside of a blue plastic bracelet, under his eyelids — nothing interests me.

Unaware of his memories, and unconcerned with his realizations, the dead sheep stared back at him.

---

London, United Kingdom

Order of the Clock Tower (Archivists Building)

Telematic Control Central, 356B67.

Case: S56780001B

Codename: “The Japanese Sheep”

Shirase Buichiro.

Port Mafia Intelligence — Burner 676.

Registered Call N. 16787.

*Interferences have been registered. Theorized cause: Influence of Prototype A.F.
(Creator: Professor Mary Shelley; 567006).*

Transcription.

[Statics.

*Transmission Status: Interrupted.

“...and I don’t —“

*Transmission Status: Conflictual.

“Hello? Wrong number, d — ... ude?”

Statics.

“...what?”

*Transmission Status: Undergoing Work.

*Transmission Status: Fixed.

“ — Port Mafia?”

“What the fuck — where did you weirdos even get my num —“

Statics.

*Transmission Status: Fragile.

“What? Yes, I do think it’s an important detail — I thought I’d never hear from Chuuya again, so—“

“What? Well, why didn’t he call — Why would he ask you guys to contact —”

*Transmission Status: Fixed.

“No, I — Blood graffiti? Are you sure they’re from... oh. Could it be — maybe someone... killed one of the kids, and took the — I don’t know! Y — I d —“

*Transmission Status: Conflictual.

Statics.

“I promise, like — You can tell him. Not me. I’m too busy here in the city — Yes, Stray Sheep, I’m doing just —“

“...killed a Sheep? Who? What? Oh. Like, a real sheep? That’s disgusti — smell like sh — reepy — Can’t you just get Chuuya on the phone — “

*Transmission Status: Fragile.

“No, I don’t know. What? Y — What? Why h — specifically? I don’t know what happened, I told you. I told you! We — separate ways. I swear. She — Suribachi? Did he kill them? Fucking — could do better, anyway. What? Hey, wh —“

*Transmission Status: Conflictual.

*Transmission Status: Conflictual.

*Transmission Status: Conflictual.

Attention: Intromission. Attention —

“It’s not very nice, spying on Master Chuuya’s friends. Want to hear an android joke, instead?”

*Transmission Status: Failed.

*Please report to **/**/**]*

End of Transcription.

Chapter End Notes

kouyou, dazai, and every person around him, very sensibly: chuuya i think you are having issues coping because irrational destruction isn’t your style chuuya: [waving his slowly decaying arms and the body that’s activating corruption on its own] could an unwell person do this hey there! first chapter of the week, and we're dealing with one my favorite themes i've written for this fic: the relationship between chuuya and anger. i don't typically agree with the popular fandom hc that chuuya has anger issues, but i do interpret a lot of his reactions to things that happen to him as a "rage first so you don't have to think about it second". this chapter is the start of a whole process where i'd like to analyze how chuuya, imo, in stormbringer and in canon and with dazai, tends to substitute grief and sadness with what's expected to him as a person — given his power and given his proneness for destruction. those of you who still remember chapter seven might remember dazai's "you do know you don't have to be angry all the time, do you?"

anyway! more on that. we got some more noguchi, which i've been waiting for! he's my best friend's favorite draft character, and i'm excited for what i want to do with him. has he warmed up to chuuya yet? what are he and the colonel planning? is the colonel as bad as they seem? we'll see and mori! god. i love writing mori interacting with skk. i feel like it makes sense to assume the he would have a close relationship with both of them; with dazai because of how they are, and because i like the familial/manipulative interpretation of it and with chuuya because i feel like his loyalty has to have its foundations on something more than mere ideal. mori is a clever man, and he's shown not to be cruel to his subordinates — he knows better. when he's cruel, he's cruel in much subtler ways (like not kicking higuchi out but making her doubt her whole life lol) and chuuya's squad is official formed! more importantly, corruption training is about to start. i'm curious to explore how the pm/skk figured out that corruption isn't exactly something that chuuya can use when he wants — and the executive competition is in place. very excited.

anyway, as always — thank you so incredibly much for all the love you show to this fic. i was really down when it got deleted a few weeks ago, and if my best friend hadn't convinced me to post it again, i wouldn't be here. i'm very grateful, and i hope to hear from you in the comments! those and kudos are much appreciated.

see you either saturday or sunday! keep warm <3 p.s. "Yes , I tapped your —" Horror crowded down his spine. "Oh, no fucking way I just said that."

anyone caught that chapter 5 reference? bomb in the near vicinity mafia code :)

BLOWN

Chapter Summary

The crucial issue, the man mused, between one too-casual step and the other; eyes roaming in search of the other suit-shielded agents scattered through the parking lot, were his slacks.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end :)!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xiv.

---

Case number: 78930985

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. completed the following [...]*

---

The crucial issue, the man mused, between one too-casual step and the other, eyes roaming in search of the other suit-shielded agents scattered through the parking lot, were his slacks.

His wife had picked them for him. She had quit her job mere weeks after his position at the Special Division branch had been put on paper; I paid for them with couch pennies, she had whispered to him, in that eyes-crinkled way of hers. They had become his favorite.

When it rained, though —

“Quit walking like that,” the nearest Agent hissed. A smile was petrified on his face — he had some never-touched-before phone on his ear, and a shiny new briefcase in his other hand. Their conspicuous group could have been a floor of the nearest tech skyscraper, pulling their cars out for lunch — under the flickering lights, he couldn’t quite shake off the feeling that their faces were too blank to sell the part.

“I can’t,” he hissed back, unsbtly fixing his gun in the tight side of the pants. “They’re soaked. It feels like walking in a swamp.”

In the ear-piece, the toneless voice of the de facto commander spoke: “In position.”

He stiffened.

He walked to the car.

It was all a matter of careful balance — the tight grip around his briefcase; the tighter grip around his unresponsive phone; the never-ever-let go grip of his ribcage around his lungs. Summer rain always made breathing difficult.

No moon was there to blink at their casually abandoned bodies, from the tunnel that led to the exit. The industrial lighting, sickly white and insistent, wasn’t any comfort. This he knew, though: monsters could not survive without the starless night sky.

The man was no coward.

It was rational caution; delicate steps on a floor littered in glass shards, and white heathers’ petals, and similar deadly things. Something every reasonable man knew — always carry a light with you, always listen to the things you can’t hear, always watch yourself from the shadows. Yokohama had simply grown more deceitful, lately.

Old friend and old nemesis; the city that would keep you safe — if you had something to offer in exchange. The man had met crueller men. He had also, admittedly, met kinder ones.

“He’s coming.”

Water dripped from some faraway leak — the echo of its crystalline rhythm bounced off the walls, ricocheting against the man's skull.

The sounds of heavy steps down the tunnel echoed like a last scream.

Nothing about the quiet was meant to be unsettling; so it wasn't. The man made his way to his assigned car, eyes low, and did not dart a single glance to the other members of the squad — the ones busy talking nothings on the phone; the ones pretending to get into their own cars.

He opened the hood, and set eyes on the only object: a black, electric wire-laced net.

Standard procedure for Abilities repression, the de facto commander had called it. Then, four words that had kept him awake the entire weeks spent planning the attack — words that had never been associated with the net.

It might not work.

“Hi!”

The man slammed the hood shut.

“Civilians?” the agent closest to him hissed in their earpieces. “We said to evacuate the area!”

“I’m really sorry to interrupt you,” the boy offered, smiling. He was tall for his age, but built in the lanky uncertainties of adolescence — the baby fat on his cheeks and the shimmering braces on his teeth were strangely unsettling, when paired with the unnaturally straight line of his spine. “Do you happen to have a lighter?”

He squinted. Hesitantly, with the hand held behind his back, he confirmed to the closest agent — civilian. “I’m afraid not. Aren’t you a bit too young for bad habits, son?”

“My babysitter set me on the wrong path,” he sighed. He was dressed strangely formal; the hems of the coat he had only laid on his shoulders almost brushed the ground. Perhaps he was one of those rich, vaguely dispassionate kids who worked internships near the City Hall. “Well. Thank you either way.”

“You may want to hurry out of here,” the man let him know, tapping a finger on the hood.

“Oh,” When he tilted his head to the side, his overgrown bangs moved just so, showing off a head bandage, hiding his eye. “How come?”

He shrugged. “Heard they’re sending men in for pest control.”

“Oh,” he repeated. His braces peeked through a vacant smile. “I understand.”

Get him out the fuck out of here, he signaled, with his hidden hand. From the square of weak light appearing from the tunnel, thunder shook the heat-vibrant air. The LED lights flickered.

For a single moment, when the plastic light bit the darkness away — the man could have sworn he had seen the boy's skull grin.

The boy bowed. Something about it was unsettling — his smile, perhaps. The way his one eye followed his breaths. "Good evening, then."

"Good evening," he mustered up.

Over the drumroll of thunder, the lights buzzed again. When they came to an halt, he was nowhere to be found.

"He's gone," he muttered.

"Now," an agent replied.

What followed was a blur.

[ "Be careful," the Commander told him, in the shiny Hall of the Special Division building. "If any other syndicate or authority caught a glimpse of this, it would create a mess we don't need." ]

"No one will know, sir," the man assured him. "We will be swift. The boy won't even know how to scream."

"You will be tasked with the net."

"I often am. I know how to hide. It was the first useful trick I learned in my life."

A curled eyebrow. "Were you a shy child?"

"No," he replied. "Just a disliked adult."

A grin relaxed the man's face. It was quick to disappear. "Still," he insisted. "Be mindful of the shadows."

It seemed a peculiar warning, with a fake briefcase in his hand and the future on his eyelids, and one of his son's dinosaur toys in his pockets. He was going through a phase. His hands were never empty enough. "The shadows, sir?"

"Yes," Whatever his gaze settled on, the man knew he hadn't been invited to observe it, too. Still, the hesitance of his next words was biting enough to slide shivers down his spine. "The roads of the underworld have been talking. Tales I have heard since I was a child — gods and demons, and whatnot," His pursed his lips. "Never seemed as real."

Nervousness turned into an awkward laugh; it was an old habit of his. "How should we know which shadows are the shadows, sir?"

"Oh," the Boss blinked, as if he hadn't considered the possibility. As if two shadows had come, and obscurity could no longer exist on his own; outside of the realm of servitude to two swift-footed thieves. "Well, not all darkness has teeth, does it?"]

A5158 was a stain of red and blank.

The man heard him more than he saw him — flashes of war cries and screams escaping from gritted teeth, as the flickers of electricity whipped his glowing limbs. Upon The Tainted Sorrows was red, according to their database — with the almost theatrical buzz of lighting and broken neons, the mess seemed more a bright, luminescent black.

Standard procedure. The men fired their guns at him, bullets-shaped tranquilizers that hit the target with an echoing roar — the men threw the net he quickly passed through their hands, and they forced the boy to the floor, and they watched as electricity tore a shriek out of his throat.

Standard procedure — the guilty convulsed and screamed and fought back, drooling like an animal, baring his teeth like a beast, uselessly attempting to flare his vanishing Ability.

Silence.

Through the labored breaths of the agents holding the net down with their feet, the man let out a sigh. A5158 was passed out — curled in a fetal position, blood seeping out of his ears. The knots of the net pressed onto his cheek, plastering him to the ground — spasming fingers and all.

Behind the eyelid, his eye shook.

“Alright,” the commander ordered. A5158 had managed to strike some hits, before falling — the man met the lifeless eyes of half a dozen agents, skulls shattered against the cars he had flung them into. He cleared his throat. “Take him.”

Effortlessly, like standing up at the end of the dinner, he ended the order with a kick to the back of the boy’s head.

It thundered.

The lights flickered — once, twice; the dark breaks in between a bit longer each time. By the seventh time, they didn’t turn on again.

A breath. One of the agents cursed. “Where the fuck are the portable to—“ He fell quiet.

The darkness was suffocating. The man tried to remember where the nearest car was positioned — he kept his foot on the net, and reached behind himself, looking for his guns. He found nothing but an empty holster.

He swallowed his tongue so abruptly he choked, backing away, stumbling, unsure of his direction, heartbeat spiking in symbiosis to the flickering lighting outside — “Code Museum,” he called, his voice barely a whisper — and then it rose until it burned his throat — “Code Museum —“

He turned, right as lighting lit up the night, and he stepped on his commander’s corpse.

A guttural scream crawled out of his throat, not a screech and not a groan and not a cry, but something in between. The sound ricocheted off the walls — almost hiding the glacial clatter of the net being dragged across the concrete, the eerie lack of breathing patterns from his agents. He backed until he bumped against a car, hands trembling so violently his body shook with it.

When lighting flared again, he only caught it all in a blink — the sea of corpses, standing right where they had been towering upon the net, heads exploded into nothing but wet, slithering brains and chests torn into pieces, their ribs spread open like gravity had used a corkscrew to.

Then death came falling on him.

It was red.

His head crashed against the concrete, and then dug a road inside it, further and further. The smell of blood was intoxicating — the claws that were anchored inside his chest were burning, as a sound that might have been laughter drooled on his face.

When he managed to tear his eyes apart, he saw crimson strands of hair floating into air that had turned scarlet with a nature-made electricity — and eyes that lacked a pupil, crying blood tears on cheeks he had seen pushed to the ground until a moment before.

“Please,” he heard himself beg, through the blood of his shattered jaw, “Please — “

“Look at this, Chibi!” A voice called, some endless galaxies away. Familiar, he thought — and then he didn’t think anything, anything that wasn’t the liquid fire in his veins and the god upon him, burying his body deeper and deeper into the concrete, laughing. “They gave your treasure hunt a name and everything.”

The boy from before appeared upon him.

He had his gun in his hand.

“Don’t worry,” he told him, like he was very aggravated by the whole thing. His free hand pinched the god’s ear; like an exhale, like an Icarus — he fell, and blinked with human eyes. “My partner vouched to fill your veins with poison and send you back home to relay a message. I’m more for the hot liquid metal route, though.”

He was going to die, he thought. They were going to let him live, and he was going to die for it.

“What — “ His chest was scattered. The thing straddling him had claws no longer, but the eyes it set on him still weren’t human. “What message?”

A5158 seemed on the verge of passing out. Nonetheless, he sunk five nails onto the holes his vanished claws had left — curling inside viscera, his entire skin dripping in the agents’ remain — and leaned forward, framed by the never ending void of the other boy’s coat, the boy’s eye — and spit right into his face.

Kamikakushi, the man recalled. The tales of folklore his wife would tell him in the winter, fingers running through his hair. Never seemed as real.

Teeth brushed his ear. Nakahara Chuuya ordered: “Come find me.”

---

TWO MONTHS BEFORE

---

Cemeteries were the one place where Arahabaki had nothing to say.

Chuuya would have expected anything but. The deteriorating bones and drained flesh littering the ground under his feet — so unapologetically endless he could feel them, one by one — were an ocean for him to get lost in. It was remarkably similar to the feeling he got whenever he stepped on holy ground — as if the thing pulsing through his veins had been reminded of just how tight the space was. As if it’d ever been holy; and not merely laboratory-made.

But Arahabaki — who scritch and who pulled and who whispered wordless ideas down the length of his spine; who didn’t even recognize death for what it was, always too much in a hurry after causing his devastation to stick around and see it poison the grass — fell quiet as soon as he stepped one foot inside that funerary playground.

It might have been interesting enough if it were respect — Chuuya knew he couldn’t feel anything of the sort, though.

Lousy roommate, he told himself, kicking rocks and walking heavily, because what else was there, if not leaving a sign — Lousy roommate, mindless itch.

“I came with the motorcycle, by the way,” he told Albatross’ fake grave, fixing his crossed legs upon it. It was the most uncomfortable of the bunch to sit on — but spiting him for all the days he’d spent on Chuuya’s counter was viscerally more fundamental than any pain. “Your dramatic ass should be grateful you’re dead. I would have never given that thing back to you.”

Summer painted the sky golden whenever he was finally alone — Chuuya liked to chase the skyline down the coast, to run fast enough that the velocity machines would ring and a cloud of dust would embrace him. He liked the sheer rawness of it, the electrifying sensation of his ears popping and his shoulders brushing the ground, the brush of brakes he didn’t want to step on, not now, not ever, not until he fell over the edge of the earth.

You’d look cool as fuck on it, Albatross had snickered, months before he —

“I’ve started buying your fancy cigarettes,” he told Iceman, then, throwing his peach peels on his grave. He would clean it up later — he always did. “They taste like shit. I get that you had a whole English-spy thing going on, but how far were you willing to go? They’re not even worth the money.”

The pack was a heavy weight in his pocket; Chuuya considered leaving it home every morning. Upon that enclosed area, the overgrown leaves of the tree offering shade to the tombstones hissed along to the wind, laughing at him. “Sorry I don’t get to stay long these past few weeks,” Belatedly, he gulped down a bite. Felt it get stuck — felt it grow old; felt it fester and grow vines up his throat.

He went there every week. Verlaine had died mere days after them; days, like stolen goods he didn’t deserve.

Don’t be a hypocrites.

“I’ve been rotting away. Quite literally. Doc would have a field day with my latest trick,” He snorted. “These days it feels like I’m only ever kicking some son of a bitch’s face in or passing out at the Arcade,” He lit up. “I know you guys didn’t care about that stuff, but we’ve come up with this foolproof technique to scam all those idiot kids at the machines, and —“ Lippman’s fake grave mocked him the most out of all of them. He had a real one — empty, and engraved with his stage name. It was littered in so many flowers the stone disappeared under them. He wondered, sometimes, if all those fans ever felt awkward — stuck with the knowledge they would never mourn his real name.

Misplaced, all of it. The dead could not accuse; guilt was a thing of the living.

“If they seriously make me do a speech, when I become Executive,” He munched on his orange, nodding to Pianoman’s grave. “I’ll call you out. No mercy at all. Getting yourself beaten to a pulp by a teenager, after all that shit you did. Pretty embarrassing.”

They had built Pianoman and Doc’s graves — or whoever they were meant for — too close. He never brought flowers, but if he had, they would have dripped water drops down each other’s stones. Chuuya had thought about lamenting the mistake. Even the dead deserved some privacy; to occupy a space that wasn’t even a quarter of the one they’d stolen from the world.

The dead did not give a shit about it. The dead could not accuse, he told himself.

These dead would not, even if the possibility existed — because he chose his friends good, and perhaps he should have been worse at it. Guilt was a thing of the living, and of pathetic idiots with murderous brothers.

Acutely, he wished he could remember the sight of whatever had been of Verlaine’s body. Perhaps it would have quieten it down — it, that sharp thing in his chest, glass shards and Doc’s shrilling laughter, a clock ticking and ticking; his brother saying if they keep you here, they must be removed; and why did he still call him his brother, anyway, as if —

I don't know where to put it, he apologized. Misplaced guilt. The dead did not give a shit. It won't fit in your graves either. I don't know where to put it.

“I still have to cut my hair,” he told no one at all.

Upon his head, the sun hummed.

He always stayed too long. Talking; silently dangling his feet from the grave. Tracing the stitches on his arms — studying them under the unobtrusive sunlight, where no one could gape at the scars. Chuuya knew they would heal and disappear, for the most part.

Not all of them. It pissed him off, pointlessly— the idea of Arahabaki leaving a mark; claws lines down the cell bars, mocking him.

Wear bandages, Albatross would have snickered. Armbands, maybe, Chuuya considered — ignoring him in every hypothesis, the bloodless and the real ones. Or —

[“Why is your tattoo different?”

Mori's surprise was evident.

Elise was pulling at his pants, squeaking and pestering about some fair he'd promised to take her to. Politely, following a code they all knew, Chuuya pretended not to notice, waiting for orders from the other side of the man's desk.

“Sir,” he added, like a second thought. His hat was still in his hand, leftover from a kneeling position he'd been hurriedly been called off of.

“My tattoo?” the Boss echoed. It was hard to understand what had taken him more aback — the question itself, or the fact that Chuuya had actually spoken up and initiated a conversation with him. He wasn't foolish enough to believe his general avoidance of the Boss hadn't been noticed; he'd just thought he wouldn't care.

“On your wrist,” he said. “I saw it during the briefing, a few days ago. There's a dagger between the white heathers, right?”

If the question stunned him, he was quick to hide it. Shirase would have called him a Dragonfly Face. You know, he would have said, chugging a beer and staining his shirt like a toddler. Always around, until you actually go look for it. Like they know, dude.

“Am I not allowed to ask?” he added, eventually, when the silence stretched too long and grew too thin. He had never been scared of the man. Such premises inevitably birthed cautiousness — he hadn't grown up the way he had to believe that a lying fool could fill mouths with only blood.

Mori exhaled, somewhat amused. “No, no. Forgive me. I was simply surprised. It's popular knowledge, you see.”

He felt stupid. “I —“

“You fit so perfectly here with us, sometimes it’s hard to remember you didn’t grow up in the organization,” the man interrupted him, gently. “I assumed you must know, or I would have asked Kouyou to tell you. It’s not your fault.”

Chuuya bit his cheek. “What is it?”

“Executives embellish the syndicate symbol with this knife, just like the current Boss,” the man explained, tapping the buttons upon his wrists. He didn’t move to show him the inked skin — he found himself relieved by that fact. “Do you know what white heathers mean? I assume Pianoman must have told you.”

He didn’t ask him how he’d known which Flag had brought him to have his tattoo made. As blankly as he was capable of, Chuuya had long since come to the conclusion that there were probably few things Pianoman hadn’t told the Boss about him.

It hardly mattered. It had been his job. Every cable he found on the bomb had to be registered. Chuuya knew he hadn’t listed them all, still.

Sometimes, when Albatross’ apartment felt quieter than usual — when the mirrorball upon his head glistened under the moonlight of windows he refused to clean — he wondered if the cables Pianoman had kept for himself were the ones they’d one day need to keep the explosion contained.

“Protection, right?” he answered, digging holes through his pockets. “For the Night Wardens and stuff.”

Graciously, he accepted the definition. “Precisely. The organization was born, first and foremost, for the well-being of the lower levels of the city. Prostitutes, prisoners, children and those on the verge of self-destruction: these people were the founders of the Port Mafia. Many Bosses — recent ones, as you are well aware of — forgot their origins and mission too easily. But some things cannot be erased completely. The heathers are merely a reminder. I trust that no mafioso I would ever welcome in the organization would misunderstand the importance of the role we’ve been bestowed.”

“As for the knife,” Gloved fingers tapped the mahogany. “We are all but a bloodless organization. There is no simple way around it, and I would be disgusted by it all the same. Negating our crimes would make us hypocrites. And why should we? We live in a world that refuses to change, and that never will. Our methods are merely a fair start in a race no one wishes to be left behind in.”

Chuuya had never thought about justifying violence. And then it had been Detective Murase’s dying body — for him, because of him, always him. Weren’t you supposed to bring me to the light?

“Those who lead the crowd need to be aware of the trust they’ve been given,” Mori concluded. “We stand where we stand because we have not been taken away from it. The knives are meant to symbolize our willingness to get our hands dirty in the place of those under us. When the time to make complicated choices comes, we should be ready to make them — even if it makes us less of a protector. Don’t you think so?”

Chuuya frowned at the carpet. “‘Suppose.”

“I know you understand,” Blinking, he raised his head. The man’s smile was wider than the thin lines of his tattoo — he could feel it pulse, between his clavicles, indelible and real; realer than anything else. “It’s what you did for the Sheep, isn’t it?”

He stared.

“And it’s what you’d do for the Port Mafia,” the doctor continued, unbothered by his shock. “I trust this. I know this. You have proved it to me time and time again. Every man who has ever worked under your direction has reported how instinctual it is for you — to put your life on the line in their place. I told you once before, didn’t I? A good leader will ruin himself for the good of those under them. A good leader will give them a life to live.”

“I wasn’t a good leader for the Sheep,” he said, once his lips managed to tear themselves apart. “You said that too.”

“Oh, well,” He winked. “Growth has to start somewhere, doesn’t it? A road that may end in high places. Perhaps you weren’t what the Sheep needed, yes. But you must believe you can be what the Port Mafia needs, or you wouldn’t be competing for the Executive seat.”

“Don’t you want Dazai there, anyway?” he curled an eyebrow, skeptical.

Mori tilted his head — as if he had never considered the concept before. Strangely enough, it reminded him of Kazuko. He wondered if the boy had noticed the similarities too.

No, he thought. He wouldn’t have nurtured her into something that might put an end to him, in that case. Nothing would have left him less fulfilled than death by Mori Ougai.

“I want whoever can shoulder the weight,” the Boss answered, at last. “I have seen Dazai do it. I have seen you do it. At this point, it’s all a matter of —” Elise, who had mysteriously quieted as soon as the conversation had started, offered him a private smile — the kind that chilled mafiosi to the bone. That made her look just like — “Well. Of who can stand the sight of broken bones longer.”]

“Chuuya?”

Shit, he thought, very calmly.

“Tanaki,” he said.

She wore yellow. A single Chrysanthemum was left in her hands; as if she’d been very careful with offering the same number of flowers to every grave. The skin under her eyes matched the bruises under Chuuya’s clothes.

“Oh,” the woman cleared her throat, running nervous hands down the invisible crinkles of her skirts. The brat and his dead friends. “I didn’t mean to interrupt you.”

“It wasn’t exactly a fulfilling conversation,” Chuuya muttered. Hesitantly — studying the blurred names on the graves she clearly wanted to ask about — she walked to him.

Stopping her would have been rude. Politeness wasn't exactly one of his daily concerns, but, then again —

[“Get him out,” she said, exhausted. “He killed my child —”]

Lighter than rain, she settled next to him “This is a nice spot,” Madame Tanaki said. “A good place for good friends.”

Chuuya crushed the rest of his peach inside his fist, imagining, imagining hard, then throwing it away. “You’re not going to rat me out?”

“Why would I?”

“Graves aren’t a thing in the Port Mafia.”

“No,” she admitted. “But sometimes we need more than a syndicate to hold on.”

He stared at the grass.

“Do you still come here every week?” the woman asked, eons later, eyes on the Chips Chips on Doc’s fake grave. He had seen people bring caskets of fruits and bread — but he didn’t see the point of leaving stuff the dead wouldn’t have enjoyed in life. And the idea would have given Iceman a migraine.

“Graves get dirty sooner than you’d think,” he said, and it was enough of an answer.

“I just thought —“ A pause. That you’d get better, eventually. “They do. I never had graves of mine to visit, apart from my husbands’, but...”

Chuuya watched her fingers reach for her abdomen with utter stillness.

“He didn’t want a grave either, you know?” she said — good Tanaki, unlucky Tanaki. “My ex husband. Said it didn’t matter. I know it’s how he deals with the pain, but — it hurts. Not having one. They were my baby. You know? I couldn’t greet them in life, but I like to believe I can greet them in death. That I can bring flowers to them.”

“Tanaki,” It was merely a whisper. Chuuya could have counted every blade of grass — spent the rest of his days just like that; could have burned the summer season and drank the ashes. “I’m not the person you want to be telling this stuff to.”

It hurt her.

She was efficiently quick to hide it, but it beat the sun for dominance and blinded him, bleeding down her cheeks like mixed tears and blood. A familiar picture. Body on the ground, hand in his own, eyes on the ceiling. Where’s my baby?

“Chuuya,” she said.

“You’re a good person,” he insisted.

“So are you.” Helplessness painted her tone. “Not every ounce of blood on this cursed earth has been spilled because of you.”

“I don’t have a complex,” he scoffed.

“And I,” Her Chrysanthemum dangled in the corner of his gaze, dancing along to her frustrated motions, “Have never, not once, thought of you as the man who killed my child.”

“I’m not about to make your loss about me —“

“But you are. ”

He snapped his head to her.

Fierce and glassy, her eyes refused to lower. Her hands were tight around the flower — did Chrysanthemums have thorns? Should he have gone and taken it off her hands?

“You are, ” Tanaki insisted. “And it’s not even — that’s not you, Chuuya. Guilt and rage, you use them differently. You push them back, you embrace them — you come talk to me, and you let me apologize —“

“Apologize?”

“— for blaming you for something you would have never done if you had been in your right senses. And I wouldn’t have either,” Tanaki stood straighter. “At the Hospital — you have to know. I would have never —“

“You weren’t in your right mind,” Chuuya cut her off, in disbelief. “Tanaki, you think I blame you for some shit you said while you were high to the moon on painkillers?”

Her laugh was shards of glass down his throat. “I know you don’t blame Executive Kouyou for anything that she did, or — or any of the other Souls, for what’s worth. All the men you killed that night — I’ve seen you go talk to their families. You don’t say a bad word against them, but you won’t give yourself the same forgiveness? What for, Chuuya?”

Violence, he thought, had never been something to justify. He wouldn’t have found the time, anyway. Too many people and too many reasons — too little care and too little space, a mountain of flesh under the soles of his shoes and the crunch of bones between his teeth. All you are is what I will escape.

Graves couldn’t speak. Albatross’ voice was in his ear, whispering things he didn’t want to hear. Lippman’s body rolling out of his brother’s car — never touching him, not once; leaving blood on Chuuya’s hands all the same. And then Pianoman’s lessons, if it’s not real, it might as well be useful —

Making this about yourself. And then: making your mistakes about someone else?

“Sorry,” Chuuya said, simply. “I’m sorry.”

Tears slipped down Tanaki's cheeks. Her hands were quick to reach up and wipe them away. When she nodded, it was sharp and weak all in one, and it never stopped.

"I'm sorry you lost them."

"It's alright."

"It's not."

"No," she agreed. Her child had no grave — but perhaps the flowers had been for them; perhaps she had only kept one because there was nothing else for her to hold. "No, not really. I wake up every morning and hope I'll feel them. I never do," A shiver wrecked her frame. "It's not alright, Chuuya, but I cannot let it kill me too. All that effort to save me — what for?"

"We all lost something. We will lose something more, as long as we live. It's the principle of it, is it not?" Tanaki concluded. Under the scorching sun, the silver X of her scars had a sickly shade to it — a new wound; newly opened, newly inflicted, newly cried over. "I have made mistakes. I will regret them until my grave. I am not unused to the pain — I will wear it until it doesn't fit. And I'll apologize, when I meet them again," Quieter, "I'll apologize to everyone."

Chuuya watched his fake graves. "The dead don't accuse, Tanaki."

She huffed a laughter, wet and humorless, warmer than summer itself. "The dead aren't here to police the way we feel about them either, dear."

Oh, he thought.

"Can I ask you a question?"

Flames clawed at his throat. "Yeah."

"They said Souls — they said Dante showed them something. What did it show you?"

Abruptly, sharply, he sunk his nails into Albatross' tombstone. "Not you," he offered. Enough time had passed that Tanaki had to have thought he wouldn't answer; surprised, she pierced him with the webbed glass of her eyes. "It wasn't like — It was shit from my past. Yeah? Not you. Some stupid vision."

"Oh," the woman frowned. Hesitantly, she asked: "Is... Is that why you don't use the elevator anymore?"

Chuuya stilled.

[A glass tank, he thinks. Green light, green numbers, green lines. The boy is drowning. The boy is drowning. He is all the boy will ever be; sensibly, reasonably, the water is in his lungs. Since he knows nothing else, he rages. Hands against the glass, he—]

“I noticed,” she continued, undeterred, in the back of his skull, “Sometimes you avoid me. It would make more sense for you to use the elevator, but you never do. I thought that maybe —”

“I’m not avoiding you,” he replied.

A wrinkled hand laid upon his own. Her rings looked like new scars upon his sun-kissed skin — just another white-and-red line he couldn’t rip away. The vivid lines of tattoos underneath them were blooming flowers, splattered in viscera. She had never told him who had painted her so deeply.

“I have no forgiveness to offer you,” Tanaki said. “You have done nothing to warrant it.”

He settled his jaw. He wanted to argue. He wanted to scratch the ground with his shoe, to trace kanjis until at least one of them would make sense to her — would make her see what she was missing. Chuuya was tired of acceptance. He was tired of the not-mad-never-mad tone of the Flags’ voices in his head, of Kouyou’s reassurances, of Mori’s closed eyes on all he’d done. He wanted —

Blood, he thought, very calmly. He wanted someone to punch him on the face — square and fair, just once.

He did the next best thing: inhaled, closing his eyes, and settled his nails deep into Albatross’ tombstone. When it began to hurt, he nodded.

---

...

---

Cracked lips were the most annoying part.

The press of the Singularity bubbles, as to say, when freed from caging cells — constricts your lungs in an effort to spread under your skeleton, Boss had explained, flashlight digging into his eyeball. The sticky plastic of his gloves had dug under and over his eyelids, forcing them apart; Chuuya had studied his bent figure through blurred outlines.

This isn’t aid, Mori had said, before laying him down. His smile was kind. If Dazai asks.

Dazai wouldn’t, Chuuya hadn’t replied.

He liked the miniature clinic in the back of the man’s office — liked the butterfly sticker that had been left on the window, and the glistening anciently-shaped bottles of medicine on the shelf. It was smaller than Kouyou's wardrobe rooms, and the roof was lower; when Chuuya couldn't hold in gasps, it didn't echo.

That constriction, the man had continued, as his fingers traced the path he was describing — because Chuuya had too many ideas about himself, and Mori at least knew the answer — is the reason why you bleed so profusely under Corruption. You spit blood in an effort not to keep it inside. It slows down the salivary process; which explains your urge to regurgitate when you wake up.

It had been a lot of words. Chuuya recalled them vaguely, and more vividly than most things. He recalled them like a warning whenever he passed his tongue on his lips — when the shattered road of dried skin falling off burned under the touch.

It was too hot for warm lips.

“What do the words mean, anyway?” Dazai questioned, palms hovering under his own.

The Alley was bathed in the blueish light of the nearby street sign — it gave the impression to last longer; as if the crooked stone stairs they had sat on might lead to something simply too distant to be illuminated. The broken pipe rained calmly by their calves. “What?”

His gloves were tucked in his pocket; the matching scar down their thumbs mocked the quiet laments of the nearby drunken homeless. Their hands made him think of Lippman — his stupid obsession with that slapping game, and the sheer number of times Chuuya hadn't been quick enough to pull his fingers away.

“Grantors of dark disgrace,” Dazai said. He pretended not to stiffen at the unexpected call. Curled on the boy's lap, silently studying them like the food she probably saw them as, Kazuko was a speck of scaly light. “Sounds downright dramatic, for a brat.”

He stared at the pool forming at the end of the stairs; had the strange idea of wetting his overheated skin. He wondered if Dazai's bandages were sweaty. “I doubt they meant to let me go and have me say it myself.”

“Point,” he admitted. His eyes traced the boa's body — it didn't seem affectionate, but he looked selfish as he did it. “Did Professor N have a thing for poetry?”

“Of course not,” Chuuya snapped, in the name of his own shelves, and the nightmare of taking something from the unwanted. “It's just — a shitty sophisticated trigger. An excuse to make a Pavlovian response into a theatre play.”

Chuuya could remember, maybe, if he tried — what the crowd of men in white had looked like, crowding around his tank. He didn't remember a thing; he felt it missing, like he just had to find the right portion of skin to stab to let it out. He could hear them clap. Another good day.

His sole eye twinkled. “A dog whistle?”

He kicked the pipe until it leaked water all the way to Dazai's shoulders.

Startled, Kazuko slithered to Chuuya's calves, hissing at him — but then seemed to find the spot comfortable, and settled there, ignoring his chilling remarks and attempts to shove her away without inciting the rage of her fangs.

He searched for words, as he stared at the curling lines of black over his scarred knuckles — vanishing against the scales of her body. Terms that weren't scientific, because Professor N didn't deserve to live on even as an echo — terms that weren't his own liquid ricochet of memories, because he didn't quite want to give more to a boy who was mere inches from discovering Chuuya liked it when Dazai made it all quiet.

"It can't be controlled," he said, at last.

"I know," Dazai replied, almost superior. I don't care. Why do you? "Kazuko, my moon, what are you doing? Come here. You don't want to catch rabies."

"Fuck off."

"Is it intuitively vicious, though? Does it need a target — does it need enemies?"

"You are a target," he pressed on. "You are an enemy. He —" He trailed off. There was quite no inauspicious way of clarifying what Arahaki's awareness of existence felt like — that there was the rumble of the earth itself moving, day after day; the sound of stars dying; the whisper of a flower cracking the concrete to grow. Heartbeats. All of them; every single one — heartbeats.

The boy curled his fingers up only so — just enough to tickle his naked wrists. "Quite," he said. "I do hope this will kill me, eventually, but I'm used to your own brand of disappointment. If you could?"

You just want to see it up close, Chuuya wanted to snap — like curiosity was a crime. Like he hadn't seen Dazai's blood plenty; like it made sense to pretend either of them didn't get it.

[Some of the safehouses didn't have water — they dunk pans filled in the kitchen over their own heads, fighting for the rationed soap they kept forgetting to store. Some of them did have water, but not painkillers, and by the time they were on the floor, it seemed too late to care.

You're free to steal, Chuuya had heard Mori tell Dazai, from behind doors that were never quite locked, but never ajar. For him].

"You need not wake me again," he insisted, pensive. "Seems strange. Were they not aware that never being awakened would have reduced their special little sadistic project into ash?"

"You're saying —" he dared, after a moment, startled, "You think it actually can be controlled?"

Dazai shrugged. "I'm saying I don't know. At the very least, now we know it needs to be said all together."

"Perhaps they just didn't give a fuck."

“Your existence is an indent bigger than the setting sun on a spring day into the Japanese Government's funds,” the boy pointed out, easily. “I will lay my humble bets on them caring.”

Chuuya thought he ought to be offended by some syllable in that conclusion.

I took myself away, he thought — a strange delight even in the littleness of freedom; of a given he had never called his. I took your shit away, too. And you haven't caught me yet.

He felt himself grin. “Think I got someone fired when I dragged my ass out?” What were a few faceless lab coats? A few sharp-eyed men directing the world from their desks — giving out coordinates to a seaside village, and picking the kid with the smaller fists and greatest potential?

Potential to what, he wondered, potential for whom? Black was crawling up his wrists, still and yet psychedelic; a burnt out match.

“Not that I understand it,” Dazai sniffed, which wasn't a no — which meant some of his troubles Chuuya could control. He lowered his head to whisper something in Kazuko's nonexistent ears; beamed when she returned to him, curling around his torso like the corset-like pants Dazai had started to wear with the summer. “I wouldn't pay a half eaten corn for you.”

He glared. “I wouldn't pay a shitty gum stuck under Gramps' shoe for you.”

“I wouldn't pay one of Elise's restaurant napkins-and-breadsticks magical girl potions —“

“I wouldn't pay —“

There was a cloud over the moon. Chuuya breathed in — parted his mouth before the thing in Dazai's eyes could become more material, and say something horrifyingly close to, I'm here.

Try as he might, he couldn't remember the sound of his words.

There was a cloud over the moon. When he opened his eyes again, it was red at the edges, just as blinding as the shots of pain from the spots where Dazai had sunk his nails in his palms. The strike of sizzling lighting curled around his ankle; Chuuya saw it twisted through the debris of a stone step he had destroyed. Grip unchanging, blood pooled on Dazai's collar — falling from the spot on his nape Chuuya had to have pushed against the wall.

He couldn't remember it.

He exhaled so heavily it ripped pieces of his skin off his lips, filling his mouth with iron. Chuuya dragged his tongue on his cracked mouth.

“Two point four seconds,” Dazai offered, fingers so tight around his own both their knuckles were white. If the hit on the nape had hurt him, he didn't show it. Kazuko was curled in front of him — protective. Hissing at Chuuya like only predators did. “That's how long it takes for Arahabaki to settle in. You only opened your eyes to stand on point five.”

Less than usual, Chuuya considered. His body was tense — his bones stretched out, almost let down; exhausted by the mercifulness of being stopped before they could snap themselves into pieces. Less than usual, he insisted, and, did it matter less if the time was lost in smaller bites?

It couldn't matter at all. Chuuya was used to being deprived of.

There are no textbooks on this, Mori had said, a bit apologetic — like Chuuya hadn't learned to fly on pages he couldn't read; like he had dragged his body out of the rubble and pretended to rule an organization by someone's information. I'm afraid you boys will have to study your own instincts. Like he wasn't the first and the last and the only. Lippman would have loved the uniqueness; Iceman would have sat next to him, offered a cigarette, and said, I almost had you, anyway. Don't feel special.

Don't feel different.

“Again,” Chuuya ordered.

That was when the man stepped in.

---

...

---

Summer nights turned the concrete into an onyx sea, curling materialized heat over the betting eyes of the crowd, and turning the hoods of the racing cars scorching hot.

“All vehicles step to the starting line,” a voice nearly shrieked through some complicatedly built megaphone, near the light towers. Immediately, a slow turning tempest of undistinguished wheels — luxury cars, scrapped trucks, stolen police cars, a few motorcycles, and even an ambulance — rose dust amidst the enormous circular area of the race route, nearing a faded starting line smeared in red.

Blood, Chuuya considered, certain.

“That sketchy fucker should have put it on that brochure, if you could race with motorcycles,” he grunted, fixing his hands around the steering wheel. The leather was slightly ruined, but it was clear The Man had been rather proud of his weekly side hustle. “I’m way better on two wheels.”

The Man had been nothing much, as it was expected from KK Company goons. He had been slightly drunk when he had approached Chuuya and Dazai, perched on the stairs of The Alley with a console and the remnants of the diner they had been haunted away from —

How was I supposed to know Kazuko wasn't allowed in!, Dazai had whined. Anyway, if you hadn't thrown her in that poor mother's face —

She was trying to strangle my wrist, you piece of —

— and had been rather enthusiastic to learn they had been recently kicked out of the Shadow Blade, and were looking for a new flag.

[“There are five major organizations in the underworld of Yokohama,” the Boss explained, tapping gloved fingers on the maps the Colonel had offered him. Under the crimson led lights of the meeting room, each line of ink seemed heavier, scratched on paper instead of traced; no matter if they were probably all the results of Elise's grotesque drawings. “Four; the Port Mafia excluded: the Shadow Blade; the Bishop's Staff; the KK Company; and Takasekai.”

“The KK Company is an immigrated Chinese group, specialized in the contraband of ancient artifacts,” Mori continued, offering two dossiers for them to grab. “These days, it has mostly been taken over by Yokohama inhabitants, but they still have easy access to Chinese means of transportation. Their last wide scale trade was focused on the exportation of Thai silver — which is, surprisingly enough, exactly the material Beatrice's crosses were made of.”

“If I had known, I would have cut Chuuya open and stolen all that pricey stuff for myself,” Dazai made sure to tell him, eagerly tapping down his back. His eyes had a dangerous glint in them. “Say, think you can get yourself to throw up hard enough, if —”]

Feet landed on his lap. “How very brave of you to assume any other racer would have seen you on a Slug-sized hellmachine.”

Dazai's head dangled from the window of the passenger seat, which made it sort of difficult to properly break his nose. Chuuya resorted to sticking two fingers in the spot of his knee he had seen a bullet go through only a week ago — the kick he received in the nuts was only so worth it.

The monotonous man on the megaphone was still talking.

Crowds over crowds of drunken onlookers were a weight divided by his half-raised window — women in leather, men with black eyes; all of them littered in so much jewelry it was tacky. On the sweaty, naked corners of their skins were tattooed two *K*s, intertwined to resemble a x.

He met the eyes of a particularly tall idiot, leaning so far off the gangly dividers he might just get snapped by the nearby truck. The man's eyes fell on the arm Chuuya dangled by the window — when he noticed the darkened edges of his fingers, he gasped.

Chuuya closed the window.

“Perhaps you ought to go back to normal gloves,” Dazai proposed, very entertained.

“It's too hot.”

“Then get rid of that coat. It makes you look stupid, anyway. Where did you even get a coat, anyway? Are you that hellbent on copying me?”

“Is this for Arahabaki,” he asked, at last, out loud — like he hadn’t dared to in the endless days of meetings. The weight of Pianoman’s coat was new; it was needed. “Or for the Five Moons?”

“It’s for Mori, actually,” Dazai replied. The strange position gave his voice a choked edge. He had a scar under his chin, barely over the Adam’s apple — it looked, strangely, like dog teeth. “Don’t be obnoxious. Everything is.”

“Boss doesn’t know what we’re planning.”

“Mori said the Five Moons need one or two reminders,” he insisted. The edge of the window had to be hell on his nape; he still tilted his head, settling a deadly focused eye on the empty road in front of them. “We are merely going our own way about it. He gave us a blank skate, didn’t he?”

Chuuya took it to mean, if he knew what we are up to, he would make Kouyou take out the punishment baston. “Fair enough,” he concluded, stepping on the gas. “Get the rifle ready.”

A woman in a flimsy skirt stepped on the dried traces of blood on the starting line. She didn’t have a flag to wave for the start — instead, she dragged a bag filled to the brim with diamonds behind her, and started rolling her fingers inside it, to the crude cheers of the crowd.

From the motorcycle beside him, a woman in a skull-shaped helmet met his eyes, and traced her throat with her finger.

The only rule for the KK Company races is — The Man they had left dead in the best hidden corner of The Alley had said — if the cops would bust you for it, you have to do it. The tip of Dazai’s designer shoes crashed on the car horn, unapologetically making every nearby pair of shoulders jump. It also — Chuuya noted, brusquely — ripped his own nails out of his skin.

“Don’t fret, now,” the boy commented, as if the whole thing couldn’t have bored him less. “You’ll get your blood soon enough.”

Chuuya clenched his jaw so tight he tasted rust — because there were things he remembered, and things he had to have made up. Arahabaki didn’t care for memories. Arahabaki had never cared about anything at all.

Arahabaki had never cared, he scoffed, to the rocks in the sky, to the blood-stained ground. Chuuya was the only body he’d ever known; the only reason why he knew how to articulate a laugh. You are a cage, he’d told him, once — the god who couldn’t talk. Chuuya had made it up. The first thing he had been, after all, was lonely. Do not misunderstand. All you are, is to be escaped.

No one, he considered, had ever even told him Arahabaki existed. His first lesson had been kind, in the way of talking to himself — do not hope, and do not ask, for I do not exist for you. The second had been: I will escape you, one day.

He let go of his own arms. “You need to cut your hair,” he said, at last.

“You need to stop projecting,” Dazai sat up only minimally — just enough to prepare his rifle out of the window. “Go.”

The woman on the starting line threw the sack of jewels in the air, and vanished quicker than the rows of vehicles could start their engines. The rain of diamonds came tumbling on fast passing windshields; Dazai laughed like a kid.

Given the hunger in his gaze at the sight of the destroyed bottles on the road, Chuuya snapped the car locks on. Their fast dashing didn’t stop him from raising his head just enough to stare him down for it. “You’re so boring,” he blamed. “You’re —“

“Watch your head!” Chuuya cursed.

Out of nowhere, a fire-red BMW crashed against Dazai’s side of the car, almost flattening him into a piece of concrete. It took away their side rear view mirror, raising a rainstorm of flickers — sticking his rifle under the headpiece of his seat, Dazai didn’t even blink at the burning strand of his own hair before putting a hole in the driver’s skull.

And then, pointedly, he threw the weapon out of the window.

Chuuya was startled so badly he accelerated right into a passing truck, sending it skiing to the screaming crowd. “What the fuck are you doing?”

“Mmh?” Oh, enjoying the ride.”

His head was hanging out of the window again. Miraculously, he wasn’t hit by the quick section of bullets appearing from a stolen police car behind them. “They’re shooting at us!”

“I saw! Very exciting.”

“Your ass’ not gonna shoot back?”

He seemed genuinely perplexed. Most of his hair clips that day were cartoonishly car shaped. “And why would I do that?”

A hellish screech right by his side distracted Chuuya from the quest of kicking his skull in — he tightened one hand around the wheel until the fingerless gloves started tearing, and turned so fast Dazai’s head bumped against the dashboard.

The lights were blinding; the quietest roar of the crowd could have woken up the entire city — engines and curses and the sound of weapons turned his ears into drums, boiling along with his sizzling blood. Either the best place to be — Chuuya considered, licking off the blood that had stained his mouth since the destruction of the parking lot — or the worst.

When they crashed against a nearby truck and sped up so viciously his hat fell into the back seats, the rising curve of his mouth chose the first.

“See?” Dazai called. He still sounded bored, but his sole eye was laser focused on every car they were razing past, almost sadistic in its focus. “You can escape bullets on your own.”

“You sure whoever wins this gets to go and recover the prize themselves?” Chuuya had to scream back, over the whipping wind. They were among the first ten racers for sure; if he looked into the rear view mirror for too long, sharks blinked. “It better be worth it. They’re not even playing any rock music or shit.”

The KK Company’s treasure room was a legendary, cautionary tale across the underground — Albatross, in particular, had had something of an obsession with figuring it out. Imagine the cutlery I could buy, he liked to say. Some said it was an underground garage under the City Hall; others said it was under the sea — some went as far as to theorize it was all stored in a singular credit card, in the hands of their Boss’s daughter.

“Mmh?” Dazai called, again, distracted. He had fished out some dossier from the back of his coat, seemingly undeterred by the rotating path of their car. “Oh, that. No, that was a lie.”

Chuuya almost halted. “What?”

“You don’t need to know all the details,” the boy waved the matter away. “Move with the assumption that we’re fine. We’re about to be very busy right now, anyway. Entering the mine area.”

“I swear to fucking God, Mackerel —“

“Upcoming truck.”

“What?”

When he looked up, his jaw fell.

He had taken upcoming truck to mean one of the trucks was trying to get in their lane — what he got, instead, was a flying, firing bundle of metal and wheels, thrown with inhuman force, flying at maximum speed towards their windshield. With a rumble, it was joined by three more, erupting from the cloud of mine-made smoke and telltale light of an Ability. The crowd lost its mind.

“Alright,” With a surge of something, either hysteria or genuine excitement, Chuuya left a hand on the steering wheel, gripping the gear shift with the other. He licked his teeth. “You may want to get your head inside.”

His tone got Dazai to finally scramble into his seat. “Don’t forget about the mine—“

Chuuya stepped on the gas.

It almost felt like a videogame, from then on — a mixture of lights and explosions and the smell of gasoline, as they zig-zagged across the road with no care for the vehicles they slammed against, in an effort to escape where he guessed the flying vehicles would land. Chuuya didn’t care — he crashed the car like he was only there to destroy them; took away all weapons appearing from nearby windows while he held onto the steering wheel with a hand; whooped so loud his ears bled with it.

For a moment, Arahabaki didn't even hiss.

"Oh, great," Dazai said, like he meant it, as he peeked through their broken back windshield. "I think you made everyone angry."

It was a fair description — somehow, they had attached themselves to the Ability User's car, the first in the race; the hordes of losing racers had caught up with their nasty play, and seemed now more intent on getting to them than on finishing the race. "Good," the boy insisted. He was staring forward too, now. "Just what we needed."

Chuuya didn't even breathe when a bullet passed right by his cheek; when the sand-stormed ground exploded right by their back left wheel, though, he was mercilessly jolted forward — crashing his head against the steering wheel.

"Mines!" Dazai called, excited. "I told you there were mines!"

"I don't care about your suicidal —"

The Ability User's vehicle was the old ambulance Chuuya had half-seen at the beginning — the woman at the wheel had her teeth clenched and one eye on them, as she slowly realized he was toying with her outstretched hand, attempting to touch their car to blow it to the sky.

"You might want to look at the street, sweetheart!" she called, when she met his eyes. She carried the KK Company tattoo right in the middle of her forehead. "Newbies don't know much about the mine pattern here."

"Yeah?" he called back, eyeing the crooked lines of ink. "Do you guys' tattoo artists know shit about patterns in general?"

The ambulance screeched on a single wheel — when the back brushed their only side mirror left, Chuuya crashed them against a nearby boulder, raising sparks so close he got shocked by them.

"Seven seconds," Dazai called. He was half climbing out of the window again — some of his head bandages had gotten loose, fluttering amidst too long hair. He was staring at the road; the sheer number of calculations under his eyelids could have sparred with Chuuya's Tainted plans. "Can you keep first place for just seven seconds?"

He sent a look. "If we go faster than this, the mines will activate for sure." They were clearly wagered on weight and acceleration — the number of car corpses surrounding them wasn't high enough to depend on mere passage.

Dazai looked back. "Well, can you?"

Chuuya grinned. "I can get you first place for the next seven hours, sweetheart."

The boy retched.

With that, he threw his arm out, landing his knuckles on the side of the ambulance — only just barely; brushing a corner so fleetingly it didn't feel material. With a heart stopping groan, the vehicle began rotating up the street, cracking it open with the might of an earthquake.

Spinning the steering wheel fully, he faced the finish line again, and stepped on the gas.

The ground didn't explode under them. "Five," Dazai counted, still, eyes on the enraged crowd tailing them. The ambulance had already started running again. They ran. "Six. Seven —"

The ambulance passed by, unscathed. The cars behind it, voicing curses and chants of victory, had no time to celebrate third place — shaking every inch of that scorching hot reality, it blew up.

Every car that has survived the race until that moment wasn't fast enough to stop its run to the subject of their rage — powerless to slow down, they crashed against the pillar of fire that had become of the third car, one after one, until the circle of explosions seemed to touch the sky, painting it in shades of golden and tangerines.

The impact sent them skiing forward; they rotated, until Chuuya's eyes found the ambulance coming towards them — at maximum, merciless velocity.

"Out," he called, slamming his fist onto Dazai's shoulders, "Out!"

"Never to be said that you didn't let me jump out of a car," the boy commented. He waited and waited until the very last moment — right as the headlights of the ambulance blinded him, his car door was slammed open, his body landing somewhere into the dirt.

Chuuya didn't feel the impact.

His exact moves came to him only later — the punch through the roof of his car, bending the metal until it broke; his fly up to the sky, higher and higher, until even his head got numb. Under him, pieces of ambulance flew through the tongues of flames and smoke — before he could forget it, he extracted the bottle stored in his belt, and threw it where he could vaguely see Dazai hiding.

When he landed, amidst the chaos of the growing explosions and the screams of the crowd attempting to escape — he found Dazai with his gun, aiming for the fallen bottle.

"There you are," he hummed.

"Dude," Chuuya heaved, his grin so wide it seemed intent on splitting his skull. "Dude."

"Yes, yes, you had your savage fun —"

"Where the hell's the treasure room, then?"

The boy nodded towards the sea of fire and gasoline, merely held back by the boulders on the roads. "See those cars exploding right there?"

Chuuya stared. “No.”

“Oh, yes.”

“You’re telling me there’s no treasure room at all?” he insisted. “They just carry everything back and forth on the race vehicles?”

Dazai shrugged. “What best way to make sure they can be out of reach at all times? It’s only the KK cars, anyway — they make sure not to let newbies know about the mines and the sharp toys that might damage their cars,” Bloodied fireworks erupted once again, raining pieces of junk onto the heated concrete. Chuuya kicked away a falling piece of dashboard before it could flatten them. “Well. They made sure.”

Then, with a yawn, he shot the bottle.

Black-and-yellow smoke erupted, curling like a snake amidst the more natural fires, and the running legs of KK Company members. It made his eyes tear — the Shadow Blade massacre-claim smoke signals weren’t usually meant to leave survivors behind.

Cold, bandaged fingers found his choker through the curtain of darkness.

He hesitated.

“If you want to do it,” Dazai said, eventually — close enough that Chuuya could read his lips; an almost impossible feat, between the glimmering explosions and the blood pooling down both their ears. “Now is the time.”

Immediately, lightning curled up his arms.

The stains of black had faded, in the past week — but they seemed to return, right under his eyes, vicious and stubborn. There were no voices to be haunted by. If Corruption was a source that needed to be emptied out — then the two accidents had left it filled to the brim, still.

If you want to.

Hone it, Mori had said. They weren’t meant to leave eye witnesses, for this plan of theirs. It’s not always about fairness.

Chuuya took off his gloves, and hung them over the neck of Dazai’s tie. “Don’t be a fucking idiot,” he said, like it was even a speck of the things he ought to say before doing something like this.

After that — he couldn’t recall.

---

We'll need to make it work without the morphine, Dazai had explained, as they mapped out just what it would mean to go the next few months without support from the Headquarters. Unless we can steal some.

Chuuya had waved the matter away. We have more important stuff to get a hold of. Stitches. Information on the syndicates' security techniques. You can just knock me out.

Something like a sadistic, slightly bored tilt had curled the boy's lips. We'll see how you feel about that in a bit.

When he came to with a broken, coughing gasp; with the distant memory of hands and nails and needles and blood over every inch of himself, all of it slowly awakening under the buzz of stone-like limbs — Chuuya still didn't regret it. But he reached for the nearest deep thing and threw up inside it.

"There you are," The most detested voice in his repertoire broke through the rumble — the white noises of his ringing ears. "Mind looking up if wearing IVs while you're submerged may bring any, ah — unpleasant side effects?" A pause. "It's too late, anyway, but. Still."

The ground under his knees was hardwood and carpets — he was lying on the floor. It wasn't too surprising — Chuuya woke up on the floor most mornings; be it too much kicking or some form of sleep-walking. His knuckles were white around the edges of Albatross' least favorite vase, as he spit and cursed the smell of burned flesh stuck in his nostrils.

There were no slithering black snakes crawling down his arms.

When his eyes managed to roam free, vase forgotten and weak spine dropping to the floor again, they stuck intermittently — the pile of blood-soaked clothes on the floor; the IV pole, its blood-sack slowly vanishing into a bruised spot on his left arm; Dazai, with his console, huddled up in Albatross' bed.

"Why am I on the floor?" he croaked.

A dried, left-to-die thing — his voice crawled up his throat as if hooked to a thorned thread and pulled, bleeding out between his teeth. His lips were still cracked.

"Because I wanted the bed," Dazai said, easily, eyes stuck to the screen. The familiar tune of Broken Roads was slicing his pounding head into pieces. "I did put you in a futon, back at the safe house, but the wet dog smell was intolerable. I had to dump you in the bathtub — and when I tried to leave, because it was intolerable, the assassins broke in —"

He stared. "Assassins?"

“Special Division, I would assume,” Chuuya froze. Dazai turned and tossed on the bed, until he was leaning over him, undeterred. “We can’t use safehouse number 13 anymore, by the way — Which is a shame, because I left my Game of Soldiers DVD there, and you’re going to have to recover it for me,” He reached over with one hand; pulled one of Chuuya’s wet hair strands, not even blinking when he slapped it away. “Corpses all over my precious console. A blasphemy. Very sloppy corpses, though, which I’m sure you will appreciate, since you missed out on all the fun.”

Everything was slightly spinning. His scalp hurt. “Why the fuck am I naked.”

“You’re in boxers, thank you. And your clothes needed to be burned,” Which probably meant he had taken care of most of his wardrobe in the meantime. Chuuya felt the irritation a bit distantly — felt too high for his body, like a floating breath of air stuck to the lower lip. “Congratulations — you tried to smash your skull against what was left of the ambulance, this time.”

He focused on the sticker-stars on the ceiling. Every inch of that apartment reminded him of Albatross; every inch of Albatross reminded him of blood. It woke him up. “I don’t like this.”

“This isn’t my ideal afterlife either, Slug.”

Chuuya nodded, vague.

He didn’t notice he had yet to stop nodding until a sharp hiss up his arm called his attention — the blood bag had turned, dangling from the wind of the closest window Ōmu had pushed to get in. Standing over the bed, the parrot stared him down, as if extremely displeased with that territory breach.

“Why are you —“ Chuuya squinted at him, turning his head as far as his pounding nape would let him. “Your ass needs to stop breaking into my house.”

“Oh, but I couldn’t,” Dazai threw the console on the bed, abandoning a GAME OVER screen he felt the urge to taunt him for. “You’ve set up a futon just for me, and I even have my own coffee cup! One can’t help but think you await me night and day. I’m not one to disappoint.”

He gaped like a fish. “That isn’t —“ Isn’t a futon for you, he wanted to say. Sure, Dazai had used it plenty — but there was a reason why Chuuya kept it rolled up and hidden under the deepest corner of Albatross’ bed. To send a message .

He didn’t manage to say any of it — before he knew, he was reaching for the vase again, sticking his face inside it.

“That is such an unnecessary reaction,” Dazai’s blurred, distant voice sighed. He pulled at the ends of his hair petulantly, refusing to move the longer strands from the vomit stains. “We can have your dream slumber party, no issue. I can sacrifice my good sense.”

Chuuya only vomited deeper.

Dazai knocked on his skull. “And anyway, I usually sleep on the bed. You never wondered why you keep waking up on the safehouses’ floor?”

It’s not even your goddamn cup, Chuuya didn’t manage to say. It just says Dog Owner on it.

It seemed hours before he managed to sit up again. The IV pulled painfully at his arm, until he resettled — Chuuya studied the bubbling blood inside it. “Where did you...” he trailed off. “You can’t give me your blood.”

“Of course. Stupid,” Dazai huffed. “They were in the ambulance,” Now we’re stealing blood bags?, he almost asked. He wasn’t quite spoiled or guiltless enough to. “Getting them out was a very boring business, just so you know. Corruption is just so grandiose. Does it really have to? There was a downright mess on that race route.”

There was an underlining tension on every vowel out of his mouth — something both bitter and freezing, dripping with the ease of the few sweat droplets stuck to Chuuya’s forehead. He was speaking too much — speaking too fast, the way he did when there was a trick he didn’t want the listener to catch. When there was a point.

“Wait,” he called, frowning. Chuuya didn’t quite feel sane — but he felt more settled. His lips burned when he wet them. “How long was I out?”

We move by instants, Dazai had explained, under Elise’s blankets, a week before. Perhaps it was pointless — planning, where Arahabaki was concerned; planning, where Mori had only smiled. Scales like wounds or destruction aren’t reliable. We test how many seconds are too many seconds.

What’s the final goal?, he had questioned.

A full minute.

“Twenty seven seconds,” Dazai offered, as he watched him crawl towards the bed, sitting down with a spinning head and coughing lungs. Nothing like the exercises in precision in The Alley — the excuses to write down data that never quite matched itself. That had been a real Corruption attempt. “You’ve blabbed a bit since you passed out — but this is the first time you’re awake in two days.”

Two days.

Chuuya set his jaw. “Couldn’t you have, like — kicked me awake or something?”

“Kicking fallen dogs is not even worth the energy. I’m not a cartoon villain.”

“You and I both know I can’t afford that long of a recovery period.”

“You broke half of your ribs,” he replied — nudged him in the spine with a wet, sock-clad foot for emphasis. “Trying to tear them off your lungs before they perforated them wasn’t pretty. If they hadn’t started fixing themselves halfway, you wouldn’t even have had a recovery period.”

“Dazai.”

“Chuuya,” He stared at the monkey-shaped statue in the left corner of the room; something like wonder in his questioning gaze. “I don’t think you should be doing this.”

A pin could have been heard as it dropped.

He turned around — ignored the screech of his bones and the lines of tension of his muscles, firing electricity all the way to his nails. The IV pulled; Chuuya thought he could feel the new blood circulate — find new ways to fill him up until he imploded.

“Excuse me?” he snapped.

Dazai climbed out of his perching spot, wiping his hand on some cloud patterned blanket Albatross had touched — as if that wasn’t enough to make Chuuya’s fingers seal on the edge of the bed. “I don’t think this is a good idea.”

“We made this plan together.”

“Because Mori left us plenty of choice.”

He stared. “What, did the mission fail?”

“The mission was successful,” he replied. “A hundred percent success rate — these are the predictions the Intelligence has, if we go on with using Corruption at our whim —“

“My whim,” Chuuya reminded him. “You can fuck right off about how I decide to —“

“Don’t get cocky. I’m the reason you get to have whims, with that thing inside your veins.”

“What the hell are you even —“

Dazai leaned against the doorframe. He had removed all hair clips but one — a heart shaped pin he was positive to have seen on Elise, before. He was wearing a shirt — an old, maroon thing Chuuya had stolen from Kouyou’s wardrobe. It was surreal to see him in colors. “Do you really think Corruption wasn’t created as a last resort? Even Mori called it so.”

“It is a last resort,” Chuuya replied. “What got you in a fucking twist? We’ve been activating it three times in one afternoon in The Alley — “

“That’s not nearly the same thing,” the boy spat, chin up. “It’s not an activation. I shut it down before your eyes can even roll to the back of your dog head.”

“You think I enjoy the weekly comas?”

“This wasn’t a last resort.”

“There couldn’t be eyewitnesses —“

“What, are you getting lazy?” Dazai scoffed. “Complacent, maybe? You could have razed the area to the ground with Tainted. What, you decided that autopilot to the cost of your bones is a good enough deal, and now the Mafia gets a dog that won’t even decide when to bark?”

A blink.

Chuuya heard water rush through his ears faster than he could stand up; the IV was ripped out of his arm, painfully fast, raining small drops of blood on Albatross’ beloved bed.

“Fuck you,” he snapped, stepping forward, Tainted glowing on his fingers. The rush in his skull was deafening; he didn’t even feel the tongues of ache flaming up his limbs until they rendered his jaw slack. “Fuck you right in that fucking hypocritical ass you have, I’m —“

Professor N, he thought.

It was a bubble in a blood vessel. Chuuya had no idea where it had come from — a flash of a disconnected memory, burned at the edges. Word association. A pointless name, stuck on his lips.

He understood too late — when electricity struck, right through the scar he still had on his chest — and then everywhere else, louder than thunder and hotter than lava, circling through his nervous system like something meant to reduce him to a vegetable. He didn’t have a tongue to scream — only pain and pain, and pain and pain, and he dropped forward, bruising his knees on Albatross’ beloved, beloved home — and then hands under his armpits and a voice by his ear, as he landed on the ground on his back with an exhale that was ripped like a robbery — and he couldn’t breathe, his ribs had grown ten inches and skewered his lungs, pain and pain and the devastating lack of air, the abundance of it in all the wrong places, brusque impact might cause a respiratory crisis, Boss had explained —

The second time, he opened his eyes to the thump! of book pages turning next to his head.

“...right, then,” Dazai was saying. “Yes, yes, I know, this call never happened. You ought to be less paranoid, old man — it’ll give you wrinkles. I’ll let you know if I accidentally snap his neck.”

Chuuya inhaled fully, attempting to sit up.

Hands pushed him down again — landing him on some half-soaked towel laid on the ground. “No, you don’t,” Dazai replied, distractedly, as he threw his own phone to the side by the charms. “I need to crack your back. You’re stuck.”

Perhaps it explained why he couldn’t talk — any attempt at mouthing words only got out a wheezing, horrible sound, and a taste of blood on the back of his throat.

“Alright,” Dazai said, again. Aggravated. As blank as a paper. Not taking his eyes off of him for a blink of a second.

It pissed him off. “I,” he croaked, fueled by pure rage, clenching his fists at his loose sides. “You — don’t —“

He snapped the book shut; before he threw it under the bed, Chuuya managed to catch one of the beautifully decorated rigid covers from Mori's collection — in golden, the words, Medical Guide To Muscular Issues; Understanding Chronic Pain. He had vivid memories of having stared at its spine for hours, the last time they had gotten stuck in his office — reprimanded for a destroyed restaurant.

“Did you —” he attempted. Fire climbed up his nape. At last, Chuuya realized it all came from the bundle of screeches in his lower spine — the flashes of pain it sent down his things. “Shit.”

“Ane-san's gonna be so mad if I kill you,” the other boy muttered — more of a mantra than a warning.

Taking advantage of his blinding pain, Dazai bent his legs until his knees brushed his chin, still laying down — and then, utterly calm, he crossed his own arms over his kneecaps, keeping himself a mere inch from laying his whole body on him.

“What the,” Chuuya tried to wheeze out. Then Dazai crashed onto him, and he saw stars.

He only realized the voice cursing out over the sound of cracking bones was his own when the world became less blurred at the edges — the ants crawling up and down his skeleton growing more and more hurried, until they leveled to something bearable.

“There, there,” Disentangling his legs again, Dazai shushed, inconvenienced. “Don't lean too much weight on that shoulder. I had to put it back in the socket while you were out.”

“I saw God,” he heard himself breathe out.

“That's nice, that's nice.”

“There's no way I have these many bones.”

“Shh,” Dazai insisted. He turned him to lay down on his face with humiliating ease, every inch of Chuuya's body reduced to jelly. “Could you wait until I can record it to be embarrassing?”

“I'll kill you,” he slugged.

“No,” the boy mused, a bit quieter. For the first time, Chuuya wondered what it looked like — from where it didn't hurt. Dazai's hands touched his nape; quiet, he thought, and cold, and oh. “No, I think that might be me.”

He breathed out. All was blurred. “What?”

Distracted, he insisted: “Do you think fascination is a crime?”

“I don't know,” Chuuya didn't quite understand a thing. “What isn't a crime?”

He studied him. “Because we're Mafia?”

“Because you’re you,” he mumbled. His eyelids were fluttering again. In the back of his mind, he knew he was tired of sleeping. “Because I’m me.”

Dazai didn’t speak.

He came down in fluttering, slow steps — by the time Chuuya could inhale and exhale fully with no firing pain up his lungs, the sound of the ACs on the balcony purred against his ears, and the coldness of Dazai’s palms was almost enough to ignore the stitches he was fixing on his back.

He paused.

By the time his mind wasn’t floating, he cleared his throat enough to wonder, only just so creeped out: “What am I, fucking dough?”

“You’re hallucinating,” Dazai replied.

“I’m not stupid.”

“No, no,” he humored. Some of his knuckles were working on a shrieking spot under his left shoulder. Chuuya gulped down the blood stuck in his throat — wondered if either of them had gotten burned by the explosion. “Does he ever listen?”

He started at the floor; counted to five, and pushed the boy’s hands off to sit up. “What?”

“You said he doesn’t talk to you,” Dazai insisted. The towel they were sharing was stained in blood and soaked in shower water. Chuuya had the feeling the boy would refuse to sleep on the guest futon. Chuuya couldn’t stop thinking about the roof of that shipping container, sometimes. “But does he listen?”

There was a bundle of frustration stuck in his throat, right over the newly pulsing muscles — the contempt of being dependent; even when his oath to the sky had been to give back ten hands to every finger pulling him out of the rubble. Of having his own limbs betray him.

Of it having to be Dazai, of all.

“Arahabaki doesn’t do shit, Bandages. He doesn’t care.”

“It doesn’t feel like it, though,” he insisted. “No one who cares that little would be so eager to see you destroyed.”

Corrupted, he corrected, in his head only. Destruction was death for men; nothing that could kill a living sin. Chuuya had to be something just similar enough, if they had wasted words on it. Born to corrupt, molded into something to protect — first children and then a decaying city and then whoever would ask nicely enough. He’d been born into the anvil of the world’s heaviest blade; he’d die in it, liquid fire and centuries old blood. Corrupted, corrupted.

“I don’t really believe in false gods,” Dazai let him know. He wondered if the fingers pushing hair off his forehead were an hallucination. “How unfortunate that you’re as real as it gets.”

His sole eye was tracing the decay on his arms. I don't think we should do this.

Then what do I do with it?, Chuuya wondered.

“Waste your pathetic prayers on deities that actually exist,” Shakingly, Chuuya climbed to his feet, surveying the mess of Albatross’ beloved, beloved room. Ōmu was singing. He was just out of tune enough — just familiar enough — to tighten his fists. “Come on. Who’s next?”

“Ah, that might have to wait,” Dazai said, scratching his nape. “Concern is devouring me. I wouldn’t be able to focus. You need to help me find Kazuko.”

He stared. “Find?”

“Quite. I’m afraid she disappeared a few hours ago,” he sighed. “Last I heard, she was in the process of strolling near the child park by the City Hall, but I sent a sniper from my squad to take care of the fireman called to deal with her. So we should — Chuuya, where are you going? Chuuya, don’t you dare crawl on the floor, you —“

---

...

---

There had been a storm, once, in Suribachi City.

Few times a weather as disruptive had been registered in the records of Yokohama. It had torn the metal-sheets-and-smelly-cartoon roofs of the settlement apart, flooding the houses and the streets. Chuuya recalled the rumble of thunder making every wall dance — the nervous gulps most of the Sheep kids badly muffled. They had begrudgingly pushed themselves together under the safest house of theirs, waiting for the light to follow the sound.

It's just light, isn't it?, Yuan had asked him, squinting at the webbed sky behind the glassless window. The most it can do it's destroy a few houses. Even I could do that. Nature is not that scary.

[“That’s Yuan,” the older girls explained, before abandoning him in her hands and her buckets of water. “She’ll clean you up. Be nice to her or we’re kicking your dirty ass out.”]

Watching the six variables he’d put together crash and burn, Chuuya wondered if that, at least, would be a storm wild enough to scare Yuan off.

“This is Virgil,” he said, curtly, waving a hand towards the awkward frame of the man next to him. Building Three’s entrance was lit weakly, turning the other five’s faces haunted. One of the chandeliers had been shattered by the latest round of Dazai’s suicide attempts. Nothing to worry about, Mori had sworn. “He’s number six. Be nice, or fuck off.”

The man cleared his throat.

The rest of the squad’s jaws didn’t fall, but it was a near thing.

Noguchi — who still carried scratches in the shape of Q’s nails and Tsuchiya’s silences; who always stared into nothingness when Chuuya used his Ability — was, unsurprisingly, the first to start a fight over it.

The twins weren’t impressed.

“Fish face needs to tone it down with the attitude,” Kenta scoffed, extracting a shard of glass from his arm. The window Virgil and the man had destroyed while brawling — in the middle of a stake out that would have failed, had Chuuya not intervened — stared at them, mocking. “I won’t sit here and watch him kill someone over his girlfriend’s hurt ego.”

Chuuya felt the slap coming; clearly, the man lacked the intelligence to do the same. Stunned, he blinked at Tsuchiya, first, and then at his sister — looking somewhat conflicted, but not moving an inch to defend him.

“I didn’t ask for his grudges,” the once-vet told him, right as the handprint on his cheek started to spread. “Do not blame me for them.”

Even less surprisingly — because Dazai had the art of strategy down to a science, but Chuuya had people in perfectly clear graphics — Koda was the first to cave. He volunteered to join Virgil during the next mission, knocking their rifles together — and by the time they were all back to base, they were grinning in each other’s faces.

With one enemy down, Chuuya assumed the root of the problem was — him.

His two only open supporters both had a tendency to be silent, wide-eyed witnesses to every brawl that ended up blowing up during missions. Noguchi would somehow complain whenever the line of enemy fire appeared. Rin and Kento seemed to love bringing up the Sheep whenever he did something familiar to them, which never resulted in anything but a pissed off Chuuya. Tsuchiya was still learning to keep up with them with the eye disadvantage, which made her prone to explode in Noguchi and Koda’s worried faces.

“Stick them in a box,” Hirotsu suggested, over the furthest end of the Old World’s counter. “And shake the rebellion out of them.”

There was a strange tilt to his tone. “I don’t think that’s feasible,” Chuuya muttered, inside his glass of wine.

“Nonetheless, I dream of it being possible,” the man insisted, vacantly. Very slowly, he turned to stare him down, lowering his gaze to Dazai’s hair clip stuck to his sleeve.

Chuuya muttered into his glass some more.

After the Window Accident, Kento and Noguchi struggled to get along. It soured the air between Rin and Tsuchiya as well, despite their fast formed alliance — the first time they snapped at each other, Chuuya felt the placid desire to jump off the nearest bridge.

“Truly?” Dazai grinned, mischievous like a black cat on the roof.

Virgil and Noguchi had yet to say a word to each other. The Kure twins were the first ones to warm up to the last-comer, after Koda — perhaps understanding the feeling of joining the Port Mafia from an enemy organization. The squad tended to work better whenever Noguchi was too busy to intervene — unfortunately, Noguchi was also the most competent of the bunch, and Chuuya needed him around.

“But he’s a difficult card,” he explained to Tanaki, huddled up with her under the canopy of a sweet shop, waiting for Elise to pick her lunch. It was too warm to breathe in easily; the sweat rolling down the intermittent black stains on his arms was uncomfortable. “The more successful I let him be, the more advantage he has in the Colonel’s plans for him.”

Tanaki hummed. “I don’t know just how seriously you should take that threat, dear. It seems very clear to everyone in the syndicate — who the actual candidates are.”

Chuuya wasn’t so sure.

He didn’t meet the Colonel all that often — he was usually absent when they reported to the meeting room, and never spared him more than an imperscrutable glance whenever Chuuya appeared to pull Noguchi out of his grasp. He looks at you like he can’t figure out how you’re still standing, Rin described it as, once.

Most of the syndicate was too busy to give more than a fearful thought to Dazai’s orders and Chuuya’s paths of destruction. But they knew Noguchi — had trained with him; had seen him stand up to the unofficial commanders during the Nine Rings Conflict. And as much as people may have murmured when Chuuya passed by, they never did so when Noguchi was following.

The squad never stopped, though.

“They’re tense,” Koda told him, after a disastrous infiltration. Chuuya had had to tear the whole building down; Tsuchiya had called in some seagulls with her Ability to help. “The underground has been a mess, ever since the Nine Rings — Well. What does it matter, as long as they can shut up long enough to do their work?”

“Try not to exclude yourself from that list,” he grunted, scrubbing at the bleeding cut down his cheekbone. “I saw you join in when Noguchi and Kenta started fighting.”

He coughed. “I was trying to stop them.”

“Tense,” Scoffing, he kicked the ground. “Is that the polite way of saying, you scare the shit out of half of them and the others want you under a train?”

Koda, who had recently been tied to train rails — along with Chuuya himself and Rin, in some rather unusual circumstances — shivered. “They’re not scared of you.”

“You’re scared of me.”

His flinch was full body. “Chuuya —“

“I don’t care,” he interrupted him, staring forward. “At the very least, though, it’d be nice if it got you aggravating shithheads to listen to me.”

Days passed, summer rained down. It was easier with the Flags, Chuuya never thought — because it wasn’t about filling emptiness. The warmer it was, the higher the conflicts grew; the further they went from the center of the city — where the sky filled with stars and Virgil would sigh and mumble stories from his childhood — the more tentative the squad grew with each other.

“Have you considered taking advantage of the fear most of them have of —” Kouyou looked for words, as he laid face down on her office couch. “Your other business?”

It had been some sort of joke, Chuuya believed. Kouyou knew the frantic side-eyes he had received since Rengoku warranted anything but pity, especially if she didn’t want to deal with his anger — poking fun at the matter was her elegant solution to the issue.

[Nonetheless, he did not try.

Corruption was the only topic the six mafiosi could talk about with the innate trust and ease of a real team. He saw them exchange heavy glances whenever he turned up to a mission with an imperceptible limp; saw their mouths open and close whenever the heat raised his sleeves and left his scars to the sunlight; saw them want to ask.

Chuuya didn’t care about fear.

The shift between wanting respect and settling for fright came gradually. Whispers grew the deeper the competition dug; gazes lingered longer the more often he was called by Dazai’s side — shoulders stiffened with every successful mission he brought home.

Nakahara Chuuya, he heard them say — like Yuan had those first days, but not quite; like Verlaine had, but not quite. The god of the Port Mafia.

On a day that was not different from the others — after the first time he picked a fight with a mafioso in the hallways and watched the crowd surrounding them fall into silent, petrified interim — waiting for what, he wondered, waiting for who — he scoffed and, like the ten years old he had been, the twelve and the thirteen and the fifteen years old, Chuuya breathed].

Change knocked, eventually — slithering in with the suffocating air of August.

He didn’t know what sparked the change — what made Tsuchiya tell anecdotes of this or that particularly savage animal she’d healed, as they waited for Kenta to break into a warehouse; what made Noguchi offer them a drink after a mission, at the cost of a drunken Rin asking Chuuya if he was old enough to drink, Shrimp Boss; what made Koda and Virgil's murmurs louder and louder.

In the end, with an ease that might have stunned him less had it been anyone else — Kajii was the one to offer the solution to his problems.

“What you need,” the man screamed, half of his lanky body hidden underneath some hellish machine in his Scientist Mad Cave, “Is to force them to associate each other to good things.”

Unimpressed, Chuuya pushed one vial to the ground. “Why does everyone assume I know what makes a friendship? Do I look friendly?”

“Not at all,” he confirmed. “But you’re a good lad, under all that — that.”

“What’s that supposed to —“

“Just get them drunk,” With some moving around, he managed to curl an eyebrow in his direction. “Bring them somewhere where they get to fuck each other up with no consequences.”

They broke into a high name restaurant, so that Chuuya could finalize some treacherous deal with an old woman covered in jewels — and when her men made the mistake of attacking them first, Tsuchiya’s panicked reaction was to use her Ability to order the octopus in the tank to get stuck inside their commander’s throat.

The sheer speechlessness that followed had no breaths in the room dare to be too loud. Then, uncontrolled and burning from new Corruption scars and holding a man by the throat — Chuuya broke into merciless laughter.

When the entire squad followed through, tentatively looking at each other, he remembered the KK Company.

He munched over the sheer patheticity of the idea for a full day, as he rode his motorcycle all the way to the rebuilt race route. The next night, after the train they had been tasked to track almost ended up blowing up to pieces because of a fight between Virgil and Tsuchiya — he took off his hat and dragged seven pairs of unwilling feet at the newly built Underground Race Tournament.

You did it with the Sheep, he reprimanded himself, making a bee-line through the crowd for the car Rin had mysteriously promised to bring along. You’ll do it with these pieces of shit too.

“T-There you are,” Koda exclaimed. He could have counted the steps separating most of them for eons. “Is this — is this a mission, sir?”

“Drop the sir,” he replied, eyes on the car — a BMW M2 that he didn’t question where, exactly, Kenta’s broken finances had found. He leaned his elbows on the roof. “Since acting like children has been you guys’ optimal summer job, I decided some entertainment might get you all to stick your thumbs in your mouths and shut the fuck up.”

Speechless, six faces stared at him.

“Well?” He paid little attention to the too-enthusiastic narration from the speakers; but the crowd roared, as some fan-favorite crossed the finish line. “I hope you brought more than one car. Your won’t all fit in here, and I’m driving.”

With no more words, he got in, and shut the door on their jaw-slacked faces.

As far as terrible ideas could go, Chuuya considered, as the group hesitantly divided itself — with Koda, Virgil and Kento opting to join him; leaving the second car, a blue twin copy of their own, to Rin’s hands and the ill-advised company of Noguchi and Tsuchiya — this might not be too bad.

If he didn’t get himself arrested, which would have definitely made Hirotsu roll his eyes. If Mori would accept his breach of the silent rule of, staying away from low entertainments the higher you wish to go. If, especially, he grinned, stepping on the gas, he won.

“Are you, ” Virgil gulped, in the passenger seat, grasping his seatbelt. He was whispering in a language Chuuya didn’t understand, tracing a cross down his chest. “Chuuya, aren’t you a bit too young to have a license?”

Even Koda and Kento shot him a disbelieving look at that. The man blushed. “I don’t remember most of my illicit background, mind you.”

“The question of your credibility remains,” Kento grunted, kicking the back of his seat. “Are you going to murder us, Kid Boss?”

His personality, Chuuya had come to decide after weeks of forced vicinity, could be summed up in a quote he’d inserted in one of his reports: He doesn’t care for much, and it makes him the perfect judge on most things.

He didn’t have the raging fire of his sister, always ready to pick a fight and always ready to pull his ears when he was wrong — but he was smarter and subtler. Apart from Noguchi, he had gained the respect of the rest of the squad via some well placed — well forethought, he guessed — saving-in-time-of-need.

“I’m still deciding,” he landed on.

Next to him, Koda coughed. As they made their way to the starting line, his in-ear creaked. “Don’t kill my brother, Naka — Chuuya, or I’m slicing your balls off.”

“Our almighty Boss,” Noguchi muttered, a moment later.

“By the way, respectfully,” Tsuchiya said, right as the makeshift referee ordered it to begin. “I’m gonna destroy you, sir.”

A bit quietly, Koda went: “We’re putting money on this, right?”

His bones had been looking for the vertiginous emptiness that abruptly filled them all their life — sheer ecstasy dripped down his throat the faster he went, the blurrier the road at his sides became; the louder and less worried the screams from the other men in the car grew.

Chuuya laughed.

It sounded like something that Arahabaki might have carved in the sky — he whooped, grinning into Koda's face when the man started cursing his soul out, as they ran over the remnants of an unlucky car that had caught fire. His gloves scratched against the steering wheel, and his hair flew to his face with every violent dip of his foot, and he needed to cut his hair, still—

With startling suddenness, a familiar blue BMW slammed against their side, almost sending them flying.

The screech out of Kenta's mouth was high pitched enough to resemble Elise's. When Chuuya turned around — pulling to stabilize the skirting vehicle — Tsuchiya's smug grin was brighter than even the red lights embracing the route.

Somehow, the sun fell, and raised again.

Hostility did not quieten down. Noguchi was still a dilemma — Virgil was still the last to be chosen in pairs. But after every mission — no matter how many of her endless instants the moon had wasted watching them brawl — Chuuya dragged them to the outskirts of the city.

Willingly or not, he explained to his five fake graves, refusing to vocalize it clearly, his worst habit arose from the depths of his ribcage, hidden under new dirt and old lessons. Mocked by stones that could not talk, Chuuya was forced to come to a somewhat inconveniencing conclusion — no dust and no teachers were ever insistent enough to get the pendant for kinship out of his system.

“Even you would laugh at me,” Chuuya told Iceman. “Or — well. You would smoke very amusedly in my direction.”

The Kure twins had grown up in Suribachi City — just like him. Escaping from the crater had been a long lost dream of theirs; the GSS had pulled them out of a bad deal, giving both Rin and Kenta the chance to abandon their work at one of the shaky brothels in the lower levels. In the organization, they had been given two rifles and been told they would be killed if they couldn't master them in two weeks.

“We worked our asses off,” Rin told him, as she drove her — stolen, Kento had admitted with a giggle — BMW down the last curve of the race. She'd gotten herself a nickname across the usual audience of those illegal competitions — something that contained the word argent, from her hair. Chuuya had never managed not to snort long enough to hear the rest of it. “I used to scream into Ken-Ken's ear to wake him up in the middle of the night and train.”

“We had this final trial of sorts,” the man shivered, chin on the back of his sister's seat. “They made us shoot some prisoners. Pretty sure they were Port Mafia, too.”

“How old were you?” Chuuya asked.

“Seventeen,” They answered, in chorus. Then, in a fit of bravery that stunned him into silence for the rest of the race, Kento ruffled his hair. “Still older than you, Boss prodigy.”

He made a face. “Fuck that.”

Kento had a startlingly good aim, only second to Koda’s one. When they waited for their turn to race, Chuuya sometimes caught them shooting at empty beer bottles in the sidelines, discussing the war — the man had enrolled, but only for a year. “Missed my sister too much,” he explained.

“That’s a fucking lie,” Rin scoffed. “He missed his sweetheart. Shame that ended so badly. He tried to shoot you, didn’t he? Hey,” She wriggled her eyebrows. “Maybe you could put a good word with Virgil for him.”

If Virgil ever noticed the attention — that was probably a joke, but possibly not — he didn’t tell.

He had taken to following Chuuya around like a lost pup, rambling until his throat had to be hurting — as if years under the influence of Dante’s Ability had rendered him unable to take the weight of every emotion he felt on his own.

He talked about everything: his days in Rengoku, his days with Kouyou and the combat lessons she had been gracious enough to offer him, his discussions with Koda, his admiration of Tsuchiya and her job — animals, aren’t they such inherently good creatures? — and stories he used to write when he was younger. He had wanted to be a writer, he told him.

“Of course, that didn’t work out,” he sighed, sitting a bit too straight next to the driver seat. Virgil always looked out of place at the race precinct, as if he’d accidentally worn his best clothes to a field-work trip. “Dante knew, I think. My limbo — it was beautiful, in that sense. I had everything I wanted. My stories were very beautiful, too. Only —”

He was pale and thin, all long limbs and a composure that would have fit a little lord more than a mafioso. Nonetheless, he was nearly unbeatable with a knife in his hand, and scarily violent whenever a revolver slipped into his fingers. Terrified as he seemed of the fast cars the squad kept pushing him onto, every word he spoke felt like a pale imitation of a much augmented race behind his eyes.

Too much to say, too little tongue, Lippman would have said.

“They didn’t feel like I had written them,” he admitted. “What’s the point of a beautiful thing with your name on it — if you can’t even say you were the one to carve it into existence?”

Chuuya shrugged. “Ane-san owns this old scripture set. Ask her to give it to you. I’ll read your damn story.”

Virgil blinked. “You will?”

“Yeah,” Hands around the wheel, he thought of the glass elevators at the Headquarters. “Yeah. Fuck Dante and Beatrice, you know?”

They swerved across the route, the engine growling louder with each vehicle they managed to surpass. With a startlingly decisive expression, Virgil rolled his car window down, screaming into the lips-chapping wind: “Fuck them!”

Noguchi and Koda had been two familiar faces through bloodied roads in France — they’d brought him stolen wine on their way to a man they had to either kill or shake hands with; had offered every burden on their shoulder and every funny anecdote.

It was a confusing enough tendency. If anything about him had even been appealing, it had had Arahabaki’s name traced in red all over it. But power didn’t exactly attract that peculiar squad of his; they took a step back whenever his frame lit up, and they didn’t mention the scars — but they never quite grinned in the face of what he obtained with that Ability, either.

Chuuya had wanted to reassure them — Arahabaki was all but a messy eater. They wouldn’t remember enough to be enraged over it.

“God of the Port Mafia,” Noguchi mused, from the open window of the car next to his — because things could never be anything but a competition. “Because you’re better than us?”

He said it the way he’d said: were you the most cowardly of them, or the only one who wasn’t? He said it in a way that made a child’s mischievousness seem the reasonable answer — that made Chuuya want to remove his gloves and show off his decay like a trick.

But childishness was left for other targets, and his burned out matches for a badly lit room.

Unimpressed, Chuuya threw his half-lit cigarette inside his car. “Just than you.”

A bark of laughter cost him the faster start.

Astonishingly, Koda turned out to be the best driver of them all. Once they managed to drag him in front of a wheel, he left them to eat the dust of his stunningly ferocious moves — as if had been waiting all his life to relieve all that something inside his chest into the nearest car to crash.

He refused to get on the vehicle alone — and Chuuya knew it was because the starting gunshot always startled his fight-or-flight. When the Tournament came to the end of the first row of races — and the crowd celebrated with endless fireworks — Chuuya was the one to drag him behind the tallest vehicle, allowing him to curl up into a tight ball and stuff his ears with his hands.

“It’s funny,” he told him, once he managed to speak clearly enough that not every letter was a stuttering mess. It frustrated him; Chuuya waited. “I k-k—murdered countless people more than any exploding mine I can’t stop hearing. Shouldn’t I be scarier than t-this stuff? Look,” Koda sighed, watching the sky. “Aren’t they pretty, too?”

“Pretty my ass,” Chuuya scoffed, brushing dust from the swerving cars off his waistcoat. “All they are is loud as shit and endless. I’m about to go deaf here. You know, they’re bad for dogs.”

The man sighed. “You’re so unromantic.”

“Unromantic?”

“I’ve always wanted to bring my brother to the New Year fireworks show,” Koda smiled, a bit instantly. “I made him a promise when we were kids. One day, when I was rich and tall enough, I would bring him to the highest roof of the prettiest building of the city, and he’d climb on my shoulders to touch the fireworks.”

Chuuya raised his eyebrow. “Unrealistic.”

“Yes, thank you, ” He rolled his eyes. “There’s always been some mess or some work. But this year will be different. I’m confident.”

“Yeah? How come?”

Koda climbed to his feet. “Well, I’m friends with my Boss, for starters.”

The wildest of his cards was also, he learned, the quietest of the bunch.

Not that Tsuchiya was silent, per se. She roared with laughter with Rin whenever their paired up driving abilities left their counterparts in the dust, and she never refused a screaming match with Noguchi. The vibrant emerald of her hair matched the leather jackets she had taken to wearing during the Tournament, with the glittery texts on the back and the endless pins in the front.

She was loud and she was boastful — she never refused a challenge; she never accepted the hands offered to her stumbling steps. She never quite met Chuuya’s eyes when they talked.

“I didn’t think the Demon Prodigy would be such an avid texter,” Tsuchiya said, the first time the two of them found themselves alone in one of the cars. She was driving — Chuuya had been prohibited car access for a week, following his attempt to drag his motorcycle to the race.

Raising his eyes from the bright screen of his shattered phone, he curled an eyebrow. “Who says he is?”

“Aren’t you talking to him, right now?”

“I’m not talking to that walking umbrella,” Chuuya scoffed. “I’m responding to his stupid corpse pictures.”

The woman stared at the text he showed her, seemingly unimpressed by the pool of blood underneath a rather short man’s body. Someone from your family, Chibi?

“That’s nice,” she said, at last. “You’re always talking.”

“He’s always sending pictures.”

“You’re still responding. Is Dazai—“

“Why does everyone keep asking me about the shitty Mackerel?” Chuuya grunted.

Tsuchiya pressed her foot on the pedal, guiding them through the first curve of the second half of the route. Some nearby car tried to push them away, scratching down Chuuya’s side of the vehicle — rolling his window down, he tapped his knuckles on the other car, subtly and lightlessly sending it flying away.

Begrudgingly impressed, the woman concluded: “Probably for the same reason why everyone keeps asking him about you.”

Chuuya blinked.

“Well. Those who don’t piss their pants as soon as he opens his mouth,” Tsuchiya dragged her shoulder up, rubbing the scarred side of her face.

The way they were seated had left him on her blind side. She hadn’t complained, but Chuuya had felt it settle in some branch of his bones, ready to chirp in his ear at night. He only knew one other person who —

“I get the terror, I guess,” she added. “I’m fucking someone from his Secret Force. Apparently he’s — pretty unstable to work with.”

“He’s a pain in the ass,” Chuuya summed it up, after some silence. “Unpredictable and devilish. But he’s not crazy.”

Skepticism colored her next glance.

“I’m not kidding.”

“It’s hard to think of him as a human being, sometimes,” she admitted.

Chuuya was no target — whatever thud he thought he heard, from the depths of his hollow rib cage, was nothing at all. He wasn’t the target — no reason to feel unsettled.

“Don’t believe every nickname you hear in the Mafia,” he settled on, eventually, once his gloves were done creaking under his unwilling clench. “We’re a bunch of assholes with a thing for theatrics.”

“Still. Can you imagine just — going up to him and asking his favorite color?”

It’s blue, he thought about telling, just to be petty. But there was no reason for him to know. There was no reason for him to lie, either — Dazai had never asked for back up where open fire wasn’t involved.

“He’s not unstable,” he insisted, crumpling up an abandoned bottle of water at his feet. “He’s too — purposeful in every crazy thing he does to be crazy.”

“If you think so.”

He pulled at the laces of his boots. “Was shooting you one of those unstable things he did?”

They skirted down the road, raising a rainfall of dust. Too excited to care, the crowd cheered. In that moment, the woman reminded him of Kouyou — a statue of the finest marble; one someone had wasted too much time on to let her be modified by something as ephemeral as emotions.

“You know,” Tsuchiya licked her lips. “I used to work with a mechanic, before Mi and I joined the syndicate.”

He squinted. “Yeah?”

“I was damn good at it,” she confirmed. “You have that nice motorcycle of yours, I’ve seen it. Remind me to give you the name of the shop. If you ever need it repaired, that’s the place you want to go to.”

“You still in contact with the guy?”

“Oh, sure,” Her next glance was more careful. “He’s Noguchi’s father.”

Chuuya frowned, pausing, his shoelace abandoned around his fingers — a bad imitation of Kazuko’s slippery embraces. He had too many pictures of the snake on his phone, he thought, distantly. Dazai had somehow developed a father fever. “Noguchi’s family is dead.”

“Noguchi’s sister is dead,” Tsuchiya corrected him. “His mother has fucked off somewhere to America, with her rich boyfriends and her pearls. His father is a mechanic, who I coincidentally happened to meet before joining. I’m working on making them reconcile, even if... well. Not that easy.”

Pieces floated through his skull. He remembered Noguchi mentioning a sister in Suribachi City, right before he was interrupted. How could it connect to the guilt he remembered dripping from his lips?

“His sister,” Chuuya guessed. “Did he promise her to get rid of her Ability, somehow?”

Tsuchiya appeared surprised by how fast he’d pieced it together. He had been walking heavy steps all over the mystery of Noguchi’s hostility for too long, though; had been obsessing over the Colonel’s trust in him — over his other competition, who never seemed quite as taken with the challenge as he was.

“Not exactly,” she admitted. “Noguchi promised to kill her.”

He stared.

“I only know what he told me. Apparently, the poor girl was n born with a curse. Her Ability was strong — strong enough that his parents had sent her to live with some maid in the countryside, all to make sure she wouldn’t destroy the city in some outburst.”

He whistled. “That bad?”

“Something akin to your Ability, actually,” Tsuchiya tilted her head, still chasing the running cars. The scars down the side of her face were viciously bright against the night sky; Chuuya wondered if it was why she never stared at his own quite as long as the others. “That’s how he describes it, at least. It would activate in the most unpredictable moments and — it hurt her. She felt as if every crack she caused to the earth was matched by one on her body, he told me.”

Familiarity tugged the strings of his throat. “She wanted Noguchi to kill her, so that she would stop hurting.”

“Herself and others,” she nodded. “She caused countless accidents, and even more victims. Noguchi did his best to hide the real number from her, but voices travelled too fast. The kid was always sick, barely able to talk or move. She begged him to do what she wanted. He begged her to wait until she was sixteen. If she still wished to die by then, he would have respected her wish. He made her a promise.”

Chuuya could see the end of the story. “He wasn’t strong enough to do it.”

“She had an attack right after the day of her sixteenth birthday,” Tsuchiya’s hands tightened around the steering wheel. He wondered if that was the tone she used when talking to the owners of her patients; her grieving to-go, sorry, he did not make it. “She destroyed more than half the village, including the maid who had taken care of her. The desperation brought her to the brink of insanity. She told Noguchi terrible things he refuses to forget — no matter how insincere they must have been,” A pause. “In the end, she took care of the promise he had broken.”

He sighed, rubbing his forehead. “And that’s why he was so insistent that you had done nothing wrong.”

Tsuchiya hummed. “I assume he sees me as everything he did not manage to be.”

He thought of Q.

Noguchi was a stubborn man in all he loved. He spent more time fighting with Tsuchiya than he did talking — he had seen him refuse to say a word to Koda for over a week, after the man had foolishly put his life in danger. It wasn’t hard to imagine he had hoped to find a better solution than what his sister had wanted.

“It’s not the same thing,” Chuuya exclaimed. “I know it’s — he loves you. Alright. I get it. I respect his insistence to defend you. I can even respect your desire to fulfill your sister’s last wish, no matter how — but that was a child, Tsuchiya. You’re an adult who made a choice. He should let you shoulder the responsibility.”

“You think I don’t know that?” the woman scoffed, skirting near the feet of the roaring crowd. “I am — beyond lucky. An eye is not even comparable to the price I thought I would have to pay.”

He sent her a glance. “You’re not that stupid.”

A pause. “The idea was to keep me alive to witness the organization’s rage against me. Is your friend expecting a full-blown conflict to explode?”

“Not my friend.”

“I can’t imagine what other situation might cause such a great number of victims that my faults would shine that brightly,” Tsuchiya straightened her back. “And his preemptive action is infamous throughout the syndicate. With your permission, sir, the day that conflict comes — I will volunteer to join our paramedics. My Ability might be useless on people, but — I can make amends.”

Chuuya clicked his tongue. ““You much of a doctor?”

“Mi taught me things.”

“Things might not save our men.”

“Things,” Tsuchiya repeated. She settled her eye on him, no matter the unhesitant acceleration of the car. “I know you’ve been ingesting poison, for one.”

He tightened his lips.

“High temperature and shivers,” she listed off, without his input. “You’re freezing, normally, but lately your temperature has been almost average. It’s also summer, and you’ve been lamenting the heat, so I don’t see why you should be shivering so early in the mornings. Irritability, drowsiness, breathing difficulties, those burns around your mouth and nose—“

“I’ve been training my Ability with your eye-ripper,” Chuuya replied, blankly.

“And Mi’s lessons did not cover what symptoms that might bring,” Tsuchiya agreed. “But you’ve been like this ever since you returned, and Noguchi tells me you were like this in France, too. Which means you must have started right after the Nine Rings Conflict. Your training surely isn’t helping your cause, but — why are you trying to build a tolerance?”

There was no resemblance between the headlights of the car rotating in front of them and the lightbulbs in Albatross’ bathroom. Still, Chuuya recalled blurred circles of colors — the cold ceramic under his fingers. What had Mori said? Tolerance takes time. He had put bottles in his hands and tapped the spot of his throat that would hurt the most — and then he’d smiled.

If food didn’t taste like blood, these days, it tasted like those little bottles. “Let me see,” he deadpanned. “Maybe because I’m tired of getting poisoned.”

“Does it happen a lot?”

“You’d be fucking surprised.”

“But why mix an already difficult practice with little eating?” she insisted.

Chuuya rolled his eyes. “I eat.”

“Clearly not enough.”

“Are you my mother?” he snapped, stunned. “Like, seriously. You want to ask how I’m going to school? All the teachers like me, don’t worry.”

Tsuchiya huffed. “I just—“

“I just — nothing. I’m your Boss, you know?

“Not eating enough is gonna bite you in the backside. Boss. ”

“I eat enough to kick your ass.”

“Barely, maybe,” She stepped on the gas.

Chuuya curled an eyebrow in her direction. “I could kick your ass. I don’t care how good you are,” And she was good, he knew. Hand-to-hand combat was her field of expertise — he’d seen her snap men’s throats with bare legs and arms, and kick them hard enough to break their bones.

“I know you could,” Tsuchiya conceded, honestly, in a tone that lacked the envy and skepticism of the best martial artist of the organization whispers. “I remember Rengoku.”

He blew air out. “Everyone remembers Rengoku.”

“Does it piss you off?”

[He’d thought — just once — about bringing them to the Old World. He hadn’t. He never would. He didn’t know how].

“You can volunteer with the paramedics,” Chuuya said, picking the cowardly route. “As long as you don’t stuff people with horse tranquilisers, I don’t care.”

For the first time, a smile graced her face. “It would surprise you how good of a sleep that shit gives you.”

His eyes widened. “You shot yourself with a horse tranquilizer?”

“Well, not on purpose, ” She blushed to the roots of her hair. Their car crossed the finish line; behind the referees, the rest of their squad was cheering, armed to the teeth and grinning from one ear to the other. With a sigh, Chuuya resigned himself to five graves’ I told you so’s.

“You see, what happened was—“

---

...

---

The bathroom stall was cramped enough to make the smell stick like a blanket.

“Thirty seven seconds,” Dazai whispered, perched on the other side of the toilet, offering no explanation to how he’d calculated that information. “They’ll only turn off the cameras for twenty seconds, so we need to get out of here quick.”

Chuuya tried to shift on that unlikely spot, freezing when the creaking seemed to grow louder than the suspicious sounds from the next stall. The pair had stumbled there in a frenzy that seemed unfit of the Gentlemen’s Club’s opening hour — except that hour was midnight sharp, and it seemed to never be too soon for a quickie.

“I still can’t believe you couldn’t just get us the funds for the entrance,” he whispered back. They had been hiding for seven hours; only waiting in Lippman’s truck for an entire day of shooting had been more boring. “Some Demon Prodigy.”

“Demon Prodigy undercover,” Dazai didn’t blink. “I’m sorry to inform you that there aren’t any allowed-to-all-clubs VIP passes for Mafia dogs, and that neither of us can have this night on our channels. Should I remind you of how elated Mori would be to find us this deep in enemy territory?”

He moved a bit more. In the next stall, a high-pitched voice moaned a sluggish curse.

“It’s just the Shadow Blade. We have too much shit on them for any breach to ever matter,” Chuuya replied. “Everybody knows every gang in the city has been to the Club at least once. Worst case, I sicc Matsuda’s righteous palms on this...” Metallic, ground-shaking music rattled the walls, the guitar riff peaking right as the voices in the next stall did the same. “... fine establishment.”

Dazai’s shoes slipped.

He landed on the ground with a thump! that shut the people in the next stall right up. Then, extracting two black cloths from his belt hoops, he ordered: “Now.”

[“The Shadow Blade is the city’s eldest child,” Mori continued, dragging eyes full of distaste down the dossier marked in their seal. “According to the archives, there are high chances it was amongst the first ever organized-crime schemes in Yokohama. The men of the syndicate — Blades, as they refer to themselves — specialize in drug rings.”

Which Mori, ever the doctor and ever the careful planner, despised. “They didn’t side with the Nine Rings,” Dazai commented, tapping the back of the man’s seat. “Why attack them first?”

The man hummed. Mere days ago, Chuuya had taken part in the execution of a Black Lizard who had been caught high on heroin; he hadn’t been on time to ask whether the rule had been put in place before or after the first Boss’ death. “To make sure they don’t get ideas.”

“More than a quarter of our buyers have had to regulate funds to deal with the Blades offers,” Chuuya intervened, recalling the documents Virgil had shown him. “They think the battle weakened us, and that this is the perfect moment to get rid of the competition. Last thing we need is addicted buyers with not enough resources.”

“They need a reminder,” The tapping fingers grew slower, then faster. Right as he was about to be distracted by it, they came to a stop. “Or an ultimatum. Whichever you two believe best.”]

The cloth was an unbearably sweaty weight over the bridge of his nose, drowning the inside of the club in a deafening-music lined darkness.

Summer and a clear abundance of bodies pressed against every inch of him, insistent like actual cement walls. “How do you go all day with an eye covered?” Chuuya muttered, fixing the knot behind his matted hair. “You must be blind.”

“I’m exceptionally more talented than you in every field,” Dazai replied. His voice was right by his ear; startled, he almost slammed his elbow in his side, feet skiing on some drink on the floor. Peeved, the boy stuck a finger over his closed eye. “Stop fiddling with that. Last thing we need is for you to go on a murder spree,” He paused. “Well. An unplanned one.”

Right in that moment, the screech of vents opening drowned the music.

They call it Flowers of Buffoonery, Dazai had explained, in the endless hours they had spent in that bathroom stall. Or — It has an uglier name, but I didn’t like it, so this is what we’re calling it. As far as everyone who frequents the bar is concerned, it’s merely inhaled euphoria. A little kick.

He’d paused. As long as it doesn’t get in your eyes, of course.

“One hell of an Ability,” Chuuya mused, as he licked the sour taste off his lips. The cloud of smoke — Chibi-motorcycle-pink, Dazai informed him, through the opaque veil of his own blindfold — was strangely material; he felt it sneak inside his nostrils and stick to his tongue, relaxing his body just so. “Bar, first. I’m not doing this sober.”

The music was loud; Dazai’s next words were traced on the hollow of his throat, instead, with a perfectly cut nail surrounded by bitten skin. You should give me your hand.

“I was fighting gangs in Suribachi City’s blackouts while you were still pissing your bed,” Chuuya scoffed, gently kicking the ground with the tip of his shoe. He didn’t watch it come to life; he felt it, though, like bright obstacles in the night. Everything is touched by gravity, he had drunkenly explained, once, to a sharp-eyed Doc, which means I can touch everything. “I’ll be fine.”

“If you slip and fall, I’ll laugh.”

“If I slip and fall, I’m pulling you down with me, jackass.”

A deep sigh; then, because Dazai was petty, he intertwined an arm with his own. “This can’t be what partnerships truly are about.”

Since Chuuya was only slightly pettier, he led them to the bar all the same. “That’s because we aren’t partners.”

“As you say,” he patronized. “You’re on my blind side all the time, like some — some noisy, baby faced nurse. Be grateful I’m willing to return the annoyance.”

Chuuya’s jaw dropped. “I’m — that is not —“

With a hum, he pulled him along.

Despite being invisible, the atmosphere all around them was perfectly tactile and unavoidably familiar. The surge of smells reminded him of the worst sides of Ace’s Casinos, with the good quality alcohol in bad quality hands, the tinge of sex, and the bad breath of dazed crowds. Drugs added an oily sort of haze to the mix — something that Chuuya only vaguely recalled from his childhood in the Sheep, before he had managed to pull them to more decent levels of the crater.

Endless people danced to music Chuuya didn’t know and couldn’t quite follow; behind him, Dazai entertained himself with humming along in all the wrong rhythms.

Flowers of Buffoonery didn’t feel like much — perhaps the numbness of too little morphine, or whiskey that had been left in the fridge. Not nearly enough to make him lose his senses, but just enough to make his slide through sweaty bodies a little less disgusting and a little more hypnotizing.

Lips brushed the shell of his ear. “They’ve got eyes on us.”

Chuuya hummed, throwing his empty glass where he guessed the counter was. They had expected eyes, despite the secrecy surrounding the Gentleman’s Club uses — too much was a stake for it not to be guarded. It was why Dazai sported a blindfold all the same, despite being untouched by the smokey Ability.

Where?, he tapped on the boy’s shoe. The passing crowd had pressed them close enough for the smell of gunpowder that never left the boy to filter in his nose, almost drowning out the Ability.

He felt Dazai’s head move. He hadn’t seen him remove his head bandage, before putting the blindfold on. He wondered if he had a sweat patch, right under there. “There’s a mezzanine all around the perimeter,” he described. “They’ve got four suspicious brutes in every quarter. Horrible clothes. The barkeep stared at you for too long, and you left your hat at home, so I assume it wasn’t mere reasonable disgust. And a few people near the DJ system.”

“And the dealers?”

Tapped on his shoulder: follow me.

Chuuya disliked the idea. Nonetheless, his senses and Tainted couldn't let him locate specific faces — he wrapped the belt of Dazai's coat around his knuckles, and pushed the small of his back.

A huff. "I'm not the dog here."

"I'm not holding your hand," he replied, just loud enough to beat the drumming music. He couldn't see the lights; he could feel them, though, pounding like a headache against his patience. "I don't want to catch — whatever you have."

"Whatever I have."

"You know what I mean."

"No, why don't you enlighten me —"

"The weirdo genes."

"The weirdo —"

"Are you going to move?" he asked.

"I had my fingers in your viscera a week ago, you know," Dazai grumbled, as he threw the two of them inside the bouncing bodies of what he could only assume was the dance floor. "Whatever I have, you've caught it long ago."

It was a joke. Chuuya felt a spark of tension up his spine all the same; the echo of a white room, an hallucination bending to meet his eyes. You and I are the same. "Not in a million years."

The second part of the plan was the easiest — he had been familiar with pickpocketing since before he had been steady enough on his feet to run from Matsuda and Murase's police rounds. Darkness and haze in his veins didn't change much — Chuuya swayed his body along to the dancing limbs, and slipped his hands into the pockets and bags of the Shadow Blade assigned dealers.

Dazai was a steady weight against him, his glee at refusing to blend in by pretending to dance more than evident. The moment Chuuya held the transparent packages of white powder and pills, he slipped their own in their place — identical bags, only sporting the Takasekai's seal on them.

"It's actually sort of pretty," the boy said, at some point, ripping a package from his fingers. "I wouldn't mind hanging myself from this roof."

"You wouldn't mind hanging yourself in a public bathroom."

"There's something vaguely enchanting about being in a crowd of blindfolded people," Dazai continued, easily. "I get it's necessary, but it's an interesting taste nonetheless. They've put neon paint everywhere. Kind of a waste, given nobody can see it."

“That’s just club etiquette,” Chuuya said. “People are usually too drunk to see shit anyway.”

A curiously tilted silence.

“What?”

“You don’t feel like the clubbing type.”

“What the fuck does that mean?”

“You collect poetry books and drink wine that costs more than my salary. I can see you with Gramp’s monocle sooner than I can see you —“ He saw the quotation marks his fingers had to be doing in his mind; along to the music, in English, he said: “Getting low, low, low.”

Chuuya would have stared him down, had his eyes been uncovered. “You’re aware I grew up in a gang.”

“Sure,” Dazai agreed. “And what bedtime did you install, exactly?”

Ten o’clock, he didn’t answer, not that anybody ever followed through. “Whatever,” He slipped his fingers by the belt of one of the dealers, stealing a passing glass to throw on his shirt. Between fake sluggish apologies and an immediate disappearance through naked shoulders and sticky legs, he added: “Had to go and recover Shirase and the others from places like this a few times.”

Dazai stuck one finger in his choker, pulling him out of the way of something at the very last moment. “Not the Flags?”

His laughter almost ripped the stitches still on his body; the reminder that thinking about it would mean feeling like a living bruise had his steps grow more careful. “Too sophisticated. A good bar and a pool table were more their taste.”

Chuuya could see it, though — Albatross’ drunkest nights; an unwise idea Pianoman would not veto, because he would see the curiosity on all of their faces. Iceman’s ass stuck to the bar chairs; Lippman and Albatross’ eyes crinkling under the lights; Doc’s quiet acceptance of Chuuya’s head on his shoulder; Pianoman’s laughter. A possibility, in another world — a day he would never live.

Dazai stepped on his feet.

“Hey!” he cursed. “You have eyes, what —“

A whistle reached his ears. Self-portrait on a cold night, his nails tapped on his knuckles, before Dazai pulled him deeper inside the embrace of the crowd. The eyes have started looking. The song had changed to something low and bass-driven; it beat harder than his heart, rattling his entire body to the point of stumbling.

“What do people do in clubs, normally?” Chuuya heard him ask, as they stumbled into what had to be the center of that maze. Arms pressed against his back, sticky fingers dragging; hot exhales blurred his perception. “Since your baby-gang-raised self is such an expert?”

“Dance,” Chuuya heard himself answer, his fingers tense. Tainted was a speck of dust behind a door that was never closed; now came the difficult part. “Get drunk. Dance more. Stripteases?”

“Have you ever even witnessed a striptease?”

He spluttered. “Have you?”

“Don’t try to make educated guesses. You don’t have the brain cells. We need to blend in.”

“Dance,” Chuuya concluded, stepping just a tad too hard on the boy’s feet, as payback. “Would be easier if you stopped acting like the fucking darkness personified and actually moved. Throw up on the floor or something,” Goosebumps gathered on his skin. “We’re not making out.”

Dazai’s exasperation was tactile. “Who said anything about making out — “

Somewhere on their left, the DJ screamed into his mic — something about it being Friday. It got lost in the echo of his system, but the crowd screamed along with ease. The dancing grew more and more frantic — up and down jumps, hair whipping the air.

“Alright,” Chuuya sighed. He hid the last packages in his shoes; wrapped the end of Dazai’s tie around his free hand, and pulled him in with an ease that had him yelp. “Dancing, then.”

A hand appeared on his shoulder, the other reaching for his wrist.

He slapped them away.

In the hesitant, heavy silence that followed, Chuuya dared: “Did you just try to fucking waltz us through a drug ring’s dance floor?”

A breath. “I think your height is getting worse,” the other boy answered, gravely. “Oxygen isn’t getting to your brain anymore.”

“That doesn’t even make sense — “

Summer nights were still summer; it became clearer with every uncoordinated sway they awkwardly dragged their limbs through, bones knocking, eyes and hands subtly checking for free ways from the surveillance. Tainted appeared and disappeared with every brush of the few portions of Dazai’s naked skin, blinking like traffic lights, shutting the space inside his skull off and turning it on again.

“They could at least put some Hirose,” the boy lamented, at some point. Chuuya mourned the possibility to watch him fling his arms around with no perception of space.

“You think they have Hirose Fumiko in a place like this?” he screamed back.

“One can always hope,” Dazai lowered his head a bit; bumped it against his own. “Whoever steals more wallets gets Hirotsu’s new lighter.”

“Oh,” He sharpened his teeth; bumped against his head again. His nose landed somewhere on the boy’s sweat-matted cheek; he thought he heard his breath catch. “You’re on.”

Offhandedly — as they twirled their hands through nearby jackets and pants, throwing their trophies at each other to keep count — Chuuya put his hands on each side of his throat, heartbeat a fluttering beast, lowering him before a flying glass could land on Dazai’s scalp.

He felt the sweat on his nape gather on the naked tips of his fingers — tracing the rigged path of a scar Chuuya had given himself by climbing over barbed wire, under Corruption.

“Hey,” Dazai called, at some point. “Do you think Arahabaki likes me?”

How stupid, he thought. Arahabaki — who wasn’t anything; who couldn’t hate anything — despised Dazai Osamu with a passion that might rival his cage’s one. Jealous like a child. Cautious like a parent. Insistent.

At the very least, the thing considered, at times — like he might have hissed and whispered for long enough that Chuuya would have finally ripped his heart out of his chest — one of them could watch his fingers trace their scars. There was purpose in that, too.

There was purpose in that only, Arahabaki corrected him. There would be purpose in the corpse he’d make of the one person who kept the cage locked. Aren’t you glad, he’d ask?

“I don’t think anyone likes you,” Chuuya answered.

“Listen,” Dazai insisted, almost too low to find under the music. “I miscalculated something.”

His head snapped to him.

The fire alarm started ringing.

For a moment, nobody seemed to notice. But they had planned that part by detail — they waited. By the time the DJ had lowered the volume enough for it to break through, panic had already broken free — the mass of bodies shrieking and flinging themselves to an exit they couldn’t see was heavier than a storm, merciless steps forcing them to hide under the closest table to avoid being walked on. Still, no matter the urgency — none of them dared to remove their blindfold.

“What is it,” Chuuya whispered. Sounds merged over the barrier of his limited senses; steps disappearing, replaced by the heavy boots of men carrying guns. The humming music had lowered, but it hadn’t left; the smell of Flowers of Buffoonery seemed thicker than before. “What the hell did you miscalculate?”

Dazai’s shoulder pressed against his own. Seemingly somewhat entertained by the notion, he offered: “Flowers of Buffoonery not having any effect on me.”

He froze. “But —“

“It’s not an Ability User I can touch,” the boy insisted. “Given the current high I’m feeling, I assume — it’s a substance. In the air. I can’t exactly nullify a person who isn’t here.”

Breathing in, Chuuya dug his nails into the wooden floor, clenching his jaw shut. His eyes roamed under closed eyelids, searching imaginary exits and coordinates, shoulders relaxing with the promise of a challenge. “Mackerel.”

“Yes.”

“You said getting this shit in your eyes is the worst case scenario. That this Ability is meant to send people in a violent frenzy.”

“They’ll attack any perceived threat on sight,” he confirmed. It was amongst the reasons why the Shadow Blade was at the center of most Ability-related whispers in the underground. The potential of that rumored Ability User would have made even the Port Mafia hesitate. “It makes sense, if you think about it — ecstasy at its maximum potential would turn into viciousness. If eyes are the window to the soul —“

“You’ve been wearing a fake blindfold,” he interrupted, fists tight. “How much of that shit is in one of your eyes, right now?”

Dazai didn’t answer.

If you start attacking at the mere sign of danger, he didn’t insist, mind moving too fast, how do we know you’ll be lucid enough to stop me?

From a higher point of the dance floor — the mezzanine, Chuuya suspected — the voice of a woman curled into laughter.

“Be a dear and wait, Takahashi,” she said; a hum only just higher than the music. The sound of her voice felt like needles on skin, awakening some sleeping whisper inside Chuuya’s veins. The smoke grew thicker and thicker; with a curse, Chuuya hid his mouth and nose behind his palm, slapping his free hand on Dazai’s own. “We still have guests in.”

The sound of guns clicking tumbled on the ground — their trajectory, even with eyes closed, was doubtless.

Chuuya cursed, and cracked his knuckles. “Don’t move. And cover your goddamn eyes.”

Before the boy could talk, he jumped out of their hiding spot.

Darkness was a veil heavier than the sky; it heightened the world around him with nauseating ease, turning the lighting-quick sound of bullets fired in his way into a thunderstorm — turning the brush of them against his skin, slowed down like time by the layer of Tainted on his outer skin, into the pressure of a single hand on a bruise.

This, Chuuya thought, this is it. He kicked out and sunk his naked fist in a man’s chest; he sent their bullets back to them, sliding down their blood on the floor to climb over a missed man’s back, wrapping his legs around his neck to snap it in two. Perhaps, Chuuya thought, perhaps it would feel less tempting if I could just do this all the time.

What's one lifetime of blood for another?, Mori had told him, once.

A hand of steel clenched around his throat.

Surprise was choked out of him; before he could order Tainted to break the delicate fingers, manicured nails brushed against his forehead — ripping his blindfold off.

“Oh,” the woman said. “You do know what we’re capable of.”

Chuuya only caught a glimpse, before his mind had the quickness to slam his eyes shut — a redhead in a glimmering green dress, with lips too pink for her pale cheeks and one fist clenched on the back of Dazai’s collar, keeping him to the floor.

“Come on, now,” she sing-sang. “I came all the way here for you. Won’t you look at me?”

“Bastard,” he called, clawing at the hand around his throat. Tainted refused to act exactly as he asked; he bit his tongue to blood and kicked, attempting to reach Dazai’s limp body.

“Wake — the fuck — up.”

The woman tutted. Her every sound was a match being rubbed on gasoline — the number the smoke felt through his nostrils, the stronger it grew at the mere suggestion of her voice.

“The Gentleman’s Club is always glad to receive visitors, you know?” she sighed. “We have had many Takasekai men in the past, and they’ve all enjoyed themselves thoroughly. You could have done the same. What need was there to cause a mess? Did you boys want the dance floor all for yourselves?”

Chuuya’s mind curled back and forth with the little blood it was being offered; he sunk his nails in the woman’s wrist until he could feel warm blood pool down his fingers. She’s mad about the fire alarm, he mused, they haven’t found the other drug packages, then.

“You guys,” he struggled to stutter, breath stuck under his teeth, “Need — a closed number entrance.”

“Perhaps you’re right,” she said, with a hint of amusement. “You seem clever. I would have let you go, in other circumstances, but — you know. With all these rumors about Takasekai secretly helping the Bishop’s Staff out, I can’t just let you two go after you sneaked around so many poor girls, yes? Who knows what you were planning.”

On the ground, Dazai groaned.

“I,” Chuuya heard him force out, dazed in a slightly euphoric way — hungry, at the seams, for something uncharacteristic, “Would never — to any beautiful woman —”

Irritation pooled on his temples, pounding like a hammer. “That isn’t — relevant —”

Knuckles knocked on the wood.

He paused.

Undeterred, the Ability User chose that moment to pick up a gun from who knew where, firing it straight to the middle of his chest.

The impact landed Chuuya on the floor; the sound of upcoming steps told him the guards he had beaten had already been replaced, doubled up in their number — eyes on him. Teeth pressed against each other, he replayed the sound of the knuckles on the wood, and ordered Tainted to let the bullet in — only halfway.

I hate, he let himself think, as the bullet sunk, this fucking strategy.

A gasp of pain was dragged out of him, fake only at its very edges — he rolled on the ground until his elbow hit shattered pieces of glass. Taking advantage of it to get more believable blood on the floor, Chuuya bit his cheek and pushed his palms down, pretending to attempt to stand.

A heel landed on his back, hard.

“This is bound to be a terribly long night of damage control,” the woman sighed, much closer. A breathing pattern he knew all too well got even closer; Chuuya had never heard it so fatigued — so resistant to something. “We offer absolute peace on our nights, you know?”

If Dazai’s touching her, he questioned, forcing his eyelids shut harder, how is he not nullified?

What we’re capable of, she had said.

“It isn’t you,” Chuuya croaked. “You’re not the Ability User.”

A pause — barely a breath. “My, my, how clever,” the woman said, at last, over what might have been laughter, if kinder. “You’re one of those Takasekai bastards, aren’t you? You should know something about keeping your treasures away from your displays.”

He coughed a coagulation of blood out, feeling his neck pulse. A check of Tainted let him know they were surrounded by more than sixty men — the heartbeats outside the walls spoke of double that. ““Would have never guessed it wasn’t you. You fucking smell.”

The heel dug into a recently-stitched spot — between his fourth and fifth rib. Chuuya felt it all the way to his skull, sizzling like electricity.

A weight was dropped on his knees, right in front of him. “I have no time to deal with this,” the woman spat out, less pleasant. “I’ll just have your partner here tear you and himself apart. He just needs to look at you to do it.”

“You — fool,” he heard Dazai murmur, sluggish and whiney. “I want to kill him whenever I look at him.”

Chuuya’s forehead pulsed. “Now, jackass?”

With dreading, unavoidable certainty, he knew what was going to happen.

His eyelids refused to part — he could see it all the same. The woman’s manicured hands in Dazai’s hair, pushing his kneeled, mindless body forward — until he was bent right over Chuuya’s curled up, bleeding one. He could see the glint of Dazai’s braces, as he sunk his teeth in a corner of his lower lip — a nervous tell he never noticed.

“There,” the woman tutted, again. The sound of her hands over Dazai’s head bandages stiffened his spine. “Only one eye won’t do.”

The blood between his teeth tasted like vomit. He spat it out, again and again, choking on it. It had been a decade since he had been hit by a bullet. “Get your hands off him.”

“A good kill needs both eyes,” she insisted, sweeter than honey, “How else will you remember it?”

He could see it with utter clarity — the bandages pooling to the ground; the way Dazai’s pupils would swallow his irises, drunk with a mindless need to kill that Chuuya had only truly seen him drown in once. He could see the words perched on his lips — that chant only they knew, and that no strategist like Dazai would miss out on using, if mindless with need to succeed.

He could taste Arahabaki devouring him whole, stretching bone after bone into a fractured mess of hollow space — skewering his insides until they could spread across all the ground a god might want soiled and a code might not want at all, and Dazai standing there — watching.

“Look at him, dear,” the woman murmured. “Now.”

The bandages landed on the floor — and he heard it. Knuckled on the wood, again.

“No,” Chuuya had no time to say. “No, don’t —” His fingers closed around the biggest of the glass shards, right as Dazai’s hand stole it from him and stabbed — Chuuya knew; only by the squelch of wet skin and the breath falling from Dazai’s mouth — his unbandaged eye.

Spring sun, the knocking had said. Like his tut in the alley; you were an indent bigger than the spring sun on —

The window of action was thinner than a blink; Chuuya gulped down a shout of Dazai’s name — something soaked in shock and questions and curses and something — and curled his mouth around the chant the strategy had ordered him to use.

After that, it was quiet.

ability user: the moment you look at chuuya you'll want to kill him dazai, about to literally stab his eye to stop himself from doing that, still refuses to admit that's why: jokes on you i want to kill chuuya whenever i look at him hey there! the corruption training arc has started, at last, and chuuya's about not to have a good day for a bit — which, i feel guilty to admit, was some of the funniest part to write for this whole fic. at the very least, he cleared things up with tanaki and managed to get the band of raging chihuahuas to calm down. you go, chuuya!

i want to start by thanking you guys again for the support, and for enjoying this fic of mine — every single comment and every kudos leaves me grinning for the whole day, i hope you know. i'm always hoping this story will feel as realistic as possible (or, at the very least, not offensively different from how i think skk are) and now that corruption is in the game, that's certainly gonna be more difficult. i'm very curious to explore what skk's understanding of it might have been, though, before they fully got its magnitude.

and cliffhanger! how i love cliffhangers. 10/10 to skk for creating a strategy that's literally just “you start corruption and i do something absolutely unreasonable to confuse the enemy”. at least, by stabbing his eye, dazai managed not to look at chuuya and not attack him. isn't that romantic?

one thing i want to point out — “flowers of buffoonery” is, of course, an irl dazai osamu reference! funny name isn't it?

and that's it for today! see you next week. keep yourself warm <3

BY

Chapter Summary

It takes him three goodbyes from the yellow thing in the sky to cave.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xv.

---

Case number: 67560091

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Nakahara C. and Dazai O. we're assigned to [...]*

---

It takes him three goodbyes from the yellow thing in the sky to cave.

For a child who knows nothing at all, disgust is quick to sink its claws in his soft skin, covered in rubble and dust, pushing him further and further away from the crawling things in the alleys where he sleeps. There's a buzz in the back of his skull — a shivering creature that wants him dead and needs him alive, and it explains a concept his growling stomach could have probably reached on its own.

Anyway, the creature is always hungry.

He picks up the things, smashing them in his fist so that they stop moving, and his fingers glow red as he does. He slept on the tiled floor of an all white place for some time, with bright lights that looked both new and destroyed — but the color freaked him out. He was quick to leave.

White. It reminds him of cables and floating green numbers, and a place that must have welcomed him since the beginning — the screeches in the back of his skull keep calling it that; the beginning — because he can't remember anything else. The concept of memories itself is lost on him.

The reflections freak him out even more.

They follow him. There is water on the ground, either from the sky or from the metal tubes scattered around. He knows they're called pipes — the same way he's not sure of what the water-from-the-sky is. He knows the reflection is him the way he knows the shrieks in the back of his head are, too.

Not you, it tells him, testily. All you are is what I will leave.

The reflections freak him out, but it — it pisses him off.

He ends up throwing up. He resists the call until his body screams at him, drawing him to the concrete and promising, threatening, to leave him there, to let him rot and merge with the ground, to make those terrifying creatures that sometimes fly in the sky put their beak all over him and devour him. His bones are showing. It will be easy.

It is fear, mostly, with a hint of rage, that makes him desperate enough to try to eat his own vomit.

Cockroaches, informs him the space in his mind where he keeps the word pipes. That's what they were.

It's not always that. As untouched by taste or preferences the it in the back of his head is — Arahabaki; because he wakes, one day, and knows that name — the little pests bore it soon enough. Perhaps it's mere instinct — he likes to believe he isn't alone, though.

Arahabaki, who isn't real, teaches him to throw rocks at bigger animals that make the mistake of circling the alleys; then it teaches him how to light up the rocks in that consoling shade of red.

The red water that abandons the animals' carcasses doubles with each trick he learns. He tries to taste that too, once. Arahabaki roars. He stops doing it.

Cockroaches become meat, meat becomes things he steals from the first people he sees. The memories he doesn't have call the white thing in the sky moon — and it takes him another two nights to have the courage to approach those people and their bags.

It is not the first time he eats food, nor the first time he kills. He does not know this. The ground he lies on at night would not exist if not for him; his favorite fruit used to be peaches. He does not know this. He lives with the shrieks in the back of his skull — and he lives, insistently, because Arahabaki doesn't want him to, but needs it.

I will escape you.

Loneliness is not something a boy who was always alone can feel; as such, he feels nothing at all. If Arahabaki will kill him, it means he's alive, still.

He —

"Nakahara," Yuan reads, bent over him, running fingers over sewn letters on his chest. She is tasked with cleaning the red water and the vomit off him, and she does so with little complaint. She says his name as if he's supposed to know it. To be it. "Nakahara — what are the others calling you? Chuuya, from the missing children lists?" She smiled. "That's a pretty name."

"No it's not," he's quick to snap.

They're not the first words he says. Very clearly, he can remember biting growls of what is that, what is that, what is that to the boy who brought him here. The Sheep, they call themselves, and Chuuya is too stubborn to admit he can't quite recall what a sheep is supposed to be.

"Yes it is," Yuan insists, squinting at him. She is one year younger than the age Shirase had decided to give him. She keeps waking up at night when he does, but Chuuya knows he doesn't scream, so he doesn't understand how. "You're going to be a pig head, ain't you?"

When they drag him to the flames for killing a kid, doe eyes waiting for his hands to light up red again — and Chuuya doesn't understand, he doesn't understand, because it's not the first person he kills; and he doesn't remember, but the place they call home is soiled from the rage of the shrieks in the back of his head, and it's just red water, because they haven't bothered to tell him what it's called — it's Yuan who calls for a Council meeting.

“Cockroaches?” she echoes, endless days later, as they drag a sleeping Shirase back to base. Her nose scrunches up. Chuuya hates that she saved his life. Chuuya hates that they all did. Chuuya will gladly leave his carcass to those terrifying birds, if his blood will be spilled for them. “That’s disgusting.”

He knows, he assures her. It took him three days to cave.

---

...

---

What is the aim, here, exactly?, Kajii had asked, the upper half of his body hidden under one of his work tables. Chuuya loathed and appreciated his weekly visits to the man’s floor; there were only so many lemon-flavored smells and discussions on the nature of divinity he could take. You’re training this hyper-secret Ability of yours. It debilitates you for days at the time. Why?

Chuuya hadn’t answered. There had been options, of course — Boss ordered it, would have shut him right up; it’s not as under control as they want everyone to believe, might have sealed his lips out of awkwardness. I want to. It calls me when I don’t. I don’t know how to stop wanting to.

Easier: there might be a solution I’m still not good enough to grasp.

Even easier: there has to be a point.

He had healing and doomed scars on every inch of his flesh, curling like mocking grins from a creature he only saw in mirrors — he hadn’t slept a full night since the beginning of June, haunted by the pounding pain in his muscles. And yet.

What would they say, knowingly, Chuuya never wondered, if they knew I’ve never felt better?

“Oh,” Dazai exhaled.

The sound bounced off the moss-covered rocks caging them; his eye, eyelids stained in blood, was set on the moon at the end of the well. “Oh, is this it? It wasn’t meant to hurt this much.”

Still pressing a white-knuckled grip on a spot right by the boy’s clavicles, through the beating white noises in his ears, Chuuya heard himself snap: “Don’t be fucking dense.”

It was a set out of some bad horror movie; the smell of blood was so thick Chuuya couldn't quite inhale without retching. The fall into the well had lasted eons and seconds; they had both scratched themselves on the landing, staining the circular floor ever deeper. Rat corpses decayed away near the perimeter, framed by trash and pennies — Chuuya'd heard something hard shatter under his weight, but he had refused to check.

Curled up like a corpse, under the layer of Chuuya's own blood and badly sucked-in wounds, Dazai had been slowly bleeding out for the past two hours.

"What," Dazai croaked. Clarity spread like a veil over his one good eye, dissipating the petty bliss that had been relaxing his traits; a bit more frantic, he attempted to look around. "What —"

"Stay still," Chuuya ordered. His hands had gone numb with pressing on that singular wound on his chest — the other was clenched around his own side, steadfastly growing surer to be holding his insides still. Every word out of his mouth had his vision turn blurrier. "The Gentleman's Bar is gone. You stopped me. We're stuck here. Nothing to do."

A pause. "I don't — remember that."

Death looked strange on Dazai. He would hate to know that, he thought, a bit delirious — but there was no denying. Chuuya had crumpled up his coat in a makeshift blanket, given his shivers — it barely hid the ripped crimson stains of his ever pristine shirt; the way his tie had gotten stuck on the edge of a linear wound by his waist.

His face was paler than moonlight; his hair, still too long, stuck to the sweaty bandages soaked in blood he hadn't had the heart to remove. He didn't hit his eye, Chuuya reminded himself. But was he trying to?

He wasn't sure he wanted the answer.

"I'm not sure how either," he offered. "I opened my eyes on the floor. You were passed out —" Hand on my cheek, "Touching me. You —" He wiped a drop that was too red to be sweat and too clear to be blood from a strangely soft spot under his eye; pretended not to hear his maybe-broken leg scream when the boy pushed into the touch, bumping his cheek against his knee. "I dragged you out. We couldn't stay. They either called for backup, or the Special Division heard and came by — I didn't see well. You were — badly wounded."

His blink was slow. "By what?"

Chuuya pressed until his arm ached. "Me."

He had known it the moment his eyes had managed to focus on him — Chuuya recognized the brand of destruction Arahabaki liked the most; knew what his fangs and claws looked like, both on concrete and flesh. He had had to extract glass pieces from his body one by one — all of them as precise as a bullet.

Dazai breathed out again — a wheeze.

“That’s so embarrassing,” he whined. The only real sign of delirium were the spasms of his hands; the unrelenting tremors of his body. “I can’t let anyone know. I’m supposed to have you house-trained, or Mori won’t let me keep you.”

He didn’t answer.

“Well, then,” he sighed, again. “This will be a pain to stitch up. I’m awake now; get us out.”

Chuuya gritted his teeth. “I can’t.”

His eyebrow curled. A bruise was forming right under it; the blood from his self-stab pooled on it like webs on a window. “Actually, how are you awake?”

He shrugged. He didn’t know either.

The boy’s eyebrow curled ever further — a bit less sarcastic. “You’re wounded too.”

“No shit, genius,” Chuuya spat out. It had been easier not to think about it before; now the idea pressed valiantly against his skull, reminding him that he had never felt colder, and that this was the part where he passed out, usually — that he had his viscera in his hands and the remnants of a starved, desperate thing curling into black lines all the way to the tips of his fingers, begging. That he hadn’t found his gloves. “It’s the usual. I can deal with it. I’ve had worse.”

“Chuuya.”

“Worry about yourself.”

“I’m trying,” Dazai replied, blanker than a canva.

“The great Dazai Osamu,” he spat, with venom that fit nowhere in that tight space, and that it crowded against his teeth like a flood. “Dying because of a pathetic Ability that — turns out — can touch him. Who would have thought.”

A breath passed. There was no spit to tie the boy’s lips together — only dried blood and ripped skin, that seemed to sing along to a velcro-like sound when Dazai parted them.

“If you’re about to ask me not to tell anyone,” Chuuya cut him off, staring straight into the wall — fingers so tight around his side he could only feel up to his elbow — “You can shove it.”

Dazai stared right ahead as well — right into the half circle of the moon. Gentler than a butterfly on cracked glass, his heartbeat seemed to slow under Chuuya’s palm — to wonder.

“We can’t do anything if we’re stuck here,” he insisted, eventually. “If you really wanna play the hero, suck it up and fly out of here to throw me a rope.”

The air under there was exactly the same as it would have been outside, Chuuya knew it — it still seemed harder to inhale. “You can’t climb.”

“I’m not a crybaby,” he let him know, easy. There was no unlike you, surprisingly — his shoulders stiffened all the same. “My ideal suicide doesn’t involve wells or you. Stop trying to bait me into —“

“I can’t.”

“Would you listen to —“

“It hit your artery,” Chuuya snapped. The boy’s jaw made no sound as it shut. “My hand is the only thing keeping it from bleeding out. I can’t fucking let go.” He gulped years old drool in — refused to even blink, as he stared at some indefinite point in front of him. He hadn’t taken his eyes away from it in two hours. “I can’t let go,” he concluded.

Dazai said nothing.

Distant sounds pooled down the walls of the well, filtering from the emptiness outside. The Gentleman’s Bar had stood proud and infinite at the outskirts of the city, surrounded by nothing but old fields and farms; the occasional car passing by made him stiffen. Chuuya had had no time to cover their traces — he’d barely had time not to let the two of them bleed out.

“Well,” Dazai resolved, at last, between one crumpled up breath and the other. “Let’s just give up and die.”

His side hurt with the effort it took to grit his teeth. “Fuck that,” he growled.

“What’s your plan, then?” the boy insisted. The curve of his mouth was shaky and dried, torn at the seams; mocking. “Call Hirotsu? Kouyou? Any of your latest goons? Don’t make me —“ His next exhale came out with a shrill, barely-there whimper; Chuuya pressed harder on his wound, pretending the rush in his ears wasn’t there. The time for rage could never be unplanned. “Given your canine tendencies, I doubt you’re unfamiliar with orders. Nobody will help.”

Chuuya squeezed his side, wincing against the bolt of pain — waking himself up again. “It’s not like Boss would let us die.”

A sprinkle of humorless hilarity twinkled in his eye. “Have you ever gotten the feeling Mori has any particular desire to own people who can die?”

Nobody needs those, he thought. The Sheep hadn’t. The Flags hadn’t been supposed to ever — “You’re a piece of shit.”

“And your naivety is disgusting.”

“Naivety?” He barked out a laugh. “You’re fucking suicidal. You don’t get to call me naive for being willing to believe death isn’t the point here.”

“Then get out of here,” Dazai taunted. He could hear his blood circle under his palm; he could hear every breath swimming in his lungs. He knew Arahabaki had, too — he knew he hadn’t cared. “Or it’s nothing but pretty words.”

His heart beat in his ears. Summer was sticky and always there; the chattering of his teeth mocked his very being. If he didn't focus on his intermittent blinking, he knew, he would pass out on a corpse. "That sounds like the type of shit someone suicidal would say."

Something like curiosity gathered under his blood-sticky eyelashes. "What do you even care?" he asked, as genuine as the few stars in the sky.

I don't, his lips shaped up. Corruption was a blink; stolen minute after stolen minute, waking him up in a pool of his own blood and the mirror of his own destruction inside a singular eye. Dazai had been there each time. He was the least bloodied thing Chuuya associated to his fading heartbeat — the one, still frame in the kaleidoscopic storm of white noises and caged screams his eyes opened to each time. The one, still thing Arahabaki wasn't meant to touch.

Perhaps, his lips didn't dare mouth, perhaps I can't forget the weight of corpses. Perhaps he had too many debts. Perhaps Arahabaki would always be able to touch.

Moving as imperceptibly as the house of cards allowed, he curled his legs closer, and laid Dazai's head on his pounding thigh.

Some bird passed by the circle of sky. The huff out of Dazai's mouth wasn't mean. "You didn't take off my bandages," he noted.

Chuuya glared. "Don't be stupid."

Don't say anything else, he begged. He had not seen what face he had made before stabbing his own eye — the clever glint of a plan, or the vacant depth of improvisation. There existed possibilities that were too delicate to survive between Chuuya's decaying hands; things that made no sense and too much and that shouldn't have.

Nonetheless, Kouyou had said, undeterred, you will thank him.

"Hey," he asked. They were curled around each other like a death grip; Chuuya didn't dare try to straighten his spine. Their puffs of breath were the only warm things. They were not the same, but they were selfish like puzzle pieces. "What was your favorite thing in Rimbaud's house?"

There was something — something relevant, that he could not quite recall amidst the shivers. Something about the way a prodigy said some prodigious hymns; something about the quicksand way the word favorite tumbled down his chapped lips, chased and unwanted. He'd sat with him and watched him order fifteen different types of ramen, eating one spoon off of each. He had killed ten men in ten different ways. He had never said a single word, and Chuuya had watched his face and felt like throwing up — like shaking him awake.

The grip of his palm had to be too hard; he was struggling to speak. He was unable to quieten hurried efficiency; he forced himself to be kinder. "He had a whole shelf full of poetry books."

"Why do you like it, anyway?"

Chuuya shrugged — breath catching when it rattled his ribs. “Sometimes it’s amusingly shitty. I admire the audacity it took to publish it.”

He peeked up at him. He really needed to cut his hair. “You don’t seem much like a poet.”

“I would say you don’t look like an asshole either, but I’d be lying.”

“It just feels insincere,” Dazai insisted. The absolute lack of tone in his voice was chilling; he wondered if it helped forget the pain. If he feels any, the mafiosi liked to whisper. Chuuya never knew — only suspected. “No one’s immediate thoughts are that refined. How can it claim to be honest, when it’s shimmering intrusive thoughts at best?”

“No one likes spontaneity. It’s called having a filter, which I assume you don’t know.”

Something bubbled between his lips; Chuuya pressed harder, stubbornly pretending it wasn’t blood. His phone had fallen somewhere outside the well. No one would answer. Someone would come. Like his own delirium, Dazai insisted: “Exaggerated refining is bound to transform. What’s the point of an idea, if you sculpt it until it doesn’t even resemble itself?”

He shook his head, exasperated. “Then it means whatever it was at the beginning wasn’t worth existing. Tough shit.”

It was quiet. It reminded his bones of their own fragile state too soon. “Hey,” Chuuya added, “Were you lying?”

“What?”

“About the nanny thing.”

Consideration blinked at him. There was a constant drumming on the left side of his head; the usual spasms of his fingers weren’t helping with their current job. He set his eyes on a mole right by Dazai’s ear. “She wasn’t exactly a nanny.”

He perked up. “You were just looking for a fancy word for babysitter?”

“She wasn’t paid to stay with me,” Dazai’s voice was carefully devoid. If he hadn’t seen his mouth move, he might have thought the sound to be born out of the rush of the heated wind from outside the well. “She just wanted to.”

“What happened to her?”

Like Judgement Day, he replied: “Why did the Sheep give you a funeral when you were eight?”

Chuuya wanted to be surprised. “Is this a slumber party?”

The boy fixed his weight on him. He turned his cheek on his lap, hiding his one eye from view entirely. His bandages were so red it was hard to believe they had ever been clean. Chuuya was angry, and there was nothing to be angry about.

“The first time I used my Ability on a wider scale,” he said, eventually. He looked everywhere but at his soaked hands — the mold on the walls; the widening stain of blood Dazai’s head was leaving on his thigh; the one hair clip to have survived their trip. “I killed one of the kids.”

Dazai didn’t move. Behind it, eye or not eye, was the face he always wore when the Sheep passed by their conversations — a mixture of contempt and superiority, stained by a flicker too intense not to be childish. The joy of stolen toys; the tantrum of jealousy.

“It was an execution, actually,” he added. He thought the rocks were dancing along to a fire that wasn’t there — thought he could see the dirty fabric of Yuan’s favorite jacket. “But they worked the same. They would light up a fire at the bottom of the crater and throw the person. Of course, they feared my Ability might activate and get me away, so they — dragged me to the fire instead.”

Shamefully — or something more numb than that; something too distant — he couldn’t even recall the kid’s face. He hadn’t done anything particularly remarkable. He had just been sitting too close. All Chuuya remembered was the heat, closer and closer — the way he had felt as if he should have cried.

“The Council had a last minute meeting, though,” Chuuya shrugged. “They told me that if I trained, I could stick around. But I wouldn’t get a second chance.”

Car honks rained in, occasionally — taunting their hiding place. It happened three times before Dazai said: “I find it hard to believe even-smaller-Chuuya would have simply accepted execution with his head low.”

He made a face. “They had saved my life, like, two days before. I tried to escape, but —“

“Stupid.”

“Fuck you.”

“Trust is the stupidest thing to offer.”

“I was eight. ”

“I was nine when my nanny died.”

“What, did you kill her?”

Bruised knuckles tightened on his side, half hidden under his motionless chest — few things managed to make him react that vividly. Dazai didn’t answer. He hadn’t expected him to — he had offered that truth just to watch him tear it into pieces. Balance was something he understood. He just wasn’t willing to make it fair.

Chuuya tightened his lips.

Wind drooled in, raising goosebumps all over the skin his ripped clothes couldn’t hide. He bent himself further over Dazai; when his thumb moved a inch, his wound made a wobbly sound — a wet, gurgling moan — and the boy froze.

“That’ll scar,” Dazai commented. His eye was still hidden; he was still breathing. “Mori might just give me a golden star for it.”

This isn’t fair, Chuuya let himself think — only for five seconds. They didn’t even know if their stitches were done correctly. They hadn’t meant to cause troubles, Nine Rings and Beatrice and Souls — they had just wanted to be listened to. This isn’t fair and we brought it on ourselves.

“I’m gonna heal, eventually,” Chuuya managed to say, voice a thread. He couldn’t feel the skin around his own wound. “I’ll — figure it out.”

A huff. “I’m the plan guy.”

He huffed louder. “Was this planned?”

“Yes.”

He stilled. “What?”

Dazai didn’t answer.

“Bastard,” He nudged him as much as he dared to, given his trembling knuckles. “Hey. What do you mean? You’re kidding, right?”

It took him centuries to speak again; when he did, his voice was muffled by Chuuya’s body. “The next step is Takasekai,” he offered. “I needed access to the office of the Gentleman’s Bar’s owner. After you entered Corruption, and that woman saw I had kept myself from fully seeing the smoke, she ruled me out as useless and locked me in there as she ran from you. You must have found me there — she probably assumed you wouldn’t leave any survivors.”

Chuuya’s head was spinning. “You did all of this for some papers?”

“A pendrive, actually,” Dazai corrected him. After a pause — “I swallowed it, I think.”

“You think.”

He tilted his head back — just enough to lay a too peaceful, too careless eye on him. There wasn’t mockery in it; there wasn’t even blame. It curled around his blood vessels like raining alcohol on a ground set on fire. “I knew you’d find me.”

I did, Chuuya didn’t confirm. He feared he might scream if he opened his mouth; feared he might finally give his ribs the push they needed to drill his lungs. I did, and I almost killed you.

When his lips parted, the only thing that came out was laughter.

It was a horrible idea — the jolting strikes of pain running down his spine painted the world blinding white and starved scarlet, rattling him from head to toe in a way neither of their wounds could afford. He couldn't stop, though — couldn't hear anything but the heart beating under his palms, darker than ink, and the certainty that it still wasn't enough, that the thing in his veins was hungry and would be —

“Over here!”

Flapping his arm up with a groan of pain, Dazai slammed his hand on Chuuya's mouth.

Hurried steps surrounded the ground near the well — heavy and metallic and unmistakable. Their rifles and hidden guns made no sound; the smell of their suits widened Chuuya's eyes.

“It's just a phone, sir,” a woman reported. She muttered something into an electronic radio — the exact kind, he knew, that the Yokohama PD used. “This is a famous spot for open night parties. Some kid must have dropped it.”

“Maybe,” a man replied. He didn't speak like a police officer — too attentive in his syllables. The hard line of Dazai's shoulders said enough. Still, he tapped one of the fingers on his mouth — Division. ““You guys ever had a specific brand of troubles around here?”

“The bar was well controlled,” the woman replied. “But everybody knew there was a shady business behind it. I'm not surprised it ended up like this,” A pause. “I'm not sure why the Division is getting involved, though.”

The man paused. “We have our reasons.”

“Let go of me,” Dazai whispered.

It took him a minute to hear it — Chuuya had clenched his eyes shut in an effort to focus on the faraway sound of the voices, dimming the fire lines of ache pulsing through his muscles. “No.”

“They're gonna look,” the boy hissed, as he attempted to remove himself from his grasp. Chuuya didn't let go — tore his hand away from his own side with a gasp, and slammed both hands on the wound on Dazai's chest. “Listen to me. If they start shooting, you can stop them.”

“They want me alive,” he said, undeterred, the edges of his eyes burning with effort, his jaw aching, “The fuckers won't shoot.”

“Chuuya, don't be childish —“

“Fuck you.”

“— any nearby hiding places?” the Division agent was wandering. “We have suspicions on the identity of the culprit — if it is who we believe, he couldn't have left so easily. He would have needed time to... recover.”

A sharp lighting streak exploded on some indistinct point of his arm; Chuuya only managed to connect the shape of that pain with teeth when he looked down, where Dazai had resolved to the last solution possible to get him off of himself.

“Fuck you,” Chuuya hissed, as low as his heaving chest could manage, digging the heel of his palm deeper into the wound — unsure of who was trying to hurt who more, unsure of why he could see Albatross’ blood-stained braid in the corner — could hear those words that words were not, because Arahabaki wasn’t anything Chuuya wasn’t — and there was nothing Chuuya hadn’t let claw marks on, nothing he — “Fuck you, fuck you, I’m not fucking letting go, you absolute piece of —“

“Sir!” A voice called. “Over here!”

The franticness had a petty, desperate note to it — kicking limbs wasting blood with each hit; mouth suffocating gasps on the skin of their own cheeks. It took Chuuya more than a moment to figure out he recognized that one voice; it took Dazai a mere second to widen his eye, lips shaping around the word: no.

Before either of them could breathe, Officer Matsuda’s head peeked from the edge of the well, setting horrified eyes on their bloodied bundle.

---

...

---

Existence restarted with his nails digging in the creases of Matsuda’s uniform, feet slipping on the blood he had left on the concrete.

“No Hospital,” he managed to gape — and it surprised him, given how tightly his teeth were clenched, fighting against the swarm of flies inside his skull. “No — No Hospital, listen to me, we can’t —“

For some reason, Matsuda was shaking from head to foot. Chuuya couldn’t quite get a look at his face, through the blurriness of his own eyes — but the hands he put around his arms to hold him up were harder than ice.

“We can talk about it later,” he promised. A distant shrill reached Chuuya’s ears — sirens. He turned around frantically, searching for a familiar bundle of black the only two officers the man had allowed to remain had dragged off his hands — he had a vague memory of punching them; a vaguer memory of tearing his nails apart in an effort to keep his hands on Dazai’s chest. “You need help.”

“I’m fine,” Chuuya replied, sluggish.

“You’re not,”

“It’s fine,” he insisted. “We were just — I’m,” He needed to go back to Dazai. Nobody else would help. Dazai wouldn’t, but nobody would help him, either, so it was better to sit and wait together, at the very least — debate on the taste of miso soup, and figure out a way to stitch him up, because that was what Dazai did to him, and Chuuya didn’t have enough hands to worry about more debts or graves. Boss would kill him if he lost sight of — “Are you listening to me? No hospitals. The Mackerel is — No —“

Something sharp dug a hole in his nape.

---

...

---

When he woke up, he was in the Hospital.

The circular beep! of the heart monitor was a scalpel in the middle of his forehead — it blinded him more vividly than even the snow white ceiling of the room. Casts and bandages and stitches; his left arm was numb — all the pressure pooling on the hole of the morphine IV, forcing calmness up his throat.

The plastic seat next to the bed creaked, only a bit — Chuuya knew, all the same.

His jaw was aching too insistently for him to clench it. His voice came out in a too-weak snap: “I told you not to bring us to the Hospital.”

The seat creaked a bit more. “And what,” Matsuda said, utterly toneless. “Leave you to bleed out in the grass instead?”

Oh, Chuuya thought, wincing — and then wincing again, when his entire back seemed to screech along to the motion. He’s pissed.

“This wasn’t your business,” he said.

“You’re my business, Chuuya —“

He barked out a laugh — did nothing more than stare him down when the man snapped his head to him, as the sound turned into a coughing fit. Chuuya sat up. “I’m really fucking not.”

“You’re a sixteen years old who’s getting torn apart weekly, according to the doctors,” the man replied, infervorated. He had eyebags wider than the baldness on his head; the click pen in his pocket was the same as his blurred memories from the well recalled — it had either not been a day, or the man hadn't been out of the Hospital. Chuuya knew he put a new one in his pocket everyday. "I'm gonna fucking make it my business, kid."

Shit, Chuuya thought. And then, just right behind that, Boss will skin us alive.

"The doctors are wrong," he concluded, as he tore the IV out of his arm. He needed to thread this carefully — needed to be more serious than he would have been with Murase, because only one of them had enjoyed sarcasm from the bottom of the barrel. "We had an — unpredicted accident. It was bad. We needed to hide somewhere. That's all. Extenuating circumstances, not habit. Thank you for getting us out of there."

Matsuda stared at him.

Chuuya held his gaze until he had nothing to lose. Then, quietly, he began climbing out of bed.

Routine was the same no matter the room — he stuck an invisible layer of Tainted to his feet, making sure he wouldn't stumble; looked around for his destroyed clothes, thanking the forethought not to bring Pianoman's coat; thought about nothing but the convincing words he would type into the reports.

Trying to figure out what, exactly, the doctors had done was pointless — he felt both more kept together and torn apart than he had in a while; littered in eerily uncomfortable stitches that didn't bear the familiar touch of Dazai's hands? and pumped with heavy morphine that didn't taste like the alcohol they had stored in their safehouses.

Abruptly — too petrified to check if his arms were onyx; teeth clenched too tight to recall just how many scars it was better if normal doctors didn't know and shouldn't know and could they? — he realized the pressure on his chest was some sort of panic.

Fuck that, he considered, coldly.

The seat only creaked again while he was in the process of buckling his choker on.

A hint of helplessness crawled in, turning the Officer's voice too quiet: "Chuuya."

"You don't know anything," Chuuya said, a tad too quick. He dragged his eyes down the low curve of his shoulders; the crinkles of his uniform. Had he slept there?, he wondered, and then, why would he? And then, would they tell him if they figured it out?, and, is there anything to figure out? "I know what this looks like. I know what you're used to seeing. You've got it all wrong. I'm —" He cursed. "I'm learning to deal with a situation. This is the only way."

"And this situation requires you not to be taken to the Hospital?" Matsuda echoed, disbelief in every syllable. "You were nearly delirious. Your friend lost so much blood the paramedics had to operate him on the ambulance —"

His skull cracked.

Chuuya was nose to nose with him quicker than he could realize. “Dazai,” he said. His fingers had been trembling since he had woken up — for a single, blessed moment, they couldn’t recall why they felt the need to press. “Dazai, where is —“

“I just checked him out,” a new voice said, sweeter than a breeze. “Forgive the priority. I heard he was troubling the nurses with his usual proposals.”

Chuuya deflated in one breath, eyes filling themselves up to the brim with Kouyou Ozaki’s marble smile and petal-tinged kimono.

“Ane-san,” he breathed out, hurrying to her side. “Is the bastard okay?”

“Awake and whining,” she promised — her eyes watched him get closer with bone deep focus. “Lamenting the lost opportunity to gain ultimate freedom — his words. I assume he’s never felt better.”

Her fingers were pillow-soft ice around his cheeks; she held his head still as she studied every inch of his face, thumbs sweeping absently at the torn seams of his mouth. Chuuya couldn’t read a thing in the sunrise-shade of her irises — she was the calligraphy strokes on the walls of her villa, beautiful and immortalized. Unneeding motif.

Slowly, she curved her lips.

“There you are,” she said. Calling it relief would have been naive; satisfaction, perhaps. The sigh of a jewel recovered through in the waves. “We should go home.”

“Yes,” Chuuya nodded — didn’t stop, and couldn’t quite stop, and couldn’t stop thinking about the moment the officers had managed to tear his nails out of Dazai’s chest. “Yes, this shitshow has been — Yes. I’m sorry.”

“Nothing to be sorry for. All that matters is that you boys are alright,” Kouyou let her fingers fall. Then, her smile just as pleasant as an inhale: “A good number of things to be grateful for.”

He hesitated; straightened.

Behind them, Matsuda cleared his throat.

Finally, deadly purposeful, the woman let her gaze graze him too. Her smile didn’t change a bit — though one would have had to be blind to ignore the distinct unfriendliness framing it.

“How nice,” Kouyou started. There was no order; Chuuya knew to move himself behind her, all the same. Unhesitantly, she offered her hand. “You must be that officer my Chuuya has told me much about,” She said officer the way one might have called out a fallen tree branch, blocking the one way in. “Kouyou Ozaki. I apologize for any trouble this situation might have caused you and your colleagues. I will handle it, from now on.”

Matsuda wasn’t stupid. His bow was only enraged at the seams, when he offered it — he kissed her pale hand with a venom only years of watching him stare down at his red-thread maps let Chuuya recognize. “With all due respect, Miss — it was no trouble. Someone needed to get the boys out of that situation.”

Since you didn't, he didn't add — Chuuya heard it so loud he barely resisted glaring.

“Rather,” the woman offered, untouched. “How comforting to know our city can count on people like you.”

“Rather,” he echoed, eyes unmoving.

“If I may, though,” she continued, one hand on Chuuya's shoulder, “Perhaps you should spend less funds on your criminal chase and more on throughout checks around your territory. One wonders how two boys managed to get trapped inside that old, abandoned well. Aren't there some regulations on these dangerous infrastructures?”

“There are, Miss,” Matsuda assured. With painstaking intention, his gaze moved to Chuuya. “There are quite a bit on child safety as well.”

Kouyou's smile widened. “How nice.”

The same helplessness as before wrinkled the man's eyes — Chuuya tried not to think of a man bleeding out on the concrete; wasting his last years on the irredeemable. “Chuuya,” he called, again, as a last resort.

He held his gaze. “Thank you for the help,” he offered. Be grateful, she had said. “I'll see you.”

The Executive didn't bow; didn't do much more than nod in the man's direction, and smile like a cat escaping over a too high wall. Chuuya felt the weight of her hand all the way to the car.

The parking lot was overpopulated — rows over rows of cars burning under the midday sun, surrounded by relatives and discharged patients in various states of damage. Kouyou did nothing but hum as she led him to the widest of the black vans, parked right by the entrance. The Hospital wasn't theirs, obviously — it was clear nor her nor the driver had any particular desire to spend more time there than necessary.

A self-sufficient microsystem, Doc had once described the Port Mafia as. Why leave?

It was hot enough to pant. Chuuya waited for the ache in his legs to fall to the background to offer: “I know what you're going to say.”

“Whatever you may mean,” Kouyou's head was tall and untouched. “I have nothing to say. I'm sure Boss will take care of it for me.”

He took the hit in silence.

They reached the car, at last — a faceless driver bowed his head the moment they entered his vision. He opened the car door to let Kouyou in the passenger seat; then, he moved to get the back one for him. Fists clenched, Chuuya insisted: “Listen, I really tried to tell him to keep us out of the Hospital.”

The door opened.

“She knows,” Dazai let him know, huffing, from the further seat. The sight of him seemed to whip his skeleton straight; like fading ripples in the water, Chuuya recalled the sound of glass piercing his body. Not yours to remember. “Haven’t you heard? This sanctimonious syndicate is officially a no-mistake land. We should all kowtow under the blinding light of our Kouyou’s peerless inability to perform any result other than impeccable success.”

Offering them a blank gaze from the rear view mirror, the Executive merely hummed.

“Quite,” she agreed.

The van grumbled to life right as Chuuya slammed his door shut.

The silence choked him. No position was comfortable on his bandaged wounds — he ended up with his knees against the front seat, chin so low the edge of the belt risked slashing his throat. Arms crossed, he dared a glance to the side. Curled up on his own seat — newly coated back to the car door, and the uncomfortable redness of sunburn and ignored fever on his cheeks — Dazai was already staring back.

He curled an eyebrow.

What?, the boy mouthed. Then, numbly tapping his fingers on the middle seat between them. I was trying to get to your room to escape. She came earlier than I predicted.

Didn’t you say sleeping drugs don’t work on you?

Didn’t you say you could handle shorter recovery times? Dazai poked his tongue out.

Unsurprisingly, he didn’t particularly look like someone who had been almost skewered by a boy with an overpowered Singularity in his bones — hard to, when Dazai hardly ever didn’t look on the brink of death. The bandages around his head were clean, now; the ones around his arms had been wrapped in that one specific formation Chuuya recognized as his own handywork. He wondered how he had bribed the nurses to let him do it.

The entire lower side of his face was covered in bruises; his shirt and tie were too well done to catch a glimpse of the artery Chuuya had held in his hands. A new stitched scar matted his forehead — it disappeared under his bandages.

Chuuya felt his fingers spasm.

Wordlessly, he reached forward — poking a crease that wasn’t there, between his eyebrows.

Just as wordless, Dazai stretched one of his legs forward, settling his ankle where the closest of Chuuya’s knees bent against the passenger seat — brushing a spot of naked skin, the pants ripped from Corruption. It was a spot too small to warrant anything but an added warmth to the suffocating air of June. He recalled, a bit distantly, the rhythm his heart had drummed under his white knuckles.

Holding each other's gazes, they each came to their conclusions.

They set their eyes elsewhere.

It seemed stupid to ask, but once the Ferris Wheel came into view, he still dared: "So, how did you find us?"

Eyes still on them in the rear view mirror, Kouyou didn't answer until she was done murmuring indistinguishable orders into her cellphone. Chuuya felt the curve of his own in his pocket — he fished it out, studying the luckily few charms ripped off by the fight. The screen had been cracked even further; he patted it, sighing.

"We do have eyes everywhere, little god," the Executive said, at last, pleasant enough. "Even more now that you boys' little competition is in place. Everybody is interested enough — or betting enough — to offer their eyes to the cause. Not all of them belong to our Demon Prodigy."

"No," Dazai agreed, distractedly. Chuuya didn't know where he had grabbed the console from — he could only assume he had stashed one in every Mafia vehicle. "Only the best ones."

A spark of irritation curled her eyebrows. "You are aware, then."

"Obviously. Chibi, wait for you turn —"

Undeterred, Kouyou insisted: "You may want to be more careful with them, then?"

Dazai's gasp was obnoxious. "Ane-san, were you worried about me?" Despite the clear mocking, nothing in his gaze seemed particularly friendly. His hands still tried to rip the stolen console off Chuuya's hand — he didn't let go of Kouyou's scrutiny, though. "You mustn't. Odasaku might get jealous if somebody else cared about my Hospital stays."

"You two aren't supposed to have Hospital stays," Kouyou reminded him.

"It was out of our control," Chuuya broke in, eyes on the loading screen of the console. "We've been dealing with training the entire month — we've been taking care of it ourselves. Matsuda was —" He set his jaw. "He was unplanned. But he won't talk. The old man had a soft spot for idiots. He was worried; that's all."

She didn't seem convinced. "No police officers should be that deep in our affairs," she said, more to herself than to them. "What were you two even doing in the Shadow Blades' territory? Mori ordered you two to wait until September to begin planning interventions against the Five Moons."

Neither of them answered.

Her pause was heavy. "Boys."

“We will discuss this with Mori,” Dazai cut in, clearly dreading his own words. “We respond to him before we do to you, Executive. You can take care of whatever calligraphy lessons he’ll order you to force on us.”

Chuuya groaned. Wisely enough, Kouyou didn’t add another word — perhaps she wouldn’t dare question Boss’ authority in front of his petty, unofficial right hand man; perhaps she wasn’t sure about the optimal procedure either. Dazai kept his attention on the console; he whined and whined and lamented his lost opportunity at a suicide, and the refusals to a double suicide the nurses had spat to his face.

The very picture of carelessness; he didn’t drop the act once — not even when the stone stairs of the Headquarters appeared in front of them.

Energy gathered under Chuuya’s nails. He waited and waited and waited — came up with words and scrapped them, and stared at the new scars climbing up his naked hands. He was too lazy to memorize them all; he felt like doing it was too important to miss. He wanted his gloves.

“Dazai,” Madame Tanaki called, eventually, from her spotless desk. A nervous twinkle stained her eyes; she smiled, nonetheless. “Boss wants to talk to you.”

Chuuya frowned. Immediately, the boy dragged himself up the couches at the entrance, sighing deep and long — walking bored strided to the elevator, like he couldn’t be bothered.

“Dull old man,” he grunted, waving his hand in that dramatic way that allowed him to hide a sickly cough behind it. “Why doesn’t he go bother Elise and her new dresses, instead?”

“Hush, now,” the woman replied, patting his head as he passed. “Don’t be mean.”

“Tanaki,” Chuuya called. “Not me?”

Her blink was confused. “No,” she offered — checking the paper in her hands. “No, dear; he said to compliment you on your hard work. He only wants to talk to Dazai.”

He stared. Every new bruise in his body seemed to pulse along to his uncertainty — pointing to all the reasons why Mori should have wanted to watch him kneel. “But —“

The glass doors of the elevator opened with a ding!, dragging Dazai’s exasperated twirls inside. Coy, the boy offered him a wave, only minimally stumbling on weak feet. “Go, go home!” he called, as the doors closed. “Not all of us are important enough for face-to-face reports. What’s that lovely French expression? C’est la vie.”

Chuuya spluttered. “You — !“

The doors closed in his face. Behind them, only for a blink — he could have sworn he had seen Dazai’s hands reach for his pockets, where he stored the last of his headache pills.

Hirotsu and Kajii found him under Tanaki's desk, throwing leftover food to the Spider Eyes episode playing on her laptop. "Here," the younger man said — hopping on the counter to teasingly dangle the hems of his scarf over the secretary's face. "Look at what the revolutionary cat brought to the door."

The flier was muddy and crumpled up, like a quickly hidden dare that might have said more than it meant to in the wrong hands. The style was unmistakable — the mockingly elegant strikes of most graffiti in the underground of Yokohama.

"Is that the bastard?" Chuuya questioned, squinting at the doodled figure in a tie. Dot-filled lines probably represented his bandages — he was hanging from a rope made of severed forearms, the hands sharpened into bloodied nails. Circling the figure like a spiral, the words, LET HIM KILL HIMSELF BEFORE HE KILLS US TOO, were scribbled again and again.

"Dear," Tanaki scoffed, with distaste, as she leaned over his shoulder to study the flier. "These buffoons truly have nothing better to do."

"Perhaps you should teach them a lesson," Kajii encouraged, batting his eyelashes behind the goggles. "I yearn to see you fight."

"I'm subtler than that, sweetheart," she replied. "There's a reason I have access to all of your addresses."

The scientist pretended to swoon.

He traced the *X*s drawn where the Dazai's eyes should have been, feeling his eyebrows twitch. It wasn't the cruelest joke at Dazai's expense he had heard since joining — but it gave him a sort of limp discontentment. Possibly, he told himself, a bit uncomfortable, rage at not having come up with it first.

"Well," he concluded, crumpling it up, "At least they know who the better option is."

"You do have unbridled support from the lower ranks," Hirotsu confirmed, blankly, around a mouthful of cigarette. He had dragged him out for drinks, two nights before — had sat through Chuuya's mistrust with relaxed shoulders. "Everyone who's ever fought with you is ready to show their appreciation. The higher ranks are with Dazai, though."

"They want Boss' favor," Kajii huffed. Chuuya dragged one gloved finger down the top of his new shoes, tasting the leather — thought of Dazai disappearing in the elevator. "It's clear they think this is how they'll get it."

“Boss doesn’t play favorites,” Tanaki said, with a nasty glance in the man’s direction. Kajii lowered his eyes immediately, chastised. “If he’s offered both Dazai and Chuuya the possibility to get to the seat, it means they both have the same chances,” A pause. “And the same critics.”

Chuuya frowned. “What do you mean?”

She bit her lower lip, exchanging a glance of sorts with Hirotsu. When she reached into one of the drawers of the desk, the cell phone she handed him was the same gentle pink as her nails.

“They’re already cleaning them off,” the woman informed him, zooming on the picture she was showing him — a shot of the stone walls of Building Five. “Ryuro here tells me somebody put them on Building Three too, though.”

The graffiti lacked the rough mastery that only starving hands knew how to channel — they were a bit too straight, and too simplistic. Still, they were unmistakable — black and red kanjis that spoke of annihilation and betrayal; sheep horns and the word Rengoku and Flags and the question how many more of us will he kill?

Chuuya studied the swirling lines and felt nothing at all.

“It’s not even an election, anyway,” he said, eventually. He could feel all three pairs of eyes on him, as cautious as feet on webbed glass — he knew, somewhere deep, that anger was not the right reaction for the circumstance. “They can talk shit as much as they want. The Sheep don’t even exist anymore —” He gave the cell phone back right as the secretary one started ringing, startling Tanaki badly enough to make her jump. “If they want to believe the bastard wouldn’t just use the seat to sleep in it, they can. I’m still winning this.”

The Commander’s eyes studied him, over one layer of smoke. He was a strangely receptive man — he saw new scars like they might bleed out in front of him.

Over the buzz of Tanaki’s customer voice, Chuuya met his gaze over the monocle, and curled an eyebrow, challenging.

The man huffed.

“Hey, man, that’s the spirit — hey,” Kajii tapped his hat, crouching down in front of him. “I want privileges when you get there, alright? They’ll pay you, like, a disgusting ton of money, right? Get the two of us to Brazil for a week and I’ll forgive you for destroying my Lemon Pistol Prototype. ”

“It exploded in my hands,” he reminded him, fixing his hat in place. Tanaki, still smiling at no one on the phone, directed him as shh! face. “It almost tore my face off, too. You don’t get any recompense for attempted murder.”

Another overheated laugh. “Isn’t that our whole job?”

Another hiss escaped Tanaki's lips. Kajii blushed. "Yes. Sorry. I'm used to French people, you know? How rare it was to find a distinguished Frenchman speaking Japanese. Although, I do have this story about —"

"If we're talking gifts," Astonishingly, Hirotsu spoke up, "I would very much enjoy a trip to Italy."

"Italy?" Chuuya blinked at him.

"Miranda surely misses her home, by now."

"What did I do to you?" he asked, before he could think about it twice.

A beat of silence. Merciless, an invisible web of cracks appeared on the man's monocle, divinely inspired by the bone chilling glance he directed his way. "Chuuya."

"As if you didn't deserve it," he grunted.

"Should we start from the most recent ones?" The sun had certainly loosened his tongue; usually, the commander preferred to hide any and all frustration he felt regarding the two of them. Scared of them, he thought. Mindful of how easily they dealt with people they didn't like. Aware that there was trust, there, somewhere — he just had to grab it by the throat. "Surely you won't ask me to assume Dazai managed to tape all those unflattering pictures of me on the ceiling of my office by himself?"

Chuuya's mouth opened, then closed.

"I heard about that!" Kajii snorted, crossing his arms over Chuuya's knees. "I know this dude from your squad, right, because I'm full of friends — and he was telling me you sleep in a purple Englishman gown? But the beret, old man —"

Wordlessly, Hirotsu looked at him.

"— Is extremely tasteful," he concluded. Fanning himself with one hand, he was quick to mumble: "Why, it sure is hot today. Melting the skin off my bones and all! Making me say stuff I obviously don't mean —"

"Not to mention the hyper-solid glue all over the sets of my Camaro," the man continued. "And then the wild raccoon under my desk, the needles on my office seat, the glassless monocle on the day of that important meeting in Tokyo —"

"I keep losing the last round of Drive Fast," he muttered, crossing his arms. "But he cheated, like, one hundred percent, so I don't even get why that should be counted as my fault —"

"Aren't you and the Demon spending a lot of time together, lately?" Kajii questioned. "Didn't you hate the guy?"

"Yes, I do. No we aren't," Chuuya replied. Then: "I need him to train — a thing. There's only so many times I can push him into the river."

“You pushed him into the river again?”

“Ah, yes, your secret training ,” Kajii cut off Hirotsu’s exasperation with wiggling eyebrows. “I know it’s all secluded information and everything, but — how does he help you, exactly?”

“Perhaps the nullification Ability has something to do with it, lemon-fucker?”

“I have never put anything even vaguely lemon shaped near my intimate parts.”

“I believe that tons.”

“Scandalous,” the scientist huffed. “Still. You’re telling me the guy just — slaps you in the face and leaves you to bleed out in the dirt? I’ve heard the stories.”

“Kajii,” Hirotsu admonished.

Pointless.

Decay tickled. Chuuya knew that, because even the brush of fabric from his shirt made the onyx skin of his forearms tingle — encouraged by remembrance and by the summer wind, fading and stubborn all the same.

“I don’t remember much,” he grunted. Glass piercing flesh. Pulsing arteries under his palm. The temptation of being blamed, again and again. “He stays there. Probably draws dicks on my face. Drives me home, as well as his shitty ass can direct a steering wheel. I don’t — remember much.”

Tentatively, Kajii dared: “Really?”

Really?

Hands and blood. Slaps on his cheeks to keep him awake, gentler fingers lingering to check his temperature. Rough nastiness, because there was a job to do and Dazai did it with little formalities — because Chuuya had bled all over him more than he had thanked him for letting him. They didn’t work like that. Hands and blood and whispers. You’ll die a clean death, one day, Slug.

Like a curse coming true, a head of too long hair and one big eye appeared over the edge of the desk, bending to meet Chuuya upside down. “You traitorous simpleton better have not made Tanaki continue Spider Eyes without me.”

Kajii’s startlement rang with a yelp, as he almost fell onto Hirotsu’s unbothered frame; Chuuya turned, shoulders tense.

“Well?” he questioned.

For a single beat — the silence so tangible, even Tanaki only directed wide eyes their way, the phone still held by her ear — it seemed as if Dazai would answer. Then, boredom dripped down his cheeks, crawling over eye bags and a tad too visible cheekbones; he shrugged. “Qualified.”

His fingers twitched. “It’s about me. ”

“It’s about anything but that,” the boy let him know, clearly annoyed. Don’t act as if you haven’t realized it yet. “And clearly, Mori knows who can give him a better picture.”

He climbed to his feet so fast that the world turned red. “What the fuck is that supposed to —“

A second head peered over the desk.

“Stop screaming,” Q ordered, looking back and forth between the two of them. “It’s boring.”

At that, even Hirotsu’s blankness vanished.

Dazai was holding their hand. It was unclear just how pleased he was by the fact; but Q, with round cheeks and unsettlingly shaped eyes, was looking at him like they would have rather tore him apart with their milk teeth. At some point, over their unofficial imprisonment, someone had gotten rid of the overgrown shirt that was their sole outfit — now, a blue primary school uniform sat tight around their small limbs, completed by a little hat over bicolored hair.

“Where are your manners, Q?” Dazai tutted, shaking them by their joint hands. “You’re in the presence of a Commander, a mad scientist, the most important woman in our syndicate, and —“ He glanced in Chuuya’s direction; then, down at Tanaki’s cellphone, abandoned with the graffiti picture still on. “Well. A possible traitor. Is that how the joke starts?”

Chuuya clenched one fist around his dress shirt, pulling him over the desk. “Listen here —“

“Hello,” Q said, shortly. Their eye contact was utterly serious; unshakable. “Chuuya -niisan. That hurts. And I can’t kill you for it. Stop.”

A breath of silence passed by. Kajii leaned a bit forward, as curious as he was horrified — in a pointless whisper, he asked Chuuya: “Is this the psycho brat you mentioned?”

Tanaki was hastily hurrying to end her call, panicked eyes going back and forth between Dazai and Chuuya’s stare down and Hirotsu’s observing eyes. He squinted, meeting Q’s vacant face. He followed the line of their hand, still clenched on Dazai’s own — still pulled by Chuuya’s own grasp on him.

Under Q’s sleeve, blood-soaked bandages dragged his thoughts to a halt.

Dazai was saying something, underneath — he was taunting him about his weak grasp, maybe; answering Hirotsu’s questions on their mission for that night as petulantly as possible. Chuuya couldn’t take his eyes off the bandages — couldn’t shake off Q’s gaze, euphoric at the edges of boredom.

“Don’t worry,” they said, low, giving him all of their attention. It was devastating, somehow — the weight of every building he had ever allowed to fall in Suribachi City. “I asked for it.”

He frowned.

“ — wants to talk to you.”

Chuuya blinked.

Dazai hadn't removed his shirt from his grasp; he seemed fine enough with their uncomfortable position. When he realized he had his attention, he insisted: “Something about your Amazing Six, I believe. Pass by his office, one of these days,” He was still holding Q's hand. Like it was supposed to explain it, he spelled out: “Better not to make Boss come up with his own solutions, yes?”

---

...

---

His best efforts to live his mornings like Dazai Osamu didn't exist were faint weapons. The boy was everywhere .

Sometimes he disappeared for days at the time — presumably to offer his widest eyes and sincerest grin to Oda Sakunosuke — but when he existed, he existed to haunt him. Among the main secret missions against the Five Moons, and their quest to test how far Chuuya's flesh could stretch — all for the sake of competition, he would reinstate, whenever murmurs in the halls grew too loud — Mori found some sort of delight in laying unimportant matters in their hands.

“All doctors are sadists,” was Dazai's only comment on the matter — eerily serious.

Chuuya flicked his cheek, removing a fallen eyelash. The thing in his veins seemed to beg for a lingering touch; for sharper nails. “Shut up.”

They ran around on the longest day of the summer, looking for a local gang that had been busying itself with graffiting the Headquarters, — how do you know so much about graffiti, Dazai asked him, with a tone that said he already knew, and Chuuya cleared his throat in the face of one particularly old Fuck The Port Mafia Fuckers, signed by a skull sheep — and they threatened this or that shop who'd been too late with protection payments, watching their owners' disbelief at the teens the syndicate had chosen to send their way morph into terror — look at this, you made him bleed on my shoes.

When it got warm in that insufferable way only the clothes they had no choice but to wear made possible, they would stumble to The Alley, and fight for the jet of water from the broken pipe. Then — because they were either too efficient or not enough — they would use the funds for the Five Moons missions at the Arcade.

Chuuya never thought about it too long.

About any of it, truly — their intertwined shadows on the concrete; the betting murmurs in the hallways; the almost daily occurrence of having the boy break into Albatross' apartment, ready for Chuuya's training lessons that weren't.

The one thing Arahabaki couldn't touch.

It was the quietest hour one could find at the Headquarters — right after lunch, when the sun was warmest; The Empty Hour, Tanaki called it — when he stood under the jet of the communal showers of Building Three, and realized he had spent almost all of June studying the boy's profile.

"It was childish, what you did," Dazai said, squirting soap in his hands like he just wanted to waste it. His bandages were soaked. Chuuya could never bring himself to say anything about it. "And mean. And badly forethought. And I will put hair dye in your shampoo for it."

"No," Chuuya replied, distractedly, staring at a hair stuck to the tiled wall. "You don't do old tricks twice," He reached back to clean the space between his shoulders; a lightning strike of pain reached his entire body, constant like a clock. "You need to cut your hair."

"You need to stop projecting. I can't believe you seriously left me to be tortured. They didn't even plan to kill me — I couldn't even hang onto that hope!"

"As if the Hounds did more than tickle you," he replied, flippant. "Should have thought about it before you locked me in that room with the bomb, assface."

Dazai muttered.

The greyish tiles shone weakly, illuminated by the little light managing to sneak in through panels of opaque windows. No other lights had been built on the ceiling; it drowned the room in a sluggish haze, making his bones feel heavier than they were.

Sometimes, when the stable melody of water became too relaxing on his tired eyes, he focused on the faucets and the mirrors on the other side of the room, pristine and shining. He remembered countless missions he'd returned from — stumbling inside and leaning crimson hands on that white ceramic, meeting a reflection that wasn't him, but wasn't anyone else. It always woke him up.

Water was splashed into his eyes.

"I'm talking," Dazai said, piqued. "Dogs are supposed to listen to their masters."

With time — and enough occasions not to even be startled by the paleness of his skin, or his strangely placed moles — Chuuya had figured out that the boy wasn't actually covered in bandages from head to foot. They circled non visible parts of his body seemingly at random — one around his waist; two around the high spot of his thighs.

They didn't look mean — but Chuuya wouldn't have known how to explain what that meant.

“My eyes are up here,” The boy snapped his fingers. The tips of his ears were red. He never did seem very glad when Chuuya wandered around naked, all shame lost. “Don’t objectify me.”

“Was trying to find scales,” Chuuya replied, automatically. Then: “Where the fuck is you tattoo, anyway?”

Crossing his arms to his chest, Dazai’s chin touched the stars. “In an insurmountably smart location, thank you very much.”

“Really.”

“Really! Perfectly hidden when necessary, perfectly visible when even more so. Truly one of my least recognized successes.”

He squinted. “You didn’t tattoo it on your ass. I would have seen it.”

“No, but I’m sort of regretting it, now.”

An idea breached through. “Is it under that toilet paper you cover yourself with?”

“Oh,” Shrugging off water, he reached up with two fingers, turning his neck to the side. The loop of bandages on his throat stayed unmoved; nonetheless, when he tapped his digits at the edge of the white road on his nape, pushing his soaked hair up with the other hand — Chuuya saw it. “Bingo.”

He curled an eyebrow. “That’s dramatic.”

“Is it?” Dazai played dumb — the Port Mafia’s flowers, a weight on his nape.

Bow, when necessary, Kouyou had told him, on that first day of his, as she pushed and pulled his skin to readjust him — to make him something that would keep his mouth shut long enough to live to see twenty. He could have told her it was stupid; so he had. Or you will die because of it.

“You’re suicidal,” Chuuya spoke, before he could taste his words again. “But you wouldn’t let him kill you.”

His smile was a complicated thing. Too well rehearsed to be real; too correct on his face to be a play pretend. Chuuya had been eight, torturing the faces of the first men he had killed, because he didn’t know bread but he did know corpses — sinking two little fingers inside their mouths and dragging, making them smile.

The water under their feet turned redder with every breath he took. He watched it float to the drain; some stranger’s living source to fill up the Headquarters’ sewers. There’s more blood in there than there is shit, Tsuchiya had once said. He wondered if Dazai only ever showered there; if the words shipping container would have closed off that minimal window of sincerity he had been scratching his nails against for all of June.

“When’s the last time you showered?” Chuuya asked, squeezing shampoo in his hands.

Dazai shook his head like a dog, offering a third jet of water. “When’s the last time you ate a full meal?”

It screeched across his ribcage; nails on chalk, a blanket on overheated limbs — something he hadn’t asked for and didn’t know how to change. Selfish as it was, Chuuya had learned all his languages — he hadn’t wanted to be learned in return. “When’s the last time you slept?”

“Why is there a bag filled with Mori’s poison collection under Albatross’ bed?”

My bed, he thought about spitting. The house was a ghost he never allowed to linger; he walked through its floors with his head raised, lest the man got a laugh about it in the afterlife. He sat on the floor, sometimes, and he just stared at the ceiling. My bed. My bed. He can’t sleep anymore.

Chuuya increased the intensity of the shower, drowning his voice out, blurring him from the other side of the waterfall. His mocking scoff was anything but ignorable. The anger pooling in his chest was half self-blame — haven’t you learned a thing?

Stalemate, he thought. Perhaps it was just delirium. Day, evening, and night, barking along to his taunts and studying the scars Chuuya had given him and Mori hadn’t let him erase — perhaps one ought to die alone, sometimes.

They washed in silence.

Dazai snatched his shampoo.

He reached for it. The boy moved his arm out of his reach. Squinting, he tried again — only to be left jaw-slacked when Dazai put his arm up, dangling the bottle too high for his fingers.

Through the curtain — freezing on Chuuya’s side, burning on Dazai’s own — they stared at each other. Distant, on the other side of opaque windows, the sounds of traffic filled the azure sky.

“Are you fucking kidding me?” he asked, a bit too honestly, detesting the string of exhaustion to leave his mouth — and then, he slammed his leg on the back of the boy’s knees.

He dropped with a help.

A slippery surface and two overfrustrated teens didn’t make for a good combination; hair was pulled and feet went skiing down the tiles, bruising knees and thumping bones against the shower heads, landing on the floor and struggling to get up again.

“No, no, no, don’t, hey!” the boy cried out, stuck in a headlock in Chuuya’s least scarred arm, as he dragged him under the sprinkler, fighting against the surprisingly resilient grip of his feet on the floor. “I don’t want to smell like a dog! I don’t want to smell like a dog, I don’t want to, let go of me, let —“

“That’s what you fucking get,” Chuuya breathed out, harshly, rubbing his shampoo-filled hand on his knotted locks. “I’m fucking tired of you smelling like shit! Start fucking showering!”

“It’s not my fault if I — ouch, ouch — Hey!”

The world spun and spun, natural light like cement blanket on his pained eyelids. The month had left so many bruises Chuuya had reached some sort of cathartic lack of pain — when he fell, one knee sinking in Dazai’s thigh and the other almost smashing a tile, amidst the boy’s whine and his own curse, he didn’t feel anything but the breathless slow down of their franticness.

The shower heads still rained. If he listened carefully, the sound of steps echoed on the other side of the doors.

“Jerk,” Dazai heaved.

“Bitch.”

The tip-tap of closing water twirled around his possible answers. He put his palms on the boy’s ears, shivering at the gentleness of it — made sure to be a little less merciful when he muttered under his breath, reaching for one of the hairdryers hanging on the wall — turning it on.

Eye for an eye, he reminded himself. Dazai’s hand was on his thigh, tracing a scar. Chuuya didn’t even remember where all of his wounds were.

They were still like that, when the doors burst open. Hirotsu — edges of his pants and scarf soaked — seemed to take in their naked silhouettes and gain ten more years of life.

“Boys,” he sighed, eventually. “Come out. You flooded the hallway.”

Sunlight — unlike the way the moon pressed against Arahabaki’s wide open eyes — was for sharper consequences.

“This is so unfair,” Dazai whined, kneeled by one of Kouyou’s Chashitsu’s fine tables like a vulture. An astonishing number of completed papers dried under his elbows, dotted with kanjis that showed off his calligraphy. “I was supposed to help Odasaku bring a package to a serial killer.”

Chuuya huffed, blowing strands of hair off his clammy forehead. “Yeah, well,” he grunted. “The Kure twins were supposed to teach me how to sail a boat. And it’s your fucking fault we’re here, anyway.”

They had been abandoned in one of the glass cages — green houses, Kouyou would tut — surrounding the main building of the tea house. A touristic little treasure, surely; shaped like a birdhouse and decorated with tingling amulets — but Kouyou had locked them inside, and the recycled air of their tired breaths was a weight on Chuuya’s constantly recovering lungs.

His offended gasp was uncalled for. Curled up in a scaly, threatening ball, Kazuko laid her chin — or the closest thing she had to it — on the table, staring Chuuya down. “That’s so not true. How was I supposed to know the car we hotwired to the Gentleman’s Bar was one of Ane-san’s?”

“Hot wired and blew up, ” Chuuya noted.

“Still not my fault.”

“I’ve never even seen her drive it.”

Clearly spurred by the support, Dazai fired on: “That’s what I’m saying, there was no reason to get that mad —“

Gentle fingers knocked on the glass squares of the greenhouse. Kouyou’s eyes were remarkably similar to her demon’s ones, when they settled on them. Two fingers tapped her under-chin. She smiled — walked away, twirling her umbrella.

They exchanged a glance. For once, when they both sighed down at their papers, Chuuya knew they were thinking the same thing.

Calligraphy is a means to discipline, she would tell them, each time she managed to catch them doing something bad enough — and personal enough — to demand the rights to a punishment to Mori. And, it is meant to quieten the mind and the muscles, to sharpen the gaze, and to fix your posture. And, Chuuya, darling, are you intending to mock hunchbacks? And, demon child, stop laughing, here are several texts more.

“Why did you even bring the damn thing,” Chuuya questioned, nodding towards Kazuko — who was currently slithering over their table, ink and papers to be damned.

Given she had a tendency to settle over the least optimal parts of his body, he moved a bit to the side. Dazai huffed, somehow managing to grab her by the tail and the head — and allowed her to wrap around himself like a scarf.

“I told you,” he said, mildly exasperated; as he had each time the pet had sneaked under their legs in the meeting rooms, giving Ace the heart attack of a lifetime — or staring Chuuya down while he worked in his office, Dazai nowhere to be found. “She likes to follow me.”

“She is not a dog. She’s a snake.”

“Of course not. I already have a dog. And she’s a boa constrictor, thank you very much.”

Dazai was an uncomfortable sight under the sun. Too pale and too bruised. Chuuya hated looking at him — it scratched some part of his brain that couldn’t help the irritation. When their knuckles brushed, he could count every bluish vein down his hand; walk all the way to the border of the bandages.

Eventually, he questioned: “Chibi, why did the chicken cross the road?”

Unimpressed, he asked: “Why?”

“To get to your paper.”

“Hilarious.”

Clearly, Dazai thought so. He sipped idly at the tea the woman had been so magnanimous as to leave to them. “You might want to check with an actual doctor if your fingers’ motor functions are acceptable.”

“What doctor?” he mumbled. “We’re not allowed to see one.”

His tongue clicked. Kazuko tightened her grip around his torso. “Still. Poor Kouyou’s heart will fail when she sees that.”

“If it doesn’t fail when she sees your ugly mutt in the sunlight first —“

“At your big age, you still don’t know how to write the word Courage —“

Chuuya scoffed, almost tearing the paper with the tip of his stylus. “Says the dipshit who can’t read, anyway.”

A pause.

He had always had good reflexes. It was the only reason why he managed to catch the flash of surprise that lit up the other boy’s face.

“Clever slug,” Dazai chirped, tracing his still-wet brush strokes with a finger. The smile he wore was mocking — as fake as the simulation of wind from the dangling dreamcatchers. He needed to cut his hair, he echoed. “Is what I would say, if it couldn’t all be accounted to your obsession with me.”

“My obsession with you?” he spluttered. It only strangled his neck in fear for a moment — the idea of having been caught while he stared, counting lines of scars and wondering, just how mad will he be when I kill him? “If I could scratch the sight of you from my skull, I would.”

“I don’t doubt it,” Kazuko’s fangs gripped a fallen stylus; Chuuya temporarily wondered about corrupting her with a rat to make her do his work. “Doesn’t change the truth, though. What gave me away?”

“Apart from your stupid refusal to do reports?” Chuuya muttered. “Iceman was like that, too. You take too much time to read stuff, but talk shit in the meantime so nobody will notice — and the private documents in your office are all white-letters-on-black-pages. Iceman used those. Also, that —“ He nodded towards the brush he was holding. “He had something like that too.”

The hair tie had been stolen from Chuuya himself, even if he couldn’t quite remember when — Dazai had knotted one side to the tip of the brush, and wrapped it around his wrist.

“Taking the detective route?” the boy considered. It didn’t seem like the revelation was displeasing him — like an addict staring at a pill bottle closed wrong, Chuuya wondered how many more things about him he was allowed to find out, but not to be told directly. “I don’t think the good side would suit you. But be my guest.”

“Still,” he sighed, a moment later. He wore discomfort like he wore Mori’s coat. “It’s kind of embarrassing that you can’t even beat the guy who can’t read at writing, you know?”

Chuuya gulped his tea and burped in his face.

Dazai groaned, batting the air away with one hand. Even Kazuko seemed displeased, rolling off his body to threaten to nip Chuuya’s calves. “That’s absolutely disgusting —“

He did it again.

“Excuse you —“

“What, you think you can do better?”

“I don’t want to, thank you very much.”

“You know,” He dropped his brush, leaning forward. “I was the undefeated champion of burping competitions in the Sheep.”

The glance the boy sent his way had rarely been as revolted. “And that must have been the pinnacle of pride, in your little gang, am I right?”

Chuuya grinned. “It was a monthly event.”

“Of course it was.”

“Bet you can’t even do a tiny eenie burp.”

“Of course I can. I just don’t want to.”

“Prove it to me.”

“I don’t have to prove —“

“Boo-oooh. Coward.”

“Coward?”

“Coward little princess.”

“Princess?”

Kouyou came back, some lifetimes later, umbrella tracing patterns on the grass. She found them like that — paper and ink on the floor, coats and jackets removed, sipping tea as a means to an end, vocalizing burps with a solemnity that didn’t fit the situation.

Summer did to Dazai what the heaviest rain of the season did to puddles. It was imperceptible — and, consequently, a testament to the forced attention Chuuya had had no choice but to pay to him.

Perhaps, he liked to lie, it was the bandages. They had to be hell with that heat. Perhaps it was the endless quantity of dossiers Mori tended to drop in his hands in the morning, smiling proudly down at him, — something no wise person should want, but that Chuuya found himself envying.

Perhaps it was the perpetual sunburn on his crooked nose, giving him a younger touch and a sickly aura. Perhaps it was chasing Kazuko around the city, her eyes mischievous and impersonal. Perhaps it was the fact that Oda Sakunosuke was incredibly busy, and apart from tapping away on his phone and disappearing every Friday night, all he could do was lament. Perhaps it was summer, in its easiest shape.

Summer made Dazai worse.

Worse was a redundant term. Dazai was always worse; than that person or that time, than he could have been and that he might have wanted, than he truly was and than he needed.

Chuuya watched him slit men's throats slower and slower, as if savouring — as if meeting their eyes and extending their end would give him something. Chuuya watched him browse through the yellowish pages of that suicide guide of his, like a schoolboy who'd been reprimanded one time too many. Chuuya watched him stare longingly at every corpse they left on their way.

(It was an uncautious move on his part — making someone whose skin spelled temporary a pillar of reassurance. Dead men could not save anyone. But summer made Dazai worse, and as things went these days, it dragged Chuuya down with him.)

---

...

---

Over the background noise of the television playing Lippman's first A-list blockbuster, Bones, Kouyou eventually asked: "Why do you only ever eat half, anyway?"

When Albatross had dragged Chuuya to the apartment under his own, he had decided the opportunity to renovate was a call too hypnotic to ignore — a mixture of, I'm merely welcoming you with style, and, what do you think about matching furniture?, that had ended up being mostly useless. As the Flags knew, if one wanted to find Albatross — with Ōmu on his shoulders and traces of blood under his shoes — Chuuya's was the place to check first.

It had made the man's apartment a dubious location — a beacon of wild stories spreading all over the syndicate. Some said he had a sauna — some, that he had built a room specifically for his torturing needs. As long as they don't think I'm boring enough to have a built-in office, Albatross used to scoff.

You're all wrong, Chuuya could have told the admiring whispers. He's a bird, and he lives in a cage.

"I get full easily," he shrugged, eyes running down the lines of ink of Koda's latest report. Ōmu was gingerly picking at his leftovers on the vanity desk, feathers ruffled. Her hand pulling the fabric of his kimono over his shoulders, Kouyou looked at him with strange fascination. "'Want some?'"

"No, thank you," the woman replied. Are you lying?, Lippman asked, on the screen, eerily close to a chin-up woman in blue. "But you always seem ready to offer some."

He shrugged. "No point in wasting."

She met his eyes in the mirror, unblinded by the star shaped lights framing it. "Rather."

Untouched by her tuts to stay still, Chuuya spun on his stool, getting lost in descriptions of promising deals and piles of yen; his shadow broke the kaleidoscopic light mosaic on the floor, as the squeak of the metal sang along to Ōmu's words — good morning and did you call and fuck.

Don't corrupt my angel, Albatross used to say, crouched on the edge of his window next to the bird. Chuuya used to sit on the floor — he liked looking up; studying how the buildings made cell bars behind the man's frame. My home is the sky and my home is the street, he would tell him, don't tell me you don't understand.

Liar, Chuuya never said.

Albatross hung pictures in his home — he plastered Lippman's movies to the ceiling; he kept Ōmu there. He had brought Chuuya to the closest place to his door, when he had thought he needed something better.

And yet he never slept — wandered down into Chuuya's empty apartment at 3 A.M; refused to put a mirror in his bathroom. And yet some spots of the floor were a bit sunken in — like he had paced, and paced, and paced.

Chuuya knew he had. He remembered the sound like a broken record. He had walked over his invisible footprints, like he might fill up the void.

Albatross needs something to come back to, Pianoman — who always saw, and never told — had explained, once. Be it people, be it home. I think that's why he likes you.

"Do you think birds ever learn to love their cages?" Chuuya recited, reading along to the quote some gang they had taken care of had graffitied on their base. "Downright poetic. According to what Virgil looked into, they were referring to Abilities."

Kouyou tilted her head. "It's not a bad way to describe it."

He studied the curling lines of the fabric she had forced him in — a quality so far from what he had grown up around that it almost scratched his skin with its softness. Waves over black fabric; the lines of red on the sash. “Who’s caged?”

Her fingers hesitated by his nape — then, with newfound calm, she sunk them in his hair, fixing the strands. “It’s curious, don’t you think?”

“What is?”

“Abilities are undoubtedly our greatest strength,” she explained, pulling his hair from the sides, studying his uncovered eyes. I rather like the mismatch, she had told him, once. It’s always useful — having something to make people look twice. “At the end of the day, still — they’re nothing but infinite bursts of power kept in chains. Well fed — but imprisoned all the same.”

All you are, he recalled, is a cage.

He munched on a cuticle, tasting the raw skin from a near-stitch. Kouyou slapped his hand away right as Lippman got back-flipped by his co star in blue. “You believe so?”

“I believe darling Elise has never said a good word about our Mori. I believe Golden Demon despises me,” The smile she offered him was mirthful, but heavy. “Not that I would ever blame her. Would you feel particularly favourable towards someone who can decide when you get to exist and when not?”

Chuuya frowned, throwing the reports on the vanity desk, startling Ōmu away with a fuck! He perched on top of the television, instead, quite offended — underneath his claws, Lippman was sporting fake blood on his face and a grin. He fit in Albatross’ apartment like a glove, because he had belonged there just as much as him — he looked nothing like Chuuya’s memories.

“They’re not sentient creatures,” he settled on saying. “They just are. ”

A dimple appeared next to her mouth. He recalled, suddenly, the first time she’d stabbed him — one of the few times she had managed to beat him when Abilities were involved in training. “That mentality surely won’t help your case.”

Chuuya stretched his arms out, studying the sole, thin line of black he could see between his gloves and the edge of the sleeves.

Your arms fade to that shade after roughly forty eight hours of no Corruption, Dazai had theorized, after close analysis. They had attempted to slow it down by activating it and immediately nullifying it, in the Alley — after Chuuya had nearly knocked him out and ran faster than Dazai could almost catch up to, they had abandoned that theory.

“I don’t know if my case can be helped,” he confessed. Control the things in your veins, or they will control you instead, the Colonel had said. “I did nothing but live with it for all these years.”

Kouyou's fingers were gentle, but never to the point of sacrificing efficiency. She did her best to tame his mane; Chuuya cringed at the sweat he could feel gathering on his nape. He grimaced at the thought of what another cutting attempt — one not sheltered by rage-trembling fingers and the strand he'd burned — might produce.

Perhaps he'd ask Kouyou, he considered, sneaking a glance in her way. Would it be weird? Could you ask your Boss for a haircut? The kids in the Sheep used to do it with him — still, probably different. He imagined his own cut strands on that floor, with its tacky carpets and parrot feathers. Home, he tried to taste. Home. Home. Thievery was only so when it wouldn't be forgiven.

"Living can only grow easier," she offered, eventually. "As long as you do it where there is no comparison. Darkened roots shouldn't long for the standard set by trees; it would be senseless."

"Always with the plant metaphors."

"Always with the belief the haunted can't be taken advantage of," Kouyou replied.

"I was a street kid, Ane-san," Chuuya reminded her. "There isn't a thing in this world I haven't taken advantage of."

"Then perhaps you should stop saving up your meals for winter days that aren't coming," You will pay for this!, Lippman promised, eyes twinkling in amusement. She stretched his kimono on his shoulders again. "Here. Ready to go."

Hesitantly, Chuuya studied his reflection in the spotless mirror.

Ever since opening his eyes to an unnatural grin and unfamiliar features had grown into the norm, he had mostly avoided the sight — the last few weeks hadn't exactly helped his case. The skin over his cheeks was a mosaic of blues and purples, heavenly matched by the healing bruises rendering his skin a painful yellow.

Scars peeked from the collar of the kimono, sunburned against freckled skin. "Black fits you to a fault," Kouyou complimented. "I'd encourage you to wear it more, but we don't want the demon child to accuse you of plagiarism."

He huffed, blowing a strand of hair off his burned eye. "I should have never told you that Shichigosan story."

"And allow me to miss Lippman's most genius idea?" the woman accused. Her photo camera had materialized from nowhere at all, dangling from her arm — he stole it, raising it to study the living room through the lens. "I would have haunted you to the ends of the earth."

"It's ridiculous."

"It's sweet."

"I'm too old for this. It's not even the right month, November is —"

“We won’t tell anybody.”

“You just want to take pictures —“

“A stroke,” she insisted, “Of genius. ”

Chuuya turned on the stool, curling an eyebrow. “High praises. Didn’t you have a whole rivalry thing going on with the idiot?”

She sniffed, chin high. “As if I would have ever wasted time battling such an — individual.”

He observed the chandelier through the camera — shards of finely-cut crystal reflecting off the posters in the ceiling; then the collection of souvenirs on the kitchen counter, and Doc’s face in one of the hung photographs, then Lippman’s fake corpse on the television screen.

His finger spasmed on the button. He took a picture of Ōmu — then, he turned to the blurred corners of the Executive’s frame. “One word?”

Kouyou leaned — closer and closer; just enough to fill the circle of the lens. When she winked, he took a picture. “Bottle blond.”

As only the unlucky knew, one of the more modern temples in Yokohama had been built with the first yen the Mafia had ripped from bloodied hands and spiked ground — an attempt, as Mori had once described it, at giving back what they had taken. Not regret, though — perhaps fear.

These days, it was mostly used for introits — it was rare for the higher ups to actually visit the structure, despite the coveted honors most guards would offer anyone to show a Silver Oracle or a mere Port Mafia tattoo.

“Why didn’t we come here for New Year’s?” Chuuya questioned, Kouyou’s arm over his own — head tilted back to stare at the structure at the end of the natural stairs. “Feels like the sort of power trip mafiosi would enjoy.”

“It feels cheap, though, does it not? Praying on ground built with the blood we spilled?”

He shrugged. “Feels cheaper to linger on it.”

“Perhaps. We used to, with the prior Boss,” Kouyou admitted, dragging the tip of her umbrella behind them. The sun was high in the sky — there was very little crowd, though; mostly gathered under the patio of the temple. “He would tell us the story of the temple’s construction each festivity — at first in mere pride; then, out of delirium. He had a taste for the fruit on the altars — swore that we all deserved to eat some, given our merits.”

Chuuya scoffed. “Blasphemy sounds like the least interesting part of him.”

“What were the outside voices like?”

“Merciless,” He fixed his foot deeper inside the wooden sandals, doing his best to pretend not to use Tainted to find his balance. The kimono felt weird on his skin — it curled like a forgotten idea at the end of his skull; the same tickle of something that always turned into too far away. Many things had that smell — homemade food; house gardens; salsedine. He recalled his lost picture — his face, young and already vacant, holding N's hand. "He was the plague of the underground."

"He was," Kouyou agreed, eyes distant — fingers curled forward, sharpening claws she didn't have. "Did you ever see him face to face?"

He shook his head. "Only the corpse inside Rimbaud's Ability."

"He always did look like a corpse," she said, not amused and not reminiscing. "Even before he was old and wrinkled — There was something in his eyes that never seemed quite with us."

"Some stories said he bathed in the blood of his own traitorous subordinates."

"Hilarious," Kouyou commented. "No. He did bathe in their material possessions, though."

The entrance of the temple appeared in all its might — red roofs and golden linings, with a pavement so clear it was almost reflective. Studying the kneeling crowd near the few altars, scattered across an empty room so wide it beat even Mori's office, Chuuya blinked. "Material possessions?"

"Be drunk with power, and treat gold like poison," Kouyou recited. "That is what he used to tell me. His predecessor had been killed over a trap, saturated by his own greed. He believed a taste for riches might kill even the strongest man. You must have seen his pictures — the clothes he wore, his disheveled hair."

"He looked homeless," Chuuya said.

She laughed. "Quite. Mind those suitors and their pearls, little Ozaki. They only want you to be blinded," Her curled lips stretched into a less amused line; she tilted her head back, studying the decorated ceiling — raised her hand to brush one of the lanterns. "Want to know what I did the day I got the news of his death?"

He waited. Effortless, lighter than a leaf, Kouyou gestured to some discreet guard near the entrance — immediately, they set to emptying the temple out.

Hiding her mouth behind her fan, tilting his way, she said: "I emptied out all of my accounts — all of them. Down to the last yen."

Chuuya stared. The bloodied skin under his nails seemed to itch. "All of it?"

"All of it," she swore. The guard closed the doors of the temple behind him, once everyone had left — not before bowing, and offering them a, Executives. Most men of Kouyou's did, lately — the others spent their time gossiping about the little of the competition that had filtered through the doors of the meeting room. "It was maybe the longest day of my life."

She let go of his arm; twirled a bit under the sun-hit lanterns, painting crimson shades on the wooden floors. Humming to that dance, she closed her eyes and sighed. "I can't even remember all of it. I bought the finest dresses that had ever been imported into Yokohama, and I wore them with my girls — and I tore them all into pieces, because I had just so many, and — And then —“

Hurrying toward the altar, she picked up a shawl some devotee must have left behind, pulling it over her shoulders. “I bought food,” she said. “I bought so much food I couldn’t have starved even in my seventh life. Never again. I ate until I was sick, and then I went out all night, and bought all the best cars in the market — and drove to all those fancy buildings they used to kick me out of.”

“Did you kill them?” Chuuya wondered, picking at the petals of offered flowers, unable to take his eyes off of her.

She bent back until her pinned up hair was dangling dangerously, smiling at him upside down. “Not that night. That endless night was for my joys and my desires.”

“You don’t desire revenge?”

“I deserve it,” she replied, easily. “There’s a wide difference.”

He tried to imagine something similar — a few hours forgetting what the Sheep’s faces had looked like on the harshest winters; a few hours not scratching at the good, too good, suits the Flags had bought for him. Everyone in the Port Mafia bled for power and hedonism; Chuuya never knew if he lacked hunger or direction for it. “Didn’t you need the money?”

“Oh, I knew I wouldn’t,” Kouyou said. She looked at him funny. “The Boss’ doctor swore the Boss had died of natural causes. He swore the seat had his name on it. I didn’t care much, either way — A new reign always means a cleanse. And I was way too close to the top,” A shrug. “Everyday was a race for survival, and my feet were naked in the sand. Starving. If it was the last day of my life, why not devour it?”

Chuuya hummed. He stretched his legs out in the kimono — exercised makeshift kicks, and kept his eyes on the ceiling, breathing in the smell of incense. Devour: “But you didn’t die.”

“I didn’t,” she confirmed. “And you know what I learned?”

Arms pulled onto his sleeves — with a yelp that was more of a curse, Chuuya was pulled into a dancing position, sandals slipping down wooden tiles and fallen pieces of paper. “Ane-san —“

“Spine straight,” Kouyou ordered, with the voice she used in the dungeons. “Chin up. Always look the enemy in the eyes.”

“You’re not the enemy,” Chuuya protested, trying to keep up with her elegant dance.

“Then look at your own reflection. Want to know what I learned?”

He slipped over a wet tile; held onto her a bit tighter, frustrated, and snapped: “What.”

From up-close, a few freckles decorated the bridge of her nose — only in the summer, he knew. He had studied her too purposefully not to have noticed that constant. A strand of hair was trapped between her eyelashes; somehow, she made it look put together. Elegance, he thought, but it was the wrong term, always — untouched, maybe. Still. A pillar not even Arahabaki would have scarred.

She knocked her forehead against his own, only once. “That my soul was rotting inside me,” she answered. “And that I was letting it.”

Chuuya set his jaw.

“I know you understand,” Kouyou called, as tentative as a gun under his chin. Her feet never slowed down once; dancing under the shards of reddened light, she insisted: “I know you know what it means to live with your nails bitten to raw skin. You exude strength. You elude power. At the end of the day, though — you’re just as scared of starving as your bones used to be.”

“I told you,” he said, stupidly, “The food thing isn’t a thing. ”

“I’m not talking about food. I’m talking about roots,” She spun the two of them around; studied the contrast of her skin with his gloves. “I’m talking about tiptoes.”

“I can fly.”

“How did you spend your first pay?”

Chuuya made a face. “The bastard and I basically got it sucked out by the Arcade.”

“The second?” she replied. “The third?”

“You know I have accounts —“

“I know they’re mostly untouched.”

“Precaution isn’t stupid.”

“No,” she confirmed. “But you’ve taken a liking to wine, have you not?”

He blinked. “What’s the point?”

“You like wine,” Kouyou listed off, between one step and the other — subtly fixing his posture with every turn; raising his chin until it stood as proudly as hers and softening his grip until it seemed natural. “You like that motorcycle of yours. You look at Albatross’ priciest furniture with this face. When we visit the Pomegranate, you let the girls show off their best fabrics with no complaints.”

“I complain,” he protested.

“You want, ” she replied. “And you could have it all — down to the last indulgent inch,” She tightened her grip on his hands. “Don’t you get it, Chuuya? It’s what I knew when Mori made me an Executive — I was here to stay. I was here to climb higher and higher, or die trying. ”

Chuuya scoffed. “You know I am —“

“Then commit to it,” Kouyou cut in. “Buy the most expensive wine on the market. Get those cars I always see you gape at. Finish your meal. You know what will happen once the money is over?” She leaned down; whispered, low and tempting: “You will get more. Because you’re stuck here.”

They danced.

Chuuya gulped words he wouldn’t know how to shape — tried to find a way that was hard, unshakable enough to explain that the Sheep had been meant to be his grave, and that the Flags had died for nothing, and the Port Mafia was —

You wouldn’t know where to put your hands around those fancy guys, Shirase had laughed, once, after he’d muttered a story about an assassin who went around calling himself Iceman. It had been a mistake on his part. Chuuya — whether pulling on the loose threads of the pockets of ripped apart jeans, or tracing stitchings across suit pants — had always known where his hands belonged.

There had been a night, countless sunrises away — washing his hands in the communal bathrooms, watching the blood rush down the sink, when he’d realized he liked being there.

Betrayal, he had found, smelled like blood and diluted shit.

Chuuya hadn’t betrayed anyone.

“It’s too endless,” he settled on, eventually, kicking away a fallen candle as they stepped on it. “It’s too endless to last.”

The woman hummed. “See, that’s the piece you’re missing,” Another spin; a step right into the widest of the gaps, where the sunlight streamed with such unguarded freedom it felt like a sin. It was pure summer warmth — it rained down his kimono, sticking it to his skin with sweat.

“You and I will never belong anywhere but here,” Kouyou said. “It doesn’t have to last, little god. We will end with it, or not at all.”

---

...

---

Chuuya had thought about killing Mori Ougai exactly three times.

The first of them had been inconsequential — the mere rage of a starving, learning child, being told to associate a symbol to a syndicate and then a syndicate to a bloodbath and then a bloodbath to a single man. The prior Boss had already been sick by the time Chuuya came to power — the streets used to curse out the doctor who was keeping him on his feet more than they did him.

Then there had been his boot on a boy's disgustingly clean dress shirt, and cubic handcuffs around his hands — and Mori's face, smiling, as it played a recording of the Sheep's prayers.

The third one had lasted less than a broken inhale — a blink of an idea; the crack of his knees right before he bent, new hat to his chest and new loyalty in his voice, as he swore himself to a cause.

You could kill him, Chuuya had heard his bones whisper, each time. The one thing he had never had any doubts about was his ability to put an end to existence. You could do it right now.

“And this is Tanaki,” Elise explained, as she raised one of the dolls from the pile abandoned in the hallway. “The plan is to set her on fire.”

It burned, strange and unavoidable, to tear his eyes off Mori's framed picture on the wall — he slid them down to safer lands. The awkward way he had posed in the picture of the Mafia's youngest; the statuary calmness of Elise, in the seat in front of him; Dazai's obnoxious grin. His hands, under his chin, were crossed just like Mori's.

He looked away, dragging his fingers down the doll house he had been assembling for the past half hour. “What the hell did Tanaki do to deserve that?”

Elise pouted, cheeks red and round. “I told you,” she whined, “She disobeyed Doll Rintarou's orders for the beach party.”

Chuuya thought about it, nodded. “The Mafia code does need to be respected.”

“Yes!” She picked up another doll from the floor — one dressed in black, covered head to toe in toilet paper. “This is Dazai. He's ugly.”

“At least you're true to your sources,” He took the doll from her hands, studying the upside down smile the girl had forcefully drawn over the doll's pink lips. Elise's red gowns looked like blood polls on the floor; the door to Mori's office was still just as closed as it had been when he had arrived. No guards, strangely — only Elise, solitary and humming and ten; haunting the halls. “Don't I have a doll?”

Elise fished out another doll from the lower floor of the house. “Of course you do. I'm true to the —” She paused. Sighed, frustrated.

“Source?” he suggested.

“I know,” she huffed, directing him a gaze so nasty Chuuya was taken aback. “Rintarou likes it when I struggle. Here, your doll.”

The words were strident only by the edges; a meaning not meant to be thought about, either because of irrelevance or danger. Elise hummed a melody he didn’t know, and Chuuya scratched his nails against the plastic red strand of his doll — the little summer hat over them. One of the blue eyes had been drawn over, turned into a monotone shade of brown.

The strangest detail, though, were the vibrantly scarlet lines covering certain areas of the doll’s skin. “What are these?”

“Your marks,” Elise explained, as if it was obvious. She always spoke with a cadency of lithe irritation — as if perpetually several steps ahead. “I remembered the places you had them in that time Mori was making you better.”

In the framed pictures, Chuuya’s serious face cracked and turned and twisted — a grin met his gaze, leaking blood from the corner of its lips.

His skin itched. Pulling the fake hair, he commented: “They’re a bit ugly for a doll, though.”

Elise’s frown fit comically on her face; he couldn’t quite help himself from reaching forward and pinching one of her cheeks. “It’s your doll, Chuuya. I can’t not make it look like you.”

“Mmh,” he confirmed, distracted, biting down a smile. She reminded him of Yuan, at times — even if they didn’t have anything in common. Something in their eyes; something in the way they both held onto the laces of his shoes. “And where is your doll?”

Other times, she reminded him of Dazai.

The sound of the office doors opening only deafened the airplane-like ones out of Elise’s mouth for a moment; the light it cast over her hands, wrapped tightly around the pink toy vehicle, made her skin glisten with the same texture as the moonlight outside. “I am the doll,” she let him know, distractedly.

“Chuuya,” Mori called, peeking from the ajar doors. He was in his doctor lab coat; he didn’t seem to notice the unforgivably complicated way Chuuya was staring at his Ability child. “Forgive the delay. Come in.”

The office was bathed in the way the moon reflected off the gold-lined couches; the shadows on the floor followed old furniture and Mori’s too tall frame, as he led him to the metal stretcher in the dead center of the room. When Chuuya lowered his eyes, the sheet over the stretcher had been removed, revealing a corpse.

“Not dead yet, actually,” the Boss said, as if he had heard, snapping plastic gloves on. “Close to it, but not gone. Dazai knows better than to get rid of good evidence so easily.”

Easily seemed a strange way to describe it. The man’s skin had been nearly entirely torn off his body, melting by the hinges of his limbs and the base of his throat. His eyeballs peeked over crimson flesh, littered in mucosa and what may have been tears, on better skin. Both of his arms had been ripped out of the shoulder sockets; crossed at the wrists, they stood over his open ribcage, showing off pulsing viscera.

“I wanted to apologize — personally, sir,” Chuuya started off, hands crossed behind his back, head low. “For the accident. At the Hospital.”

“Mmh?” Mori called, distracted. “Oh, that. Dazai already responded for it. No need to worry.”

He frowned. “But he —“

“I apologize for the odor,” he continued, undeterred. “He’s ingested something we need. Plus, Dazai’s always rather methodical with it, isn’t he? He tortures like a doctor would. Wonderful to study. We do have entire archives on the matter.”

If he squinted, Chuuya could see it — the back of Dazai’s coat, as he leaned over the chair that man had been tied to. The unenthusiastic light in his eyes; the clever way his hands worked over wounds given too fast.

I wouldn’t say he enjoy it, Kouyou had said, once. I wouldn’t say he doesn’t take some pleasure from knowing he’s good at it, though.

“And he’s writing them?” he asked.

Mori shrugged; winked. “At least he isn’t under a bridge. Don’t you agree?” Chuuya didn’t speak. “Look at this. Revolting, isn’t it?”

He crossed his arms over the cold metal of the stretcher’s side, studying the imperceptible rise and fall of the man’s chest — the way the motion leaked some more blood from the gauzes Mori was pressing on it. “I think I’m a bit desensitized to it.”

That was how Doc had always talked about it. De-sen-si-ti-zed. It was a good thing, according to him — better than being horrified by your own living, he would say, whenever Lippman attempted to philosophize about it.

“Certainly,” Mori conceded. “When you first awoke in Suribachi City, were there bodies?”

Something in his tone caught him by surprise — the earnest curiosity; the longing, almost, sharpening his tongue. A fool raising cocoons inside a sealed glass, only to sleep the whole day when they became butterflies.

“Not really,” Chuuya offered. The planes of bones peeking from the man’s body could have been metal roofs and the roads of a crater. “Most of them were covered by debris and remains. Limbs, maybe. Lots of blood. But I —“ Those first days were as blurry as he imagined birth itself must be to those who remembered it all; only the claustrophobic, starving feeling of climbing out. “I think I stayed under the rubbles for a long time. There were already people working on getting the ruins off, when I got out.”

“It was all volunteers, wasn’t it?”

He scoffed. "Everything that happens in Suribachi City is volunteers. The Government hasn't given a shit about us, ever," Chuuya picked at a loose leather thread of his gloves; when it was ripped off, he said: "About them."

Them, he thought. A jacket from a kid much taller than him and six feet under; the way Shirase hadn't turned back even once, after he had gotten on that boat. Them, them and you. You were never one of them.

Mori's amusement came out of a single huff of breath. "I saw you boys' fliers. And the graffiti."

He attempted to sink his nails in the metal. "Well," he said, curt. The idea of Mori staring at the sight Chuuya's name made next to the words traitor and killer and Mafia's most unsuited dog wasn't particularly gratifying; the rage it would take to convince him it wasn't true would mean too much. "Unfortunately for the artists, this isn't a democracy. They don't get a vote."

A nod, distracted. "No, they don't. But free propaganda isn't always useless. I'm sure our Dazai will take plenty advantage of it."

"I'm sure Dazai commissioned the fucking graffiti," he muttered, eyes on the corpse's shattered teeth. The bastard couldn't even punch — no way he hadn't asked someone from the Secret Unit to do it for him.

"Mh," Mori echoed, like he didn't exactly agree. "Why do you think it isn't, anyway?"

"What?"

"Why aren't we — or any syndicate in the underground, to be fair — a democracy?"

The idea seemed laughable. He tried to give the picture justice — a crowd of the Mafia's suited, sharp-teethed bodies lining up to put their votes in a box. The idea of any head that hadn't bent to write Mori's name not being cut off.

"Your Sheep had something of that nature, if I'm correct," Mori recalled. "A Council?"

He kept his eyes on the wet bones. "Yeah."

"Why don't we?"

The Executives are there, he considered saying. It seemed even more laughable — no one would compliment a king's jewels, if not to gain something from the king himself.

"Because people don't really come here for power," Chuuya concluded, at last — recalling, for a moment, how endlessly sincere the weight of the ground had been under his knee, after a life spent being pointlessly called a king. "They come because they want to be given a direction."

Mori's scalpel didn't pause; it was clear his answer had caught his attention, though. "Then why do you want the Executive position?"

Be grateful, Kouyou's tone tutted, clear as the starry sky. Be careful.

He shrugged. "Because the view is better from high up."

The man tilted his head to the side. Blood had reached the edges of his gloves; never his white sleeves, though. "The view of what?"

Chuuya thought of Ōmu's wings spread over the one window Albatross had never gotten to fix; thought of the stranger crowds at the Old World, and how gently they stepped over tiles he had watched his friends bleed out on. That was the life of the Port Mafia — constantly moving on.

"Everyone," he said.

A hum of consideration. "Here," Boss said, handing him a strange toll. Chuuya got the feeling of having passed; he just didn't know what kind of test. "Keep these two sides of skin separated. Not like — Yes. Like that. Wonderful. And how's your squad?"

"They're..." The memory of Noguchi and Kenta's destructive arm wrestling competition from the night before, as they waited for the girls to be done with the infiltration, came to mind. Chuuya had beaten them both. "Working on it."

This time, Mori's curled eyebrow was more teasing than anything. "Your missions have been more than successful."

"They work fine together," he muttered, not quite meeting his gaze. "Some of them are a bit resistant to the idea of collaboration. Or orders. But I'm working on it, sir."

"I'm sure you are," Passing by his knuckles, Mori tapped on each of them, before going back to his work on the intestines. "It must feel strange."

"What must?"

The doctor studied him in that distant way of his — a fortified glass between them, and no guarantee on whose protection it was ensuring. The scalpel was abandoned on the stretcher; Mori set to removing his gloves, a half mocking smile mercifully tilting his lips up.

"You know, Chuuya," he started, "You have always given me the impression of someone who could not stand holes in the fabric."

Chuuya detested metaphors. "You should have seen my clothes in Suribachi, Boss."

He laughed, which felt good enough. "Not quite what I meant."

A screech. "I know, sir."

"Well," he echoed. "There is this rampant need in you to — have everything covered, let's say. I understand how the Flags' absence might have put you in need of a — different support system," His smile grew slightly too kind. "That's why I suggested to Kouyou that this little project might help you out."

He could do nothing more than stare.

Not everything has to be rage, one of Verlaine's diaries had sworn, in lines written in skeptical ink. Arthur swears so. Some of it, he says, can simply not have a correct answer.

Chuuya felt eight again — full of things to explain, full of accusations to defend himself from; incapable of shaping up even a single one. He was too short compared to all of them; he didn't know enough words. They wouldn't believe him, because people believed what they saw only — a bloodied thing swearing it hadn't killed. A questionable being, swearing it knew how to mourn, and not just how to lose.

His voice sounded miles away. Blankly, he said: "My squad isn't the Flags."

Boss made a sound, waving one hand. "No, no. Don't misunderstand. I'm well aware. I merely feel like this might be a good chance for you. A second one," His smile was kinder; he studied the hesitant downfall of Chuuya's stiffened shoulders, and added, soaked in a regret he didn't know if he should call sincere: "I am sure the Flags are more than proud of you."

"I'm not sure the Flags can be proud of anything they're not here to witness."

Mori hummed, pulling new gloves on. "I think you're underestimating the faith the Flags had in you," When his eyes flew up to his face, the man pointedly, teasingly directed his own to the gasping body between them. "I have many proofs of it. They came forward with — well. Several and more opinions on you and your future."

Chuuya frowned, dubious. "The Executive position was meant for Pianoman."

"Yes," the man confirmed. "That isn't quite what I'm referring to. But — Oh, look. Look, it's happening."

All his attention was stolen by the body — the uncontrollable spasms that were going through its exposed viscera, wetting bones and drooling red blood and yellowish liquid onto the stretcher. The man's expression was hardly findable in between the ruined flesh and the blood tears; the whines out of his lips were infernal. When his rolling eyes managed to find Chuuya, they begged.

Curiously, Mori pinched the edge of his lower lip. The whine grew into what could have been a scream. Chuuya tried to look away.

"Isn't that marvelous?" he commented, all rationality and uneuphoric glee. He grabbed one of Chuuya's hands; didn't wait for his hiss to lay it on the trembling organs under the first layer of ruined flesh. "Look at this. Despite it all — alive. Some call it the miracle of life — I don't think it's the right terminology. It's purely a good machine."

Mori's fingers curled around his knuckles, pressing a bit further into that nauseating warmth — he looked up at Chuuya like he knew he found it familiar, in that way that Arahbaki poisoned each time.

“All that is life,” Mori insisted, refusing to let go of his eyes, “Is breathing and beating. There is nothing to fear as long as that exists. It isn’t a miracle. It’s only the art of being clever enough to make sure everything keeps breathing, and keeps beating, and keeps being.”

He couldn’t look away.

Viscera twirled underneath his gloves, only the naked tips of his fingers sinking in the meat. It made the blackened lines hidden under his sleeves retreat, he thought — made the constant ache of his teeth grow more stubborn, aware of the vicinity of something. There was no point in ruining the already ruined — Chuuya had sworn and sworn it, hanging from an electrical spear and meeting N’s eyes from behind a fortified glass.

When Mori asked, eyes still on him, hands still on his, “How’s Corruption, then?” Chuuya didn’t feel an ounce of surprise.

How was Corruption — always the same. The studies in The Alley; the missions Mori could not know about; his decaying arms. They had been gathering data on healing and fighting times, and whenever it seemed better, it changed again. It was too late to accept inconsistency as a factor, though — too late to accept that all those corpses and all those new scars and Dazai’s eye as he bled out had meant nothing at all.

“Nothing I can’t take, sir,” he offered.

Mori nodded, slow. “Your body is more than capable, despite — the circumstances. I was referring to your mind, actually.”

Chuuya made a face. “‘S fine.”

“Dazai seems to believe you —” A pause. The Boss seemed to consider something; at last, a tad too casual, he concluded: “Nothing, I guess.”

“No,” he insisted. Dazai had been in that room, days before — called in for a crime they had both been guilty of. Who knew what kind lies he had spread to save face? “I would like to know.”

Mori waved the matter away. “Ah, nothing, nothing. If you tell me you’re fine, I believe it,” He removed his hand from his own; it took Chuuya a beat too long to take his, as well. “Should you not be, though — If something about this ordeal is making you hesitate —”

“I’m not.” Was that what Dazai had said?

“I know,” the man assured. “But should it happen — Just remember what I told you.”

His hand — wrapped in bloodied rubber and bad intentions — reached over the corpse; it pressed flat onto Chuuya’s chest, fingers spread and palm weirdly still over the summer sweat stains of his waistcoat. The sound of the man’s heartbeat echoed in Chuuya’s throat; he clenched his hands around the stretcher.

“If it breathes,” Mori said, low, the infinity in his eyes tasting like every road in Yokohama. “If it beats, if it moves — it is life,” Even lower — as if walls and little girls that weren’t real could snitch, he added: “No matter what any sacrilegious deity might whisper in your ear.”

Chuuya felt his jaw twitch. He wanted to look away; he couldn’t.

“He’s not a god,” he said, because he said it every morning and every time he was about to fall asleep. “Nothing about this is holy.”

This, he thought — destruction and blood and chronic back pains and Dazai’s face and the way Koda never stood too close after Corruption and Verlaine’s diaries under Rimbaud’s bed. Nothing was holy; it merely was.

“I think there’s something holy in everything that has power,” he replied, with the ease of someone who had been cursed before. Chuuya had thought about killing him three times, before. “Otherwise, we wouldn’t look for it. People come to the syndicate for a direction — not for power,” Mori shrugged. “Isn’t there faith in that, as well?”

---

...

---

The Sparkling Twilight was a mess of fireworks, parades and running children in kimonos, blurred by the windows of Takasekai’s most famous casino — and the one establishment in the city not owned by the Port Mafia — The Flower.

“I’m pretty sure Ace has a picture of this place printed in his office,” Dazai’s voice offered, from the in-ear. It sounded muffled; Chuuya bet it had to do with the dog sticker the boy had stuck on it with hyper-strong glue. “He throws darts at it whenever Mori forgets to scratch behind his ears at the end of the day.”

“Gossip later,” Chuuya ordered. Darts?, he wondered, subtly. “Worry about actually telling me the plan.”

“I told you I have four bullets,” The sound of a rifle being cocked rumbled through the in-ear. “I told you you have only one. I told you the KK Company has an Ability User they call Godai. You can make up the rest. On your right.”

“Ah, thank you,” A woman in a blindingly shimmering green dress offered, appearing from his right, grabbing a glass from the silver tray in Chuuya’s hands. “May I ask after the appetizers?”

The Flower had slippery white marble floors and lights shaped like blooming petals — a beacon of strangely intense light, twirling all around the men’s jewels and the women’s gowns. Tables over tables of tricking games surrounded the dead center of the room — a bar platform, its counter climbing inside five floors of open balconies.

From the outside the place was shaped like an upside down flower, edges lit in floor lights — it made the walls sunken, tilted in strange angles, giving the whole place a sense of tightness Chuuya couldn't help but frown at.

Perhaps it was the waiter uniform. Papillons weren't exactly his style.

A shape at the corner of his eye caught his attention.

"There's Bishop Staff's members here," he tsk- ed into the in-ear, subtly, making his way over to more crowded tables. "You'd think the assholes would be inconspicuous enough not to wear those weird capes in the open."

They looked like a small group — the more he searched, though, the more scattered silhouettes in white tunics and greyish hoods, covering the back of their heads all the way to their shoulders appeared. White masks hid any thought on their traits; their body motions were extremely calm.

Chuuya would have recognized them with one both eyes missing — the subjects of one of the many pictures Kouyou had hung to her office walls with sharp knives.

"I think that's exactly the point," Dazai replied. "As for them being here, I'm not surprised. Takasekai's possible alliance with them is not confirmed by any means, but I believe nights like this are trying grounds. One deals in bodies and the other in faith. Quite similar, yes?"

He grunted.

["Takasekai is the richest of the quartet," Mori said. The dossier he was scamming through overflowed in macabre, furtive photographs of beat up, vacant-eyed people, staring straight into the camera. "They didn't outrightly support the Nine Rings, but we have suspicions that they might have freely offered them weapon funds, right before the attack at the Headquarters."]

"Each minimally high-placed member of the organization was once a Senator, or a Governor, or some vaguely relevant name in our panorama," Dazai intervened. "It certainly doesn't bode well with the human trafficking accusations the current Government wing faced in the last decade — but it makes it difficult to act against them. They're all beloved public figures."

"Beloved politicians?" Chuuya echoed. "Nice oxymoron."

Dazai made a face. "You know what that is? You were serious about liking poetry?"

"Boys," Mori sighed. "As I was saying — Their support to the Nine Rings is still a dubious tassel, but my instinct tells me it is a correct one. The Port Mafia's relationship with Takasekai has always been the most conflictual. They would gladly welcome a chance to bring us down."

“And, well,” the man added, some moments later, turning his head to study Elise’s pale fingers — twirling around the house doll she had dragged to the meeting room. “I am rather curious about these rumors about a collaboration in the Bishop’s Staff’s thievery.””].

“Well, what did the pendrive say?” Chuuya questioned, swiftly abandoning his filled tray in the empty hands of a passing waiter. He reached for Hirotsu’s stolen lighter. “How involved are we supposing Takasekai are in this girl-stealing business?”

“Seriously, Slug, you shouldn’t smoke over innocent people’s amuses-gueules —“

“If you think a single asshole inside this room is innocent, you seriously need to brush up your people-reading skills,” he replied, blowing out a mouthful of smoke. It was barely heavier than the smell of the atmosphere — the crazed haze all over losing hands; the mercilessness of the faces announcing punishments.

Executive Ace’s Casinos granted jewelry collars and a Port Mafia ownership to whoever was stupid enough to accept the bet. This place, he considered — watching as a screaming, wide-eyed couple in clothes just a tad too nice to be truly a good brand got dragged towards the backrooms — had no use for people who weren’t good at cards.

“Do you think they’re giving them girls?” Chuuya muttered, more to himself than to Dazai. “Or doesn’t it count if the Bishop’s Staff’s isn’t the one to get them?”

“I doubt they’re concerned with merit,” Dazai sniffed wetly, as he had relentlessly been doing ever since The Well Accident — a mixture of a fever he wouldn’t admit he had, and his tendency to wipe his nose on the back of Chuuya’s coat. “On the pendrive — Well. Look.”

On the small wooden stage on the other the end of room — the wall it leaned against a floor to ceiling screen, psychedelic in its jumping images of cartoonish suited men signaling the highest win of the hour — a condenser microphone was being swung around by a grinning woman in red.

Her words were a compact, gleeful knot Chuuya couldn’t figure out — eventually, though, she waved her hands to the screen, where the picture of a blank-faced woman in a simple white dress appeared, framed by a randomized number.

Chuuya felt his brain screech to a halt.

“ — only twenty one years old, sirs, still in her prime!” the red-dressed woman was saying. All the crowd of Champagne-drinking people around the stage aaah- ed in awe; the Bishop’s Staff, though, had their arms crossed. The presenter’s eyes were only on them. “Daughter of a wealthy master down at the oil factory, she —“

“These pieces of shit are betting on the girls,” he said.

“According to the pendrive, they’ve got six hundred and forty two faces to pick from, this month. Only twenty percent of them Japanese,” the voice in his ear offered. Then, a bit distracted: “You know, this roof is very high. I don’t think I’d get away with a few smashed bones only, for once.”

Tsuchiya had gotten the pendrive out of him, Chuuya recalled, in a fruitless effort not to blow them room up. She hadn't said a word while she did it. She hadn't let him die either — Chuuya didn't know if he was to blame for it. Maybe she had simply felt too merciful to kill a man who had willingly let her sedate him.

Maybe Chuuya had just stood too close to the basement table they had laid him on.

“Those four bullets of yours,” he heard himself say. A new picture had taken over the screen; the round-faced girl pictured in it couldn't have been older than sixteen. “Who's lucky enough to die that easily?”

“I already told you, Corruption isn't a good idea tonight.”

“The whole point of these missions is —“

“ — not this.”

“You're playing sniper with a broken arm,” Chuuya snapped. “I'll decide what's a good idea.”

“And you breathe like you have a broken fan in your ribcage,” Dazai replied, unimpressed. “I don't exactly know how to tell you this, but you're no use to the syndicate if you're a bundle of viscera and squeaking dog noises.”

He set his jaw, eyes searching across the crowd of suited men. Five bullets in total — Godai. A way to make sure the KK Company would be blamed for what had happened. An excuse to use Corruption; an excuse not to use it. A way to make sure Dazai wouldn't be at reach when —

Don't be stupid.

“This isn't the night to take down a whole syndicate alone,” Dazai concluded.

Chuuya threw the cigarette on the ground, stepping on it, before making his way to the stage. Godai, he insisted. Where had he read about that name? Why would a KK Company member ask to be referred to as such? “Who better than us.”

The other boy huffed. Then, the in-ear went silent.

Given he couldn't be certain he hadn't just ripped it off and threw it off the roof, Chuuya set to exploring the ground floor, looking for a flicker to awaken the answer on the top of his tongue.

It would have been easy to blame drunkenness for the sheer volume of laughter and bets raining down his ears, the deeper he travelled inside that betting crowd — but each glass a man or woman took from Chuuya's tray stayed filled. Most of the attempts to claim by people who weren't Bishop's Staff went nowhere; whenever one of the quiet, hooded silhouettes raised their hands, though, the girl immediately disappeared from screen.

They had a tendency to pick women with a strong background — girls the red-dressed woman described as Ability Users, good fighters, or a bit too stubborn to tame.

“Your prizes will all be waiting in the vans outside the Casino,” the presenter assured, with a wink, when one of the winners demanded to give a real taste test to his latest buy. “I can assure you, our pictures do not lie.”

It was right as he started to get bored — spitting in the Champagne glasses before giving them out — that he saw the first man.

Irritation choked him.

He pressed his hands on the in-ear. “A joke on fucking elements, seriously?”

No answer came. Chuuya had the feeling it was more of a decision than a necessity.

From then, it was easy. His eyes traced the lines of the flame-shaped tattoo on the man’s nape — thick lines of black curling in a style too similar to the Takasekai’s symbol one, barely bigger than a palm — and memorized it; then he set to go look for four other signs.

The fucking text Ane-wan had us copy in the green house, Chuuya seethed, by the time he had managed to find a woman with a water tattoo on her arm and a man with a stylized current of wind on his cheek. Godai — the five elements in Japanese Buddhism.

“You’re telling me this KK Company freak goes around killing people related to these five elements only?” Chuuya whispered, as he made his way between two tables of bets, following a thick glasses-sporting woman with an earth-like symbol on her knuckles. “What does that even mean?”

“I know a girl in the Port Mafia who only kills people with a numerical tattoo somewhere on their body,” Dazai answered, finally. “It’s not good manners to judge others’ obsessions.”

You started laughing like crazy, Dazai had explained, after one of the dead-on-start attempts at controlling Corruption in The Alley. Chuuya’s body had been mostly irresponsible from the sudden shock of silence. The boy’s hands were under his armpits. We don’t have funds for mental breakdowns.

We don’t have funds for fucking aspirin, you simpleton, Chuuya had replied, biting his lips not to laugh — or curse out. One of the stitched up holes in his chest had reopened slightly. It sneezed whenever Chuuya breathed. Worry about your own psyche.

I am, the boy had assured, panting. At last, he had landed him on the stairs. You’re deteriorating it. My brain cells, too, but that’s not — And then it had been too uncoordinated, and the wrist bone Chuuya had only scratched broke for good, and whatever sound had left his mouth had shut Dazai up.

“I swear to God, you goddamn mummy,” Chuuya hissed, looking around for the last tattoo. “You need to learn to simply tell me —”

“Oh,” a voice spoke up, somewhere behind back. “Le Roi des Assassins.”

On the stage, the red-dressed presenter cheered, as the golden-eyed teenager on screen got sold off to a bored member of the Bishop's Staff. It was a wonder, — Chuuya thought, as distant as the waves from the heart of the city — how many girls could simply be erased. How many screws and mechanisms kept a city alive; how many things he couldn't see coming.

The man was white, and older than time. There was a strangely grainy texture to his eyes — something blurred and candid. Blind, Chuuya concluded.

“Oi,” he answered, brusque. “You’ve got the wrong guy.”

“No, no,” the man assured. The tilt of his tone was unmistakable — a badly accented, French lined Japanese. When he stepped forward, he made his way to Chuuya with no hesitation or cane; on his chin, blurred by rolls of wrinkled skin, was the tattoo of a black filled circle. Fifth element — void. “My eyes may not work well anymore, but I never forget an aura. Roi, es-tu venu pour me tuer?”

His mouth was dry. There was a hiss in his ear — Dazai's voice. Chuuya knew the taste in his mouth too well — knew that old man wasn't his brother, and knew the floor didn't even look like the Old World's one, and knew Murase had died for something, but wasn't quite sure what.

King, have you come to kill me?

“I'm not him,” Chuuya concluded. Again, like a mantra: “You’ve got the wrong guy.”

“You are him enough,” the man insisted. “I am hardly picky. Do you mind offering me your arm? I would like to converse with my Reaper.”

“I'm not —“ going to kill you, he was about to say. It died on his tongue at the last moment; he studied the calm lines of the man's face, unhurried and certain. A man who had met Verlaine and had survived — in the past months, Chuuya had slowly come to decide that wasn't quite possible.

Aren't you alive?, Tanaki had argued, when he had offered that concept, once. Chuuya lacked words to say — whoever met him, isn't me.

He could hardly afford that old weakness — could hardly afford a body that had only fought back at the last moment.

“Chuuya,” Dazai called, from the in-ear. It was clear he had his eye on them, through the rifle — it wasn't clear how much he knew. On the stage, another girl got taken. “Don't forget.”

How can I?, he wondered.

He offered the man his arm.

Swiftly, they ended up on the first rows by the stage. It was clear the man could only follow the descriptions the presenter was enthusiastically following — his lips were pursed in a whistle that grew a bit more curious whenever another girl was sold off. His arm was an unshakable weight.

“It’s not an easy feat, surviving him,” Chuuya ended up saying, once he got tired of attempting to read the scars under his eyes. “Why would you risk meeting him again?”

“You couldn’t kill me,” the man replied. “I made more than sure of that. You took my eyes, yes — a terrible disgrace for someone with my gift. It was made for savouring, you see — And you made sure I never would again,” He tilted his head up in his general direction; offered a smile of teeth that had to be fake. “But I scared you, even just a bit. I think that it is much to ask from a god.”

“He wasn’t a god,” Chuuya spat out, a bit angrier than he had intended to. “You’re ancient, old man. You should have seen enough in your life to keep from divinizing every idiot who’s capable of spilling blood.”

The man hummed. “Are you a god?”

“No.”

“Could you be?”

“Is there a need to?” he questioned. “Will you only accept to be killed by one?”

Another girl appeared on screen. She was the first of the bunch to be smiling, even if just an inch — a clearly panicked expression. Yuan used to laugh nervously at every shooting attack; she used to cover her ears and only ever look at him.

“My name is Leconte de Lisle,” the man offered, once the applause had died down. “I am not very good with religious zeal. But I am good with regret. Aren’t they quite similar?”

Think, Chuuya hissed at himself. The name was too familiar. Takasekai’s Ability Users were international — they had allies everywhere, as long as the money kept flowing in. A man who Verlaine had met. A man who hadn’t been killed by him. A man relevant enough, that his and four more kills would equal, to Takasekai, what the destruction they had caused to the Shadow Blade and the KK Company had meant.

“ — next one will leave you quite shocked!” the red-dressed presenter was announcing. “A face well known in the underground of our lovely city; a name few haven’t heard, if involved in the affairs of Su—“

“Death of a Poet,” he said, suddenly. The pile of documents on Kajii’s desk; the blurred lines in one of the least controlled pages from Verlaine’s diaries. “You’re the Ability User who was expelled from France.”

“My lord, you know that already,” Leconte replied, only barely surprised. “You were there when they exiled me. Heavens, I believe you might have suggested it yourself.” He looked around the room; sighed, a bit dejected. “Japan is a good land, luckily. But any place is the same. Regret is the one thing men carry around wherever they go. More than love, more than hatred, more than fear —“

When he looked at him, for a moment, Chuuya got the feeling that he could really see him — him, or whatever was closest. His smile was kind in the way of tiredness — pity for blood he had walked over again and again. “You can never escape the sound of those you’ve left behind, can you?”

“Look at those eyes,” the presenter said. The jingle playing under her words was strangely familiar. “Look at the stubbornness in them. Don’t we all need a fighter, these days?”

Death of a Poet, Chuuya thought. Death of a Poet. Death of a Poet. What did the paper say? It manifested something. It turned the world until —

His in-ear creaked. “Now.”

The sound of glass breaking barely echoed under the music of the Casino — the breathless thump! with which the man with a fire symbol on his nape fell to the ground didn’t either.

The shouts out of the people around him seemed to shake the earth.

“Perhaps it isn’t that bad,” Leconte offered, pensive, like he hadn’t noticed. “I don’t believe regret means we ought to believe our actions wrong. Sometimes you just run — Sometimes you find other things to fight for. It’s in the nature of this world. Someone lives, and someone dies for it. Someone dies, and someone lives for it.”

The presenter was still talking. The jingle in the air was still familiar — a hum shaped by known lips; broken by the shimmering metal of braces.

The dance in Albatross’ kitchen, he thought. The night I came back from France. Dazai had been humming that exact same melody. But how had he know —

“Do you have a point?” Chuuya asked. He tried to extract his arm from his grip, amidst the screaming. The woman with the water tattoo fell next — the blood leaving her skull splattering on a game table. “Or are you one of those Gramps who spends hours talking about ridiculous hypotheticals?”

“Did you have a reason for it all?” Leconte replied, easily. “Or did you just need to have it?”

A third body fell from the balcony, pierced once in the throat — it landed on the bar counter with a sickening crack, scattering the nearby crowd like terrified rats.

“I’ll tell you, don’t worry,” Dangling a bit forward, the man’s warm breath washed over his face, blurring his vision. As one, his nails seemed to tear the fabric of his waiter jacket — sinking into his skin. “It doesn’t matter, l’Inhumane. Reason or not reason — it will never matter.”

A gunshot broke through the screams — the last man, right by the first row, fell, staining the presenter’s dress in a different red. Her scream was ear-shattering — she and the crowd ran off, feet and shoulders bumping against Chuuya’s still frame and Leconte’s sweet smile.

Chuuya raised his arm, still bleeding from his nails and still trembling out of his control, and sunk it through the man's chest.

He fell utterly easily — a strange feat, given the solemnity with which he had spoken. His eyes stayed white, and staring at the nothingness with the same sweet-lined, tired smile — Chuuya's arm dripped blood and remnants over his suit, and on the lips that had never traced his name.

"I'm not him," he snapped.

Leconte didn't answer.

Chuuya shrugged the blood off his arm.

"We're done here," he said, pressing on his in-ear, scrutinizing the nearly deserted Casinos — only the last hurried steps and terrified screams racing to the doors, distant like an echo. Behind the glass doors, the black vans the presenter had been talking about were leaving the parking lot, braving the chaos of the festive city. "We need to go. I destroyed the cameras, but we shouldn't —"

He trailed off. His eyes found the stage — its blood stains and abandoned microphone; the screen, stuck on the latest picture of a girl, framed by a six-numbers long code. 424933.

Chuuya had it memorized long before his eyes managed to meet the girl's ones — framed by reddish, short hair that reeked of dye even from a photograph. He recalled — like a street sign to slow down registering when he was already driving off the bridge — the presenter's praises. If involved in the affairs of Suribachi City.

They called her, I hear — the Queen of the Sheep. Isn't that just inviting?

Chuuya ran.

["The Bishop's Staff is a religious organization, although not one of any religion we have been able to identify," Mori explained, at last, settling his finger on a pentagon-like scribble on the map. "Their base is a Christian Church, but the facade only lasts for the morning. At night, they worship who they refer to as The Creator."]

"Sounds very Beatrice-y of a concept," Dazai yawned, gaining himself a stoic — pointed — look from Kouyou.

"The Creator isn't God," the Boss insisted. "None of the Staff cares about humans. In fact, I'd go as far as to say they feel nothing but contempt towards them. Their Creator is the artigian of something much more precious, in their eyes: Ability users."

"According to Odasaku, their life mission is to gather enough riches and enough power to force the Creator into returning to the world," Dazai explained, much later, eyes settled on the falling sun at the edge of the ocean. "With his return, a new wave of Abilities will be bestowed upon the disgusting cockroaches they believe normal people to be. A foolproof plan, certainly, if their stories didn't depict The Creator as an apocalyptic beast."

Hearing his name was enough to make him pause. “He knows of the Bishop’s Staff?”

“Oh, yes,” Dazai nodded, livelier than ever. “Dealt with them, once. He won, of course. They’re interestingly useless people, according to him. That makes me cautious. I can’t even imagine what kind of lunatics would manage to interest someone with such an exciting life.”]

Outside it was summer — in its sweetest, most burning shape. The Sparkling Twilight had been going on for two days of relentless fireworks and laughter, caged by the ragtag swarm of teenagers, families and couples filling the streets to the brim. He and Dazai had thrown rocks to the performers on the ships, only yesterday — and now Chuuya was running and was running, and the black vans were driving just a tad faster, and the sea of colors was never ending.

He tried to focus on any particular shard of that kaleidoscopic scenery — stalls of festival games and sea-food, vendors with shaved ice and sweets that would have sent Koda into a frenzy, lights hung up in intertwining threads across the square and the minor roads, lighting every inch of his eyes in fire.

No, he thought. His teeth creaked with the forcefulness he snapped them shut; a guttural, low sound abandoned his chest, the groan of machine and forced silence. There was no time to scream. No.

“Chuuya,” his in-ear called. “Chuuya, there is something wrong —“

“Don’t you fucking say,” he snapped.

He jumped over a bench; walked to the top of a street light, surveying the oceans of peoples in kimonos dragging each other into spontaneous dances — the stumbling children and the blooming flowers of light in the sky, bloodless explosions. The cars were getting further and further away.

“No,” Dazai insisted. There was an odd sound in the background — as if he was running too. “No, listen, I think it’s the —“

He bumped against a child in a dragon costume. One of the car windows seemed to lower only an inch — Chuuya saw red, and didn’t know how much of it was his.

A ship parade greeted him on the other side of the railing, marching through the reflections of fireworks in the water; a mikoshi one, blinding him with the golden portable shrines — tree frogs, mythological lions and boats. A marine rescue demonstration attracted kids at the end of the bay, scenic screams from fake victims and heroic climbs from colorfully dressed heroes.

That was when Chuuya felt them.

“They’re caging you in,” Dazai called. His breath was tired. He was still running. “Little dog running to a dead end — Oh, won’t this be fun.”

He met the unfriendly eyes of a suited man mere seconds before a firework exploded behind his head. The crowd pushed the space between the two of them; Chuuya turned again and again, until he saw more suits than kimonos — realized, at the very last moment, that there was no fighting that wouldn't tear those festive people apart.

"A5158," the closest of the suited women spoke, his fingers on her in-ear. "Begin."

"Dazai, follow that van," Chuuya said, mind running. He could crack the ground — it would get the civilians to move. But there were too many costumes and too loud sounds — they would never make it in time. "Are you listening to me? Don't lose that fucking —"

Something fell on him, pushing him to the ground.

It was a confusing material — so heavy it mercilessly pressed his chest against the concrete, but filled with holes his fingers somehow didn't manage to crawl through. It was the same feeling he had gotten the first time he had forced himself to stay underwater longer than necessary — the utter silence; the mind-numbing pressure.

Abruptly, Chuuya knew that Tainted wouldn't work.

Legs surrounded his body, their shoes too shiny and bloodless for the words he could vaguely hear over the head he couldn't raise. He bared his teeth, uselessly attempting to fight the weight off of himself — a hand stuck something to his side, tickling in the way the scar on his chest and his spasming fingers knew too well.

Chuuya tasted nothing but lighting.

He didn't know if he screamed — he knew the tasers kept landing, and the voices kept talking, and Dazai's breath was a heartbeat in his in-ear. He kept his eyes on the van, driving away and away and away.

"Shit," he heard himself beg. "Shit!"

"Get yourself out," Dazai ordered, in his ear, in between electric shocks. The festive music filtering through his in-ear was too similar to the one Chuuya could hear under the Special Division men's voices. "I'm almost —"

"Don't —" Chuuya growled, quicker than even his lungs could bear. The lump in his chest was thunder — he recalled the moon from the end of a well, and a heartbeat under his palm, and Arahaki touches it all, and that stupid van — "Don't come too close, you —"

The taser struck again. The net shook with it, shakingly sizzling with electricity over every inch of his skin it was touching.

Van wheels, he thought, delirious. Gunshots. The men's shoes — their bodies, dropping on top of him. A single voice. Van wheels. Van —

Chuuya opened his mouth, and Corruption was the last thing he felt.

[Chuuya was eight, was twelve, was fourteen, was fifteen — was trying to stay awake. There was a blade in his side and blood on his hands; there were familiar eyes piercing him from thrones he couldn't remember watching them build — but they were too well crafted and too never ending, and no rancor could be born from thin air.

No hatred so deep, he thought.

But Chuuya was eight and twelve and fourteen before he was fifteen and alone, and he remembered watching the sunset, every single day, sitting on the walls upside down. A golden fireball that leaves and comes back every single time, they had explained to him, when he had asked. We call it the sun.

Sometimes she would join him. When she was feeling particularly whiny — when Shirase had pissed her off; when Momo was too busy robbing passersby. He wasn't her last choice — but he knew there were many things she enjoyed more than a sunset.

Hey, she would tell him, without missing a beat, every single time. She couldn't sit on the walls or jump from buildings; instead, she would hug her knees right under him, welcoming the shade brought by his body. Under his wing — over the cliff — staring at him as he bled from the hole on his side — counting birds near the sunset.

Hey, Yuan would grin. Chuuya watched her disappear inside that van — it was the last thing he did. Remember when you ate cockroaches, that one time?].

Chapter End Notes

chuuya, rationally upset: that child has blades on their arm

dazai, put the blades there, blinking: you don't wanna know what "my ability is my ideal woman, a twelve yo" would have come up with do you first things first:

Shichigosan (a rite of passage for 3yo-5yo-7yo Japanese boys and girls, celebrated in November. The children wear kimonos, and it sorts of symbolizes a first "entrance to growing up)! I headcanon that the Flags would have jokingly promised Chuuya to take him to something in that vein, just to both make fun of him and allow him to live through something that was taken from him. Luckily, Kouyou is here to mend!

the five elements in japanese buddhism: air, water, fire, earth, and "void". Leconte Le Lisle, a contemporary to Paul Verlaine.

that little accent i put on mori saying the flags have "long since bet on chuuya" is a reference to the Cannibalism stageplay, where we got a new scene of Mori explaining why Chuuya was bound to become his successor (and revealing that the Flags, like most of the syndicate, had placed their trust in him)

WELL! nice to see you again. i hope you guys are liking the two-a-week schedule, because i should be able to maintain it (all that's left for this fic is to revise the last five chapters, and let's say it's taking some time.

but it's okay, we will manage!). i want to thank you again for all the nice words and the interest, though i am in a bit of a hurry today. you guys are very much half the reason i have the strenght to finish this brick of a fic. i hope you'll enjoy what comes next even more, and a have a great day!!

<3

THE

Chapter Summary

There's this dream I have,

Chuuya told one of Lippman's hundred faces on the ceiling.

There is blood all over. There's my hands. There is nothing else in the world.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xvi.

---

Case number: 77890567

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Nakahara C. and Dazai O. were tasked with the removal of
[...]*

---

There's this dream I have, Chuuya told one of Lippman's hundred faces on the ceiling — movie posters and memories. There's blood all over. There's my hands. There's nothing else in the world.

Nakahara Chuuya didn't dream, though — as such, because he was taught rationality at one point or another, he looked for other explanations. Lippman's face was too covered in makeup; it was framed by too-different wigs, completed by clothes too clean to fit even his most realistic movies. I am as chameleontic as an honest man can be, he liked to say, and as honest as a liar can afford.

Not a memory, he considered. So, then — it had to be a prediction. Foresight; good sense. If it wasn't there yet — it could be avoided.

Chuuya breathed in the dust, and opened his eyes inside a closed coffin.

It was mildly startling — the immediate understanding of where he was. The darkness had no shape and no weight; when he pressed his palms on the makeshift roof, the soft fabric was familiar enough to give him goosebumps. It had taken the men hours to put the Flags' bodies respectably into the coffins. He had never been one to let good work get wasted — so he had lingered by the coffins.

Chuuya always lingered.

This is how people like you die, Shirase had said, the first time he had witnessed a bullet pierce his skin. By not looking hard enough.

“Oi!” Chuuya snapped, rattling his hands against the lid of the coffin. The thump! thump! thump! was deafeningly endless, louder than his heart, pulsing against a concussion Chuuya had learned to recognize. For a single moment, haunted by the memory of the net, he forgot to attempt to use Tainted. “Fucking hey, I'm not fucking dead, you imbecilic bastards —”

The lid opened.

“He lives!” the most detested voice in his mind repertoire exploded, arms — cast or not — flagging around in obnoxiously astonished fashion. “Bear witness to the miracle of perseverance! He lives, my lord, he —”

Dazai's words got choked out of him right as Chuuya's hands enclosed around his collar — pulling him forward until he spluttered, all the red of his sunburned skin converging to singular spots of his face. His eye was lucid with the fever he had been pushing down all day; under the little golden light of approaching sunrise, filtering in through blurred windows in the Mafia's funeral building, he was a mirage of enraging blankness.

"You," Chuuya breathed out, utterly calm, clenching his fists so tight around his shirt he felt them tremble, "You —"

Dazai's eye ran up and down his face, as he struggled for breath. "Oh," he wheezed out, at last, hilarity and childlike wonder and jealousy alike softening his traits, "Oh, you really do fear it."

"What?"

He laughed. His blood boiled — he let go of him, brusquely, pushing him to land in between the pews as he did so.

The boy, curled over his MACKEREL splattered casted arm, immediately began to whine. Chuuya set his fingers over the edges of the coffin, breathing in more spacious air; he dragged his gaze over the darkened aisle of the funeral room, from the old chandelier to the empty frame that would have carried the dead one's picture.

Something rumbled in his lower sternum; he put his hands — firmly gloves-covered, as they always were after — on his stomach, searching the pull of stitches under his shredded waiter shirt. There were less than he had expected. A dry mouth and spasming fingers filled that lack; and the ache of burning muscles down his spine and thighs.

When he looked at his arms, they weren't black — reddened, thick scars, like branches and veins, dominated the skin instead. Chuuya could never forget their semblance.

"I was bored, waiting for you to wake up," Dazai justified himself, now standing on top of one of the pews, aimlessly twirling. "And I couldn't risk the Special Division spying on us going to a safehouse. This was closer," He shrugged. "And slightly more entertaining."

"Fuck you," Chuuya said.

"You may want to lay down."

"I'm not sleeping in a goddamn coffin —"

"You already have," he replied. "And you had three different seizures. You may want to rest, if you don't want a fourth one to lock you in there permanently," A sigh. "What a wonderful gift it would be."

"When I knock you out and bury you alive, I'm sure that will be even better," Chuuya swore, dropping back onto the crimson cushions of the coffin, once holding himself onto his arms grew too painful.

He gritted his teeth against it, again and again — disgustingly certain that his body was too young to creak.

The ceiling was littered in humidity stains. If he focused hard enough, he could hear the sound of the first engines preparing to rise with the sun — distant, the last song of owls. He couldn't recall the seizures, but he felt their weight like a physical pull, dragging his cheekbones down and filling his mouth with a horrible taste.

He thought of van wheels. It took him eons to find the will to speak again.

"She dyed her stupid hair red," Chuuya said.

In the middle of playing Hopscotch on the pew, Dazai hummed. "Does that qualify as meaner or nicer than effectively stealing your title? A nice survival technique — certainly a good way to attract the Bishop Staff's attention. But, still."

He took the hit for what it was — not a true attempt at cruelty. A sharp blade, all the same. "I don't know," he admitted. "I don't know if I care about either one," The chandelier was hit by a golden ray; it shattered in a thousand pieces, all of them blinding dots on the wall. Summer had always been prettier in Suribachi City. "I have to find her."

Dazai studied him.

"Why are we angering three fifths of the Five Moons?" Chuuya questioned, at last. "How did you know the music that played when —"

He trailed off. His fists were clenched; he thought it was too deafening to be anger. Perhaps it was merely an ache — the frustration of seeing the finish line, and realizing it was nowhere nearby.

"I had..." Dazai trailed off. Then: "I was keeping an eye on this Queen of the Sheep stuff."

His head pounded; he set his jaw. "And you didn't tell me, because?"

He didn't answer.

"The Five Moons —"

"We're dealing with them too."

"Boss will kill us."

Dazai's face was stubborn. Like it answered both questions, he concluded: "Not when he sees the results."

Easily, he jumped off the pew, uselessly scratching his arm over the scribbled cast — Oda Sakunosuke's handwriting still the only thing he knew of him — and pushed into the most pained spots of his body until Chuuya gave in, letting him lay next to him in the coffin.

"This isn't a two-place ride, idiot," Chuuya complained, elbowing him where he had held his wound under his palm only weeks before. "They already build these shitholes smaller than they're supposed to —"

“Dead bodies shrink,” Dazai recited, like he had been born to offer that piece of information.

“— they’re not made for two people.”

“But dying alone seems so boring,” the boy lamented, inconsolable. They fought for the right to have their arm over the other’s own, until Chuuya’s breath got too shattered and Dazai began sneezing. “It always did.”

He offered him his most revolted look. His hip was hurting, pushed strangely against the wood — the lid of the casket hovered like doom. For no particular reason, he held his body off Dazai’s, and let Tainted light his fingers up. “I thought dying with me wasn’t in the plans.”

“Never,” Dazai said, immediately horrified. “Not even if it’s the least painful death ever. No.”

“You tried to jump out of the car during the race against the KK Company,” he listed off. “You tried to stab yourself against Shadow Blade. You considered jumping off the roof against Takasekai. I was there.”

“You can be around,” he insisted, *tsk-*ing. “A good dog would mourn, singing along to the moon. I just don’t want you in my blood.”

Chuuya thought about the traces of grass sprouting between the rocks at the end of the well. Their crimson shade. The flutter of Dazai’s eyelids as he slept; the knowledge that he was devilish, and that Arahaki was just a tad more — something.

I’ve been in there, he thought about spatting.

Eyes on the ceiling, faster than doom, Dazai asked: “Why did you hesitate?”

He knew what he meant before his fingers could close around it. “I didn’t.”

“You did.”

“I was choking under an Ability-nullifying net,” Chuuya snapped. “And I was surrounded by civilians. Fucking sorry if it took me more than two seconds to get out the holy activation poem.”

Dazai’s eye traced his profile — he felt it like a physical thing; a race over the bridge of his nose. He didn’t turn; he remembered the scar by the boy’s eyebrow by memory. He could feel how feverishly hot he was even through the clothes, illness and summer and sunrise all the same — still, he wasted no time taking off his coat, gingerly laying it over the both of them.

Chuuya kicked it off. Dazai put it on again.

“Liar,” Dazai said, effortlessly.

He set his jaw, and didn’t answer.

Then: “Why didn’t you want me to use it?”

Dazai crossed his ankles; uncrossed them. He had to bend his legs a bit to fit inside the coffin — Chuuya wondered who it was meant for. He wondered where Yuan was — if Shirase would blame him for it. If Matsuda would.

“I think we’re done with Corruption.”

He seethed. “I think I get to decide that.”

“What is there to find out anymore?” the boy questioned — adorned in that empty inflection of his; meant to make one feel foolish. “The same useful nothings we have spent weeks chasing? We’re just weakening you — possibly, we’re accelerating a deterioration that is meant to be permanent. Mori won’t like that.”

“Boss —“

“Boss was punishing us.”

Undeniable. Chuuya had seen it in his eyes — Chuuya had felt it in every dead thud! in his chest; never waiting for help, but somewhat terrified to be left alone to bleed all the same. “He doesn’t do things that aren’t useful.”

“There is pointlessness in greed too, Slug,” Dazai scoffed. “There’s no controlling this. There’s no reeling in. You say those words. You break. If I’m not there, you die,” He shrugged. “That’s all there is to it.”

Coffin or not, it sounded as final as a funeral.

“You said,” Chuuya insisted, because he couldn’t recall the past, but he recalled everything of the present, “You said it was my choice.”

The boy didn’t hesitate. “It is.”

“And you think it’s the wrong one.”

“I think it’s not yours,” Dazai replied, with the same toneless voice he used to rattle off different discoveries from each time the chant left Chuuya’s lips — less scars and less seconds and less self-directed violence and less recovery time and less time for me to run. “I think it’s the syndicate’s.”

“I want what’s best for the organization,” he replied. His voice was a croaking nightmare; his nails full of dried blood. “I’m not like you.”

“You think you’re what’s best for it?”

“Better than you for sure,” Chuuya said, uncertain of whether he was lying or not. “That’s why I’ll be Executive.”

For once, the boy didn't argue. Instead, he elbowed and kicked until he managed to lay on his side, the collar of his coat brushing his lips over a layer of stubborn sweat — and blinked.

Huffing, Chuuya mirrored him.

“Odasaku had me bring Kazuko to a vet, a few days after I took her in,” the boy started. The sound of the man's name startled his curiosity — a bit unwillingly. Dazai was always secretive — he very rarely acted like that secrecy mattered to him personally, though. “Stunning woman. She was very kind when she refused my suicide proposal.”

He pinched the skin between his eyebrows. “You're gonna end up with restraining orders, one of these days.”

“I have two of those,” Dazai replied. “But they're for me. Mimiko just wasn't the same after she sent me that bomb. She knows I dislike death by explosion as a possibility.”

Chuuya stared. “What?”

“The vet told me this story about a woman who owned a pet snake,” he continued, calm. “She had brought him over to the store because it seemed like the poor thing had started starving himself — day by day, refusing to eat. Never a good idea for a snake. I catch rats for Kazuko daily, because I'm a great owner. And because Mori will get mad if she strangles a mafioso,” He frowned. “But the snake had also grown way more affectionate. He insisted on sleeping in the same bed as the woman. Snakes aren't very affectionate creatures — which I could argue against, but. Well. Her pet was suddenly all over her, every hour of the day. What do you think the vet told the woman?”

Chuuya raised his eyebrows, unimpressed. “Cover yourself in dead rats and wait until the beast gets the message?”

Dazai shook his head. “The snake was only starving himself in preparation. He kept lying next to her in an attempt to size her up — he was in a long term planning to eat his own owner,” His hand reached forward — snapped his choker against his skin, startling one of the electrocution scars. “She had to give him away. For some reason, it didn't sound like a good death to her.”

“Shit,” he commented, disbelieving. “She was just sleeping next to that hungry thing?”

“Don't be surprised. She loved it.”

“Love should stop at stupidity.”

“You think so? I rather believe it starts there,” Dazai turned onto his back again, pensive. As if tracing constellations, he raised his good hand, following invisible lines with his forefinger. “This place — it's a bit like that. I think. It might give you everything you hope for, but it will empty itself as well. The mistake is believing it an act of selflessness,” His hand closed; dropped onto his stomach. “It's just patient hunger. It's preparing to devour you whole.”

Offhandedly, for the first time that night, Chuuya took notice of his lack of hair clips — not a singular, funnily shaped pin. Then, a bit later, he saw the blood staining the wrists of his shirt.

He scoffed. It burned across his wounded lungs. “Are you warning me?”

Dazai glanced his way. With something like pity, he said: “I am, but I don’t think you get it.”

The lines of golden on the walls rose higher and higher.

“I do,” he swore, eventually. He thought about the Flags; about how proudly they had died for a starving beast — readying itself to claim their lives, after having digested the little they had existed for. “I just think you’re wrong.”

Summer would still breathe in and out. Chuuya would learn to die quietly, and Dazai to put viscera back into an unwilling carcass. Gloved hands would guide him through the process, passing the thread through the needle, because Dazai’s sole eye couldn’t see that good — bandaged wrists would allow him to sink his teeth into them, muffling screams.

In diametrically opposite ways, he insisted, they had no choice.

Dazai kicked his foot. “You’re buying us ice cream and Arcade tickets, when we manage to drag ourselves out of here.”

He seethed, knocking his foot again — harder. “Why do I always have to buy?”

“As far as you know, I’m younger than you.”

“Are you, even?”

“Who knows.”

Chuuya frowned, poking his ribs. “Are you even sixteen yet?”

He slapped his hand away. “Don’t be dense. I’ll tell you at the end of the year, or you’ll know which months to eliminate from your analysis.”

“As if I’d ever waste time analyzing you, ” he muttered. Then: “22th of September?”

Dazai gave him a look. “No.”

“3rd of May.”

“Dang!”

“17th of —“

“You’re not going to guess.”

“Statistically, I have to, eventually —“

A vein visibly pulsed on his temple. “You’re wasting time, that’s just silly —“

“Bet you’re one of those people who believe in the whole born under an unlucky star,” Chuuya insisted, mocking. “Is that it? Or do birthday hats look atrocious on you?”

A pointed look. “Hats look atrocious on everyone with a shred of good sense.”

“No, your head is just shaped like a lemon. Trust me on this. I’ve spent months with Kajii.”

“No, it isn’t —“

He snorted. It was funny, for a beat — it grew slightly less so once he felt something warm pool on his lips, racing down his chin in tandem to the sharp fit of pain in the middle of his chest.

“Ah,” Dazai sat up, unceremoniously parting what was left of his shirt. He pressed on his sternum with hands spread wide — over the sudden fall of blessed quiet, Chuuya heard nothing but the wheezing sound out of his throat and the wet crack of something that got his spine to stir, as if electrified again.

“That tickles,” he stuttered, choking on the blood in his mouth. A fit of coughs erupted from his wrecked chest; it was sharp enough to make the hands running down his sides pause.

“You punctured a lung,” Dazai explained. Chuuya stared at the light and wondered, not for the first time, if he blamed Mori for the duty to keep him alive. “Thought I’d fixed it while Hirotsu drove us here, but —“

He stared. “Gramps drove us?”

A glance. “Told him it was you. He came. Subtly threatened me if I let Mori get a whiff of it,” He cleared his throat, almost amused. Mori always gets a whiff. “Have to see how many more broken ribs you have left, but you need to be awake. Sleeping Beauty reenactment later.”

“I’m trying, piece of shit,” he hissed, between gritted teeth. The need to pass out as soon as No Longer Human activated had slowly weakened, which probably meant progress. Chuuya found that he missed it. Comfort, though, was a secondary concern. “What’s with you and fairytales? You didn’t,” He choked on his drool, gasping. “You — didn’t even know 101 Dalmatians —“

“What’s with you and that movie?” Why were they in a coffin? Where was Yuan? “A dog through and through.”

“Fuck you,” A pull — A twist. Something wet and warm and horrifyingly screeching; stuck so deep inside him tears gathered at the corners of his eyes — rage or grief. “Fuck you, fuck —“

“I know.”

Chuuya saw white.

“Hey.”

“Fuck.”

Very soft — a tone he wouldn’t remember; a strange reminder of what it might mean for a boy who wanted to die to dutifully vigil over a corpse every single night: “Chuuya.”

“Slap me,” he vaguely heard himself pant. “If you see me close my eyes, slap me.”

Immediately, a palm connected with his cheek. It was unnecessary — his eyes, though glossy and shaky, were open — but it did wake him up.

Dazai was always blurry, through a veil of the world minimizing itself to fit in his lungs again. Chuuya wanted him to stop looking. Chuuya wanted him to stand outside of firing perimeter. Chuuya wanted to gauge his eyes off and nullify himself, wanted anyone else to do this —

The worst of it, he thought, as he waited to actually regain feeling in his legs. The worst of it was the freedom.

Side effects came in bundles. Joy and rage were ephemeral and unculpable — he hid them deep in the space between the third and the fourth rib, where no mirror could stretch far enough to reach. Sixteen years of colors were easy on the eyes of the stubborn, and Chuuya knew the eye Arahaki had devoured was blind in ways most wouldn’t grasp. It saw; it didn’t wander.

“You hesitated,” Dazai noted, again. It rolled on the floor like Judgement Day. “Why?”

He swallowed, stubborn.

If it breathes, Mori had said. If it beats.

Then, gritting his teeth against the stupid effort, he reached up to lay a hand on Dazai’s chest.

The boy didn’t move. Graciously enough, he continued twirling his hands over his ribs, his eye running over options that included more than the stitching set on the first pew. Chuuya studied the lines of his dress shirt between his fingers, a bit red but never creased — the good quality of the fabric, just like the one Kouyou had forced down his throat. He wondered if Mori had given that makeshift uniform to him — if he ever felt the weight of the coat.

Nested underneath layers of fever-warm skin and thin bones — he lived in a shipping container, Chuuya remembered, unironically — he found a fluttering heartbeat.

No different from any other heartbeat, he considered. Doc had insisted every heart beat a bit differently than the next; Chuuya had called him a romantic with all the venom one could get on their tongue without choking. He had a feeling Dazai might like the notion, though — for someone who wanted to die, he did seem to believe life rather pretty.

If it breathes. If it beats.

Stable as it was, the heartbeat changed.

Chuuya frowned. “You need to give up on that shit.”

“I’ve almost mastered it,” the boy replied, tonelessly, pointedly keeping his eye away from his face. “It’s not that hard, really — a bit like holding your breath. I just need to figure out how to make two beats close enough to not perceive a pause.”

And then it’s D-O-N-E, his heart said.

He huffed, curling his fingers. “You’ll give your idiotic ass a heart attack.”

“That would be wonderful,” he said, overly elated. Whatever he had done, or whatever healing process he had prompted Chuuya’s muscles to start, it seemed to be working — with less flames running up his throat, he exhaled; not doing more than kick Dazai’s shin when he dropped next to him, crushing his shoulder. “Won’t it?”

As long as it isn’t Arahabaki who does it, Chuuya thought.

He paused.

He covered his face with his hands. “That’s so fucking stupid.”

A curious nudge. “What is?”

He shrugged him off. “That’s so fucking stupid,” he insisted, nauseous. “God. Shit.”

“Are you losing your mind again? I told you already, we don’t have funds for —” Chuuya shifted until he could lay his cheek on the side of his arm, retching as he did so. Dazai fell utterly, awkwardly quiet. “Ah?” He cleared his throat. “I’m not a pillow, you know —”

“Shut the fuck up and die,” he ordered. Every heart beats the same, he had told Doc. Arahabaki had no time to concern himself with buildings or innocents or the fragile layers of flesh of his vessel; he always counted heartbeats, though. Heartbeats meant blood; blood meant silence. A little exercise in memorization, Chuuya swore.

Dazai didn’t drop dead, but he kept quiet. His heart wasn’t saying a thing — it was, on the other hand, strangely upbeat. Most likely, Chuuya nodded, the fever was growing wilder.

Sunrise arrived in full bloom, raining inside the room with a light so golden it hurt on the eyes. The coffin creaked under their weight. At some point, some eons later, his heart’s rhythm began to change — framed by an hesitance a less attentive ear wouldn’t have caught.

Attempts. The proof that even prodigies — even alleged, braces-wearing, blank-eyes demons — had to start somewhere. If it beats.

Alive, he thought. That’s all there is. The rest is sharp teeth.

“Don’t show off,” he remarked — knew it was biting and unfriendly, like it only came natural in Dazai’s presence. But he had learned how to say Chuuya’s name with his heart. It seemed like a lot of effort; so, Chuuya vowed to remember it.

---

...

---

[Teeth brushed his ear. Nakahara Chuuya ordered: "Come find me."].

---

...

---

Present day.

"Dazai Osamu."

Dribbling the first rain of the summer from his raincoat, Chuuya looked down at the stunned Officer at the desk. "'This enough to bail the motherfucker out?'" he asked. "If not, you can keep him."

Upon the woman's frame, a bleep! blinked from a TV screen. A signal of some sorts — a group appeared from the entrance door of the Yokohama Central Police Station, carrying two men in black and handcuffs through the desks. Right as he spat on the police emblem on the floor, one of them happened to lay his gaze on Chuuya.

His eyes widened.

"The —" he stuttered, docilely allowing the men to drag him away, neck bending to follow him with his gaze. "You're — he's the —"

His companion kicked him in the side, ferocious; before the guards could tear them apart, he hissed: "Shut your fucking mouth —"

It took a hissing screech for them to disappear behind the corner — Chuuya, hands in his pockets, curled an eyebrow.

The Officer cleared her throat. Chubby fingers searched through the stash of cash he had abandoned under her nose; the banknotes had been acquired after selling Dazai's favorite seat from his office. If the woman noticed the smell of fish, she was gracious enough not to mention it.

Perhaps she couldn't smell it. The bustle of policemen and interns sagged the air with the sharp odour of corrupted righteousness — nauseating enough to remind him of Suribachi City, although he doubted any of those sanctimonious assholes in particular could have been begged to walk a step down the crater.

Only the most incompetent got sent to Suribachi.

"Relations to the prisoner?" the secretary dared to ask, tapping her pen.

"Thorn in my fucking ass."

The tapping came to a halt.

Chuuya stared at the lights on the ceiling. "Just write me down as his cousin or something."

"A cell phone number?"

He offered it.

"And three contacts, so that we can make —"

"Make sure you can contact us, make sure the jackass goes to court," Chuuya completed, obediently, scribbling the first made up numbers to come to mind. "It's two in the morning, Ma'am, and we're here over a mackerel and his pet snake. Can I just go grab him and leave you to your —" He glanced at the brick of pages in front of her. "— Book?"

She sighed.

From the dated red radio on the woman's desk, Hirose Fumiko's Did I Ever Save You? filled the murmuring room. Music on worksite isn't quite professional, Murase used to tut, sneaking to the stereo like it would compare to Chuuya's weekly crimes. And yet, isn't it a marvelous distraction?

His wet shoes dragged him to the hallway of cellbars. Behind the furthest of them, Dazai was a white and black bundle upon the bench, bending a bit more with every bored motion of his dangling leg. His coat was a makeshift blanket; on the floor, was a clean open pair of handcuffs — one the other inmates were gaping at.

Abandoned as he was, drenched to the bone from the ongoing storm outside, he could have been a corpse. Could have been Mori, too.

The man turned the key in the lock. Autumn-leaves eyes snapped to Chuuya and, abruptly, he was nothing more than a child.

“My knight in shining raincoat,” he cooed, pounding into him as soon as his squeaking shoes were done stumbling on the floor. August had come with furor and glory, revealing one of Dazai’s least amusing quirks — passing out while Chuuya was walking forward, leaving him unable to notice until the silence took a not-enough malicious note.

Low calcium, was his justification, filled with delight. Perhaps he believed he would crack his skull open during at least one of those falls. Or high calcium. Or maybe it’s tachycardia. Or maybe it’s the heat. Or maybe it’s your ugly face, shocking me to the point of unconsciousness.

“I knew you weren’t being honest when you hung up on me all rudely,” he was blabbering, still. “All those I’m not getting your ass out of jail and Go sink your teeth in wet cement and die and stuff. Pettiness doesn’t suit you.”

He didn’t hug him, because that would have been an incorrect term for the very subtle, very purposeful game of hanging-off-Chuuya that Dazai had slowly mastered in those last few weeks. “Last thing I need is murder allegations,” Chuuya offered, unimpressed.

The Special Division — with their nets and Chuuya’s taunts — would have loved the notion of his civil arrest.

“On the matter of things that don’t suit you,” Dazai continued, flagging his body like jelly, forcing him to carry both of them down the corridor. “I’m beyond glad you dropped the hat, but the question remains. Did you mean to leave the house dressed like Red Riding Hood, or —“

“I was with Ane-san, before you threatened to release videos of me bumping against light poles if I didn’t come bust you out,” he snarled, between gritted teeth. For peace of mind, he observed the stains his electric red raincoat was leaving on his shirt. “It’s the fucking Flood outside.”

“Mmh, ” Dazai agreed. “What’s one more divine omen? And you let her dress you up? Aw. You’ve got your little hood on and everything! I could cry with — ”

He dropped him to the ground.

Under the sound of his laments, he turned to the police officer, still studying the abandoned handcuffs. “We’ll be going,” he said, after throwing Kouyou’s other raincoat — a vibrant blue — onto the wiggling worm on the floor. “Where’s the glorified lizard?”

“Safely kept,” the man answered. “Animal Control will be arriving after the night shift.”

Dazai stilled. Looking up from under the plastic veil, he echoed. “Animal Control?”

The Officer crossed his arms. Adults weren’t supposed to all look the same, Chuuya suspected, but he still had to meet one that didn’t. “Surely you don’t expect us to simply give it back to you, young man?”

“Kazuko,” Dazai replied, pointedly, half in his raincoat and half in his Demon Prodigy attire, “Is a perfectly well behaved creature. How is it her fault if those braindead hoodlums ignored a command as simple as don’t touch the boa constrictor?”

Chuuya doubted that to be the full story. Dazai tended to be blind to most of Kazuko’s sensible wrongs — perhaps because Oda Sakunosuke had found her; perhaps because he missed those grasshoppers he’d sworn he used to own. Still — something about Dazai caring felt unnatural.

The Officer was still blabbering. “— And witnesses attest that you were seen freeing the snake —“

“Kazuko had one of her princess fits — she bit my arms, which is why I let her go —“

His eyebrows flew to his hairline. “You do understand that pets are to be removed from their owners’ care when they attempt to maim them?”

Dazai stared. “That won’t be a problem. I don’t even own Kazuko, legally.”

“Alright,” Chuuya intervened, raising two pacifying hands. “We’ll just go, yeah? You keep the thing. We’ll just — call Animal Services. Bye.”

“No, we aren’t —“

He paused.

Chuuya tightened his grip around his wrist.

“Yes,” Dazai said, obediently smiling up at the Officer — a terrifying sight for all the wrong reasons, but it was successful in forcing the man to take a step back. “Yes, we shall go. Thank you for everything — I had a wonderful evening in this beautiful cell of yours. Could you direct me to the storing of my personal belongings?”

The Officer frowned, suspicious.

Patiently, they looked at him.

“Fine,” he huffed. “Follow me.”

A wooden door at the end of the hallway was opened with a devilish screech. Dazai stepped on the man’s foot on his way in; Chuuya did his best to pretend not to be snooping around the most recent cases — particularly, information on the disappeared girls.

No red hair dye called his attention.

He hoped Dazai had just enough oxygen in his brain to steal at least one of the cigarettes abandoned in the lockets.

“Hey,” Chuuya started, slightly hesitant. “Is Matsuda working today?”

The Officer's lips parted.

"Here I am!"

Victorious, Dazai appeared on the doorframe, dangling a wallet that certainly wasn't his own and some poor fool's cigarettes in his hands. "Once again, it was a pleasure. I do hope you'll be able to fix your bathrooms. I did tell Tanaka not to eat my food — but he just wouldn't listen."

"If we ever get all the toilet paper out," the man grimaced, "I'll let you boys know."

"Must be hard to see all that shit while not looking in the mirror," Chuuya nodded.

Dazai nodded, too. "So sad. Let's go, Slug."

Any desire to demand answers disappeared as they walked down the corridor, and Chuuya was faced with the genuine horror dripping from the eyes of all the other prisoners. It was a different kind of fear than the one that had darkened the men's faces when they'd noticed him; more tactile. They'd stuttered around Chuuya, because voices traveled fast in the underground; but they were gaping at Dazai's skipping figure.

Or perhaps, he considered, watching as the boy rattled his knuckles down the bars, making the prisoners physically recoil, he sang Ninety Nine Hangman Knots the whole night.

It was then, belatedly, that the Officer seemed to understand what else was causing the ruckus among the lowlife jailbirds. "Wait a —"

Chuuya didn't stop walking. "Now?"

Eyes forward. "Obviously."

They ran.

At some point between their merciless slaloming and pushing through desks and tired police officers, someone was aggravating enough to activate an emergency siren. Kazuko, intertwined under Dazai's coat, bared her tongue at every gun being pointed in their direction.

Outside, it was pouring. It had to be way more violent than it had been when Dazai was brought in, because he yelped as soon as the heavy rainfall battered his body, making him stumble.

"Now you're grateful for that coat!" Chuuya screamed, as they slipped and crawled down the street, leaving the lights and the shouts of the police station behind.

"It's tacky!" he replied, securing the hood over his head. His voice was barely audible; he had to shield his eyes with a hand to even attempt to find him through that blurry curtain. "It's no wonder you're defending it!" A yelp, as Chuuya's push landed him ass first in a puddle. "Hey!"

Empty streets chased each other down the drain, devoid of car drivers willing to risk the weather and pedestrians with sturdy enough umbrellas. Placid puddles were shattered by their shoes, shredding the moon reflected in it in a thousand little pieces.

It was a fresh breath of air, richer than any fans or agonizing solutions to heat waves. Chuuya found that the rhythmic tap-tap on the plastic-like fabric of his coat grew more soothing with each stride he took; found that pulling each other's hoods down and watching Dazai twirl under the moonlight with a snake in his arms was somewhat exhilarating; somewhat aggravating.

Refuge came in the shape of a konbini — and the single, tired glance from the only cashier in the shop for the lakes pooling under their feet.

“She didn’t attack anyone,” Dazai insisted, curled inside the cart amongst the bags of food, patting Kazuko’s head. She rested her non-existent chin on his shoulder; eerily close to the arms Chuuya had crossed over the cart handle. “It’s not my fault if mediocre minds lower themselves to prejudice. She just wanted to show those kids how pretty she is.”

“She is a boa constrictor,” Chuuya pointed out. He floated a bag of chips in; kicked his feet up, settling them on the base of the cart. “And those were twelve years olds at a birthday party. You’re lucky your ugly face didn’t scare them more than the the literal poisonous beast —“

“I told you, she is not poisonous.”

“She could have strangled them.”

Dazai sniffed, conceited. “She’s no cheater. I’m the only one she will ever bring to the doors of death.”

“She’s certainly working to get you there,” he huffed, eyeing the red mark down his palms and neck.

Music played from some centuries old speakers — a background hum vibrating along to the lights and the thunder behind the glass entrance. Chuuya heard more than he was meant to: idle fingers turning pages from a magazine; Kazuko’s intakes of breath; the electronic buzz of Dazai’s phone in his pocket.

He closed his eyes.

Fingers skirted down the length of his arm, a senseless shortcut to another bag of chips — a clear path down rotten flesh they were both too aware of. An excuse, and a too obvious one at that.

“Which one is it?”

Which side effect, he meant, probably. He was pretty sure the boy kept a list, — weird voice when he’s recorded, it probably read; blood loss and scars; weird hands and weird fingers and weird everything — although he wasn't sure if it would have been worse to have it written down or just memorized. Chuuya toyed with the possibility of not answering.

"None," he said, finally.

"You're such a dishonest child."

"You're younger than me," he grunted, watching the lights through his shut eyelids. The cart kept moving. Then: "May 24th."

Dazai clicked his tongue. "Wrong again."

"June 3rd."

"Wrong."

"July 7th."

"Your chances for the day are over," The boy clasped his hands, startling Kazuko from her sleep. Apologetically, he patted her tail. "The weight of knowledge is a herculean one, but I cannot imagine such emptiness would leave your skull comfortable," He sighed. "Don't you ever get tired? It must be exhausting."

"Not more than being in your presence," Chuuya scoffed. "And not my fault if you're a freak. Who in hell goes as far as to delete any trace of himself from the system? What are you scared of, people knowing your blood type?"

"We live in a dystopian society."

Extracting something from the back of his pants, the boy threw a thick dossier into his lap. "Just to make sure you don't get any ideas of me owing you something for Kazuko's escape."

Holding the cart still, Chuuya looked down at the file. His eyes only made it as far as to the second line — he ripped it out of Dazai's hands, and snapped it shut.

"How," he ordered, "The fuck did you —"

"I know you went to the Bishop's Staff base, a few weeks ago," Dazai replied, kicking the end of the cart. "The question of why was pretty easy to answer, all things considered. Apart from it being a pathetic reason, it still doesn't change how stupid it was of you to go there."

Chuuya scoffed. "They didn't even notice."

"Unfortunately," he confirmed. "If they had, they would have killed you with a holy knife and then ripped your limbs off, leaving your torso and head to be sacrificed to the Creator," Dazai leaned the side of his head on top of Kazuko's. "Nothing ever ends well in my life." Irrked, he turned crossed arms on him. "And you broke promise fourteen."

He groaned. "I knew you were going to —"

“Unannounced solo missions are an unfair advantage to the competition,” Dazai insisted, speaking over him. “Your carelessness certainly gives me all the ammunition I need to ask Mori for more jobs than you — so that when he makes the right decision for the promotion, I can say that you made your own teenie tiny bed —“

“I didn’t even engage with them —“

“The Bishop’s Staff is a bundle of fanatics,” Pale, veiny hands halted the cart; the boy jumped out, almost bumping against the cleaning supplies shelves — leaning down to meet his eyes. “Are you familiar with the term? It means they’re a bit off their rocker. Those women you saw?”

“How do you —“

“The Staff intends to steal the children they will convince them to have,” His braces peeked through chapped lips, an unfortunate match to his tone. “They take women and girls who have nothing to lose and they indoctrinate them, convincing them to offer their body for their holy mission: birthing The Creator.”

Chuuya stiffened.

His grin grew. “Unpleasant, yes? They’re busy guys. Beatrice and the Nine Rings could have hardly convinced them to join. They have their own God. Which is why we couldn’t group them with the other Moons. Which is why, the plan was to leave them alone, for now —“

“For the last time,” he snapped. “It wasn’t a mission.”

“I know,” Dazai tapped one knuckle on the dossier between them. “That’s why I got you this, yes? Because it’s your business. Say, is Pink Hair at Albatross’ right now?”

“Dazai,” he warned.

“Although, I assume she’s not much of a Pink Hair any longer. Or did she find time to dye it, while she led whatever miserable life led her into believing she could scam the Bishop’s Staff with no loss or baby formula?”

Chuuya set his jaw.

“How did you even convince her? Knocked her out and dragged her by force? It’s be a shame if she were to —” Offhandedly, the knuckle he’d knocked on the dossier slid down. Ripped one corner apart; Dazai blinked in tandem. “Well. Be denounced for crossing territories.”

He pushed him off.

Enough strength was put in the impact to make him stumble backwards, clashing against shelves of detergents and birthing a hiss out of Kazuko — who immediately sank her teeth in his shoulder. It wasn’t enough to wipe the unsmiling amusement off his face.

The cart miserably skirted down the aisle. Electricity pinched his skin, thousands of needles — thousands of sounds he wasn’t even supposed to hear. Which one is it? All of them.

“Stay away from her,” Chuuya spelled out.

“How valiant,” Dazai commented, as he rubbed his shoulder. “It’s been weeks since you found her, though. Are you sure she still deserves your protectiveness?”

“I’m not fucking around,” A cliff, he thought, the ocean and the Arcade. Chuuya is dealing with an important Port Mafia matter, Dazai had said. Chuuya is his own person. What, did your friends betray you? “Keep your disgusting hands away from her and let me deal with this.”

“Why?” Bored, he blew wet hair off his forehead. “Are you scared I’m going to repeat the same trick twice? I’m not that interested in your life. And this is a train wreck in high definition. I have no reason to interfere.”

“This, ” He shook the dossier. “This is you interfering.”

“You needed her records for the last year and a bit, didn’t you? I was just helping you out. It’s clear Matsuda isn’t being very —”

“Refrain from it,” Chuuya ordered. “Things go to shit whenever you involve yourself in my business. This is already a delicate —”

“How delicate are we talking about?” Dazai questioned. Blue raincoat, soaked bandages — the gun in the back of his pants. “Did she already try to steal the sum of money promised to the Chosen One? How many limbs did they cut off for it?”

Horrificed, he tightened his fingers around the dossier. “No, what the fuck — I’m not letting that happen.”

He shrugged. “You’re not the boss of hers any longer. If she wants to destroy her life, let her.”

“Joining a cult is not her choice. ” Chuuya heard himself laugh; it didn’t sound very amused. “It’s in the word, you moron. They’re fanatics, and — and they clearly found her when she couldn’t even defend herself. She had no one else —”

“Chuuya, ” Dazai sing-sang, two fingers tapping his temple. Then, undeterred, he reached forward — tapping his own. Dumbfounded, he met his gaze — viciously clashing against the apparent nonchalance of his tone; familiar. “Chuuya, she’s not your responsibility.”

Disbelieving, he stared. “Of course she is.”

There existed no correct words to describe the way his face seemed to fall. It drained every pigment of color — suffocated every glint in the wooden glass of his visible eye; scrutinized by it, too close, for a short breath, Chuuya forgot to be angry. Only —

“You haven’t changed a bit, have you,” he concluded. Questions didn’t taste like that — truth, especially from the mouth of a liar, had a too-peculiar shape to mistake it. Disappointed, Chuuya thought. Dazai was disappointed.

The step he took forward broke the pavement.

“Get the fuck out of my face,” he said.

All he did was look down at him.

“Go,” he insisted, voice raising. “Take your stupid snake that’s never going to kill you and go pretend you can sleep in your fucking container, like the miserable freak you are.”

A smile crept on Dazai’s mouth, painful.

“I haven’t changed?” he heard himself continue, as venomous as a bite. “Look at you and tell me what’s different. Is it the part where you drown yourself in the river, or the one when you get yourself arrested and the only person around to call is me? I figured it’s worth trying? Fuck you.”

Kazuko blinked at him. For a moment, he thought she might surge forward and bite him — all she did, though, was wrap herself even tighter around her owner’s arm.

They always ended there, he thought. There was the ocean between the rocks they had curled onto; there were armed men behind Dazai, and the ruins of his life over Chuuya. There was too much empty space, and they were too starved.

“Fine,” Dazai said, and boredom was an art — and he wanted to smack it out of him, that lack of care, that superiority, that everything. “Go beg your little lamb to love you again. Go tell her you’re sorry for ever pulling on your leash, like the obedient dog you are,” He leaned down; closer and closer, until he could bump his forehead with his own. In a hiss, he informed him: “I have no more job offers for when she inevitably sticks a knife in your chest.”

He stalked to the entrance. Chuuya could feel every scar he had gathered in the past year; every second that had passed. You haven’t changed a bit. He stared at the chip bag on the floor; stared at the wet floor, the same shade as the Flags’ graves, as Shirase’s hair.

One hand busy waving lazily, without even turning around, Dazai sighed: “Born a sheep, die one, yes?”

---

...

---

“Are we looking for someone?” Noguchi called from the kitchen, distinctively impatient.

“No,” Chuuya screamed, as he tore the doors of Albatross’ wardrobe apart. There was nothing to be found; only Ōmu’s mocking chirps, vaguely shaped like swear words. He had been following him through every hiding spot he had found empty — the bathtub; the underneath of every guest room’s bed; the cupboard, too. “Yes,” he corrected. “Maybe.”

“That’s useful.”

“Just get yourself a coffee or shit and stop complaining,” With a sigh, he jumped down the top of the wardrobe, studying the rows of silky yukata. “Stay away from the Dog Owner and Dog cups, though. Found poison in them the other day.”

“What?”

Flipped open on the water mattress, the file stared at him in unabashed carelessness. You ought to pretend inanimate objects can show animosity, Pianoman had once tutted. He couldn’t remember why. The picture on the dossier framed a stranger.

He tapped two fingers on it. “What the hell are you playing at, Yuan?” he murmured.

The pink dye had long since abandoned her hair — it struggled to survive near the ends, interrupting a dirty cascade of forcibly red strands. There hadn’t been much the underground knew about the King of the Sheep — only flashes of red, and the certainty of doom. The hair laid like sheets upon a bruised cheek, showing off her jaw bone. Too thin.

There’s a thief who keeps stealing food from the kitchen, Koda had said, offhandedly. None of the kids recognize her, but she’s young.

A sheep corpse. The bloodied words on his window — the traditional vow every kid had to recite when they joined the organization. Chuuya had spent weeks memorizing it; since he couldn’t read, he had had to beg Shirase to repeat it to him, again and again.

She had been arrested seven times in the last year; thirteen in total since Chuuya had joined the Port Mafia. No one had ever bailed her out. Thievery, assault, and shoplifting were listed down the dossier — but if he assumed she’d stayed in Suribachi, he knew there were countless ways to put children to use.

He could have asked, if only she —

“It’s me,” he called, a bit pathetically. Like she would jump out of the walls. Then, he made his way to the dining room.

The open window behind the couch stared mockingly back at him, carrying wind and rain inside the room, a puddle of naivety on his part. He hadn’t thought she would return, not after a week of MIA — but he had hoped the storm might just push her to hide in Albatross’ bathroom.

Wincing at the water wetting his socks, he shut the window. On the wooden drawer underneath, Ōmu muttered something intelligible, blinking endlessly stupid eyes at him.

“Why did she leave by the window, anyway?” he asked — to the bird, or to Noguchi, standing quietly behind the counter, beer in hand. “I taught her how to pick locks. The emergency stairs are all dirty.”

Ōmu hummed.

“You stupid thing,” Chuuya concluded. He did caress its head, though — with two knuckles only, mindful of all the times it had tried to bite his fingers off. “Albatross should have made you into a Thanksgiving meal for Doc. Hey, Fishface, did you ever —“

When he turned to look at the other man, he fell quiet.

Noguchi made for a striking figure, inside the mirrorball-illuminated space — all black and all tense, leaning his back against the counter to stare down at the immense sea of pictures attached to every door of the kitchenette. The beer in his hand was held so tightly it was a wonder it hadn’t shattered; his eyes were on Albatross’ face.

Chuuya grabbed another beer from the fridge; jumped on the counter, crossing his legs. Staring along seemed the polite thing to do. Chuuya had no words to explain the emptiness of every face in those pictures.

Looked at it so long it lost all colors, Shirase used to say, about his Sheep bracelet. But that only means I’ve been kind to it, right?

“Why was he always throwing peace signs in every fucking picture,” Noguchi commented, eventually. Not quite a question.

“Maybe he wanted to spread the word.”

“What word?”

“Of peace.”

A snort. A pause. Then: “He always felt untouchable.”

Chuuya was on the floor, for a blink — wooden tiles wet with spilled drinks and blood, shoes skidding and pants getting soaked. He had his nails sunk so deep in Albatross’ jacket, he could feel them getting ripped off. He had wanted to touch his face — he hadn’t been fast enough; and then he had been too much of a spoiled child to want to touch his corpse.

Albatross was fucking wrong about you.

“No one is untouchable,” he concluded.

The man drank. “I guess not.”

They drank together.

Bringing him to his building had been an uncertain feat, concluded too quickly for Chuuya to linger on it. They had needed a safehouse, after getting chased that far by a squadron of Hounds — he hadn't considered the implications of bringing him there. Regret wasn't quite the thing for him, though — the leap of trust would have to last.

He wondered if Noguchi would be offended by the notion.

"Tsuchiya told me about your sister."

His hum was noncommittal. The fish bone tattoo on his face flexed along with the movement of his mouth; it seemed strangely alive. "Did she?"

Chuuya shrugged. "'Thought I'd tell you. I dislike the notion of a conversation where one party knows more than the other."

A huff. "Of course."

He frowned. "What?"

"You're just so —" Noguchi put his bottle down. Following his lines of vision, he studied his own face in one of the oldest pictures, red hair in Albatross' mouth as the man forced him in the camera shot. "Remember the Observatory?"

He grimaced. Truly, he only recalled how slimy Dazai's skin had felt as he dragged him out of the water — how beautiful the star-painted ceilings had been. "What, how you led a squadron in with no previous command?"

Noguchi's side gaze was nasty. "How you pushed me out of the way of a bullet."

"Oh."

"See," he insisted, fervent, seemingly ready to tear every picture in that place down himself, "You don't even — back then, I was actively and frequently attempting to kill both you and your bandaged boyfriend."

"Most people in my life are."

"And you still risked getting hit by —"

"I don't get hit."

"You could, one day," Noguchi snapped. He picked up the beer again, possibly just to have something in his hands. It reminded him, weirdly, of Yuan — her tendency to pick up rocks and play with them during Sheep meetings. "I'm never sure if you're anticipating the challenge or not."

Chuuya traced the elegant patterns on his new shoes — all good leather and good intentions and several bucks less in his accounts; all promises not to care — and didn't speak.

"I'm just saying," the man concluded, teeth clenched, "That you're a goddamn confusing guy. Twin Girl —"

“Rin has a name, and you know it.”

“ — calls you egg with a mammal in it.”

He turned to stare at him. “What the fuck does that mean?”

“Hell if I know. That everything about you is unexpected, I suppose. I’ve thought to have you completely figured out more times than I care to remember, in the past year only,” Noguchi said. “And I still have it wrong. I don’t know if anyone has ever gotten it right.”

He scoffed. “I don’t care for secrecy.”

“It isn’t a matter of —“ A huff. “Whatever. All I’m saying — perhaps whoever you’re looking for isn’t sure of what to do with you either.”

Chuuya studied the depth of his bottle; the glimmering green glass, floating under the liquid. Ōmu was still tending to its feathers; that one movie posted in the furthest corner of the ceiling was still about to fall off. Noguchi was still the one who held secret conversations with the Colonel, and the Flags were still dead, and Chuuya hadn’t been a Sheep for almost two years.

I have no idea either, he could have told Yuan. The only certainties he had, these days, were the scars on his skin — the poisonous taste in the back of his teeth. A seat he wanted; for whatever reason.

“I mean,” Noguchi added, “The whole god of the Port Mafia shtick might scare away even the ballsiest people, y’know.”

Chuuya groaned. “That’s just bullshit, and you know it. All of you do.”

“I was there, in Rengoku. I saw —“

“What did you see?” He turned to meet his eyes, undeterred. “I assure you — whatever stupid explanation you’ve come up with and taken for granted, is wrong. There’s nothing divine about any of this, except the good publicity Executive Kouyou insists on,” He downed the last of his beer and threw it in the can, not wasting Tainted. “I’m sure the Colonel must have told you all about it.”

Noguchi took the hit in silence.

“Not really,” he admitted, eventually.

It was unclear whether he was ashamed by the notion or not — if he really thought he had a shot at the Executive Position. You don’t, Chuuya could have told him. If it isn’t me, it won’t be you. Fairness was good — believing Mori would have time to set his starved eyes on a frame taller than his or Dazai’s was foolish.

It took Noguchi an endless time to speak again. “The Colonel used to say that — regardless of how inconvenient it would be for the Mafia — it would have been better if you didn’t exist,” He stared at the floor. “Albatross did always get plenty pissed off about it.”

Chuuya, too, took the hit in silence. Took it for what it was, too — an apology.

He sighed.

“Her name’s Yuan,” he spat out, brusque. “She’s — she was my friend, in Suribachi City.”

Noguchi curled one eyebrow. “The King of the Sheep had a queen consort?”

“You don’t even imagine how funny that joke is, in the current circumstances.”

“Is it?”

“She’s like Tsuchiya,” he muttered.

A veil of understanding pooled down his face. He straightened. “How did you piss her off?”

He stared at Albatross’ photographs — he counted each time Doc’s IV appeared in one of the pictures, and started again when he was done. That apartment was a haunted house with no ghosts to spare; Chuuya had made up the voices all on his own. Exorcism was a necessary art, if he wanted to stay. He knew how to start breathing again in every corner Albatross had stepped on.

“Surviving,” Chuuya offered. “I guess.”

---

...

---

He had to knock her out to bring her to Albatross’.

“You know,” Chuuya offered, leaning his cheek on the edge of the couch where he’d laid her, “Red looks like shit on you.”

There wasn’t enough naivety in his bones to believe she would have come along in any other way; and Chuuya, trapped between the columns of the Bishop’s Staff underground base, had lacked the time to figure out a better solution. She’d met his eyes for a split, endless second — as unfamiliar as it was, framed by thinner bones and different hair, by hands that had memorized the shape of his arm by dragging and begging, let’s go home, Chuuya — he had recognized the light in them.

Terror, he had concluded. She was terrified of him.

Underneath was a knife, and her fingers, ready to grab it and tear him to pieces.

Laid underneath the mirrorball light, her face devoured him alive. Chuuya sat on the floor by the couch, pulling on a strand of faded pink dye and forced red — and he was fourteen, twelve, eight years old, and gut-wrenchingly, in a way he couldn't remember feeling since the split breath when a knife had been buried in him in, he wanted Shirase to be there.

Childish. Pointless. They had all leaned on Chuuya; that was how it worked. He was in London. They were fine. They could never be in the same room again, he thought.

It was fine. They were fine.

She was quiet when she woke up.

“Hey,” Chuuya offered. The floor was cold, but it was too rainy for it to be a relief; behind the smell of dust and old of his compartmentalization, Yuan was crystallized with a teasing grin and bright eyes. She had always been a happy kid. “You have two ribs in bad shape. Don't move.”

She stared, breath cut short on its way to her lips — eyebags deeper than ink. A happy kid, he thought. Had anyone in the Sheep ever been happy, or had they just been young?

A breath passed. Blanket falling to the floor without a sound, Yuan sat up, eyes forward. “I'm leaving,” she said, very easily — and stumbled to the door just as effortlessly.

Chuuya stared at the floor. “You're not,” he replied, just as simple.

Mere steps from the door, she froze.

He recalled what it had been like — looking up, bent in a half as he bled; meeting the eyes of people who knew to have cut off their last thread of hope. Will he kill us, he had seen them wonder, will he kill us, now that he has no reason not to?

He stood up; she still didn't move. They had given her a nightgown of sorts, old and frail, barely distinguishable from her pale skin. She hadn't brown an inch — she looked like a ghost. Chuuya couldn't imagine her being anything else.

Quicker than she'd ever been, she grabbed the nearest object at reach — a horse shaped lamp — and smashed it on his face.

“Mature,” Chuuya commented, studying the shattered pieces on the floor, after he flung it to the side. Yuan had already thrown herself out of the unlocked doors. “At least it wasn't a bucket of water.”

He ran.

Every flight of stairs was freezing under his naked feet — Yuan is the fastest of us, he recalled Shirase say, and Chuuya, Yuan is crying again, and, this is Yuan; be nice to her — and every light on the ceiling flickered along to the storm. It had been more than a year — roughhousing still came to his blood like a street kid's honor, as he landed on her back and they rolled down and down, sharp angles and new bruises, punching and kicking and scratching.

By the time they landed at the entrance, his shoulder bled from reopened stitches — and she was too thin and too angry, and her lip bled from the cut of a step, as she backed away, grasping at the wall — breathing in and out; staring.

Her lips shaped something. Then: “Chuuya.”

That’s a pretty name, he recalled.

Her gaze was the ruins Arahbaki insisted on burying him under. Insisting. Accusing. He had begged for it, he remembered — to be blamed. Selfishness was rooted in his ribcage; be grateful, he thought Kouyou had said, but for what?

“I don’t care,” he offered, blank. She hasn’t said a thing. “You’re not going to those freaks.”

“Those freaks,” she hissed, fists clenched, “Are my ticket out of this hellhole — my ticket to a life somewhere else. You, of all people, —“

“Yuan.”

“You have no right to destroy that for me.”

“Listen to me —“

“Not again,” Tears welled up in the corners of her eyes; a rage so profound mistaking it for pain would have felt sacrilegious. Rogue and useless, he wondered if she had wasted any tears on the idea of stabbing him in the back. “Chuuya. You’re not taking my life away again.”

The LEDs on the walls thundered. He had the feeling she could trace the black lines running down his arms, no matter the gloves — had the feeling she could see his skeleton with each flicker of lighting; could count his bones and observe his play pretend closer than anyone, since a boy with his same face had dared.

He had the feeling she wouldn’t stop.

“Let me call Shirase,” he proposed, then. It had seemed easier to keep his tone distant with him — not lingering on how much the scar on his side hurt when it rained had been easier. “The idiot’s in London. If you let me call him —“ Chuuya didn’t blame any of them, he remembered. Chuuya didn’t want Yuan to hate him. “You can talk to him instead. He can talk you out of whatever bullshit idea you —“

“Fuck you,” she breathed.

Her fingers strangled her own wrists, old bruises and new scratches; reddened and forced to a halt — but not bleeding; never bleeding — Chuuya would have died for them. “You have no fucking right —“

Irritation pulsed on his temples. “Gonna get yourself killed to spite me? Because, let me tell you, there aren’t words for how idiotic —“

“It’s none of your —“

“You think you can take an entire syndicate on your own?” Chuuya hissed, stalking forward so suddenly that she had no time to step back. Nose to nose, he clenched his fists just tight enough to resist the urge to shake her awake. “You think you can beat a bunch of psychos bending over to get a divine child? You think they won’t kill you?”

Yuan’s eyes were wide as coins; shallow as her breath was, her disbelieving laughter cracked in high notes. “Don’t pretend you give a shit about that.”

I have, his throat screamed. Shirase had never understood either; Chuuya had never known enough words to explain. I have. I did, even when you left me there. “If I wanted you dead,” he heard himself promise, always just an inch taller than her, “I would have killed all of you a long time ago. You think I couldn’t have pulled it off?”

Her lips parted, scratched to blood. She pushed him off with so little strength, she ended up stumbling too. “Our blood is yours all the same.”

Chuuya wanted to carve it where she would see it — the dead cannot blame. He wanted to kick her right in the mouth, this is Yuan, be nice to her. He wanted, he wanted —

“Yeah. Yeah,” he scoffed. Why be mean? “The vandalization and the dead sheep conveyed the message pretty well. Where did you even find the time to do that shit? Do lab rats get vacation days?”

“Lab rats?” She barked a laugh, razor-sharp, cruel, the least familiar sound of his life. “You’ve got some nerve calling someone else that.”

Chuuya fell quiet.

“Yeah,” Her chest rose and fell, red tips tickling the embroidered collar of her gown — looking at him, thousands of years away. “Yeah, Shirase told me. Before he went and left, too — that’s all you guys were ever good for, isn’t it? No,” She stepped back, one foot after the other; she plastered her back to the glass doors, lighting framing her like a picture. “No, not again. Fuck that. I’m doing this by myself.”

His lungs were getting too used to the shape of her name. Still: “Yuan.”

“You don’t get to do this again,” Her murmurs were almost too low; it was all for herself, and never for him. “I’m not letting you. Never again. You’re not taking anything else from —“

He took a step forward. “Listen.”

“Shut up!” she snapped. “For once in your life, shut up, Chuuya.”

“I’m just trying to help —“

“Leave me alone,” she nearly screamed, her nails sinking in her own arms, shaking her head so fast it looked like a whim. “Leave me alone, leave me alone, I hope you die — “

Chuuya took no further step. He opened his mouth; closed it again, counting ribs he could see peeking from underneath the nightgown.

“Yuan,” he heard, somewhere. “They will kill you.”

Her disbelief was palpable. “You will kill me,” she insisted. Deer caught in the headlights; a sheep bleeding up in the sand. “I’m not going to let you. I hope you die. I hope you die, like the others.”

A pause. He tasted poison — the familiar was recurrent, and a ghost was in his building. “The others?”

“Leave me alone —“

“Yuan, ” he snapped, stepping forward. She stepped back, terrified, terrified, will he hurt us now that he has no excuse not to? “Yuan, what about the others?”

It was to no avail. All she did was shake her head, shake it harder, murmuring — walking backwards until her feet were outside, in the open rain. Chuuya wanted to follow her; Chuuya had never wanted to leave in the first place. Chuuya watched her run downstairs, disappear; heard the doors close as she left.

---

...

---

Finding her became an intermittent job.

He refused to get Kouyou’s eyes on it, no matter the possible aid — refused to do anything more than stare back when she sat next to him, studying his burned eye like it might be more sincere than the other.

“When you’re ready to tell me, then,” she would say, each time. It carried the sweet bitterness of knowing she would have to investigate it all the same — knowing there was the Mafia, and then there was blood, and then there was them.

Chuuya would usually nod.

Sometimes, he would try to imagine what she would say if she knew — if she would accuse him of chasing pictures long faded. If she would understand — if she had cried, even once, since she had buried Beatrice.

At some point, she assumed Arahabaki was to blame.

“When you’re ready to tell me, then,” Kouyou told him, one night — 3 A.M. blinking from an old clock in her office, and the documents of their latest transportation messes between them. This time around, she reached for his knuckles — tapped them, as if she knew the skin underneath had been decaying a bit more since Takasekai. “When you’re ready to talk about it as if it’s you, and not something unknown.”

“I know it’s me,” Chuuya huffed.

It wasn’t about that — Chuuya never wasted time thinking about Arahabaki. It was what the entire crater and some more had done for years; feeding and bathing a myth that didn’t exist outside of their fear of it.

He doesn’t know, he had wanted to tell them. He doesn’t feel. He doesn’t care. He was the blood flowing in his veins; he was his guilt and his rage and his victory. Chuuya only blamed him to have an excuse not to scream at a mirror.

“But it’s inside me,” he said. He hadn’t quite meant to; he couldn’t stop counting the flares in Yuan’s eyes when she’d said, he told me. He wondered if she could see it — if the doctors could — if everyone could. “Why does it burn?”

Kouyou shrugged. It was as delicate as a petal being carried by the wind — mercilessly, she offered: “Doesn’t it burn to be anything at all?”

Two days later, Chuuya found Yuan kneeling by the last pew of an abandoned Church the Souls had occupied, months before.

“You don’t even believe in this shit,” he said.

She didn’t even look the part. Someone had given her a grey hoodie; she was kneeling a bit too casually, and boredom lined every knuckle of her crossed hands. Hands on his pockets, he leaned against the pew, too.

“You don’t know what I believe in,” Yuan said, toneless. She was fiddling with banknotes; she had always had swift stealing fingers. A new bruise colored her cheekbone.

“There’s no Creator,” he informed her, helpfully. “And he won’t give you — or a child, or anyone — an Ability.”

“Why would anyone want one,” It wasn’t a question; she looked up at him like she expected an answer all the same. Her face was devoid of it all — it was worse than the tearful rage. “You came with one, didn’t you?”

Tell them I’m here, Arahabaki whispered.

I did, Chuuya replied, watching her stand and stumble out of the ruined doors. Talking with himself had made the beginning less boring; it was better than screaming at the sky. Counting the pounds of blood on a fake god's hands was easier than counting them on his own; it made studying the scars down Dazai's chest easier, too. She doesn't care.

Yokohama would never be Suribachi City.

There were no telltale places he could scout to find a trace of pink that was no more — but Chuuya had been keeping his eyes on the Sheep for as long as he could remember, and falling back into old habits was easier than breathing.

This Yuan liked the coast. The sea was nonexistent and vaguely legendary in Suribachi City — he wasn't surprised to find her dangling her legs over the railing, eyes settled on the current, pulling at the cuticles around her nails until she was bleeding into her own palms.

"I want you to leave," she told him, as he leaned his shoulders on the rusty metal.

"I know," Chuuya promised her. The failed attempts — when she would notice him and turn the other way, and he couldn't quite push himself to follow her — had taught him something simple: never stand too close, and never show his hands. "I just don't particularly care."

Her eyes searched him thoroughly — they drained him to the bones, scouring the hollowness. She wore her fragile skin with quiet uncertainty; stubborn enough to stay, but clever enough to know the curve of her shoulders meant something. To be anything at all, Chuuya thought.

She hesitated on the burned strand of his hair; his unpinned waistcoat; the blood on his boots.

"Look at you," she spat, repulsed. In another life, it was a mocking grin, as they tried on silky clothes stolen from passersby. "You look like them."

At the Old World, on the other end of the city, he remembered being introduced to dead men walking — not that he knew; not that he would have dared to, when they had seemed like the most alive thing in miles. Iceman, he already knew — both his face and his blood. Iceman he had punched, after those same words had been hurled at his face — at the green leather of his jacket.

His answer did not change, and yet —

"I am one of them," Chuuya told her.

"You've always been, haven't you?" Her frame shook, either rage or cold. They were saying it might rain again. Did she sleep in the Bishop Staff's hospital beds every night? "Even before they found you. The Port Mafia has always been a bunch of traitorous, cowardly roaches. You were made for them."

"I don't care what you think of me," he insisted, unimpressed. "I'm not here for your judgement. I'm here to help you."

"Too late," Viciously, her hands trembled, incapable of working correctly; nonetheless, she managed to hold onto the railing, fingers on each side of her legs, sinking. "Too late. I don't need you anymore. I can do it on my own.”

“I know you can.”

“Then let me.”

He stared at the waves. “Not risking it.”

She bit her cheek. A bad habit; Momo used to pull her hair for it.

“You want to start anew,” Chuuya said. “Alright. You get it. You don’t have to sell yourself to those psychos. I have money, alright, and Shirase is trying to create a new group —“

“I’d rather die.”

He took the hit in silence.

It wasn’t fear, he thought. It wasn’t fear and it wasn’t hesitation — no matter how vivid the fire in her pupils was, no matter how constricting it felt to be the sole target of such unbridled rage. A child was looking at him, no matter how angry she was — a child hated him, and Chuuya didn’t fear her; but he didn’t want to look at her.

This is Yuan. Be nice to her.

“I’d rather die, ” she repeated, voice breaking on those last few sounds, “Than take anything from you, Chuuya. I’d rather die.”

Something was stuck in his throat. Two sharp mouths would amount to nothing. You should try being angry, sometimes, Doc had told him. “You’re being unreasonable.”

“You killed us,” Yuan replied, toneless and insistent, always the same. She said it each time he found her. “You killed all of us. You don’t get to grieve.”

The dead don’t give a shit. “Your spite is not enough reason to —“

“You want to make amends?” She laughed, blood around her nails, fingers tight on the metal, eyes too wide not to hurt. Chuuya did his best to recall what she looked like when smiling. “You don’t get to, Chuuya. You don’t even care, do you? You just want feel better about yourself, for killing us —“

“Yuan —“

“I want you to leave.”

That, Chuuya thought, was always clear.

---

This Yuan had many stories.

He wondered, in rare moments of lucidity, if the Bishop's Staff suspected his involvement with one of their pearls; if it was why she was always around, these days — when he had spent more than a year hoping, in a corner of his mind, to catch a glimpse of his past in the streets.

To kill it, perhaps. To assess. To apologize. To stab them back, to walk past them, to make them beg — until he did not care anymore.

“Yuan,” Chuuya called, quiet, nudging her curled up body with his toe. “Come on, kid. I’m bringing you home.”

Facing the blooming trees of Yamashita Park, fingers intertwined with one end of the bench she laid on, she didn’t speak. The moon was gentle in its cover, bathing the wet grass in silver specks. The park was empty and eerily silent — Chuuya allowed Tainted to come to life just to hear its buzz.

Yuan shivered — more like a spasm than goosebumps. Nonetheless, he took Pianoman’s coat off, and laid it over her, crouching down.

“What did they do to you?” Chuuya asked, at last. There was bleeding cut between her eyes, running over the left side of her nose; she didn’t seem to particularly care about the dirt and the dried blood sticking to her skin. “Did they find you out?”

“They got Fumiko first,” she replied, eyes right over his shoulder. The coat covered her all the way to her lips; it made her look younger. “One of those stupid white vans. Me and the others killed them. But she’s still in the white van.”

A head-splitting memory — short hair and wide eyes; her favorite blue overalls. “Alright.”

“She’s still there, Chuuya —“

“I know,” he assured her. He put one arm under her knees and one under her back; she was lighter than a feather. “It’s alright.”

Her cheeks were sickly red; she cuddled her cheek against his shoulder, humming, pupils blown out. During his research, he had read something about the little care the Bishop's Staff had for their members’ wounds — they had probably stuffed her with something just powerful enough to make her wobbly through the pain. “Aimi was so pissed,” she murmured.

“I can imagine.”

“The assholes made her throw herself from the roof,” Yuan recalled, distantly, her weight all on him. “Either that or they would shoot us.”

Chuuya recalled two twin pairs of legs, jumping up and down the levels of the settlement — gaping at his flawless victories, pulling his pants, dragging him to the futons, it's too cold to sleep alone, Chuuya! “That sucks,” his mouth said.

“I hope you die,” she grunted, lips brushing his ear. Her feet were naked where they dangled from his arms, bleeding near the heels; Chuuya laid his chin on her forehead. “I hope you die.”

She fell asleep on Albatross’ bed.

It gave him the chance to clean her up to the best of his abilities. He didn’t dare undressing her, but he gathered enough wet towels to do the job — disinfected old cuts and bruises, found a pair of socks Albatross must have forgotten the existence of in the depths of a drawer — dead, he thought, dead too — and put them on her splintered feet. He sat on the floor.

He didn’t remember falling asleep, but Yuan was gone when he woke up.

This Yuan was different from the one he remembered, but not less predictable. And so he found her — day after day, and he brought her home when the Bishop’s Staff left her too out of it. He locked her in his bathroom until she threw up whatever they had been giving her to heal — dodged every plate and every treasured belonging she threw to his face.

“Sorry,” he told Albatross, during his next visit at the Cemetery. “I don’t think you would mind. But sorry.”

The more he found her, the angrier she grew.

She had grown strangely deadlier than he remembered — skilled with the knives she tried to sink on him, screaming her throat raw and then not speaking for days. Only she had survived, she made sure to tell him. And so, too smart to believe even her new abilities would land a hit on him, she told stories.

“Katsuki enrolled,” she laughed to his face, as he pushed her down her knees, near the toilet, fingers down her throat. Hirotsu’s discreet enough research had concluded most of the Bishop’s Staff was hooked onto a chemically modified sort of morphine; something too strange not to be an Ability. Nonetheless, he worked with it. “He said he would, yes? They — ah — They busted him. They killed him. No records to speak of and criminal behavior, and they didn’t even send him to jail, they just killed him,” Deep in the toilet, she looked up at him, hair red and eyes redder, “Where the fuck were you —“

Ino worked at a factory near the slums, just like Shirase had — only less lucky. Some traitors from the GSS had recognized her immediately.

“They blamed us,” she recounted, vacantly, arms around her knees, surrounded by shattered glass from the window she’d kicked and kicked. “The GSS. They called us crazy for attacking a new Post Mafia asset — suicidal, for letting you live. You told us we could kill him. You told us he was one of you. They killed so many of us. It's why we scattered. It's why Shirase left; that," She frowned; her lips trembled. "That piece of shit."

Chuuya wanted her to stop talking.

She never did.

Mitsuo was shot. Kyo was taken by the white vans. Arata and Michiko were thrown into some juvenile jail — found by kids who the Sheep had exiled. Saburo tried to join the Shadow Blade. Yoshito and Kohaku and Zuki — and when she was done with the stories she just started again, and again, and again.

I hope they're dead, he'd told the twins, Kajii. I hope they're dead, because —

At the dead center of her abdomen were intertwining tattoo lines — black ink on red one; shapes he never lingered on enough to recognize. The Bishop's Staff symbol was not the first or the last of the marks Yuan had caused herself since he'd met her; this one was purely more permanent.

Dragging her out wouldn't be easy.

Yuan wanted the money — an incredible amount of them, according to the voices. Enough to live the rest of her life comfortably. All the women who had been promised those amazing sums of money had been found dead.

"Don't touch me," she told him, one night.

So he didn't.

---

...

---

The first time he tried to push her into the bathtub, she threw up.

Chuuya was nothing but stubborn; she was nothing but a piece of him. They spat liquified hatred in each other's faces, words he didn't even remember — fighting like the older Sheep would call them for dinner and make them shake hands in no time. Inconsequential. This is Yuan. This is Yuan. This is Yuan. Be nice to her.

"Chuuya," Hirotsu questioned, only once. "What are you doing?"

He didn't know what to answer. It had been more than a year — he knew he had grown. He knew he had seen more, had seen too much; he knew there was a solution just out of reach. He still couldn't let go.

Through the ghosts and the hysteria, he gave up on any semblance of maturity — be nice to her — and started screaming back.

“It's money, Yuan,” he snapped, each word an uncomfortable weight on his tongue. “I don't need a friendship bracelet. Take them and get the fuck out of here, and you'll never even have to see my face again.”

“No,” Her lips barely moved.

Her favorite spot at Albatross' was behind the television, curled up and silent — perhaps because of the electrical hum it gave. But Chuuya didn't know if he was the only one to hear it.

Her silence revolted him.

Yuan had been the loudest of them all — was he supposed to blame himself for what she couldn't be anymore? Again and again, and again and again, once for each member of the Sheep, twice for Shirase, a hundred times for a girl who would rather wait and see than touch his fingertips?

“They're not going to let you get away with this,” Chuuya insisted. He didn't know what she was doing to take care of the Bishop's Staff; he knew it was bound to fail. “You're not a fucking idiot. Stop acting like one. The best you can hope is for them to lock you in some cell and bind you to the syndicate for the rest of your days —”

“Maybe it's better like that.”

Barely a breath.

It struggled to exist — it shone blindingly, reflecting the squares of light of the mirrorball. Scratching his bones, looking for a foothold.

Chuuya gulped it down like the poison under his bed, and knew there was no one brave enough to choke it out of him.

“Better like that,” he echoed.

“Do you think being alone suits me?” Yuan scoffed. There was no fear in her eyes; nothing but a vacant carelessness for it all. She would have tried to murder the Bishop's Staff leader without even a weapon. “I had my family, and then the Sheep, and — and then I was alone. Look what I can do when I'm alone.”

Chuuya didn't understand.

“You want an organization,” His brain chased the answer — just out of reach. “They're going to kill you.”

“Aren’t you glad?”

His jaw hurt from clenching it too hard. “You want an organization,” he repeated, eyes to the pictures in the kitchen. “The Bishop’s Staff?”

“They’ll have me.”

“The Port Mafia would have you.”

It escaped before he could think about it.

Yuan’s sluggish eyelids were parted with a brutality that seemed to bleed. It was the most alive she had looked since he had found her — locked in a silence so merciless, it threatened to shatter his bones on impact. Chuuya knew it was a mistake the moment he made it.

Too late.

“Fuck you, Chuuya,” she gaped, shaking, barely words, a growl and a scream all in one. She stumbled to her feet, pushed herself against the wall — away from him. “Fuck you, fuck you, who do you think you are —” Chuuya dodged the glass souvenir she threw, heard it shatter behind his shoulders, sorry, sorry again, felt Arahabaki giggle in the space between his ribs, begging him to get angry, you’re already there, “You don’t get to say that shit to me, you don’t get to, they’re all dead because of you, fuck you, fuck you, I hate you, I hope you die!”

“You don’t have to work with me,” he insisted, stupidly. He imagined it, just for a moment — having her close enough to check on; having her safe enough to feel — “Stop and think, for a second — my Boss, she could train you, and —”

“I’ll die before I join those bastards,” Yuan breathed, hysterical, terrified. “They destroyed us. Don’t you see? Chuuya, how can you not see — they tore us apart, they dragged you into their mess and —”

“It’s me you’re pissed of at,” he insisted, “And you’re going to let it kill you, like a fucking coward —”

“They killed us,” she seethed. “They killed us — you killed us, and I’m not letting you —”

“You,” Chuuya spelled out, snapping his teeth so sharply even his skeleton seemed rattled, “You are the ones who stuck a knife in my —”

He snapped his mouth shut so fast he tasted blood.

Albatross’ home wasn’t built well enough for it to ricochet against the wall. Close enough to count her too-dark eyelashes, Yuan flinched from the impact all the same — stared at him, mute and speechless, eyes wide.

Chuuya tasted the betrayal in his tone too late.

Suribachi City — he had once declared, to no one but the pages of poetry he liked to read — had been a merciless mother.

It had been easier to see, in retrospect. He'd discovered it in his reflection in the Flags' eyes — telling stories they blinked at, marveling at the ease with which his lungs breathed when his shoulders weren't carrying the sky. Suribachi City had been a merciless father — earth-rough hands and broken pipes of lullabies, and a family whom he would have bled himself dry for — a promise that seemed weak, these days, with Arahabaki's claws in him; because it was easier to admit Chuuya had always known he wouldn't die. Couldn't.

Suribachi City had been a merciless home, and Chuuya hadn't blamed it for a second, as he bled out under the too-smart eye of a demon. Sins and devils were meant to make deals; the rest was a side effect — an unblemished victim.

Don't tell Shirase, he'd told Adam.

I don't want anything he has to give, and he wouldn't give it anyway.

"I want you to leave," Yuan stuttered out.

Chuuya rubbed his temples. "I know," he swore. "I'm know. But I'm not, Yuan."

It rained, the next day.

Angry, he left her to mope in Albatross' bedroom and went to the Headquarters — and furious, he let Kouyou drag him around with her elegant delight — and tired, he kicked the rusty gates of the Church when he passed by. Answered Dazai's only allowed call, sat in a shopping cart and thought, you haven't changed a bit, have you.

"It's me," he called, because the Mafia's resident demon was, ultimately, cursed with the gift of being right. No answer came.

---

...

---

After the first day of rain turned into a full week, Chuuya sat under the canopy of a bus station, and selected the one contact on his phone with no name on it.

It rang longer than he had expected it to, an intermittent, unchangeable beep that ended up being as comforting as the slow traffic of the afternoon — grey wheels on grey streets against a grey sky; the waves of the distant sea shattering on the bay without a sound. Chuuya hadn't been cold since Rengoku; still, he sat on the wet bench, and he counted goosebumps.

Eventually, a metallic hiss interrupted the beeps; in a distinctively surprised Japanese, the voice in his ear questioned: “Buichiro Shirase. Ah, if this is about those redundancy fees — Jeez, I’m sorry, man, I’m not even on your continent anymore.”

Dropping his temple on the rusted frame of the canopy, Chuuya closed his eyes.

“Hello? Heeeello? Anybody there?” Some rustling and murmuring later, Shirase cleared his throat, clearly peeved. “Seriously, come on. I saw the number. It’s from Japan. Yes, Jess, I know the Japanese — Of course I do! — Is this a prank call? I have no time for prank calls. A prank call from the motherland? How bored are you, dude. Come on.”

A two-seats car passed by quicker than the others; it raised a small wave of dirty rain water.

The raindrops reflected the fading sun. He tried to find his eyes in them; tried to remember if storms had looked the same in Suribachi City. If he had — if a jacket and a bracelet and one secret more made a man, or if loss did. If he was allowed to miss it, if he didn’t want it back.

“You don’t want to mess with me,” Shirase was saying, still, growing more brazen with each second more of silence. He was the first voice of his memories. “You hear me? If this is going to be some — Some Haunting Of The Park shit, with you calling anonymously every three days and breathing down my neck — I won’t get scared, you get me? I’m not a brat. I don’t get scared of this stuff. I’m a gang leader, you hear me — Ah. Hypothetically. Not seriously,” A pause. English murmurs filled the background; the sound of skin being slapped. “I — Listen, is this about those taxes? The factory didn’t even have an actual contract, man, you can’t — Do you even know who you’re talking to, you absolute pile of—”

Chuuya closed the call.

He lowered his hands — tugged at the sheep-shaped phone charm; one of the first ones Albatross had given him. A joke. Or a reminder; the man had winked.

The police car arrived only a minute later, parking right by the sidewalk.

Kouyou’s camera was a weight around his throat, as he hurried under the rain — after a training session she had deemed him too distracted for, she’d sent him to get it checked out. The lenses were slightly cracked — when he landed on the passenger seat of Matsuda’s car, slamming the door behind him, they seemed to glisten.

“So,” he asked, distractedly, “Anything?”

Very pointedly, the man cleared his throat.

Chuuya raised his eyes.

“What the fuck are you doing here?”

Looking entirely too comfortable for the situation at hand, Hirotsu raised his monocle under the little light filtering in from the window of the backseat, cleaning it with his scarf. He didn’t blink; he only glanced at the occupied seat next to him and said, low: “Quieter, please.”

Curled up under his coat, forehead plastered uncomfortably against the window, Dazai deftly pretended to snore.

Chuuya stared. He stared some more; still speechless, he turned to look at Matsuda.

The Officer's jaw seemed to be stuck in a death grip; he kept his eyes to the streets, knuckles white around the steering wheel, and clipped out: "Unpredictable circumstances."

"Some of Dazai's business with Kazuko had to be clarified on more official locations," Hirotsu explained. The man had a talent to seem entirely in his place in every situation; framed by a police car, he still held some careless regality. Chuuya kind of expected to watch him start smoking. "Officer Matsuda was kind enough to offer us a lift to Mori Corps."

"The kid got inside and started screaming until I started the car," Matsuda translated.

"He was just too tired."

"Was he?"

Undeterred, Hirotsu extracted his lighter. "Endlessly so."

"Yes," The man glanced at the rear view mirror, where Dazai slept soundly. Pretended to, at least — Chuuya wondered if Hirotsu was aware. Dazai never slept in public. "I can see that. The sheer number of Officers he's offered to commit a double suicide with might have influenced it."

"No," the Commander replied, "I believe he's very much trained for that."

A vein in Matsuda's temple pulsed.

It felt as if he had tumbled in another dimension. The stormy afternoon traffic was like a broken machine; the low murmur of the station radio was barely high enough to break the visible tension in the man's shoulders. Chuuya wondered if he feared them leaving blood stains on the seats.

Because everything in the Mafia moved according to his plans, he tried to meet Dazai's gaze in the rear view mirror.

They hadn't met since the konbini — all he had had of him were whispers on the competition, propaganda fliers, and the strange position his Dog Owner #1 cup was abandoned in, at weird hours. The file he had given him on Yuan still sat under Albatross' bed. The words he had said were still somewhere — stuck under his nails, maybe.

"All right," Chuuya concluded. "So. Do you have something for me?"

Hesitantly, Matsuda glanced to Hirotsu.

"Gramps' fine," he forced himself to say, as uncaring as possible. He could feel the man's gaze on him. "He won't talk if I ask him not to. Yes?"

The Commander hummed. “If not against — upper orders.”

He scoffed, turning Kouyou’s camera on — sinking down his seat as less petulantly as possible. “As if I would ever go against them.”

Another hum. Fair.

Officer Matsuda still seemed hesitant; with a sigh, eventually, he offered: “Nothing much that I can do for you. I’ve been working on clearing her record — making sure big offenses get registered as minor, erasing her from the looking-for database. Stuff like that. If you can get her out, she could start a mostly normal life,” He glanced his way. “I can’t help you with getting her out unless you give me all of the information, though.”

“I don’t need help for that part.”

“Yeah,” he commented. “You and your — jewelry business will take care of it?”

Chuuya didn’t answer.

Another sigh. There was a new pen in the man’s pocket — the cap was yellow, this time. “I’m assuming she was behind that Queen of the Sheep ordeal, then. Any feelings about that?”

He was painfully aware of Dazai’s presence behind his seat. “She needed a name to protect herself with,” he said. “It’s not important. I just need someone on the inside to make sure she won’t be taken from one prison to another.”

"An insider?" Hirotsu perked up, boredly exhaling a cloud of smoke. “The state force is worse than I thought.”

Matsuda gritted his teeth. He could have sworn the bundle under Dazai’s coat snorted.

“Listen,” the man said, some endless time later. The pictures under Chuuya’s fingers were growing more and more familiar — Kouyou a bit older in each of them — Elise’s, Mori’s, and Hirotsu’s blurred faces appearing sporadically. By the time the red of his hair and his first suit made their debut, Matsuda had a weird look in his eyes. “When you get her out — I could work something out for her.”

Chuuya raised his eyes. “As in —“

“As in taking her in. If she needs it.”

He tried to imagine how well Yuan would react to the notion of living with a police officer — someone so tightly connected to Suribachi, too.

“With your statal salary and three kids fresh out of divorce?” He lowered his eyes again. “You have enough on your plate, old man. Last thing she needs is — Well. I’ll figure something out.”

“Respectfully, Chuuya,” Matsuda said, a bit forceful. “Because I have a feeling you truly want to help her — I don’t think bringing her from one well of crime to another will do her much good.”

Hirotsu cleared his voice.

“All offense,” the Officer spat.

“None taken,” he replied.

“No need to worry,” Chuuya cut in. “You can unclench, Officer. She has no interest in any jewelry business,” One edge of Pianoman’s hair appeared in a corner of a picture of the meeting room; in the next, Chuuya was standing by the door of Kouyou’s office, eyes a different shade and a tad too vicious. “Or in staying where I am.”

At that, even the animosity between the two men seemed to trail off.

It was sort of pathetic — the way they both awkwardly scrambled for a more normal topic of conversation. An attempt to give him a moment to himself, perhaps — unless they had bonded over the recent weather updates while he wasn’t there. Chuuya let it wash over him, coddled in the same uncomfortable warmth Hirotsu’s wink in the rear view mirror gave him.

It took three pictures, all dated from after the parking lot accident, to notice what was wrong with them.

Under the hum of Hirotsu using the terms unusually frosty, the lines of all of Chuuya’s frames grew blurrier and blurrier — as if, no matter the carefulness, the camera had refused to catch him still. His eyes seemed strangely vibrant whenever caught from too close; the few scars visible on his skin glowered a red that had nothing on Tainted’s own.

The more recent pictures went further — the scarlet marks shimmered from under the clothes, too. The last one — the one taken at Albatross’, as Kouyou prepared him for the temple visit — framed one burned eye shining too bright to be natural; and then, two spiral scars right in the middle of his cheeks, bleeding down onto smiling teeth.

He dropped the camera.

“Chuuya?” Matsuda called.

He cleared his voice; picked it up again. “Cold hands,” he offered, inconsequential. Then, squinting at the driver, he insisted: “What’s wrong with you, anyway?”

Matsuda frowned. “Excuse me?”

“Why are you all —” Chuuya gestured, a bit vaguely — an excuse to keep his fingers away from the sharper lines of the camera. Hirotsu was still staring at it. “Tense. You’re only like that after missions go wrong. ‘Something happen?’”

Hesitation curled up the wrinkles near his wooden eyes; the Officer seemed to munch on the possibilities of sincerity. He glanced at the backseats, again — then, he offered Chuuya a complicated look.

“Chasing gone wrong,” he said, curtly. “We had to open fire. One of the guys I shot ended up not making it,” He pressed his lips together. “Got the call right before picking you up.”

Chuuya fiddled with his gloves, eyes set on the gentle lights of the car in front of them.

“Sorry,” he offered.

It probably sounded a bit lost — Matsuda’s next glance was fueled by the same frustration he got whenever he talked about reformation. “You could stand being a bit less used to death, kid.”

“It’s natural,” Hirotsu intervened, opening his window to throw the half cigarette out. “It ought to be talked about as such. Being afraid of speaking won’t amount to anything.”

The Officer’s irritation only grew. “And some things ought to be discovered later.”

“Who decides that?” Chuuya questioned, a bit distracted. He had kept the Sheep as safe as he could, back then — had lied about the number of weekly attacks; had lied about the bullets he wasn’t good enough to miss, at first; had lied about what it would mean to live without him. None of them were innocent; no one who joined the Sheep could afford it. And yet, Chuuya had always been — “It seems selfish to demand blindness, doesn’t it?”

The towers of the Headquarters appeared at the edge of the street. Matsuda didn’t seem to have an answer. Before he could attempt to find it, though, Hirotsu’s phone rang.

He didn’t hear what he said when he raised it to his ear; he only caught the slight widening of his eyes. Unavoidable, unreadable — those eyes were laid on Chuuya, at last.

“Dazai,” the Commander called, before he had even hung up the phone. “Get him out.”

It was startlingly quick — Dazai dropped all pretenses of sleep, sitting up so suddenly that Matsuda jumped in his seat. He didn’t waste time — settling one hand on his car door, uncaring of the vehicle picking up speed in the empty road, he threw it open.

“Jesus!” Matsuda snapped, stepping on the brakes so eagerly the whole car skidded forward. “Kid, what the hell are you —“

“Magenta,” Dazai called.

Amidst his wide eyed confusion, Chuuya stiffened. “What, seriously?” he lamented, for a moment — then, before Matsuda could react, he grabbed him by the nape and slammed his face onto the steering wheel, knocking him out.

Under the incessant rain, his own car door was already being opened. “Go,” Hirotsu ordered, climbing in between the seats to take Matsuda’s place; the man’s body falling onto Chuuya’s own lap. “Stay with Dazai. Do not step a foot near the Headquarters until we let you know, alright?”

“What the fuck are you talking about?” he demanded, on a thin line of patience. “Why me? Is something wrong at the —“

He felt a single eye on him, needles and pins and thorns down his skin. Arahabaki came with side effects; one of them, he’d quickly realized, was paranoia. Perhaps it was another show of self-importance from a fake god — the assumption that someone was always watching. Perhaps it was just intuition, and Chuuya was nothing but a cage.

Fuck that.

Familiar fingers grasped his hand; Dazai had no particular expression on, even with hair and bandages plastered on his face by the rain.

“Come on,” he incited, endlessly bored. Still, when he intertwined their fingers to pull him out into the storm, Chuuya felt a curious tilt to his heartbeat. “I’m taking your microscopic self home. Try not to drown in the puddles.”

---

...

---

Dazai, Mori had told him, once, is barely a person.

He didn’t quite remember the context — only the blinding light of his medical office; a needle in his arm. Chuuya had lacked a good number of shots, when he’d joined; before Doc had put his sadistic hands on it, there had been Mori — and the lessons in Mafia survival.

His humanity rests in a common trait: he exists to entertain himself. It’s inconsequential whether that entertainment is a danger to himself or to others. It’s even less inconsequential whether that entertainment could be called such.

When the endless mountains of trash of the dumping site appeared in front of him, Chuuya knew there was a joke, somewhere.

He kept quiet all the way in, though.

“Here we go,” Dazai said, too cheerful for the circumstances. It was disgusting to see; it was goosebump inducing, the sound of his hands pulling the metal door of the shipping container aside. “You might not remember, given your late tendency to pass out like a fair maiden — but. Here’s my humble abode.”

“Yeah,” Chuuya echoed. Being weirded out or being concerned, was the question. “Humble.”

It was then, in the heavy silence and the water drops dripping from their chins to the floor, that they both noted their still intertwined hands.

Both shivering in disgust, they let go.

One track minded, Dazai was surprisingly efficient in his quest to ignore the circumstances. Each step he took on the metallic floor shook the whole box, as he made his way to the mini-fridge in a corner and fished out some clothes, startling Kazuko from her curled sleep on his bed.

The only other furniture of the house — a desk overflowing in reports, projects and dossiers, and a screeching stool — was dimly illuminated by the thunder appearing from the square of the door. The lightbulb, Chuuya noticed, a bit numbly, raising his fingers to brush against the sharp, warm edges, had exploded.

“Here,” A bundle of clothes hit him right in the face — dry, warm enough to feel like a relief against his soaked body. “We’ll be here for a while. Last thing I need is to be subjected to your horrible caveman sneezes.”

“They’re not cavemen —“

Dazai threw another shirt.

The tip-tap of the rain against the roof was the only sound, apart from the rustle of fabric. He abandoned the wet clump of his clothes under the desk, skipping over the curves of Kazuko’s body with familiar mastery; the blue shirt he slipped on was too tight on the shoulder and arms, but it reached embarrassingly low under his waist. He stuffed it into an old pair of pants to hide it — only half surprised that Dazai would own something other than suits — and pulled the hems up his calves.

By the time he was done, he tilted his chin to study the panels on the roof, and paused.

“Did you make these?” he asked, stupidly.

Drawings, he could only conclude, blinking at the faded oil paint. Those were drawings.

Sketched and abandoned halfway, blurring off at the outlines and ruined by palms running over them in an attempt to wipe them off. Hands in white gloves, dragging a scalpel up the tarnished metal surface; a brown scarf fluttering with nonexistent wind down an old man’s frame; golden eyes bleeding crimson tears down the mini-fridge, demonic and familiar and much more vicious than they had ever looked at him; manicured hands on a secretary desk; the river near the Headquarters.

A red-led light sign, white words curling in unclear letters — B-r L-in? — and a man’s hand wrapped around a glass of alcohol. More detail had been put in those fingers than on any other smudge on the walls; a heartbreaking kind of care littered on every brushstroke.

Chuuya reached out to brush against the most faded of the pieces. The rumble of thunder called his hand back; when he turned, Dazai was wearing only a white shirt, sitting at the edge of the doorframe.

“I can’t stay here,” Chuuya announced, dropping down next to him, their legs dangling. The container had a canopy of sorts. He studied the smoke-colored sky — the lines of bandages on Dazai’s naked legs. “Yuan might come back to the apartment. If you have shit to say about whatever the hell that was, speak up.”

Dazai hummed. “No.”

“Of course.”

“I’m just as allowed to be informed of these things as you are,” the boy clarified. “You must be aware.”

He scoffed. “You’re basically Boss’ equal.”

“Because I know how to find things I’m not allowed to find,” Dazai insisted. “You should learn. It might do wonders for your development.”

He removed his hat; threw it somewhere over the makeshift bed. After a moment, he took off his gloves too. Quietly, he seethed.

The sound of the storm was less of a background noise and more of a roar; Chuuya couldn’t imagine trying to fall asleep underneath that melody.

Chuuya couldn’t imagine — having that little space to move, given how continuously tweaking Dazai was; circling and circling those four walls again and again and again, spinning on a stool, talking with a snake whose existence was a prayer for death. If he focused on it too long, something started climbing up his ribs — as if the answer would be hidden in the hook for a hangman knot on the ceiling.

It’s just Dazai, Kouyou had said, once.

With not much to add, he reached back for his coat — Dazai’s own thrown like trash into a corner, being curiously analyzed by Kazuko — and settled it around both their shoulders, sighing.

“For your information,” Dazai said, after the cascade of raindrops had turned into a blurry, furious mess. “A meeting with the Five Moons has been announced, a month from now. And if we go on with the last part of the plan, three of the Five Moons will want us dead by then.”

The last part of the plan. Chuuya frowned. “We knew that already.”

“The stakes just got higher, though. Those dummies found a useful card. Even the advantages we’ll gather next week are in question.”

“So, we don’t act on it?”

“No,” Dazai replied. His side was freezing, pressed against his own; his heartbeat placid. A few of the scratches on his upper thighs, right by the hems of grey boxers, were shaped like glass pieces. “We do.”

“Makes sense,” Chuuya shrugged. Curious, Kazuko slithered in their direction, blinking onyx eyes up at him. “Don’t you dare, brat. Keep your slimy ass out of my personal space, or I’ll turn you into shoes for Madame Tanaki.”

Dazai’s gasp was obnoxious; he gathered the boa constrictor on his other side, offended. “Are you heartless?”

He flicked him between the eyebrows. “What card did the Five Moons find?”

“The plan was to remind them who the sleeping dragon truly was,” Dazai explained. “I told you this. Show them how easily the Port Mafia can get rid of high-placed pieces on their chessboard. Truces are a sign of weakness — what Mori needs, is for them to keep us out of their conflict.”

Chuuya watched a scrapped traffic light at the edge of the trash crater blink, shattering the raindrops in blue-red-yellow rays. “We didn’t fail.”

“We didn’t,” he agreed. “Unfortunately, they were smart enough to set their eyes on —” Inspiration curled upon his lips; his eye fell on Chuuya’s hands, gathering his soaked hair on his shoulder to work through the knots. “Something we need.”

“What is it?”

“You’ll see.”

“Fuck you.”

Dazai did nothing more than shrug. “You have been just so busy chasing your past around the city. If you had shown up, I would have — very reluctantly, please be aware — dragged you to spy on the Executive meeting with me.”

Chuuya stared at the ground. “Oh.”

“Yeah. Oh, ” He pulled his side of his coat a bit tighter around himself, clearly pretending to be peeved. “You’re always assuming the worst about me. With the little you’ve got going on for you, you could at least be more graceful.”

“Don’t make me punch you again.”

“Would it help you calm down those dog nerves of yours?”

Thunder flashed. “Excuse me?”

“Well, you sure can’t punch Yuan, ” Dazai blinked, weirded out. “She’s a girl. ”

He huffed. “A girl who could kick your ass, if she wasn’t starving.”

“You can relate to that, don’t you?”

“Do you relate to Kazuko?” he snapped. “Homeless and slimy and pathetic?”

As if she understood, the snake hissed. Less than impressed, the boy munched on his nail — with the same interest of a sniper for a dead body. Lighting followed the thunder, rattling the container. They fell quiet.

Eventually: “So you do know her name.”

“I know everything,” Dazai replied, flippantly. “You know — there’s a wall at the Headquarters filled with photographs of high-level members. It’s been there since the foundation.”

He frowned. “Is there?”

“Hm-hm,” He pinched Kazuko’s chin. As much as she bit and tormented him, it was astonishing how genuinely peaceful the thing was in his arms. “There’s this old tradition — should one of the subjects of the pictures betray the organization, their frame will be cracked.”

Traitors were rare in the organization; the higher they were in rank, the more vicious their punishment was said to be. “Wouldn’t it be easier to just take the photo down?” he mused.

Abruptly, the boy turned to look at him.

“What?”

“I,” Dazai blinked, as if the idea had never crossed his mind. He still needed to cut his hair; some horribly asymmetric strands were wetly stuck to his cheek. Chuuya itched to pull them. He hadn’t worn a single hair clip since the well. “Well. You’re the expert on betrayal, aren’t you?”

Disgruntled, he kicked his calf with his own.

Dazai didn’t seem perturbed — he kicked right back. There was a jitteriness to him that was only more evident without the endless layers of an incomplete suit and Mori’s coat; an intent to his fingers that had Chuuya only watch, when he reached out, tracing a fading black line on the inside of his arm. He reached his palm; tapped on the curling branches of those poisoned veins, once, twice, and intertwined their fingers again.

A quiet so familiar it could be tasted came with the next wave of rain.

Chuuya stared.

It was more felt than seen; their arms were pressed from elbows to wrist, freezing skin against drying one. A distant memory pressed against his eyelids — wandering through the most dangerous layers of the crater, hungry and bored, holding onto Shirase and Yuan’s sticky fingers.

This means something, he mused, belatedly. Everything did, with Dazai. He stretched his fingers to plaster their palms together, cringing at the wet squelch of rainwater; gulped down the hint of revulsion he could see in the tense line of Dazai's jaw, too — and exhaled.

"It tastes like blood," he said, eventually. Kazuko had managed to lay her chin on his knee, right by their knuckles. A heartbeat that wasn't his own pressed against his wrist; he focused on it.

Dazai squinted at him, like he didn't really care. "What does?"

He shrugged. "Everything."

Understanding clogged the silence.

"Most of it, anyway," he added. "I'm not starving myself. I'm not — fucked in the head," Kouyou's voice echoed in his head, reprimanding. "Or something. It just tastes like shit."

"Because of Arahabaki?"

Chuuya huffed. "A recurrent theme."

"But you do ration your food."

"And you don't sleep at night, or leave your house without those disgusting bandages, or give a good reason for holing up under people's desks," he spat out. "Keep your nose out of my stuff, and I'll keep mine out of your —"

"My?"

He kicked the metal ground underneath his calves. "Whatever it's fucked up in there that makes you live in a shipping container."

Howling wind plastered his clothes to his skin; whispers over whispers over taunts. In the nature of gods, I'd imagine, Hirotsu had once mused, unaware of the incongruous irony, there is loneliness, too.

Is that why you never shut up?, Chuuya wondered, watching Dazai's thumb trace a bundle of ink lines over his third and fourth knuckle. It was a hypnotic, vaguely unpleasant feeling — every nerve in his body had focused on that spot, humming along to the swing of his fingertip. Are you not even an inch as terrifying as they all believe? Are you pathetic, behind the blood you spilled and you bled?

Arahabaki knew no sarcasm — he barely knew anything. Look who's talking, he imagined he would taunt.

"No, but seriously," Dazai started. "Being the expert on betrayal. Say you needed to pick. One afternoon with Yuan or one with Verlaine?"

Speechless, he paused. "What?"

"Between Yuan and Verlaine," he repeated, undeterred. "An entire afternoon."

“You need to shut the fuck up.”

“Odasaku would call this a devilish crossroad,” His nails traced Kazuko’s scales, pensive. “A global scale emergency could erupt if you picked Verlaine, but are we sure Pink-Hair won’t pray to her Creator to strike you down with lighting? She’d be doing me a favor. Perhaps I was too harsh with her. Perhaps I understand where you’re coming from.”

“I will kick your ass,” Chuuya spelled out, lips trembling, “Do you understand me?”

“And blow my thatched house away? Are your dog tendencies morphing into wolfish ones?”

“What the fuck is up with you and fairytales?”

“How does a street rascal know them, by the way?”

He hadn’t quite been smiling; all hilarity subdued all the same. He watched dirty raindrops draw dots on his shoes. “One of the younger kids had a fairytale book.”

A hum.

“He’s dead now.” It seemed necessary to say — felt like Chuuya had been lying about just how capable he had been. Just don’t kill the kids. “They all are.”

Dazai’s fingers tightened around his own, only once; somehow, it managed to feel careless. But it was there, and it was quiet. Tactility was a privilege he had no spine to deny, not to someone who craved it so quietly. Not to someone who’d had his hands in his blood.

She’s not your responsibility any longer.

Who else?

“You’re very stupid,” Dazai concluded. “Death is death. It’s all very boring.”

It didn’t mean, he thought, he had to understand it. It meant Dazai spoke in transactionality, and Chuuya, foolishly enough, had developed a pendant for learning his languages. “You’re the scum on this earth.”

“Probably,” he agreed. “But you’re even more suicidal than I am.”

He barked out a laugh. They were sitting in a shipping container. Four overheated walls, puddles of rain sneaking in through holes in the metal, a broken lightbulb, and a snake on his lap, stubbornly crawling towards Chuuya’s own. A shipping container where he lived.

“Doubt.”

“They were little cowards overflowing with delusions of grandeur,” Dazai replied. “And you were their King.”

“I wasn’t shit,” he scoffed.

“Because you didn’t want to be.”

“What?”

“Look at you,” Stretching, he allowed Kazuko to intertwine around his waist; the world’s deadliest belt. He unclenched his grip until their fingers were only intertwined by fortune. He ran his index up the inside of Chuuya’s little finger; then, their shared scar by the thumb. “You don’t even trust them enough to tell them the truth.”

Chuuya stared at the ground.

“You didn’t tell Shirase,” Dazai sing-sang, still, studying the brumous sky. “You won’t tell Yuan. You’re content with their crucifixion. For a slug so eager for a chance to punch someone in the face, you surely will do anything but beg for someone else’s contempt. Won’t you?”

“I’m not you,” he said, easily.

For a moment, he was hanging from chains, a spear of electricity piercing his body, and pain — more than he should have been able to withstand. A familiar face, too close, too unwanted. You and I are the same.

“Oh,” Dazai said, because he was real. “Oh, that’s for sure, Chuuya.”

Gods are to be left alone, he thought. But he wasn’t a god, was he? External factors did not count. Were his hollow bones not the same as the ones in the soiled ground? Would he not have bled the same as every child from the Sheep, dead, dead and gone, caught in the trap of a sin he hadn’t committed?

If it’s not real, he thought, it should at least be useful.

“You get more freckles.”

Chuuya frowned. “What?”

Pointedly, Dazai’s nail printed a half moon on a dot on his knuckle. They were pressed from shoulder to knee; if he focused, he thought he could hear his blood flow. If it breathes. If it beats. “After Corruption. Like a sunburn, I assume. They usually disappear by the time you wake up, but they make you look like a chickenpox victim,” He tilted his head, studying him. “A very ugly one at that.”

He spluttered, speechless. “Your dead fish looking ass has some fucking nerve —“

“Your eyes also glow in the dark.”

Kouyou’s pictures came to mind. “Shut the fuck up.”

“And if I look at you from the corner of my eye,” the boy continued, undeterred by the pinches and punches, “You’ve still got Corruption marks all over you.”

“As in —“ Chuuya blinked. “What, like, during Corruption?”

“Bleeding, shiny gashes that smell like burning trash cans, yes. Rotting arms and hands aside. You might be familiar with the idea.”

Chuuya was — but only from reflections he mostly attributed to his decaying sanity. It was meant to be a private business, he thought — not one more proof for others to wonder. There wasn’t supposed to be any space for questioning — not when he, Dazai, and Mori were the only ones who knew enough to doubt.

It seemed stupid — but they were stuck in the rain, and their fingers were still too close, and Yuan was still lost. He asked: “What else?”

---

...

---

“Here,” Chuuya said. “Answer the phone.”

Through rain-wet eyelashes, Yuan stared at him. A reddish veil was draped over her skin — a reflection from the umbrella he’d pushed towards her huddled figure at the end of the alley.

“What?” No sound arose from her mouth; her lips, though, moved unmistakably. The motion spurred her eyes into motion, too; she settled them onto Chuuya’s destroyed cell phone.

He threw it on her lap. “Go on.”

Hesitantly — how did you find me, she didn’t ask, and I want you to leave, she didn’t say — Yuan did as told.

Static noises floated to his ears, defeating the distance and the roar of the storm — shaping themselves into words that ripped Yuan’s eyelids apart. Chuuya pretended to scratch his ear with his shoulder, doing his best to muffle his hearing.

So delicate it could have been a simple breath, she whispered: “Chi-chi?”

Before he could shut the conversation out, Shirase’s embarrassed groan filled his skull.

“Yuan? Are you kidding me? You’re the one from the prank calls?” His huff was louder than the storm. “That’s so not cool, I thought I was getting haunted — Yuan, come on, what did we say about that nickname? It’s Buichiro, if you really have to — we’ve talked about it —”

A sob wrecked her throat — something lined in more longing she had spared for him. Chuuya turned around, floating his umbrella over her head to step away.

That piece of shit, she had spat out.

Less of a piece of shit than me, he considered, for a split second — a breath so quick it was over before his lungs could even feed on it. Pettiness was childish, and childishness was luxury, and Chuuya had no money to spend — and Chuuya wasn't a child, and Chuuya hated that he truly didn't care.

He was supposed to care, wasn't he? That would have been the human thing to do. Unfair, he thought, only once, like a luxury — and then it was gone, because it wasn't real. Unfair.

He exhaled.

Evening traffic and busy passersby had filled the road to the brim by the time he felt his phone hit his back. Yuan held onto his umbrella for dear life, untrusting even of his power — her eyes settled on him, a bit more awake.

"Stray Sheep?" she muttered. Fondness lined her mocking tone. "What a dumb name."

Chuuya removed his soaked hat, snapping his fingers. Keeping the rain outward with the help of his Ability was possible, but it required a certain concentration his frantic mind usually refused to waste. Unconcerned with his thoughts, Yuan was still shaking. Still in that damn night gown.

The awkwardness of it all would kill him, one day.

"You know," he spoke up, unsure of why. "I had a brother."

Hesitation filled her dusty features. "No," she replied, tentatively. "You're an orphan."

Chuuya tilted his head. "That's — actually debatable. But it's a long story," He plopped down on the wet ground, giving Yuan all the time to study his movements as he lowered himself. A corpse could have filled the space between them; it did, perhaps. "He's not really my brother. Ane-san said we resembled each other, but I didn't really see it. We just — came from the same place."

Got out of it differently, too, he didn't add. Verlaine's voice was a flicker in the back of his skull — an accented tone swearing their birth had been the problem. Chuuya lacked the sufficient rage in his mind to send him to hell.

Yuan hugged her legs closer.

"Before — Before leaving," she cleared her throat. "Shirase told me you were — said you came to us from this facility. Said they made him pass out, and — he said I'd have to ask you the rest."

He waited, curling an eyebrow.

"I don't want to know," she admitted.

"Alright," he conceded. "It's none of your guys' business, anyway."

“Like your personal Port Mafia business?” she questioned, mocking. “Like at the Arcade?”

Outside the alley, car horns filled the silence, a dissonant melody. Chuuya wiped his face, pointlessly. “Yeah. Exactly.”

A glint of surprise flashed through her face. Turning it to the side, she insisted: “Where’s your brother, now?”

“Dead.”

“Did you kill him?”

A helicopter platform, the Yokohama skyline. A useless question from someone who knew there was no other choice, and then — nothing. A nothingness he had grown familiar with, cradling it in his arms every week, studying the constellations as he bled out in the grass. His nothing against someone else’s — the only one who might understand. The only one he didn’t want to ask to.

“Yeah,” Chuuya concluded. “The bastard murdered my family. So I killed him.”

Yuan struggled to open her mouth. “We were your family too, you know.”

Control the things in your veins, he recalled. Or they’ll control you instead.

“Things change,” Chuuya said.

She fell quiet.

It took less convincing than other times to get her to her feet. She accepted to walk close to him, knuckles white around the umbrella — given that they both wouldn’t fit underneath, Chuuya pretended to appreciate it, pushing himself out of the way.

Uncomfortable memories from the first true storm to hit Suribachi City crowded under their steps — the kids all pushed together in the driest corners, wrapped in shared blankets and gritting their teeth to keep them from chattering. On his eleventh birthday, Chuuya, had marched war against one smaller group in the better side of the settlement. It had gained them a new base, and some easier stormy nights.

You need to take better care of yourself, Yuan had huffed, strangling him in her own blankets, pulling at his hair, as if the rain could be dried with ripped pieces. What will we ever do if you get sick, Chuuya?

The closer they walked to the destination, the slower the girl’s steps grew. “This isn’t your apartment,” she dared to murmur.

“Bet you’ll recognize the place anyway.”

As he’d expected, the moment the rusty gates of the Wild Geese Orphanage appeared in front of their eyes, Yuan gasped. Quicker than she could have predicted, Chuuya’s hand sneaked out and wrapped around her wrist, gentle enough not to startle her — barely stopping her from sprinting to the other direction.

Chuuya felt her stiffen under his touch; her grip around the umbrella gave up, dropping it to the ground.

“Hey. Hey,” he hurried to explain, dragging her to the canopy. “Listen to me.”

A hint of betrayal sparked in her eyes, pulling her shoulders in. “Chuuya,” she breathed out. Something in his chest tightened; something about her seemed younger. “Chuuya, what are you doing?”

“Listen,” he insisted. “It’s fine. I have a friend who has a brother here. He and this other friend of mine — sort of work here, too. They’re not mad about you stealing food.”

“They will call the police,” Yuan hissed. “Chuuya, you know they’ll call the police —“

“This isn’t Suribachi City. And they’re mafiosi, they wouldn’t call the police —“

She pushed him off. “Everywhere is like Suribachi City. Where the fuck have you been?”

“Surviving, Yuan,” Hands on her arms, he shook her — needing her to look at him. “That was the whole point of the Sheep, wasn’t it? Surviving. That’s what I’m doing. That’s what I need you to do.”

“The Bishop’s Staff —“

“Are a bunch of psychos,” he cut her off. “A bunch of fanatic, disgusting fuckers who are going to take more than what you can give, and leave you emptier than before. You don’t want my help — fine. You want me to get out of your sight — I can do that. But I’m not leaving you with them.”

Frantic, her eyes searched him, untrusting, uncertain, angered. “You —“

“I killed you,” Chuuya heard himself spit out. She flinched. “I killed all of you. I believe you. I destroyed the Sheep. I ruined your life. Let me fix it.” A gulp wrecked her throat, deepening the veil of tears in her glass eyes. “But to do that,” he spelled out, slowly, the tone he used to wear during emergency attacks, when he needed the older kids to bring the younger ones to safety. “I need to take a step back.”

She didn’t speak. “You need someone to trust,” Chuuya concluded. “I’m not that person.”

Her next flinch shook her whole frame.

He didn’t let it deter him. “I’ll get you one of those stupid sparkly pink phones you’ve always wanted and put Shirase’s number in there. I don’t know why he left without you, or what happened between you two — but clearly it’s fixable shit. You can fix it. You can stay here, with the other kids, and you can get better. My friends will keep an eye on you. I promise not to interfere. I won’t even show my face around here.”

“Chuuya —“

“Just for a few weeks,” he said, undeterred, eyes set on nothing at all — if he stopped talking, he thought, he would never do it again. “A month. Something more. They can help you. You need — you need medical checks, and some food, and a bed that’s not in the middle of a cult’s base. You don’t even believe you can cheat the code, Yuan,” Her eyes brushed the ground. “None of us can.”

“Just a few weeks. And if you still want to leave — I’ll get you the money. Not mine, and not the Port Mafia’s. I promise. I have a — my stupid brother. He had this house in France, and he — I’ll get you his money. He had a shit ton of money, and nothing would make me happier than someone wasting all of them. You can go wherever the fuck you want. Yuan, I don’t care.”

The strange, nonsensical way those last words seemed to echo off the walls of rainfall mocked him, laughing in his face, closing them in with its peer pressure. Yuan was paper thin under his hands. Yuan had spent almost two years in a nightmare. This is Yuan. Be nice to her.

“This is touching,” A voice spoke up. “But wouldn’t it be better if you maggots continued your heart-to-heart where it’s dry?”

Noguchi and Koda were leaning on the doorframe of the Orphanage, a stone-throw from the open gates. Uchiyama slept in his brother’s arms, lulled by the rain and the gentle roar of voices he could hear from inside the building.

The moment their eyes laid on them, Yuan threw herself behind Chuuya’s shoulders, hands reaching for a fragment of glass he’d seen her pick up in the alley.

“R-Relax,” Koda intervened, hands in the air. “We’re not here to hurt you.”

“You can fucking try,” she hissed.

Noguchi huffed. “Yeah — your little sister alright, Boss.”

Chuuya threw a nasty glance in his direction. “She’s not my —“

“Are you going to get inside? You look pathetic, standing under the rain like that. And she,” He nodded towards Yuan, “Is going to pass out from either starvation, sickness, or hypothermia in about — yesterday. Get inside.”

“Fucking alright, shut up,” he snapped. “Can we have a moment, or do you two need help finding the way in?”

They muttered — but by the time he had leaned down to pick up his fallen umbrella, the porch was empty again, and Yuan’s fingers were tattooed around his wrist.

“He,” she forced out, looking distraught by the notion. “Shirase told me to trust you. He said I could.” That’s fucking rich, he thought. “He said you — he said you tried your best.”

Abruptly, Chuuya felt very tired.

“But,” she gulped. “But I — I can’t —“

“Yuan,” he stopped her. It thundered; as incessant and insistent as it had come, the rain only grew stronger, following the parting clouds. The smell clogged his nose; the taste ran down his throat, leaving him thirstier than before. “Yuan, I don’t care.”

“But I do,” Yuan snarled. Her fingers flexed at her sides — longing to punch him, perhaps. To pull him closer. To do something. “What the hell do I do with it?”

Chuuya studied the splintered wood of the Orphanage door. Death is death, Dazai had said, and some things are meant to be discovered later, Matsuda had insisted, — and, doesn’t it burn to be anything at all?, Kouyou had shrugged.

“I don’t know,” he offered, eventually. “You try and figure it out where it’s warmer, I guess.”

She parted her lips; closed them again.

He stuck his hands in his pockets; jumped down where it was wetter and safer. A cowardly route, he considered — just for a bit. He thought about something sufficient to say; came up empty. Yuan didn’t speak — she pulled her wrist, looking for a bracelet that wasn’t there.

Chuuya turned around and left.

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: i am being haunted dazai: like christmas carol or

“at least it wasn’t a bucket of water” anybody caught the stormbringer reference? hi there! if you’re still reading — thank you so much for the support, and for the comments, and for the kudos. seriously, it’s all so very nice and it always makes my day!

i’m in a bit of a hurry, but something i wanted to highlight is one of my favorite chuuya hcs — namely, that corruptions gives him strange side effects. the pictures thing in particular has always been a little hc of mine, and i’m glad i finally get to use it!

as for yuan, she's always been a side character i've wanted to explore — and i have a whole lot to say about the way stormbringer handled chuuya's feelings towards the sheep. i feel like chuuya took shirase's blame very headstrong, and he kinda took their whole situation as a “okay, that's over with”, so in my hc — him meeting a yuan who carries news of just how devastated the sheep were after everything that happened would absolutely make him. yk. pause. i also like to believe living with the flags and being generally treated “better” would help him understand he does get to feel betrayed about what happened — though he'd rather die than admit it to the sheep themselves (hence his regret during the “you're the ones who stuck a knife in my—”) anyway! i do have more to say, but i'll tell you guys next time. kudos and comments are always appreciated, and i hope you'll keep reading! have a wonderful day <3 see you!

NOVEMBER

Chapter Summary

The end of August ruffled rusty feathers on the unjusticated tension brimming through the syndicate, and brought government cars around the perimeter of the Port Mafia Headquarters.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xvii.

---

Case number: 7886990

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Nakahara C. and Dazai O. took part in the emergency meeting between the [...]*

---

“...reports from the station are yet to confirm whether the attack should be linked to terrorist roots, local gang violence, or the isolated case of an antagonistic shooter. Anything of smaller scale is to be excluded, given the damage to the station itself and a number of wounded and dead that brushes the two hundreds. The few, horrified survivors from Train 7 reported the presence of bullets right before the bomb went off, killing every last passenger inside up to five wagons of the train. From the Yokohama PD, Chief Tanaka says:

‘It’s too early to speak with certainty — we’ll need to wait for answers from the forensic team. But my bets are on a fore-planned gang attack. One that ended up involving too many civilians — a scare technique of its own right. None of the gangs want the police’s attention. To do something like this, the culprit must want to send a strong message. Truly — we haven’t seen anything of this scale in a long time. It was a bloodbath. We have gathered the names of three suspects from the three different criminal organizations, among the deceased — namely, Takasekai, the KK Company, and the Shadow Blade. Our database named them as rather relevant amongst their syndicates — perhaps even among the top dogs. It’s not far fetched to hypothesize the attack was meant to partly incapacitate such groups in one go.’

On the matter of whether the Chief has any suspicions on what gang might be blamed for this tragedy, Tanaka added:

‘I’m sure we’re all thinking of one name in particular. This is Yokohama, after all — who else?’

— Extract; 12:37.

[Radio Station: City View]

---

...

---

The end of August ruffled rusty feathers on the unjustified tension brimming through the syndicate, and brought government cars around the perimeter of the Port Mafia

Headquarters.

Having unwillingly developed a Pavlovian response to anything that carried the government footprint on it, Chuuya wasn't particularly surprised by the fight-or-flight instinct swathing his spine like sticky ivy the more vehicles he located — leftovers of the paranoia Arahabaki brought with him.

Problem was, he'd never been much of a flight. Problem was — he wasn't quite sure anyone else could feel the rustle of taut wings through the halls.

"Perhaps you need some rest," was all Hirotsu said, when he dared to bring up the issue. Chuuya had been covered in goosebumps since the morning, no matter the scorching heat beating his reasonings. "You and Dazai have been bouncing around missions —"

— and it was true. There had been job upon job, infiltration upon infiltration; until Chuuya had come to the disheartening conclusion that he would have probably managed to kill whoever Dazai needed him to before he could even meet his eyes. Messages were tapped onto his skin, traced, bird-whistled, blinked, mouthed, tutted with lights and reflections — a thousand ways more. His soles were shaped like skulls biting the curb; his feet tended to climb walls, forgetting to turn off his Ability. Dazai was everywhere.

Surely that could be enough to be tense.

And yet —

"Not to mention your squad, and your..." He searched for the words; landed on all the wrong ones. "Your training."

Chuuya tasted acid and apple pie; familiar, never mind if he had never munched on either one. "Drop the subject."

"I'm merely —"

"Old man," he insisted, snapping eyes from a long time ago in his direction. Not the gaze of run from the handler — a brother to the darkened drapes he would wear when the man walked a bit too close to the sun. "Drop the subject."

"Alright," Hirotsu conceded, once he was done reflecting him in his monocle. "But I'm not blind, Chuuya. And whatever it is that is haunting you —"

"Nothing's haunting me, grandpa," He swatted at him, knocking back his glass of wine. Yuan wasn't a secret — just an unnecessary detail.

Skepticism blurred his gaze. "Something must be, if you're so convinced trouble's on the way."

Trouble was always on the way; that mentality kept him alert — kept him useful. A meeting with the Five Moons was scheduled for the end of the month; there, eventually, they would be asked to own up to crimes nobody but him and Dazai knew of. Whatever secret card the

Moons has apparently hoarded would come clean — a truce might be put in place, or they might finally accept to bow their heads.

“The sooner the Five Moons understand the subtle concept of hierarchy,” Mori explained, hands crossed under his chin — as certain as an untouched painting, “The quicker this tension of yours will know peace, Chuuya.”

He hadn’t told him about any tension of his. “Do you wish to rule over the Five Moons, Boss?”

“Wish is an — elastic term. Power thirst is such a cliché motivation to act upon,” His smile was a private thing; the borderline appraisal of it helped Chuuya imagine that there might be no real purpose behind the, want to take a walk with me, Chuuya?, he sometimes chirped. “What I wish, is to protect the organization in the best way possible. If command over the Five Moons will help me accomplish that mission — then yes. I do wish that.”

He didn’t seem concerned. Only endlessly, omnisciently amused.

It wasn’t the perspective of having done something wrong, turning his skin into a field of pins and shivers, though; nor the possibility of the Three Moons demanding their heads. Of the many curses Chuuya’s plastic skeleton had been stained with, trust in Dazai might have been the most foolish of them — but, unfortunately, also the sturdiest.

[Policy in the Sheep went: you do not attack, if you’re not attacked first. Policy in the Flags went: you can keep your morals, as long as they don’t shit in the dining room].

“The Black Market has been suspiciously devoid of competition,” Kouyou admitted, mouth hidden in Hikari’s fur. “Those fools are too busy throwing knives at each other’s faces in the name of their former commanders to realize how quickly their affairs are tumbling down. Nonetheless, they will still demand our help to figure out who’s to blame for the slaughter at the train station,” She studied her own nails, looking thoroughly bored. “An alliance is an alliance, I suppose.”

Pointedly silent, Chuuya kept his eyes on Hikari’s sharp claws.

Featherlight and wonderstruck, day after day, he kept his eyes on the stained-glass windows, too. He would have been able to feel a sniper even with his back turned. He could have counted every government vehicle circling the buildings, and he could have memorized them from wheel to roof.

He could wait.

“She needs some more time,” Noguchi told him, uncharacteristically non-disgruntled. The bustle of children from the Orphanage embraced them, suffocatingly warm and impossible not to glance at — fighting for the last piece of bread on the counter of the kitchen they occupied, playing catch with Koda’s limping, bruised form, they were the loudest thing around. “She barely accepts to talk with the other kids. You’re going to set her back if you insist on seeing her.”

What the fuck do you know, he wanted to say. The roofs in that place looked unstable. If he concentrated, he thought he could hear Yuan's too-heavy steps — running circle over circle; biting her nails down the quick.

He hoped they had managed to get her out of the white gown. He hoped she hadn't stolen any more food.

As far as everyone who he had involved knew, the Bishop's Staff hadn't been looking for her. Only Chuuya — and the healing scar on his side — were aware of the truth.

[“You don't get to keep her,” the man in the mask had told him, right before he'd attempted to sink a stop-sign into his ribcage. Chuuya had made him eat the concrete for two whole alleys, for it. “But you can have her, if you wish.”]

“It's not you she hates,” Madame Tanaki told him. “I assure you, dear. It's what you represent. She doesn't see you. She only sees all that she's lost.”

Be patient, they told him. To the goosebumps on arms he still checked every morning, surprised not to find them near the ending stages of decomposition; to the pointless startlement that woke him up in the middle of the night — longing for a Corruption break Mori had mournfully decided could come to an end, for, I see no point in giving you scars you haven't earned. For, you could create immeasurable problems for us, Chuuya, if you got yourself defeated so easily.

He knew.

[It was, he knew, an oversimplification of the circumstances.

Side effects were easy to juggle. Chuuya found that he preferred them; would have rather felt Dazai's questioning — contemptful — gaze from the corner of his eyes, studying marks and dots and skin-ash that shouldn't have been there, eyes that glowed a tad too bright, needles and pins down his spine because someone was watching, and —

Belated side effects could be juggled. They were nothing compared to the immediate ones.

“I believe the strain might be catching up to him,” he overheard Dazai explain to Mori, after he was dismissed. He still didn't know what the man had told him, after the Hospital fiasco — at times, he wondered if he had been blamed for it. “Corruption — I don't think it was supposed to be activated this often. Those stains on his arms are only part of it. We've been giving Arahbaki all the means to gain more control over a weaker body. Who's to say something akin to the parking lot won't happen again?”

“I thought you'd said it wasn't as strong, during the training rounds,” Mori replied, sounding every last bit surprised. “That is why I gave my approval to them.”

“There's a different weight to the power when it's not actually being used to fight, but it still —“

“Still?” Mori encouraged, when the silence stretched out too long.

“It’s... ” There was no particular shade in his hesitation — merely an intake of breath. Doctor to doctor; except most of Chuuya’s scars would never heal nicely. Except he wasn’t quite fond of the idea of offering himself to real medical eyes again. “Rotting him.”

He wondered what part he was referring to — if it was the scar tissue draped across him like a second skin; the sudden bursts of energy; the lungs-related difficulties he refused to admit he was experiencing — but which he doubted the guy who had memorized his breathing pattern hadn’t noticed. Training himself to withstand poison had made him very much familiar with his toilet; throwing up blood, though, tasted like concrete and gunpowder.

The end — and the delineation of those academically precise words of his — came with the rain, and with the burst of freedom Arahabaki had ripped from his chest when he was distracted.

“It’s not stopping,” Dazai told him, calm.

Swimming through the waves, redder than they should have been, clogging up his throat until his breaths came out in rattles, Chuuya watched the stars. Bleeding was an outer-body sensation; liquefying through the grass, dew and sweat one and the same, skin melting with the heat. It’s not stopping, he said — was it supposed to?

In the back of his skull, Arahabaki dragged a tongue of flames up his nape, wet and sharp. Limbs turning to dust, hands turning to poison, destruction on the tips of his decaying fingers. Stars, it said, hysterically, because he couldn’t say a thing. Hurts like a bitch, but it’s beautiful, yes? Yes.

The slap smacked his jaw on the ground. He felt his skin tear apart, scratched — reuniting with everything it had lost through the green threads and the moonlight.

“It’s not stopping,” he repeated, clenching two fingers around his chin, lining his gaze with his own — which was useful, or would have been, had his eyes managed to focus onto something that wasn’t blue and dotted in silver; had he managed to see more than bloody bandages and the incomprehensible lines of his sunburned face. “So you need to make it stop.”

His lips parted. What?, he couldn’t say. There was something bubbling under the surface, he thought. There was a star much brighter than the others, and it kept looking at him. Stars, Arahabaki agreed. Stars were —

Fire erupted with the snap of a thread, and his vision went white.

“Think about it as — overheating,” Dazai would explain, later, holed up on the floor of the safehouse closest to the train station. They would have to burn the car, once he managed to stand. The blood it was soaked with would never stop sagging the air. “It’s a simple assumption, of course, given we have no comparison to study. But, according to you, Arahabaki lives to breach his way through. If we allow him to bite away at the entrance so often — to train himself to slip through the,” He snapped two fingers against the burned skin of the inside of his wrist, “Cracks, then, maybe...”

Overheating, Chuuya considered, was a rather mechanical way of putting it. It was merciful, also — much quicker on the lips than the blank descriptions Dazai had offered after his barked questions.

Something sneaked its fingers through his ribcage, widening the space, fitting itself where it shouldn't have. Terror, he thought — distantly, because he'd been very young the last time he'd felt something akin to fear.

Still — terror. It would never push past his lungs, but he wondered, still, where it had come from. Corruption wasn't an addiction and Chuuya didn't need the infinite in his veins. Corruption didn't even feel good. Corruption was —

“Chuuya,” Dazai's eye was all for the ceiling. He should change his bandages, he thought. A stranger's blood was rarely a good feeling on naked skin. “Do you want to be useless?”

The official communication was offered to Mori the next day — Dazai sporting a bent nose and a bored face, and narrating his tales as insultingly as possible. Chuuya spent two days stuck in Kouyou's guest bed, seething and grimacing, haunted by Arahbaki's taunts. Next time, he told him, next time for sure.

He would have to be patient].

And so Chuuya was patient.

“Hey,” Tsuchiya said. “Just once. Can I drive your bike just once?”

And,

“Five bucks I can get Rin drunk before the mission starts,” Kenta winked.

And,

“I made you one of the characters of my new story,” Virgil confessed. “Do you mind?”

And,

“Chuuya, I'm alright — Chuuya. Chuuya, I'm alright,” Koda promised him, cutting his rant off, holding a soaked piece of fabric to his bleeding side.

Missions with the squad quickly grew to be his favorite part of the week. An assortment of the adrenaline and the familiarity of a leading role managed to startle the ferociousness stored in his hollow bones — to set it on fire and keep him awake and vigil. It wasn't the instinctiveness and effortlessness of jobs with Dazai — but it was good, and he actually liked them.

He liked hearing the victorious whoops! out of Noguchi's mouth when their performance satisfied his pathetic parameters of fun; he liked watching Tsuchiya scam guards into believing she wouldn't be much of a threat; he let Kenta teach him something more about aim with actual weapons.

He watched Virgil and Koda brawl on the ground over some drunken bet, relishing in the unworried curve of the ex-Soul, in the time it had passed since the last time he'd said the name Dante; he challenged Rin to a duel on bikes when the teasing about a supposed puppy-crush of his on her grew too irritating.

It made nights easier. Mornings stayed the same, and cars kept circling the Headquarters.

Goosebumps and needles and pins, and glowing eyes in the dark, and some more quirks — Dazai insisted that his voice sounded different on the phone; Chuuya refused to let him prove his theory by deleting his number at least once every three days — and he could only come to the conclusion that everything was fine.

"I think France was good for you," Kajii sighed, holding him tight to scrub traces from an exploded lemon-bomb from his face. "Maybe you should consider a vacation. Paris is somewhat more tolerable in the winter."

Chuuya found himself agreeing, absurdly.

Roommate, he called, sometimes, when it was too dark for any reflection to catch up with his weakness, with his longing — waking him up, sweating him out, sucking his soul dry until all he wanted was the god-touched agony that had grown familiar. Some of his scars had healed, and some had not. He traced them at night, undifferentiated — and he imagined the grass under his body, imagined bleeding out, imagined the stars.

If he had to live with goosebumps and needles and glowing eyes, they would be his, and no one else's.

Cemeteries didn't calm him down, but he went there all the same. Talked with five graves who would not answer back. Thought about a makeshift tombstone on top of a cliff who he owned everything and nothing to; grass that had long since been washed clean from his blood, from the soles of the Sheep's second-hand shoes — second-hand loyalty.

Even if you are a pattern, that one grave told him, because that grave always answered back, etched on the surface of raw power; you are you.

"Sorry I killed your — him," he grunted to Verlaine, who did not have a grave — but who he didn't think would have minded sharing with Randou; Rimbaud; Arthur, mon stupide humain. "He wasn't as much of a piece of shit as you are."

He paused. "You were."

What the flutter of wings was not: grief. As such, it had to be a thing of the dead.

"Something is coming," the Colonel said. "And they're all fools if they cannot see it."

Chuuya paused, stunned.

Government cars circled the HQ. Suribachi City had overflowed with vultures — they had known they would never go hungry. It felt somewhat the same; it felt nothing like it. He knew what red water was called, these days. He knew they wouldn't throw him in the fire.

“Maybe you’re senile,” he replied, respectfully. It wasn’t the first time the man approached him; it was the first time he opened his mouth, instead of standing too straight — too tall, too nothing — next to him. “Ain’t it soldiers who get the PTSD thing? Paranoia and stuff.”

“That’s not what PTSD stands for, son.”

“Have you considered that I don’t care?”

“How hostile,” the Colonel mused, as if it didn’t touch him at all. “Has Kouyou been filling your head with warnings, lad?”

Chuuya didn’t have anything against the Executive. It stayed an open question whether it was because he couldn’t afford to, or because there was truly no reason. The man had wanted him in his team. The man thought he used his Ability in all the wrong ways. The man stood next to him after every meeting Dazai didn’t immediately drag him out of, and he didn’t say a word.

It wasn’t enough to hate a person. Not even Kouyou’s barbs were, even if he did recognize his own tendency to idolize her opinions. Too much of a soldier, she’d tell him, sometimes. The Mafia has no use for those.

As far as he understood — the woman despised the unfamiliar, and she despised the unreachable.

“Why do you think something is wrong?” he asked, instead of answering.

The Colonel hummed. “Why do you?”

“What makes you think I do?”

“We’re not like them. We understand.”

He scoffed. “I’ve heard that one before.”

“Our Abilities are somewhat similar, have you ever noticed?” The man tapped two knuckles on a red tassel of the window. A circular scar was imprinted there; Chuuya recognized the marks of a dashboard lighter. “They require us to be particularly aware of what surrounds us. It is inevitable. The ground under our feet,” He tapped ruined soles on the floor, “The ceilings, the walls, the air, the people,” Swiftly, he bowed his head to a passing woman, armed to the teeth and clearly uninterested.

“Everything could possibly become our weapon. That means we need to feel all of it,” the Colonel concluded. It could have easily been a soliloquy; Chuuya’s presence was nothing but a side effect to the rainfall of words abandoning his scarred mouth. “I know you understand.”

“If I’m the one who understands,” he drawled, feigning interest, “Why is Noguchi your champion?”

Noguchi, who doesn't even want to be Executive, he didn't add, because his analyses of his own subordinates were not to be disclosed — certainly not to the one man who would surely tell the interested subject.

“Because he saved my life,” the Executive said, easily. “And I believe he could save many more.”

Surprise stiffened his shoulders. He thought back to the stories Tsuchiya had told him — to the little Noguchi had allowed to escape about his mentor; an assortment of hushed conversations in the hallways and hesitation pulling the edges of his fish bone tattoo.

“His sister,” he dared. “Were you in the village she destroyed?”

A curt nod, soldier-like in its rigid curve, in the way it was immediately over — despising to concede. “I am from the village, to be precise. Noguchi saved me and my wife from certain death. In exchange, I brought him to the runaway road he was so desperately looking for after the funeral. His sister was not so lucky.”

“Her Ability,” Chuuya frowned. Suspicion tickled his palms; the aborted warnings from Tsuchiya's mouth — the step back Noguchi took whenever he dared to garrote the air in scarlet branches. “What was it?”

Instead of answering, the man offered: “Here's a question, Nakahara.”

He stared. “What, are you quizzing me?”

“Are you against it?”

“I don't see the need. It's Chuuya — “

“Here's a question, Chuuya,” he insisted. “Can an Ability be turned off?”

“No,” Chuuya said, eventually — once he decided the man was serious. “You can't turn off the blood in your veins.”

A flash of surprise overrode his features, quickly suffocated. “I see Albatross' rare teachings still strike as deep as they used to.”

It stung.

Chuuya hated it with precision.

Mindless hatred wouldn't do a thing. Keep the target under your eyelids, Kouyou had told him, teaching him how to correctly handle a gun. He hated it with cogency; for its inability to turn into a duller sort of nostalgia.

It was a reasonable idea — that living in four walls covered in photographs and ghostly laughter should have made the blade blunter. He didn't wish to forget. He didn't wish to not care. He wanted to catch a glimpse of the Flags in the summer air and not hurt, first and foremost, insistent and unbeatable, and there — always there before everything else.

Tell me about him, he wanted to ask Noguchi. Tell me his life, he wanted to ask — but there existed a claustrophobic room of possibilities, and each of the windows wanted a price, wanted something back, wanted, only if you tell me his death.

“Is there a point you’re trying to reach, sir?” Chuuya asked, eyes forward.

“You can’t turn it off.”

“We’ve established that.”

“Chuuya,” Something in his tone warranted him to turn. Eyes were interchangeable; nonetheless, he’d worn that exact pair as he asked him to tame something that wasn’t his blood, but that had been fighting for the space in his veins since the beginning. “Abilities know more than we ever will. They need no sleep, no rest; they’re untainted by bias and untouched by rationality. You may not be aware of the ground you step on, but your power is.”

That mentality won’t help your case, Kouyou had told him, and, I think Golden Demon despises me.

Yet another government car circled the building.

Chuuya didn’t fear it. It didn’t raise goosebumps on his skin; didn’t prick him with needles. Men were the least of his fears. He didn’t fear it — he didn’t remember enough to do so. It was him they’d thrown in a cage, he thought. But it wasn’t him who’d occupied the body in the water.

“And if the one, lonely guard who never sleeps says an earthquake is coming,” the Executive concluded. “You have no excuse to ignore him, do you?”

Chuuya despised those government cars.

Instead of longing for blood that was not his to spill, he tried to think of obscurer — and, as such, nicer — things. I’ll buy you a car, if you get your promotion, Kouyou had told him. We’ll have to forge you a fake license, though. Can a sixteen years old drive a Maserati? Or would you like something nicer?

Something nicer.

Suribachi trash once, Shirase would have said, Suribachi trash forever.

Suribachi trash doesn’t have a several-zeroes monthly pay, though, does it?, Chuuya replied, petty, pointlessly, talking to the walls.

“Are you going insane?”

It was a deeply Dazai question — unwarranted, unwanted and somehow correct. Scientifically curious and pointedly uninterested. It made him want to hurt him; so he did.

“Ouch,” he whined, cradling his pinched wrist, devastatingly blank-faced. “Someone’s pissy he didn’t get invited to the Grown-Ups party.”

Summer was but a season, and it could not change the unchangeable. Thus, Dazai had recently managed to land his wrist in a cast, following some unimportant mission with his Secret Force Squad. The obnoxiously blue shade of his splint was characteristic; the dead mackerel Chuuya had drawn on it a bit on the nose — but necessary because of it.

“In case you forgot,” he muttered, tickling his guts with his heel — as much as their stifling hiding place allowed, “You weren’t invited either, dipshit.”

Several feet underneath their broken spines and intertwined legs, Mori and the Executives discussed the meeting the other Four Moons had requested. Glowing blood dripped down the led lights and the chandeliers — liquid blood, liquified dawn; the blush on Madame Tanaki’s cheeks when she’d stuttered out a reason to make them take the stairs. Thank you, he hadn’t told her.

There had to be a prize, he thought. Surely, not anyone could be so stupid as to get themselves stuck in a vent with Dazai Osamu so often.

“I didn’t want to go,” Dazai brushed the matter off, lightly. “I told you once, didn’t I? Grown ups are so aggravating.”

The grown ups, he was somewhat sure, were supposed to discuss the traffic of government cars outside of their Headquarters, at some point. Do you know why they’re here?, Chuuya had barely managed to hiss to Kouyou, before the flood had swept her away to her duties.

I have my suspicions, she’d replied. Two fingers under his chin, two taps — a kiss on the forehead. Concern was not a thing of statues. Keep your gravity on your fingers, alright?

“It’s not quite the Prime Minister.”

“What?”

“You’re thinking about the cars,” Dazai guessed. “It’s not exactly the Government.” Ace snapped at something Kouyou had said. Mori observed. The electric hum in the room could have webbed every bullet-proof window; all it did, though, was sag the air with the smell of unexisting blood. “It’s the Special Division For Unusual Powers.”

Electricity scars had long since healed — the tasers couldn’t have awoken them, despite the spasms of his fingers. Still, he tasted rust. “What are they doing here?”

As estranged from the real world as Suribachi City had somehow felt, Chuuya had never needed anyone to explain who the Special Division was. When he was younger, he’d convinced himself it was a piece of information every Ability User naturally possessed — the instinctual, unexplainable fastness of preys’ limbs, all to escape predators they weren’t even aware of.

In his mind, it was a lurking shadow — grey walls, probably, and dusty archives. Dossiers on dossiers, lines of numbers on lines of numbers, names and ages and stuff Chuuya had never cared about. They were meant to keep Ability Users contained; they existed to give order to what, in his experience, existed to not be ordered.

For them to be observing the Mafia — for them to be observing him, according to Kouyou

---

“Same thing the Moons are doing, I assume,” Dazai shrugged. He hadn’t said a word about the train station; clearly, he was waiting for the best moment to snap Mori’s patience with it. The closer the meeting came — the more Chuuya wondered. “Circling the prey. Looking for mines. Searching for the poisoned apple. You can pick the metaphor. We’re having a rat infestation.”

Chuuya didn’t follow. “The fuck do rats have to do with this?”

Only one side of his mouth curled up.

There was desperation in the knowledge that even his smiles had become a language, and his pendant for them had yet to fail him; immediately, he knew he was being left out of a joke not meant for him — out of Books with capital initials and the doors of Mori’s office; because no briefing could ever be over before the Boss got his hands on secrets no promise-number-nothing could bring Dazai to spill.

“More than you’d think,” he said, at last. “About the animalistic circling. Did you kill the man from the Bishop’s Staff?”

He stared. “What?”

“The one who attacked you in the name of Pink-Hair,” Dazai yawned, accidentally — allegedly — kicking him in the side to sit up. “Did you kill him?”

“How do you even —” He took a deep breath. “No, fuckass. I didn’t kill him. I’m not stupid. Last thing we need is for them to join the other three Let’s Murder The Teens organizations,” He hooked his fingers on the metal graves. “Which Mori will kill us for, by the way. If we don’t tell him before the Moons can accuse us.”

Begrudgingly, Dazai appeared impressed. “I really am rubbing off on you, am I not? Much pleasing — for my dog for life. Less pleasing when I consider just who you are.”

The idea settled somewhere it wasn’t meant to; he knew, because bile spread through his teeth, almost drowning out the nausea resting beneath his lungs. All we share, he told himself, both a reassurance and a threat, is victims, sunburns, and scores at Smash Smash!. Nothing so serious as habits. Nothing so serious as minds.

“Says the guy who fights with his hands in his pockets,” he said, before he could stop himself.

What he could only imagine was a mirror of his own expression morphed the boy's face into a living nightmare. "No, I don't," he snapped.

The Colonel and Ace fought. Kouyou suggested the smartest solution — Mori accepted it, but pretended not to, all to watch the Executives reach for each other's throats in front of his eyes. He took that from Dazai, he assumed. Or perhaps it was the opposite.

A suffocating tunnel was all but the suitable place to wonder after the most scrutinized dynamic in the Mafia; nonetheless, Chuuya wondered. Sticking with someone, he thought, sticking on someone — was it a matter of strenght or perseverance? Dazai could have walked all over Mori in the name of stubbornness; Mori could have pulled Dazai by the tongue with a crown of power. Dazai proof-read every document Mori came up with. Dazai knew of every ounce of blood anyone in the organization spilled.

Tiring, he found himself thinking, astonishingly — before any envy, before any longing for competition. Forced closeness had to be at blame. He was close to fault the blue under Dazai's eyes to something they had wordlessly agreed not to talk about. It must be tiring.

"Are you seriously going to pass out, you waste of —"

"I believe that should be enough," Mori's voice called, several feet underneath their grates, alerted by the metallic thumps and the screeches. Uselessly, they froze. "Hirotsu, do me a favor and ask Chuuya and Dazai to join us. They should be in the Hall, correct?"

Goosebumps and needles and government cars took a step back. Breathlessly, Chuuya concluded: "Shit."

"We're leaving for the meeting in Tokyo tomorrow evening," Pleasantly, eyes to their grate, the man added: "I believe they might be interested in the information."

---

...

---

His apartment stank of fresh paint.

The warning sign still adorned the door, but Chuuya paid it little mind before pushing it open. Apart from the smell, all was as he'd left it before boarding a plane for France — which he knew, meant very little, if his sole piece of furniture was a bean bag.

He strided to his room, only offering a quick glance to the white tents draped all over the ceiling. Abandoned jars of paint and wide brushes littered the floor; some of his French textbooks were still on the table. On the doorframe that led to the dark hallway, two gashes left by a knife still tainted the wood — two names next to them. Chuuya vowed to never measure heights with the mackerel again, if it would assure him the distance would stay minimal — on paper, at least.

He found the box where he'd left it: deep in his wardrobe — still compartmentalized as Shit with a scribble on the lid; still fraying at the edges.

Opening it was muscle memory; one particular addiction he had given up sometimes around the first laughter out of Albatross' mouth. The blue bracelet was faded and frail with use; it had survived seven years of mindless abuse — of heartfelt, bare-teeth protection — and several weeks of munching; of pulling until it broke but never did; of snapping his wrist with it. Mindless habit, pointless retribution, nothing at all — because it was just a damn bracelet.

“Still smells like sewers, too,” he muttered.

There was still dried blood on the pocket knife.

He had thought about giving it back to Shirase, when he'd left for London. It had seemed cruel. Look at it, he wouldn't have said, look at it and bring it with you and never forget what you did.

It made for a guilt Chuuya didn't care to receive. And so he'd kept it.

Grudges can grow, Kouyou had told him, when she'd investigated around his haunted mansion. They have roots sturdier than most trees, and they rarely need more than space.

And I don't hold any, he'd replied. So it's fine.

Chuuya, she'd sighed, soft and gentle, death under her sleeves and fingers on his face. He had fallen asleep in front of her for the first time, some days before; had woken up to her secret smile and hums. Clean that knife.

“It is clean,” he said — because he hadn't, to her. Crimson bloomed on the tip, trailing off in shattered roads all the way to the edge of the blade. It would never wash off. Its rusty metal still ran across his veins; it will never be cleaner.

He picked up the last object in the box and shut it.

(He wished to find a way to explain — wished to explain the threads keeping his skeleton together in a way that would not birth pity.

I don't blame them, he longed to make them understand — yearned to liquify the soil and rocks of Suribachi City, the sunlight in the coldest days of winter, the bruises he'd gotten himself by racing through alleys more familiar than his own limbs. He remembered being young, and wishing the crater could take the place of his carcass; being convinced his mind would fare off better, if allowed to spread through those roads it knew so well. That Arahabaki would be delighted and alive and quiet.

I cannot blame them, he wished to say. They did what I would have.

But words were a thing of other creatures — not fake gods and not humans and not anything else he resembled. So he kept his bloodied knife, because the blood was his and the blade was his best friend's, and he said anything but what he needed to).

---

...

---

“Didn’t we agree to give her space?” were Koda’s first words, as he pushed the door of the Orphanage open. Two or three children were hanging from his legs, whining and begging for his attention; on his shoulders, Uchiyama lit up the moment he recognized who their guest was.

“Maybe I’m here for you ungrateful sons of a bitch,” Chuuya grunted, shouldering his way inside, sending a half-hearted warning glance to the kid when his fingers excitedly pulled at his ponytail.

“And daughters,” Tsuchiya chirped, perched on the counter, playing Poker with Rin. As she spoke, they exchanged a high-five. “Thank you very much for the generalization, Boss.”

“Forgive him,” Noguchi burped. “Bet the punk doesn’t even know the difference.”

Kenta perked up from under a pile of children, busy asking stories for each scar they located on his naked chest. “Wouldn’t that be more inclusive, to be precise?”

Growing familiar with the flowered walls of an Orphanage would have torn a younger Chuuya’s bones apart — pulling at some deeply untrusting part of him; knocking with a confidence he would have compared to dead-eyed cops and offers he would have laughed at, under a falling bridge, surrounded by other disenchanted people like him.

It was easier these days. The open door behind his back played a big role in that comfort, he assumed.

But he knew which tiles would creak under his feet; knew which glasses he wasn’t allowed to touch, claimed with all but a scribbled tag. But the kids greeted him by name as he made his way to his friends, blabbering about some plan of theirs he could remember hearing about during his last visit.

“What’s that?” Virgil asked, appearing behind him. Chuuya wasn’t easily startled; he still directed a dirty glance to his sneaking frame.

“Something I have to give Yuan before leaving,” he said, curtly, stealing an orange from the bowl on the table. “Is she in her room?”

“Is she ever anywhere else?” Kenta replied. A flying Jack of Hearts attempted to cut his nose off; he grabbed with ease, but it didn’t stop him from falling victim to the little beasts trying to pull his pants down. “What in the goddamn fuck, Rin —“

“Leave the kid alone,” she ordered, eyes still on her game. “If I was traumatized, and the perspective of leaving brought me to your dirty mug, I’d stay in my room, too.”

“You’re such a bitch.”

“You’re a cunt.”

“Children,” Tsuchiya called, playing with the black eyepatch Virgil had gifted her. Someone — one of the kids, he assumed — had drawn a pirate symbol on the fabric. “I’m sure you’re both whores. Can you shut the fuck up?”

“Yuan is fine,” Noguchi grunted, mouth still on his beer bottle. He rarely met his eyes when talking about her — Chuuya suspected he had genuine faith in his own ability to pretend he hadn’t developed an appreciation of sorts for the ex-Sheep.

It had started, according to Koda’s amused whispers in the hallways, after Yuan had made the mistake of trying to sneak out. An altercation of sorts had taken place in the kitchen, and she’d ended up kicking him hard enough between the legs to render him speechless for the next hour. She had stormed back into her room, but the show of unfamiliar street-swearing mixed with her ruthless viciousness had tickled Noguchi’s interest.

They’re always fighting about something, Koda had shaken his head. He’s t-there whenever she pushes her nose out of the door. She seems to believe he’s both a stalker and the ugliest fucker on earth. Noguchi thinks she’s the devil spawn. They’re a perfect match.

“Little brat still refuses to talk to the other kids, though,” Noguchi continued, scoffing. “Not that I blame her. If I had grown up surrounded by pathetic diapers-wearing motherfuckers with guns, I’d be pretty tired of children too.”

“None of the Sheep were young enough to have diapers,” Chuuya replied, helpfully, throwing the orange to his head to watch him bounce back. He picked up another one and made his way to the stairs, ignoring the strings of uncensored curses thrown his way. “I’m giving you the maps for the shit we need to do when I’m back. Do something with them while I’m gone.”

“Aye-aye, Boss,” came the chorus.

“Something that’s not crumpling them up and going to the Tournament without me.”

A little more hesitant: “Aye, aye.”

“Fuck all of you,” he grunted. A moving obstacle crashed against his legs; wide eyes settled on his face, and a surprised gasp left a chocolate-stained mouth — a perfect match to the maroon lines now printed down his pants. “Sayuri, we’ve talked about watching where you put your feet, haven’t we?”

“Sorry!” she squealed, unapologetic. “Do you have any more money, sir?”

“You opportunistic little —“

Featherlight steps down the stairs, fingers littered in band-aids gripping the wooden railing. If you learn someone’s steps, one of the older Sheep had told him, before leaving him in the grungy boxes where they lived, you will always know when to open the door.

A deer in the headlights would have stiffened slower than Yuan’s whole frame did, as she came to a halt before the last step. Uncaring of the storm of children running through the hallway, of the laughter coming from the door to the kitchen, she stared at him — significantly less soaked and frantic than she’d been the last time he’d seen her, on the porch of a less constricting cage he didn’t know if she’d choose to flee.

Endlessly stoic, Chuuya retraced every French swear word Kajii had ever taught him.

“Hey,” he grunted, hands migrating to his pockets.

She gripped the railing. “Chuuya.”

Sayari blinked, letting go of his pants. Whatever child-proof signal she sent to the rest of the crowd in the hallway — in less time it took Yuan to actually take the last step, the space was cleared out. Someone had gotten rid of Yuan’s old gown; the overgrown jeans and hoodie she was wearing were old and faded, but they settled something in his throat. She looked tired — but there.

“Are you,” she trailed off. Her tone had changed when she spoke again — but Chuuya was helpless to understand how. “Are you leaving?”

I just arrived, he almost said, dumbly, and he felt it set his ears on fire. She must have heard chatter float from the kitchen. “There’s a meeting,” he confirmed, munching on his cheek. He wouldn’t risk the words Port Mafia around her; not yet. “I — shouldn’t tell you about it.”

The corners of her mouth touched the unswept floor. She was rolling something between her hands; the pink flip-phone he’d asked Koda to give her. “Probably not.”

“I’ll make sure the Bishop’s Staff is not looking for you,” he added, eventually, after debating some more.

Yuan recoiled, flinching. “You don’t — you shouldn’t have to.”

“It’s fine.”

“I don’t want,” A pause. He wondered how she’d spent the time since they’d last seen each other; if she’d replayed their conversations the way Chuuya hadn’t wanted to — if she’d told Shirase about them. “I don’t want you to fix a mess I made myself.”

Good, the spiteful part of him thought. Good, you know you —

It tasted like most food did.

“Why did you go to them?” Chuuya asked. “You might have been helpless, but you know Suribachi City. If you’d stayed there, you would have been in your territory.”

“I was the only one left,” A glossy texture overcame her eyes; something distracted. There were massacres he hadn’t been there to witness, and Arahabaki suffered the loss more than he could bring himself to. “I think — I don’t know if we’re all dead,” She blinked. “They. If they’re all dead. Some just... ran. I thought I could stay put and wait for them, but — it was horrible.” Her teeth sunk in her lip, too violent for the delicate, dreamy tilt of her vowels. “I kept seeing them everywhere. There was nothing left for me in that place.”

Fifteen, he thought. She was fifteen; she’d been fourteen when he’d left. She’d been fourteen when she’d vouched for a poisonous knife in his side, because he’d told them it would slow down his Ability.

Hands tightening around the phone, she whispered: “You know, I’ve always wanted kids.”

Chuuya stared. “Yeah. I remember.”

Family was something most street-kids longed for; a communal desire that felt no need to be molded into reality, or into any understandable language. They didn’t talk about it; didn’t mention how a few hours alone could easily rush from peace to torture, when all they’d ever known was — chaos. People. The rumble of presence.

But Yuan had been strangely vocal about it. When I make myself a family, she would tell him, I’m going to have at least twelve kids.

It had been the rambling of a child, partly; but he knew there was truth to it, too. She needed people more than she needed to breathe. Even now, it was clear the atmosphere of the Orphanage was pulling at her threads — slowly, torturously so, closing the cracks scattered all over her skin.

“It just seemed like the easiest option,” Yuan concluded. “No job would take me. I didn’t have any kind of identification. Plus, they only ever took boys in the factories. Some of the girls, they...” She gulped. “But I didn’t want to do that. I really didn’t, so —”

A small, insistent bug that had been flying near his ears sparked to life. Chuuya recalled the dead eyes of women in Suribachi — bony legs peeking from plastic bags. He hesitated; then: “Do you need to see a doctor?”

“What?”

“A doctor,” he repeated, more brusque than he would have liked to — strayed at the edges like every inch of him; unblunted and unsoftened by his useless efforts. “You don’t have to tell me shit, if you don’t want to, but — Rin and Tsuchiya would be glad to talk it out. Green and silver hair? Silver hair comes from Suribachi, you know. She and her brother worked at the Tailor, for a little while.”

Yuan’s eyes darted to the kitchen door. “The brothel?” she dared.

“Yeah. So, if you need —” He cursed the words stuck on his tongue; spat them out. “If you need to get checked out — if something happened to you —“

“No, Chuuya. Not that,” she cut him off. Discomfort made her look younger; she crossed her arms. “I was just — I was recognizable, before the hair dye started washing off. Too many people had grudges. I got roughoused a lot. If I’d let someone do something, it would have been because I wanted —” A scoff. “Something.”

His relief felt dirty; heavy on the brink of his nose, soft enough to tickle down his shoulders. There were corpses all around the room; their bones crunched with every step he took.
Making this about you?

Who else, he thought. Who else do I make it about, if they’re dead?

“A doctor might be good, though,” she admitted, quietly.

“Yeah, alright,” He nodded, and couldn’t really stop. This, at least, was familiar. He’d spent half of his life dragging the Sheep around the nearest thing to pass for a professional in the settlement; given how he couldn’t get sick, it was the perfect solution. “I’ll find someone. Someone trustable. Don’t worry about it.”

He regretted coming, suddenly. Then he gave himself a shake and told the regret to get fucked; and then told himself too, for good measure. If you hate it, it’s probably the best solution, Pianoman would have said.

“Here,” Chuuya handed her the plastic bag, making sure not to take any steps forward. “I have to leave, but I brought you this.”

A glint of confusion lit up her traits; it was better than the blankness and the eyebags, so he took it. She sunk her hand in the bag and searched, squinting. Stunned, she stilled.

“You,” Yuan started. Nothing else came out.

The green jacket was in fairly good condition, considering Chuuya had left it in a garbage can for the first week after taking it off — vowing to never look at it again. Kouyou had been the one to clean it up, back then, after taking one look at the rigid set of his shoulders. He’d wondered — whenever he removed the lid from the box and studied his only old possessions — whether she’d just bought another identical one to fool him.

Would it matter? He’d heard some parents did the same thing with their children’s pets. That wasn’t even a real thing. It was just a stupid jacket. He couldn’t even remember which Sheep had pushed it into his hands, after digging through the abandoned clothing — warning him that he’d better not grow into it too soon.

“I thought I’d thrown it away, but seems not,” he lied, settling his eyes wherever she wasn’t. Some strength more, and his knuckles would tear holes in his pockets. “I don’t need it, though, so you can have it. Or you can burn it, I don’t know. I doubt you have any shit with you, so I thought, maybe...”

Chuuya huffed, unnerved.

Had thought what? That she would enjoy the reminder that he was not a Sheep anymore? That she would wear that jacket and be alright with dragging her eyes all the way to his own? That she wouldn’t know he hadn’t thrown it out — that it had been almost two years and he was just as haunted by the Sheep as their only members left still were by him?

“Whatever,” He cleared his throat. “I’m gonna go. I’m already late, and those rich men cars are shit with the evening traffic. My number’s on your phone, if you need — I don’t know.” He was rambling. He wanted to leave. He wanted to sit on the floor and listen to her aggravating, familiar voice. “Try not to make anyone’s life a living hell and — for fuck’s sake, stay away from that Church.”

He dug holes in the hallway and into the kitchen with his strides, fingers itching for a sturdy door to slam. Abruptly, she called: “Chuuya.”

Lips tight, he turned.

Fingers covered in band-aids intertwined green fabric, desperate; he was reminded, pointlessly, of her hands around his arm. Pulling and pulling — let’s go home, Chuuya. Her frame was shaking from head to toe. His brain settled on the wet roads down her cheeks and shut down.

She opened her mouth, then closed it again. He wondered, for the first time, if Noguchi had had a point — if she had no idea of what to say to him either.

